START

Microfilmed By:

NORTHEAST DOCUMENT CONSERVATION CENTER
Andover, MA 01810

August 1994

Camera Operator:
John Sullivan

MASTER

NEGATIVE NUMBER: BSO-56-067

MICROFILMED
August 1993 - April 1994

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA SCRAPBOOK MICROFILMING PROJECT

Funded in part by

THE NATIONAL ENDOWMENT FOR THE HUMANITIES

Grant No. PS-20709-93

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA MICROFILMING PROJECT

A Cooperative Project Between the Boston Symphony Orchestra Archives and the Boston Public Library (August 1993 - April 1994)

The Microfilming Project incorporates two collections of scrapbooks housed in two separate repositories. The first set of scrapbooks (80 volumes) resides within the Allen A. Brown Collection of the Boston Public Library (BPL) Music Department. Their call number is M.125.5. The second set of scrapbooks (132 volumes) resides within the Press Clippings collection of the Boston Symphony Orchestra (BSO) Archives. They have the designation Pres 56.

The BPL scrapbooks begin with the founding of the BSO in 1881 and continue, through 79 seasons, to 1960. Articles consist mainly of reviews and feature stories from Boston and New York newspapers. Occasionally, magazine articles and press releases are also included. The scrapbooks cover most aspects of the BSO.

The BSO scrapbooks run from 1889, the Orchestra's 9th season, to 1973. In addition to local reviews and features, the volumes contain articles culled from national and international publications. The scrapbooks document, in detail, all aspects of the BSO: The Symphony Orchestra (including subscription concerts, tours, and trips), the Boston Pops, the Tanglewood Festival, the Tanglewood Music Center, and Symphony Hall.

The two sets of scrapbooks have been filmed as two separate entities. Researchers wanting to look at specific seasons or subjects must examine both sets of films to ensure full coverage.

The scrapbooks do not represent the complete holdings of either location on the subject of the BSO.

Requests for positive microfilm copies of individual rolls, or of film sets, should be directed to the respective repository:

Music Department
Boston Public Library
Post Office Box 286
Boston, MA 02117

Boston Symphony Orchestra Archives
Symphony Hall
Boston, MA 02115

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA SCRAPBOOKS

1889 - 1973

132 VOLUMES

Source: Boston Symphony Orchestra Archives

FINDING AID

Boston Symphony Orchestra Scrapbooks (Series 56, Sub-Series 1)

Source: Press Office (Office of the Public Relations Director)

The BSO scrapbooks comprise part of one series in the BSO Archives. Series 56, Press Clippings, is divided by format into 3 sub-series: 1) Scrapbooks, 1889-1973 (132 volumes); 2) Loose Clippings, 1931-1991 (9 record cartons); and 3) Oversize Newspapers and Journals, 1919-1979 (1 oversize box). Each sub-series is arranged chronologically.

The scrapbooks contain concert notices and reviews, record reviews, and feature articles. Early scrapbooks may also contain programs, tickets, and subscription orders. Materials are organized by concert season into the following categories: BSO (including tours); Kneisel Quartet (and later Boston Symphony Chamber Players); Boston Pops (referred to in early years as Promenade concerts); and Tanglewood (including the Tanglewood Music Center, the Tanglewood Festival, Tanglewood-on-Parade, and the Fromm Festival of Contemporary Music).

Reviews and articles cover a wide range of subjects: Founder H.L. Higginson; BSO conductors, players, trustees, and other personnel; guest artists and composers; BSO and Pops performances and recordings; U.S. and overseas tours; BSO/Cecilia Society joint performances; open rehearsals; and special events connected to anniversary celebrations and fundraising.

Feature stories document changes in the size, composition, and location of the orchestra. Topics include the hiring of women and minorities; the unionization of players; controversies (such as the internment of conductor Karl Muck during World War II); the sale of the old Music Hall; and the construction of Symphony Hall and other structures (such as the Koussevitsky Music Shed at Tanglewood).

Reproductions of the materials in the collection may not be made without permission from the Boston Symphony Orchestra Archives.

GUIDE TO CONTENTS

Institution: BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Series Name: PRESS CLIPPINGS
Series Number: 56
Series Dates: 1889-1991

Sub-series Name: SCRAPBOOKS
Sub-series Number: 1
Sub-series Dates: 1889-1973

VOLUME LISTING

VOL	TITLE	DATES
1	BSO	1889-1890
2	BSO Kneisel Quartet	1890-1891
3	BSO	1891-1892
4	Promenade (Pops)	1892
5	BSO Kneisel Quartet	1892-1893
6	BSO Kneisel Quartet	1893-1894
7	BSO Kneisel Quartet	1894-1895
8	BSO	1895-1896
9	Promenade (Pops)	1895-1896
10	BSO	1896-1897
11	BSO	1897-1898
12	Promenade (Pops)	1897-1898
13	BSO	1898-1899
14	BSO	1899-1900
15	Pops	1899-1900
16	BSO	1900-1901
17	BSO	1901-1902
18	Pops	1901-1903
19	BSO	1902-1903
20	BSO	1903-1904
21	BSO	1904-1905
22	Pops	1904-1905
23	BSO	1905-1906
24	BSO	1906-1907
25	BSO	1907-1908
26	BSO	1908-1909
27	BSO Pops	1909-1910
28	BSO Pops	1910-1911
29	BSO Advertisements	1910-1911
30	BSO Pops	1911-1912
31	BSO Pops	1912-1913
32	BSO Pops	1913-1914
33	BSO Pops	1914-1915
34	BSO Pops	1915-1916
35	BSO Pops	1916-1917
36	BSO Pops	1917-1918
37	Karl Muck	1918
38	BSO Pops	1918-1919
39	BSO Pops	1919-1920
40	BSO Advertisements	1919-1920
41	BSO Pops	1920-1921
42	BSO Pops	1921-1922
43	BSO BSO Advertisements Pops Advertisements	1922-1923
44	BSO Pops	1922-1924
45	BSO Pops	1924
46	BSO BSO Advertisements Pops Advertisements	1924-1926
47	BSO Pops	1925-1926
48	BSO Advertisements Pops Advertisements	1926-1927
49	BSO Pops	1926-1928
50	BSO	1928
51	BSO Pops	1928-1929
52	BSO Pops U.S. Tour	1929-1930
53	BSO	1930-1931
54	BSO Pops	1931-1932
55	BSO Pops	1932-1933
56	BSO	1933-1934
57	BSO	1934-1935
58	BSO	1935-1936
59	BSO	1936-1937

VOL	TITLE	DATES
60	Pops
	Tanglewood	1936-1937
61	BSO	1937
62	BSO	1937-1938
63	Pops
	Tanglewood	1938
64	BSO	1938-1939
65	Pops
	Tanglewood	1939
66	BSO	1939-1940
67	Tanglewood	1939-1941
68	BSO
	Pops	1940
69	BSO	1940-1941
70	Tanglewood	1940-1944
71	BSO	1941-1942
72	BSO	1942-1943
73	BSO	1943-1944
74	BSO
	Pops
	Tanglewood	1944-1945
75	BSO
	Pops
	Tanglewood	1945-1946
76	BSO
	Pops
	Tanglewood	1946-1947
77	Tanglewood	1947-1948
78	BSO	1947-1949
79	Tanglewood	1949-1950
80	BSO	1949-1951
81	Tanglewood	1950-1951
82	BSO
	Pops	1951-1952
83	BSO
	Pops	1952-1953
84	Tanglewood	1952-1953
85	BSO	1953-1955
86	Tanglewood	1953-1954
87	Tanglewood	1954-1955
88	BSO
	Pops	1955-1956
89	Tanglewood	1955-1956
90	Tanglewood	1955-1956
91	European Tour	1956
92	European Tour	1956-1957
93	BSO
	Pops	1956-1957
94	Tanglewood	1957
95	BSO	1957-1958
96	BSO
	Pops	1958-1959
97	BSO	1958-1959
98	Tanglewood	1958-1959
99	Tanglewood	1959
100	BSO
	Pops	1959-1960
101	Tanglewood	1959-1960
102	Far Eastern Tour	1959-1960
103	BSO
	Pops	1960-1961
104	Tanglewood	1961
105	BSO
	Pops	1961-1962
106	Tanglewood	1962
107	BSO
	Pops	1962-1963
108	Tanglewood	1963
109	BSO
	Pops	1963-1964
110	Tanglewood	1963-1964
111	BSO
	Pops	1964-1966
112	Tanglewood	1965
113	BSO 85th Anniversary	1965
114	BSO
	Pops	1965-1966
115	Tanglewood	1966
116	BSO
	Pops	1966-1967
117	Tanglewood	1967
118	BSO
	Pops	1967-1968
119	Tanglewood	1968-1969
120	BSO
	Pops	1968-1969
121	Tanglewood	1969
122	BSO
	Pops	1969-1970
123	Tanglewood	1970
124	BSO
	Pops	1970-1971
125	Tanglewood	1971
126	BSO
	Pops	1971-1972
127	European Tour	1970-1971
128	European Tour	1971
129	Tanglewood	1972
130	BSO
	Pops	1972-1973
131	Tanglewood	1973
132	BSO
	Pops	1973-1974

MATERIALS NOT FILMED

SUB-SERIES NUMBER	SUB-SERIES NAME	SUB-SERIES DATES
2	Loose Clippings	1931-1991
3	Oversize Newspapers and Journals	1919-1979

COPYRIGHT STATEMENT

The copyright law of the Unites States - Title 17, United States Code - concerns the making of photocopies or other reproductions of copyrighted material.

Under certain conditions specified in the law, libraries and archives are authorized to furnish a photocopy or other reproduction. One of these specified conditions is that the photocopy or other reproduction is not to be "used for any purpose other than private study, scholarship, or research." If a user makes a request for, or later uses, a photocopy or reproduction for purposes in excess of "fair use," that user may be liable for copyright infringement.

This institution reserves the right to refuse to accept a copy order if, in its judgment, fulfillment of the order would involve violation of the copy-right law.

TECHNICAL DATA

IMAGE PLACEMENT: (IA) IB IIA IIB

REDUCTION RATIO: 14X

FILM STOCK:

REEL 67

Volumes 109-110

BSO, Pops, Tangelwood

1963-1964

PM-MGP 13"x18" METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET PHOTOGRAPHIC

A3

200 mm

A4

150 mm

A5

100 mm

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&D
1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

MULTIPLE EXPOSURES DUE TO COLOR VARIATIONS AND OVERLAPPING MATERIAL

VOLUME 109

BSO
Pops

1963 - 1964

NATIONAL FLAT BACK SCRAP BOOKS

NATIONAL Made in U.S.A.

FULL DUCK COVER, MANILA PAPER

Without Index, Ruling, Paging or Title

NUMBER	THICKNESS	SIZE
56-032	72 Leaves	12⅝ × 10¼
56-033	72 Leaves	15 × 10
56-034	100 Leaves	15 × 10
56-036	90 Leaves	16 × 11⅜
56-038	150 Leaves	16 × 11⅜
56-039	90 Leaves	18 × 13
→ 56-041	150 Leaves	18 × 13
56-042	150 Leaves	25 × 20

To duplicate this book Order Number indicated by arrow

I N D E X

PRE-SEASON 3

BOSTON 1 14

BOSTON 2 16

SUNDAY 1, TUESDAY 1 18

BOSTON 3 20

MONTREAL 22

NORTHAMPTON 24

"CAMBRIDGE" 1 25

BOSTON 4 .....Britten's War Requiem..... 25

TOUR No. 1 29

PROVIDENCE 1 38

BOSTON 5 .....Richard Burgin, Cond..... 40

CONCORD,N.H. 42

TUESDAY 2 .....R. Burgin,Cond., ... 43

BOSTON 6 .....Burgin....Jeanne-Marie Darré,Piano..... 43

SUNDAY 2 .....Burgin....Darré..... 45

"CAMBRIDGE" 2 .....Theodore Lettvin, Piano..... 46

BOSTON 7 .....George Zazofsky, Violin..... 47

MONDAY 1 48

TUESDAY 3 .....G. Zazofsky, Violin..... 48

BOSTON 8 .....Idel Biret, Piano..... 49

TUESDAY 4 .....I.Biret..... 52

BOSTON 9 .....I. Biret..... 53

TOUR # 2 56

PROVIDENCE 2 64

MONDAY 2 .....I. Biret..... 65

BOSTON 10 .....Joseph Silverstein, Violin..... 65

SUNDAY 3 .....J.Silverstein..... 67

TUESDAY 5 .....Theodore Lettvin, Piano..... 68

BOSTON 11 .....Pierre Monteux, Conductor..... 68

TUESDAY 6, BOSTON 12 72

MONDAY 3 75

CAMBRIDGE 3 .....J. Silverstein..... 75

SUNDAY 4 .....Lorin Hollander, Piano..... 75

BOSTON 13 .....L. Hollander..... 76

SUNDAY 4 .....L. Hollander..... 78

BOSTON 14 78

PROVIDENCE 3 80

TOUR # 3 81

PROVIDENCE 4 .....Postponed to March 3rd. See Page 112..... 88

ANNUAL FRIENDS MEETING 191

AWARDS 193

B.S.O. MEMBERS ACTIVITIES 197

APPOINTMENTS, RESIGNATIONS & RETIREMENTS 206

OBITUARIES 213

MISCELLANEOUS 223

RADIO & TELEVISON 254

RECORDS 259

BOSTON 15 .....Kaddish by Bernstein..... 89

MONDAY 4, TUESDAY 7.....Kaddish..... 95

BOSTON 16 .....Charles Munch, Cond.,.....N. Henriot-Schweitzer, Piano..... 96

BOSTON 17 .....Rudolf Serkin, Piano..... 98

"CAMBRIDGE" 4 98

SUNDAY 5 .....Serkin, Piano..... Postponed to April 5. See Page 143..... 101

TUESDAY 8..... 101

BOSTON 18 .....Phyllis Curtin, Soprano..... 103

BALTIMORE 106

PHILADELPHIA 108

TOUR # 4 110

PROVIDENCE 4 .....Postponed from January 28th, 1964. See Page 88..... 112

BOSTON 19, Monday 5, Tuesday 9 .....Leopold Stowkowski, Conductor..... 113

BOSTON 20 .....Van Cliburn, Piano..... 117

PROVIDENCE 5 120

BOSTON 21 .....Ruth Posselt, Violin..... 121

SUNDAY 6 121

"CAMBRIDGE" 5 .....Lorin Hollander, Piano..... 124

BOSTON 22 ..... Harvard & Radcliffe Chorus..... 124

WASHINGTON 126

TOUR # 5 140

MONDAY 6, TUESDAY 10 143

BOSTON 23 .....Erick Friedman, Violin..... 143

SUNDAY 5 .....Grant Johannessen, Piano.....Postponed from February 16th. See Page101. 143

"CAMBRIDGE 6 .....Harvard & Radcliffe Chorus..... 148

BOSTON 24 148

PENSION FUND CONCERT .....Artur Rubinstein, Piano..... 153

SPRINGFIELD 155

OPEN REHEARSALS..... 157

YOUTH CONCERTS 158

ORGAN CONCERTS 169

COUNCIL OF FRIENDS 174

SYMPHONY WEEK 188

ANNUAL FRIENDS MEETING 191

AWARDS 193

B.S.O. MEMBERS ACTIVITIES 197

APPOINTMENTS, RESIGNATIONS & RETIREMENTS 206

OBITUARIES 213

MISCELLANEOUS 223

RADIO & TELEVISON 254

RECORDS 259

Boston Symphony Orchestra

ERICH LEINSDORF, Music Director

SCHEDULE OF CONCERTS

WINTER SEASON 1963–1964

SEPTEMBER
27–28	Boston	(Fri.-Sat. I)
OCTOBER
1	Montreal
4–5	Boston	(Fri.-Sat. II)
6	Boston	(Sun. I)
8	Boston	(Tues. I)
10	Boston	(Rehearsal I)
11–12	Boston	(Fri.-Sat. III)
13	Northampton
15	Boston	("Cambridge" I)
17	Boston	(Special IV)
18–19	Boston	(Fri.-Sat. IV)
21	South Hadley
22	New Haven	(I)
23	New York	(Wed. I)
24	Brooklyn	(I)
25	New York	(Fri. I)
26	New York	(Special I)
29	Providence	(I)
NOVEMBER
1–2	Boston	(Fri.-Sat. V)
3	Concord, N.H.
5	Boston	(Tues. II)
8–9	Boston	(Fri.-Sat. VI)
10	Boston	(Sun. II)
12	Boston	("Cambridge" II)
14	Boston	(Rehearsal II)
15–16	Boston	(Fri.-Sat. VII)
18	Boston	(Mon. I)
19	Boston	(Tues. III)
22–23	Boston	(Fri.-Sat. VIII)
26	Boston	(Tues. IV)
29–30	Boston	(Fri.-Sat. IX)
DECEMBER
2	Storrs
3	New London
4	New York	(Wed. II)
5	Brooklyn	(II)
6	New York	(Fri. II)
7	New York	(Carnegie Hall I)
9	Boston	(Mon. II)
10	Providence	(II)
13–14	Boston	(Fri.-Sat. X)
15	Boston	(Sun. III)
17	Boston	(Tues. V)
19	Boston	(Rehearsal III)
20–21	Boston	(Fri.-Sat. XI)
31	Boston	(Tues. VI)
JANUARY
3–4	Boston	(Fri.-Sat. XII)
6	Boston	(Mon. III)
7	Boston	("Cambridge" III)
10–11	Boston	(Fri.-Sat. XIII)
12	Boston	(Sun. IV)
JANUARY (continued)
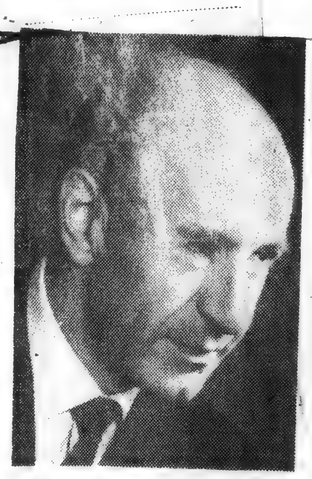
14	Providence	(III)
16	Boston	(Rehearsal IV)
17–18	Boston	(Fri.-Sat. XIV)
20	Hartford
21	New Haven	(II)
22	New York	(Wed. III)
23	Brooklyn	(III)
24	New York	(Fri. III)
25	New York	(Carnegie Hall II)
28	Providence	(IV)
31	Boston	(Fri. XV)
FEBRUARY
1	Boston	(Sat. XV)
3	Boston	(Mon. IV)
4	Boston	(Tues. VII)
6	Boston	(Rehearsal V)
7–8	Boston	(Fri.-Sat. XVI)
11	Boston	("Cambridge" IV)
13	Boston	(Rehearsal VI)
14–15	Boston	(Fri.-Sat. XVII)
16	Boston	(Sun. V)
18	Boston	(Tues. VIII)
21–22	Boston	(Fri.-Sat. XVIII)
23	Baltimore
24	Philadelphia
26	New York	(Wed. IV)
27	Brooklyn	(IV)
28	New York	(Fri. IV)
29	Bridgeport
MARCH
6–7	Boston	(Fri.-Sat. XIX)
9	Boston	(Mon. V)
10	Boston	(Tues. IX)
13–14	Boston	(Fri.-Sat. XX)
17	Providence	(V)
19	Boston	(Rehearsal VII)
20–21	Boston	(Fri.-Sat. XXI)
22	Boston	(Sun. VI)
24	Boston	("Cambridge" V)
26–28	Boston	(Thurs.-Sat. XXII)
30	Washington	(I)
31	Washington	(II)
APRIL
1	New York	(Wed. V)
2	Brooklyn	(V)
3	New York	(Fri. V)
6	Boston	(Mon. VI)
7	Boston	(Tues. X)
10–11	Boston	(Fri.-Sat. XXIII)
14	Boston	("Cambridge" VI)
16	Boston	(Rehearsal VIII)
17–18	Boston	(Fri.-Sat. XXIV)
19	Boston	(Special Concert)
21	Springfield

PRE-SEASON

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Patriot-Ledger (e)
QUINCY, Mass.
Circ. 44,419



ANOTHER OPENING: Erich Leinsdorf begins his second season as music director when the Boston Symphony Orchestra starts its 83rd year Friday at Symphony Hall. He will conduct Friday afternoon and Saturday evening featuring works by Hindemith, Barber and Brahms.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sun (e)
LOWELL, Mass.
Circ. 45,001
SEP 21 1963

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Enterprise & Times (e)
BROCKTON, Mass.
Circ. 45,777
SEP 14 1963

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Telegram (m)
BRIDGEPORT, Conn.
Circ. 13,172
SEP 20 1963

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Patriot-Ledger (e)
QUINCY, Mass.
Circ. 44,419
SEP 12 1963

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Ledger-Times
BOSTON, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 14,000
SEP 19 1963

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 465,653
SEP 22 1963

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Herald
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 283,819
SEP 22 1963

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Christian Science
Monitor (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 174,850
SEP 14 1963

Stokowski Invited To Lead

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its 83d season on Sept. 27 in Symphony Hall. Erich Leinsdorf, who begins his second year as the orchestra's music director, has invited Pierre Monteux and Charles Munch, the Boston Symphony's two living former music directors, to be guest conductors this season. Leopold Stokowski will make his first appearances with the orchestra this winter, and Richard Burgin will also conduct.

Five pianists have been invited by Mr. Leinsdorf to perform with the orchestra, including the Turkist pianist Idil Biret, who will be making her American debut with the Boston Symphony at Symphony Hall. Other pianists to be heard are Jeanne-Marie Darré, Lorin Hollander, Rudolf Serkin, and Van Cliburn. Erick Friedman will be violin soloist, and Mr. Leinsdorf has asked several members of the orchestra to be guest soloists.

Thomas D. Perry Jr., manager of the Boston Symphony, has announced that the orchestra's winter season will include 123 performances in Symphony Hall and on tour. The Symphony Hall concerts, as announced by Mr. Perry, include 24 Friday afternoons and 24 Saturday evenings, with 6 Sundays, 6 Mondays, 6 Tuesdays in the "Cambridge Series," 10 regular Tuesday concerts, and a series of eight open rehearsals for the benefit of the orchestra's pension fund.

During the eighty-third season the orchestra will appear in several other New England cities including Providence, R.I.; Northampton, South Hadley, and Springfield in Massachusetts; Bridgeport, Hartford, New Haven, New London, and Storrs in Connecticut; and Concord, N.H.

Other cities to be visited are New York City for the 78th consecutive year, Brooklyn, Baltimore, Philadelphia, and Washington.

The orchestra will make a special trip to Montreal to participate in the opening performances of the new Palais des Arts in that city.

In addition to its five Wednesday and five Friday programs in Philharmonic Hall, New York, the Boston Symphony will appear in Carnegie Hall, New York, as a part of the International Festival of Visiting Orchestras.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Transcript-Telegram (e)
HOLYOKE, Mass.
Circ. 26,063
SEP 16 1963

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Patriot-Ledger (e)
QUINCY, Mass.
Circ. 44,419
SEP 19 1963

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Standard-Times (e)
NEW BEDFORD, Mass.
Circ. 65,046
SEP 14 1963

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Berkshire Eagle (e)
PITTSFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 29,084
SEP 12 1963

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Record-American (m) (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 452,333
SEP 17 1963

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Republican
WATERBURY, Conn.
Circ. 49,216
SEP 15 1963

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Standard-Times
NEW BEDFORD, Mass.
Circ. 52,312
SEP 15 1963

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 465,653
SEP 15 1963

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Christian Science
Montor (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 174,850
SEP 21 1963

Symphony Time Change

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's Friday afternoon concerts will have a new starting time of 2 o'clock. The starting hour of the Friday programs has been advanced to enable its subscribers to avoid the peak of the Friday evening rush hours.

The Orchestra's evening and Sunday afternoon concerts will continue to begin at 8:30 p.m. and 3 p.m. respectively.

NEWARK STAR LEDGER
NEWARK, N. J.
SEP 29 1963

THOUGH IT would hardly seem possible that there is an orchestra in this country that Leopold Stokowski hasn't conducted in his long career, he has a "debut" scheduled this season with one of the oldest—the Boston Symphony. He will be one of three guests invited by Music Director Erich Leinsdorf, the others all familiar to the home public: his predecessors Charles Munch and Pierre Monteaux, and his associate Richard Burgin.

* * *

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 194,870
SEP 28 1963

Salute to Symphony

In Boston the real arrival of Autumn has little to do with the calendar, or with local baseball's pre-World Series fadeout. The great moment arrives when Erich Leinsdorf, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, raises his hands as he did Friday, to open the new season.

The melodious strains of Hindemith's Symphonic Metamorphosis were a reminder also that concert music here in the United States enjoys a popularity baseball might envy. According to a recent survey, more people attend symphonic and other concerts than attend all major and minor league games, including the World Series. Pessimists who worry about the fortunes of the arts in America should cheer up.

With the Symphony off on its 83d season — the longest, counting Tanglewood, of any similar orchestra in this country—the die is cast. At Symphony Hall virtuosity works its miracles once more.

To conductor Leinsdorf and his famed musicians, a grateful salute! Boston is itself again.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Times (e)
HARTFORD, Conn.
Circ. 126,360
SEP 14 1963

All in a Lifetime

Call it what you like — pioneering, creativity, barrier-breaking, exploring, excellence — it is the essence of man's existence. Architect, musician, social worker, businessman. When he stops striving for that which is original and better, he might as well stop existing. —Erich Leinsdorf, musical director, Boston Symphony Orchestra.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Times (e)
HARTFORD, Conn.
Circ. 126,360
SEP 17 1963

All in a Lifetime . . .

Nothing new or important was ever done by men who would not drive themselves along the hard path of discovery and creation.—Erich Leinsdorf, musical director, Boston Symphony Orchestra.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Traveler (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 164,299
SEP 27 1963

Tell It to Joe

Symphony Doing Part To Ease Traffic

DEAR JOE:

Inasmuch as the afternoon driving hours are reputed to be the most dangerous, how about taking this up with the traffic commissioner:

Arrange with the Red Sox and the Boston Symphony Orchestra to have the game and the symphony end after commuting hours, say 6 p.m.?

Most of us who commute by car have no choice in the matter, and find baseball fans and bewildered symphony-goers the last straw after a hard day at the office. MISS P. C., Westwood

DEAR MISS P. C.:

Patience, my dear. The traffic situation may be aggravating to you, just as it is to baseball fans and music lovers.

I asked Lanning Humphrey of the Boston Symphony if anything could be done whereby Erich Leinsdorf's Friday concerts would end either before or after the rush between 4:30 and 6 p.m.

As a result, Thomas D. Perry, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, graciously informs me there will be a change in the starting time, beginning today.

"The best we can do," he advises, "is to move the starting time back to 2 o'clock, rather than the regular 2:15 starting time."

This means the concerts—today marks the opening of the 83d season—will be over about 3:45 p.m. That will give concert-goers three-quarters of an hour to make tracks before commuters start rolling.

As to changing Red Sox starting times, Tom Yawkey did just that several years ago in an attempt to ease the traffic problem. But, the fans didn't buy it and he was forced to revert to the regular starting hour.

Joe

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Herald (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 178,553
SEP 23 1963

Pre-Symphony Luncheon Friday

A STONE'S THROW from Symphony Hall, the Pre-Symphony Luncheons at the Midtown Motor Inn will begin their third season, Friday. The tables will be decorated with flowers in white, deep blue and cranberry red, and the menu will feature international dishes.

Harry Ellis Dickson will pay tribute to distinguished music patrons who support the Boston Symphony Orchestra and who will flock to the opening of the 83rd season at 2 o'clock, Friday afternoon. These luncheons are open to the public and free parking at the Midtown again will be available.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Record-American (m) (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 452,333
SEP 23 1963

"DISTINGUISHED Music Patrons" (the faithful ticket buyers) will have tribute paid to them by Harry Ellis Dickson at the Pre-Symphony Luncheon on Friday at Midtown Motor Inn. Many of the patrons, after the noonday day program will be walking across the street to Symphony Hall for the opening concert of the 83rd season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Table decor for the luncheon (this is the third season for the "Pre-Symphonies" at Midtown), will be carried out in white, deep blue and cranberry red flowers. The menu will offer international dishes made to please gourmet tastes. Since several prominent members of Boston Symphony Orchestra will be guest speakers this season at the popular luncheons (which are open to the public and free parking is available), they have been invited to join the special guests at the head table on Friday.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Traveler (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 164,299
SEP 23 1963

Luncheon To Usher Symphony Season

By PEGGY BROWN
Society Editor

Red, white and blue flowers will decorate the tables at the Midtown Motor Inn next Friday, Sept. 27, when that hostelry starts its third season of pre-Symphony luncheons.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin its 83rd season of concerts on Friday at Symphony Hall.

Harry Ellis Dickson will be back on the speaker's stand immediately following the luncheons. At Friday's luncheon he will pay tribute to distinguished music patrons—long time subscribers to the Symphony and the Boston University Celebrity Series.

Although personal musical philanthropy still exists, the faithful ticket-buying patron is coming more and more into prominence. He lends not only financial but also moral support. A house filled with these patrons is rewarding to musicians.

Several prominent members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be guest speakers at the Midtown luncheons this season. They have been invited to join the special guests at the head table this Friday.

The special guests are Mrs. George Scatchard, Mr. and Mrs. Albert C. Titcomb, Mrs. James S. Russell, Elizabeth C. Leland, Mrs. William Ittman, Margaret

Socially Speaking

E. Daniels, Dorothy Cornish, and composer Mabel Daniels.

Also Mr. and Mrs. Francis L. Higginson, Reuben Arey, Mrs. Frederick W. Cox, Mrs. Constantine Pesteff and Mrs. and Mrs. [illegible] Montgomery, Jr.

The Symphony members are Everett Firth, Rosario Mazzeo, Leonard Moss, Robert Ripley, Louis Speyer, Harold Thompson, Roger Voisin and Jordan Whitelaw who is radio and television producer for the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 194,870
SE 1963

Today in Society

Harry Dickson Continues Symphony Lecture Series

By MARJORIE W. SHERMAN

Famed founder of the Boston Youth Concerts, Harry Ellis Dickson of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, one of the orchestra's most delightful authorities, at a luncheon in his honor at the Midtown Motor Inn, gave glimpses of the reign of three historic conductors.

Just back from his "vacation," working on music scores at Tanglewood and with former Boston Symphony conductor Pierre Monteux, who has been appointed permanent conductor of the London Symphony at the age of 88, Harry Dickson will continue his brilliant series of Symphony lectures each Symphony concert Friday noon at the same inn.

A committee of longtime Symphony subscribers, ably headed by Mrs. Anthony Kutten, have made it possible for hundreds of music-minded Bostonians to enjoy a Symphony preview-hour together before the Friday concerts for the past three years. Pre-Symphony luncheons are open to the public and free parking at the Midtown will be available.

Dickson will pay tribute to distinguished music patrons, who will be represented by subscribers over the longest time to the Boston Symphony and the Boston University Celebrity Series. Although personal musical philanthropy still exists, the faithful ticket-buying patron is coming more and more into prominence, lending not only financial support, but a moral one, as well.

The tables will be decorated with flowers in white, deep blue and cranberry red offering international dishes made to please many a gourmet. Since several prominent members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are guest speakers this season at these luncheons, they are invited to join the special guests at the head table this Friday.

Also invited to the head table are Mrs. George Scatchard, Mr. and Mrs. Albert C. Titcomb, Mrs. James S. Russell, Miss Elizabeth C. Leland, Mrs. William Ittman, Miss Margaret E. Daniels, Miss Dorothy Cornish, composer Mabel Daniels, Mr. and Mrs. Francis L. Higginson, Reuben Arey, Mrs. Frederick W. Cox, Mrs. Constantine Pertzoff and Mr. and Mrs. Robert H. Montgomery. Also members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra including Everett Firth, Rosario Mazzeo, Leonard Moss, Robert Ripley, Louis Speyer, Harold Thompson, Roger Voisin, and Jordan Whitelaw, radio and television producer for the orchestra.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Traveler (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 164,299
SEP 10 1963

LUNCHEONS AT MIDTOWN, TOO

Music lectures will be held at 11:30 a.m. preceding each pre-Symphony luncheon. Those who wish to attend only the luncheon will make reservations for noon. The luncheon

The third season of the pre-Symphony luncheons at the Midtown Motor Inn will open on the day of the first concert, Sept. 27.

Harry Ellis Dickson, delightful lecturer at these luncheons, has invited colleagues to share some of the programs with him. These other prominent members of the Boston Symphony will discuss and demonstrate their particular instruments and review the current programs.

Prominent persons in the music world and musical organizations have already been invited as guests of honor to various luncheons. These luncheons have faithful followers, eager to hear from "Inside the Boston Symphony Orchestra."

Due to the change in "curtain time" of the Friday concerts to 2 p.m. the luncheons will start promptly at 12:15 p.m.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Record-American (m) (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 452,333
SEP 11 1963

SMART SET By ROSE WALSH

Pre-Symphony Fetes Set at Midtown Inn

Followers of Boston Symphony Orchestra first violinist, Harry Ellis Dickson, guest speaker at the interesting pre-Symphony Luncheons at the Midtown Motor Inn, will welcome the news that he will open the third season of the luncheons on Friday, Sept. 27. Due to the change in "curtain time" of the famous Friday afternoon Symphony concerts to 2 o'clock, the luncheons will start promptly at 12:15.

This season Mr. Dickson has invited colleagues to share some of the luncheon programs with him. These prominent members of the BSO will discuss and demonstrate their particular instruments and review the current programs.

Prominent persons in the music world and musical organizations have been invited as guests of honor at various noonday events which are open to the public who may enjoy hearing about "Inside the Boston Symphony Orchestra." (Its Tanglewood Season under Erich Leinsdorf's leadership is a top conversational topic in music circles).

In addition to the gourmet menus offered at the Midtown, "free parking" is a great attraction.

Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 194,870
SEP 13 1963

Today in Society

Pre-Symphony Lunches To Resume on Sept. 27

By MARJORIE W. SHERMAN

Back on the Boston scene by popular demand for a third season are the Pre-Symphony luncheons at the Mid-Town Motor Inn. Staged to honor Boston's musical organizations and its patrons, the luncheons put guests in the picture with Harry Ellis Dickson's amusing and informative report on the program to come with a look "Inside the Boston Symphony Orchestra."

Symphony's 83d season opening on Sept. 27 will start for music lovers with a luncheon call at 12:15. The Friday concerts are to begin at 2 o'clock this year.

Free parking at the Mid-Town will again be provided for Symphony-goers, so that they can walk across the street in plenty of time for the concert. Many music lovers go to the luncheons even when they aren't able to hear the concerts, since individual tickets are available for the public at the gourmet occasion.

Boston's notable music patrons will be honored at the opening pre- Symphony luncheon at the Mid-Town. Among the musical regulars who have already made reservations with luncheon planner Mrs. E. Anthony Kutten at the Mid-Town to hear Harry Ellis Dickson again this year and his first-desk colleagues at Symphony Hall are Mrs. Ferdinand Brigham, Mrs. Stanford M. Calderwood, Mrs. Gordon B. Thayer and Mrs. William Van Lennep, all of Cambridge.

Coming from Milton for the luncheons will be Mrs. George F. Hall; William Morris Hunt, president of the Cambridge Drama Festival and Mrs. Hunt, and Mrs. John E. Thayer. Also sharing the informative fun will be Mrs. Richard A. Erlich and Mrs. Howell Stevens of Brookline, Mrs. Albert B. Hunt, chairman of the Country Evening Concerts, and Mrs. Richard Schanzle of Weston; Mr. and Mrs. John Vosoff of Cohasset, and Mrs. Richard F. Overholt of Dedham.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Patriot-Ledger (e)
QUINCY, Mass.
Circ. 44,419
SEP 11 1963

Symphony Luncheons

The third year of Pre-Symphony Luncheons will begin Sept. 27, the first day of the Boston Symphony Orchestra season.

Harry Ellis Dickson, youth concert conductor, will speak on the forthcoming program at the 12:15 p.m. luncheon at the Midtown Motor Inn, Boston. His colleagues at the public event will discuss the orchestra's recently completed Tanglewood season.

NewYorkWorld-Telegram
and
The Sun
D. 463,241 SAT. 175,139
SEP 13 1963

Society

Symphony Group To Sponsor Tea

By RUTH G. DAVIS

THE WOMEN'S COMMITTEE for the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give a tea on the stage of the Brooklyn Academy of Music Monday at 1:30 p.m. Honored guest will be Sam Levonson.

The purpose of the tea is to promote interest in new subscriptions for the orchestra's Brooklyn concert series on Oct. 24, Dec. 5, Jan. 23, Feb. 27 and April 2.

Mrs. Andrew Gomory is chairman of the committee and Mrs. Ann Barclay Hargert is subscription chairman.

6

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Herald (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 178,553
SEP 25 1963

Social Chatter By Alison Arnold

Pre-Symphony Luncheon Tacks 'Sold Out' Sign on Hotel Door

PRE-SYMPHONY GOERS, now clamoring for reservations at the Women's City Club for the Pre-Symphony Luncheon, Friday, at the Hotel Statler Hilton, are being told they'll be "wait-listed" or may "stand by." The concise airport phrases have perplexed some of the regular Pre-Symphony Luncheon guests. The fact is, the opening luncheon with Joseph Silverstein, Boston Symphony concert master, as speaker, and society models, strolling to Ruby Newman's music, is sold out.

The larger capacity of the Terrace Room has drawn even more enthusiastic support than anticipated. The models now number 16 and Ruby Newman has enlarged his string orchestra. Tomorrow afternoon at 4, there'll be a dress rehearsal on the new runway and the models will change their costumes in a gay tent, fit for an Arabian king.

The MTA has also departed from precedent for this event and will run express cars from Arlington street to Symphony Hall for a five-minute run. The MTA will return those who have left their automobiles at the Motor Mart by running express cars after the concert. There'll also be a fleet of taxis at the Statler Hilton entrance for those who prefer to use this means of transportation.

Mr. Silverstein's talk will begin at 11:30, the luncheon is at 12 o'clock, and the fashion showing will end in time for spectators to be at Symphony Hall promptly at 2 o'clock when the concert starts.

Many large tables for eight, ten and twelve have been reserved. At Mrs. Robert Montgomery's table, Mrs. Stephen R. Casey's birthday will be celebrated, complete with a cake and champagne. Among the guests will be Mrs. Frank Ludwig, Mrs. Carl Dreyfus, Mrs. John A. Sargent and her daughter, Ann, and Mrs. Gregory Connolly.

Sitting in the "Royal Box" will be Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Silverstein, Ruby Newman, Mrs. Harris Fahnestock and Mrs. Norman Cahners, representing the Friends of the Symphony, and Mrs. Howland Walter, who will represent the Women's City Club, which will benefit from the proceeds of the fashion showing.

Among the hosts and hostesses who have made reservations are Mrs. William Emerson Barrett, Mrs. Paul Bernat, Edward Bolster, Claude R. Branch, Miss Louise Condit, Mrs. Virginia Cabot, Mrs. Robert C. Caldwell, Mrs. Robert C. Dean, Mrs. Frank A. Day, Mrs. Charles Davis and Howard W Davis.

Also, Mrs. John C. Dewey, Mrs. Richard Greenwood, Mrs. Herbert Harwood, Mrs. Thomas G. Hazard, Jr., Mrs. Willard P. Hunnewell, Mrs. Edward D. Hobbs, II, Noel Hadley, Mrs. Hervey Kent, Mrs. Erick Kauders, Lady Illingsworth, Mrs. Leo Mawm, Mrs. Edward Rose, Mrs. Cecil Rose, Urbain Robert, Mrs. John Spellman, Mrs. Williams Straub, Noel N. Sinclair, Robert C. Walker, Mrs. Peter Welch and Mrs. Ralph P. Worden.

Also, Mrs. F. Wadsworth Busk, Cathy Colt, Mrs. Hans Estin, Mrs. Michael Filides, Mrs. John L. Gardner, Mrs. Victor Kazanjian, Mrs. Richard Stokes and Mrs. David Wilder.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Herald (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 178,553
SEP 17 1963

Social Chatter By Alison Arnold

New Concertmaster to Speak At First Pre-Symphony Lunch

THE SPEAKER at the first Pre-Symphony Luncheon at the Hotel Statler Hilton, Friday, Sept. 27, will be the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert master, Joseph Silverstein. Second in command of the orchestra, he succeeds Richard Burgin, who retired last April.

Mr. Silverstein's talk will be about the Boston Symphony Orchestra and personalities from the concert master's point of view. To appeal to music-lovers, there'll be a 25-minute talk on music each week before the luncheons, which begin at 12 o'clock.

The fashion-conscious will find these luncheons to their liking, too, for there'll be a fashion showing with society models and Ruby Newman's music. The price for the three-course luncheon will be $3.25, the same as last year at the Ritz.

Proper Bostonians will have their sense of propriety satisfied by the fact that the money earned from modeling will go to the Women's City Club to help maintain its historic twin houses at 39 and 40 Beacon Street.

So all Bostonians musical, chic and Proper—will enjoy these Pre-Symphony Luncheons. Although they are sponsored by the Women's City Club and are in charge of Mrs. Howard W. Davis, chairman of the club's Special Events committee, the luncheons are open to the public.

Although the Terrace Room at the Statler Hilton has a large capacity, it is advisable to make reservations as early as possible with the Women's City Club or with Alfred, the head waiter at the Terrace Room. A fleet of cars will be lined up to speed the Symphony-goers to Symphony Hall at 1:20. The concerts begin this season promptly at 2 o'clock.

* * *

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Traveler (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 164,299

SEP 27 1963

Boston Symphony Opens 83rd Season

By PEGGY BROWN
Society Editor

Socially Speaking

It's here! The official start of the 1963-64 season of Boston Symphony concerts. For many it is synonymous with the official start of the Boston social season.

At 1:55 p.m. today at Symphony Hall the orchestra gathers on stage and tunes up. The ticket - holders hurry to their seats which they may have held for many other seasons.

At 2 p.m. Musical Director Erich Leinsdorf enters onto the stage. The audience rises and the conductor bows. The audience settles down, the hall grows silent. Leinsdorf raises his baton and for the 83rd year Symphony is under way.

For the Proper Bostonian it is the day of days and it will come about 25 more times this season, nearly every Friday all winter.

Traditionally, Boston ladies start their Friday afternoons lunching with friends and sister Symphony-goers. The Ritz has been "the" place for years and last year the luncheons were brightened by fashion shows featuring society models.

Gourmet luncheons will continue at the Ritz this year, accompanied by Ruby Newman's music. The fashion showings, however, have moved over to the Statler-Hilton where a new series of pre - Symphony luncheons will be held in the Terrace Room.

The Terrace Room luncheons are being prefaced with 11:30 a.m. lectures by members of the Orchestra. The modelling corps have been increased to 14 socialites and their modelling fees will be donated to the Women's City Club of Boston.

Friday Symphony-goers have still another choice for their luncheon rendezvous. The third season of pre-Symphony luncheons starts today at the Midtown Motor Inn, diagonally across from Symphony Hall. Harry Ellis Dickson will again offer informal talks with after-luncheon coffee.

Leinsdorf has invited the Executive Committee of the Council of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to a small reception immediately following today's concert. It is being held in the Ancient Instruments Room in Symphony Hall.

Greeting the ladies with her husband is Mrs. Leinsdorf and President of the Trustees Henry B. Cabot and Mrs. Cabot. Co-chairmen of the Council, Mrs. Louis W. Cabot of Wenham and Mrs. Norman Cahners of Brookline are also attending.

Among the Executive Committee members who accepted the invitation are Mrs. Neil Ayer, Mrs. Lewis P. Cabot, Mrs. Howard C. Dickinson, Mrs. Richard Higgins, Mrs. Robert Hopkins, Mrs. Charles F. Hovey and Mrs. Robert M. P. Kennard.

Also Mrs. Hans Kroto, Mrs. Charles Lyman, Mrs. Charles Mason Jr., Mrs. George Parson, Mrs. Irving Rabb, Mrs. William Vogler, Mrs. Roger Voisin, Mrs. Leonard Wheeler, Mrs. Robert Wiese, Mrs. Harris Fahnestock, Mrs. Eric Kauders, Mrs. Benjamin Tilghman and Mrs. James H. Perkins.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Traveler (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 164,299

SEP 30 1963

Pre-Symphony Luncheon Party-Flavored

By PEGGY BROWN
Society Editor

"Smile, you're on Candid Camera," advised Mrs. Howard M. Davis at the close of Friday's first pre-Symphony Luncheon at the Statler-Hilton.

The special events chairman of the Women's City Club of Boston was referring to newsmen recording the pre-Symphony rush hour at Arlington St. Station. The MTA handled the onslaught with express cars to Symphony Station.

Two hours earlier, at 11:30 a.m. many pre-Symphony luncheoners gathered in the Terrace Room for a pre-Symphony lecture by concert master Joseph Silverstein. At noon hundreds more filled the Terrace Room foyer to claim table reservations.

The luncheon itself was one of babble and baubles — and a birthday party. The party came first, with society orchestra leader Rudy Newman extending felicitations to Mrs. Stephen R. Casey of Waltham and a chorus of "Happy Birthday" following.

The maestro - of-ceremonies then introduced Mrs. Davis who was proud to present a dozen socialities modeling a handsome assortment of winter fashions. Their fees, she explained, were being donated to the City Club for upkeep of its twin houses on Beacon St.

Some of the babble included talk about the Women's City Club's annual Harvest Festival Oct. 22 and 23. It will be a Jubilee Festival in honor of the Club's year-long Golden Anniversary celebration.

Socially Speaking

With the emphasis on Christmas shopping, the clubhouse auditorium will be decorated in an International theme. There will be an International Gift Shop and a Christmas Boutique and Cardshop besides China, Men's, Food and White Elephant Shops.

To make the Festival atmosphere festive, an International Wine Tasting party has been planned for Oct. 22. A tea and fashion show will be held the afternoon of the 23rd and a Gala Dinner Dance that evening.

The camera-shy, we'll bet, took taxis to Symphony Hall after the Statler luncheon. But music-lovers who attended the special luncheon at the Midtown Motor Inn simply walked across the street after Harry Ellis Dickson's delightful post-luncheon talk.

See Pictures on Page 26

Foremost of the guests there was First Lady of The Commonwealth, Mrs. Endicott Peabody. She was joined by such notables as Mrs. Francis Lee Higginson, neice by marriage of the founder of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Henry Lee Higginson.

And then there were Mrs. Lucius Thayer, Mrs. Russell Coolidge, Mrs. John Coolidge, Mesdames Richard Saltonstall Sr. and Jr., French counsul's wife Mme. Jean Savelli, Mrs. Jasper Whiting, and Mrs. Albert Hunt.

Each pre-Symphony luncheon at the Midtown honors individuals or groups making outstanding contributions to music. Last Friday's luncheon saluted long-time supporters of Symphony. Next Friday the Berkshire Music Center in Tanglewood will be feted.

But for those who like their food the way they like their music—untainted by distractions —there's always the Ritz. Come to think of it, whatever happened to the Friday Chilton Club Lectures and Luncheons?

NewEngland Newspaper Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • Richmond 2-4300
Sunday Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 465,653
SEP 29 1963

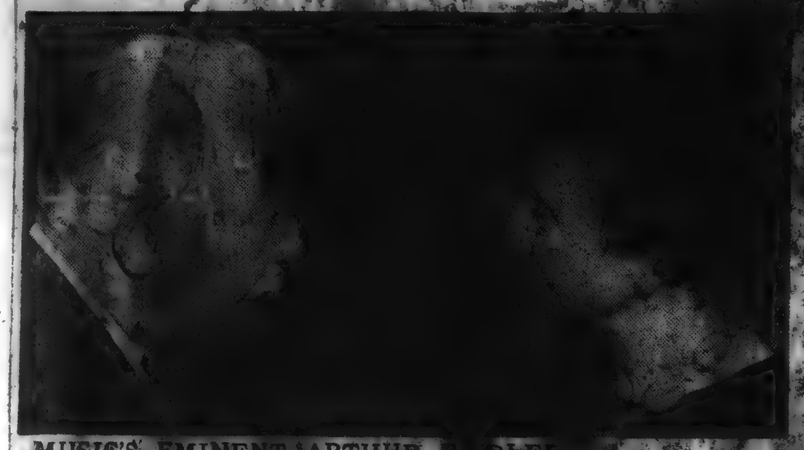
The Symphony Is Back

By MARJORIE W. SHERMAN

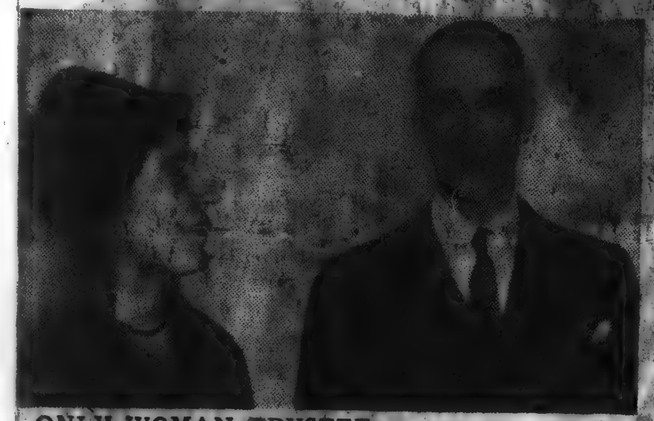
The Symphony, Boston's most cherished institution for three generations, began its 83d year with appropriate enthusiasm on Friday afternoon. A tradition even in the years when Friday concerts were actually rehearsals, and seats for Symphony were sold at auction, these afternoons devoted to the batons of Monteux, Koussevitzky, Munch, Leinsdorf and other great conductors are sacrosanct.

No music-minded Bostonian makes another engagement for the 24 concert dates, and family Symphony seats are heirlooms along with the Revere silver and the Copley portraits.

(Globe Staff Pictures)



MUSIC'S EMINENT ARTHUR [illegible] and Mrs. E. Anthony Kutten share the opening of another Symphony. Mrs. Kutten, decorated by the French and the U.S. government for her work in the fields of music and the theater, is chairman of the Midtown symphony luncheons.



ONLY WOMAN TRUSTEE ever to serve on the board, Mrs. James Perkins of Westwood discusses the program with president of the trustees Henry B. Cabot.

Mrs. Endicott Peabody and the Boston Symphony's Harry Dickson talk music at the midtown luncheon before the opening concert. Youth Concert's founder and violinist with the orchestra, Dickson began his third season of pre-symphony talks at the Midtown before the concert.

The 83d season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra opens at Symphony Hall.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 3078, Boston 6 • Richmond 2-4300
Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 194,870
SEP 27 1963

1ST OF 86 CONCERTS TODAY

Boston Symphony Tunes Up

By MARGO MILLER

One man had waxed his sports car—and his bassoon. Another dieted away 14 pounds. Harps were restrung. And a crew of electricians changed all 395 bulbs in the five chandeliers.

In various ways, the Boston Symphony Orchestra was tuning up. Its 83d season began last Monday behind the rehearsal curtain in Symphony Hall.

The men talked of Cape Cod and European vacations, of salmon and bear in Maine and Y. A. Tittle on the bench. The kids were back in school. For their fathers, dressed in business suits and toting instrument cases in from the suburbs, this first meeting of the new season is "just as thrilling as your first rehearsal with the orchestra — way back when."

Promptly at 10 o'clock, and to that murmur and shuffling of feet with which musicians applaud a soloist, Erich Leinsdorf stepped on the podium. The conductor welcomed the 104 players (including five newcomers):

"I thank you for my marvelous first year. I greet you this second year with great affection."

Then he launched the orchestra into Hindemith's Symphonic Metamorphosis, which will open today's concert. Sometimes his language called for the abstract: "Play so the dancing quality comes out." Or he was musically specific, tattooing in the air the trimmer 16th notes desired or singing a tidier phrase. Before long, suit coats were off and the music was on.

Beginning this afternoon, an estimated 223,600 persons will hear 86 concerts in Symphony Hall. A few ladies remember all 11 B.S.O. conductors. Some college students will attend their first orchestral concert, perhaps at one of the eight open rehearsals on Thursday evenings.

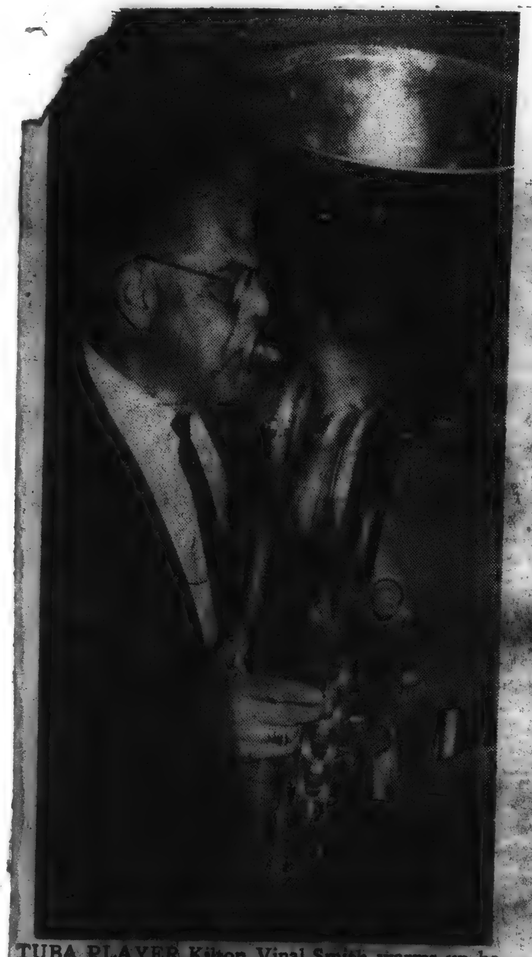
Other patrons renew their seats for the 24 Friday-Saturday programs, or the six Sunday afternoons, six Monday evenings and two Tuesday series. One Tuesday series called the "Cambridge concerts" replaces the six programs given in Sanders Theater, Harvard. Not only have the concerts been transferred but also the television shows which WGBH tapes for broadcast.

Subscribers will hear concerts under Charles Munch and Pierre Monteux, former B.S.O. conductors; Richard Burgin, retired concertmaster continuing as associate conductor, and Leopold Stokowski, making his first appearance with the orchestra. Instrumental soloists number five pianists, two violinists and several first desk players from the orchestra.

The music this season will comprise a good measure of the tried and true: Brahms Symphony No. 1 is on the first program. But so is Samuel Barber's First Symphony. Leinsdorf, who spent his vacation in New Mexico reading books and scores, thinks that about 50 percent of the music he has planned was written in the last 30 years. Some conductors place too much importance on premieres, he feels.

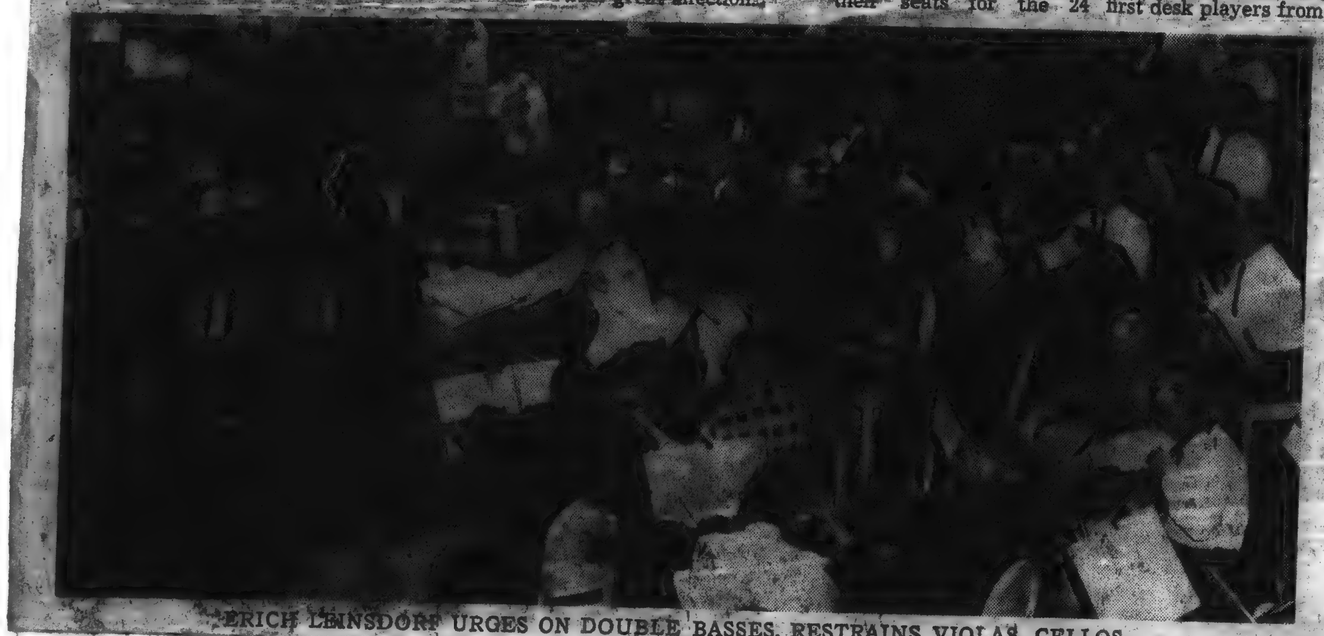
"I do not program for the glory of the initial announcement; rather for the value of the work.

Still, Boston will have its share of new music in works by Toch, Sydeman, Barber, and even some little-heard Mozart, Haydn and Schubert.

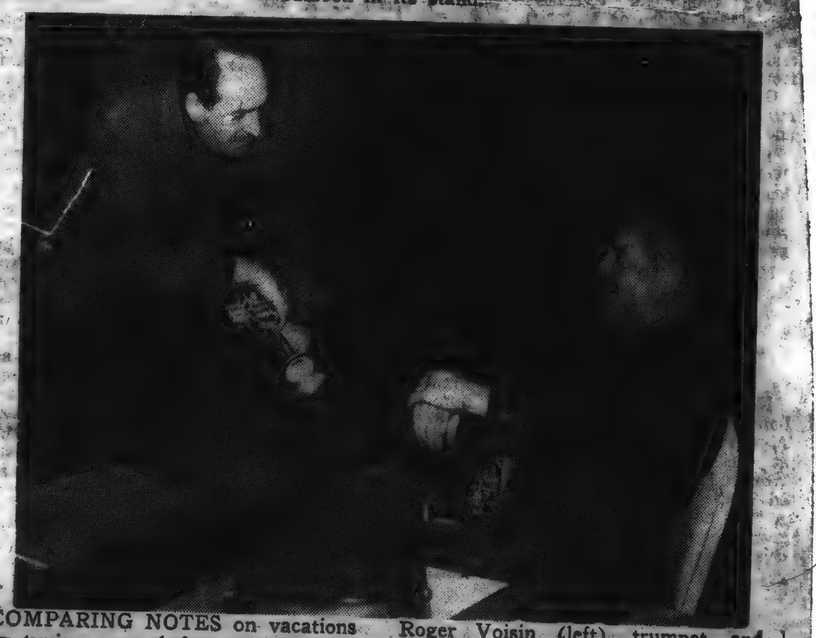


TUBA PLAYER Kilson Vinal Smith warms up before rehearsal.

VINCENT MAURICCI, violist, inspects contra-bassoon in its stand.



ERICH LEINSDORF URGES ON DOUBLE BASSES, RESTRAINS VIOLAS, CELLOS



COMPARING NOTES on vacations in tuning room before rehearsal are Roger Voisin (left), trumpet, and James Stagliano, French horn.

10

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Journal
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
Circ. 193,108
OCT 6 1963

Boston Symphony's New Faces

THERE WILL BE five new young faces in the Boston Symphony Orchestra when Erich Leinsdorf opens its annual series of five Tuesday evening concerts on Oct. 29 at 8:15, in Veterans' Memorial Auditorium. They replace five retirements, winning their appointments by competition.

The two new violinists are Giora Bernstein and Burton Fine. Mr. Bernstein, a native of Vienna, has been living in Cambridge, where he was associated with the Cambridge Arts Festival. He also has been concertmaster for the Goldovsky Opera Co. A graduate of the Juilliard School of Music with a Master's Degree from Brandeis University and doctoral studies at Boston University, Mr. Bernstein has studied with Edouard Dethier and Joseph Silverstein.

Mr. Fine comes to the Boston Symphony Orchestra following nine years with the National Aeronautics and Space Administration in Cleveland, Ohio. He has performed with a number of string quartets. A graduate of the Curtis Institute of Music, he also holds a Ph.D. in chemistry.

Luis Leguia, cellist, has most recently been with the Metropolitan Opera Orchestra. He also studied at the Juilliard School, and formerly played in the Houston and National Symphony Orchestras. His teachers have been Pablo Casals, Andre Navarra, Kurt Reher, and Leonard Rose.

'Etoile d'Or' To Honor Dancers

PARIS — (UPI) — The "Oscar," "Emmy," and "Tony" will have a new companion in the form of the "Etoile d'Or" when eight of these "golden stars" will be given an international festival here devoted solely to the dance.

From Nov. 4-30, at the Theatre des Champe-Elysees, the art of the dance will emulate its sister arts of drama, music, films, radio and television.

Until his appointment to the Boston Symphony Orchestra Thomas Newell Jr. had been principal horn with the Houston Symphony. He studied at the Cincinnati Conservatory where he received both a Bachelor and Master of Music degrees. His teachers include Gustav Albrecht and Mason Jones. Mr. Newell previously played with the St. Louis Symphony, the Santa Fe Opera, and the the United States Air Force Band.

Thomas Gauger, percussionist, attended the University of Illinois where he received a Bachelor of Music degree. His teachers were Paul Price and Jack McKenzie. For the past four seasons he has been the principal percussionist with the Oklahoma Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. Fine, Mr. Gauger, and Mr. Newell have also studied at the Berkshire Music Center, the summer center for the advanced study of music maintained by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood (Lenox, Mass.).

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 465,653
OCT 6 1963

Five Players Join Boston Symphony

By MARGO MILLER

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has five new players. Of the quintet, two have joined the second violin stands. New faces are also to be seen among the cellists, French horns and the percussion section.

MILLER

The new men do not inherit the five chairs left vacant by players retiring from the orchestra or leaving it for other pursuits. Each newcomer was auditioned last Spring for his particular position.

Indeed, subscribers to Symphony will notice season to season that some familiar faces are not in their accustomed spots. In the string sections, any player may audition for another desk.

Joseph Silverstein, the present concertmaster, began his B.S.O. career in 1955 in the 34th and last violin stand. In 1959, he "moved up," as the men say, to share the third desk of first violins. For other sections of the orchestra, men are hired for specific chairs — third French horn, for example — or for a particular instrument — E-flat clarinet, English horn, utility percussion, although these players, of course, also play other instruments in his instrument's family.

Through the Grapevine

How does a player join the Boston Symphony? For this information we went to see Rosario Mazzeo, personnel manager of the orchestra and a member of the clarinet section.

The process starts with an invitation, says Mazzeo. "I'd say there were between 50 and 200 appplications for each position. Whenever a man leaves the orchestra, word gets around. The grapevine is the most extraordinary purveyer of news. We don't have openings every year, so I keep all applications on file."

The forms do not gather dust. To keep track of players, Mazzeo has lists of every orchestra here and in Europe. If a man moves from a minor to a major orchestra, the fact is duly noted. "I also have my own grapevine. You get to know whose judgment to trust for word that so-and-so is playing better than his present position would indicate."

Applications on file include former students at the Berkshire Music Center, maintained by the orchestra. The Summer sessions are invaluable for would-be Bostonians to get to know the band. Mazzeo follows the youngsters' careers. "Most are still in their 20's and spread all over the country." Mere youth, however, is no obstacle in joining the B.S.O. A double-bass player, for example, has just reached his majority.

Generally speaking, few men in their late 40's come to the B.S.O. "If a player hasn't moved up to a position which suggests that he'd be what we want, he'll never make a major orchestra." Runners-up at auditions are always encouraged to try again. Mazzeo takes pains to find them spots in other orchestras for seasoning. One applicant from the Midwest, thus, will have 20 years or so to gain his goal. He's a 14 year old French horn player who wrote to assure the orchestra of his intent to join. He had many serious questions to ask, including the salary he could expect. And he closed his letter with a request for pictures of the 104 players.

Behind the Curtain

When a vacancy occurs, say, in the string section, an audition committee composed of the concertmaster, and principal second violin, cello and doublebass reviews the applications and sends out invitations to about 40 players. Perhaps 30 turn up at Symphony Hall on the appointed day. Each men is expected to have prepared a solo piece. Known only by a number, he plays without accompaniment. His judges sit in the auditorium behind the rehearsal curtain. The chairman might then ask for a Bach slow movement or a Mendelssohn allegro. The audition committee chooses five semi-finalists who will appear that afternoon at 4. What orchestral music the five will then sightread has been announced and the parts are given out for study. The applicants rehearse at 2 p.m. with a piano accompanist. Now in alphabetical order, they are called to play for Erich Leinsdorf, the B.S.O. music director; Richard Burgin, former concertmaster and associate conductor; Mazzeo and the audition committee. Burgin conducts. How a player takes direction, says Mazzeo, is more important than his skill in sightreading. "It's the gleam of understanding in the eye of the player. That's what Burgin wants to see." Leinsdorf is the final arbiter in selecting a new man, but he acts with the advice of the audition committee.

Surviving last Spring's auditions are: Giora Bernstein, once concertmaster of the Goldovsky Opera Company; Luis Leguia, former cellist at the Metropolitan Opera; Thomas Newell Jr., principal French horn of the Houston Symphony; Thomas Gauger, principal percussionist of the Oklahoma Symphony Orchestra; and Burton Fine who comes to Boston from nine years with the National Aeronautics and Space Administration in Cleveland. Fine, be it noted, has been violinist with a number of string quartets.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Patriot-Ledger (e)
QUINCY, Mass.
Circ. 44,419
SEP 25 1963

5 Musicians Join Boston Symphony

Five msicians, two violinists, a cellist, a French horn player and a percussionist, have been appointed to the Boston Symphony Orchestra following competitive auditions.

Giora Bernstein, former director of the Brockton Symphony Orchestra, has joined the orchestra's violin section. Holder of advanced music degrees from Brandeis and Boston Universities, the Vienna native was concertmaster for the Goldovsky Opera Company.

Violinist Burton Fine comes to the orchestra after nine years with the National Aeronautics and Space Administration in Cleveland. A Ph. D. holder in chemistry, Mr. Fine is a graduate of the Curtis Institute of Music and has performed with a number of string quartets.

Cellist Luis Leguia, a former pupil of Pablo Casals, recently performed with the Metropolitan Opera Orchestra. French horn player Thomas Newell Jr. comes from a principal horn position with the Houston Symphony.

Percussionist Thomas Gauger has been principal percussionist with the Oklahoma Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. Fine, Mr. Gauger and Mr. Newell studied at the symphony's Berkshire Music Center, Lenox.

INDUSTRIAL PHOTOGRAPHY
NEW YORK, N.Y.
MONTHLY 27,015
SEP 1963 Buffalo

TV Lighting System Installed in Symphony Hall

One of the very few equipment changes made in Boston's Symphony Hall since its construction at the turn of the century has recently taken place. The modification has been the installation of a unique lighting system for television broadcasting in the Hall, which is the home of both the Boston Symphony and Boston Pops Orchestra.

The new system which is a permanent one manufactured and installed by Sylvania Electric Products, Inc., consists of sixty-three compact, powerful Sun Gun® Photo Lights placed in strategic positions in order to furnish the high level of stage illumination needed for TV broadcasting. Located on each side of the auditorium at the second balcony level are thirty Sun Guns, with an extra three lights placed at the back of the stage for podium lighting. Finished in gold, the Sun Gun lights blend in with the gold leaf of the organ pipes, proscenium arch, and balcony railings of the hall.

The new system has already been utilized with a videotape concert of the Boston Pops Orchestra, conducted by Arthur Fiedler. It is scheduled to be televised on Boston TV during mid-summer.

10

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Journal
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
Circ. 193,108
OCT 6 1963

Boston Symphony's New Faces

THERE WILL BE five new young faces in the Boston Symphony Orchestra when Erich Leinsdorf opens its annual series of five Tuesday evening concerts on Oct. 29 at 8:15, in Veterans' Memorial Auditorium. They replace five retirements, winning their appointments by competition.

The two new violinists are Giora Bernstein and Burton Fine. Mr. Bernstein, a native of Vienna, has been living in Cambridge, where he was associated with the Cambridge Arts Festival. He also has been concertmaster for the Goldovsky Opera Co. A graduate of the Juilliard School of Music with a Master's Degree from Brandeis University and doctoral studies at Boston University, Mr. Bernstein has studied with Edouard Dethier and Joseph Silverstein.

Mr. Fine comes to the Boston Symphony Orchestra following nine years with the National Aeronautics and Space Administration in Cleveland, Ohio. He has performed with a number of string quartets. A graduate of the Curtis Institute of Music, he also holds a Ph.D. in chemistry.

Luis Leguia, cellist, has most recently been with the Metropolitan Opera Orchestra. He also studied at the Juilliard School, and formerly played in the Houston and National Symphony Orchestras. His teachers have been Pablo Casals, Andre Navarra, Kurt Reher, and Leonard Rose.

Until his appointment to the Boston Symphony Orchestra Thomas Newell Jr. had been principal horn with the Houston Symphony. He studied at the Cincinnati Conservatory where he received both a Bachelor and Master of Music degrees. His teachers include Gustav Albrecht and Mason Jones. Mr. Newell previously played with the St. Louis Symphony, the Santa Fe Opera, and the the United States Air Force Band.

Thomas Gauger, percussionist, attended the University of Illinois where he received a Bachelor of Music degree. His teachers were Paul Price and Jack McKenzie. For the past four seasons he has been the principal percussionist with the Oklahoma Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. Fine, Mr. Gauger, and Mr. Newell have also studied at the Berkshire Music Center, the summer center for the advanced study of music maintained by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood (Lenox, Mass.)

'Etoile d'Or' To Honor Dancers

PARIS (UPI) — The "Oscar," "Emmy," and "Tony" will have a new companion in the form of the "Etoile d'Or" when eight of these "golden stars" will be given an international festival here devoted solely to the dance.

From Nov. 4-30, at the Theatre des Champs-Elysees, the art of the dance will emulate its sister arts of drama, music, films, radio and television.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 465,653

Five Players Join Boston Symphony

By MARGO MILLER

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has five new players. Of the quintet, two have joined the second violin stands. New faces are also to be seen among the cellists, French horns and the percussion section.

MILLER

The new men do not inherit the five chairs left vacant by players retiring from the orchestra or leaving it for other pursuits. Each newcomer was auditioned last Spring for his particular position.

Indeed, subscribers to Symphony will notice season to season that some familiar faces are not in their accustomed spots. In the string sections, any player may audition for another desk.

Joseph Silverstein, the present concertmaster, began his B.S.O. career in 1955 in the 34th and last violin stand. In 1959, he "moved up," as the men say, to share the third desk of first violins. For other sections of the orchestra, men are hired for specific chairs — third French horn, for example — or for a particular instrument — E-flat clarinet, English horn, utility percussion, although these players, of course, also play other instruments in his instrument's family.

Through the Grapevine

How does a player join the Boston Symphony? For this information we went to see Rosario Mazzeo, personnel manager of the orchestra and a member of the clarinet section.

The process starts with an invitation, says Mazzeo. "I'd say there were between 50 and 200 applications for each position. Whenever a man leaves the orchestra, word gets around. The grapevine is the most extraordinary purveyer of news. We don't have openings every year, so I keep all applications on file."

The forms do not gather dust. To keep track of players, Mazzeo has lists of every orchestra here and in Europe. If a man moves from a minor to a major orchestra, the fact is duly noted. "I also have my own grapevine. You get to know whose judgment to trust for word that so-and-so is playing better than his present position would indicate."

Applications on file include former students at the Berkshire Music Center, maintained by the orchestra. The Summer sessions are invaluable for would-be Bostonians to get to know the band. Mazzeo follows the youngsters' careers. "Most are still in their 20's and spread all over the country." Mere youth, however, is no obstacle in joining the B.S.O. A double bass player, for example, has just reached his majority.

Generally speaking, few men in their late 40's come to the B.S.O. "If a player hasn't moved up to a position which suggests that he'd be what we want, he'll never make a major orchestra." Runners-up at auditions are always encouraged to try again. Mazzeo takes pains to find them spots in other orchestras for seasoning. One applicant from the Midwest, thus, will have 20 years or so to gain his goal. He's a 14 year old French horn player who wrote to assure the orchestra of his intent to join. He had many serious questions to ask, including the salary he could expect. And he closed his letter with a request for pictures of the 104 players.

Behind the Curtain

When a vacancy occurs, say, in the string section, an audition committee composed of the concertmaster, and principal second violin, cello and doublebass reviews the applications and sends out invitations to about 40 players. Perhaps 30 turn up at Symphony Hall on the appointed day. Each men is expected to have prepared a solo piece. Known only by a number, he plays without accompaniment. His judges sit in the auditorium behind the rehearsal curtain. The chairman might then ask for a Bach slow movement or a Mendelssohn allegro. The audition committee chooses five semi-finalists who will appear that afternoon at 4. What orchestral music the five will then sightread has been announced and the parts are given out for study. The applicants rehearse at 2 p.m. with a piano accompanist. Now in alphabetical order, they are called to play for Erich Leinsdorf, the B.S.O. music director; Richard Burgin, former concertmaster and associate conductor; Mazzeo and the audition committee. Burgin conducts. How a player takes direction, says Mazzeo, is more important than his skill in sightreading. "It's the gleam of understanding in the eye of the player. That's what Burgin wants to see." Leinsdorf is the final arbiter in selecting a new man, but he acts with the advice of the audition committee.

Surviving last Spring's auditions are: Giora Bernstein, once concertmaster of the Goldovsky Opera Company; Luis Leguia, former cellist at the Metropolitan Opera; Thomas Newell Jr., principal French horn of the Houston Symphony; Thomas Gauger, principal percussionist of the Oklahoma Symphony Orchestra; and Burton Fine who comes to Boston from nine years with the National Aeronautics and Space Administration in Cleveland. Fine, be it noted, has been violinist with a number of string quartets.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Patriot-Ledger (e)
QUINCY, Mass.
Circ. 44,419
SEP 25 1963

fascinated.

5 Musicians Join Boston Symphony

Five musicians, two violinists, a cellist, a French horn player and a percussionist, have been appointed to the Boston Symphony Orchestra following competitive auditions.

Giora Bernstein, former director of the Brockton Symphony Orchestra, has joined the orchestra's violin section. Holder of advanced music degrees from Brandeis and Boston Universities, the Vienna native was concertmaster for the Goldovsky Opera Company.

Violinist Burton Fine comes to the orchestra after nine years with the National Aeronautics and Space Administration in Cleveland. A Ph. D. holder in chemistry, Mr. Fine is a graduate of the Curtis Institute of Music and has performed with a number of string quartets.

Cellist Luis Leguia, a former pupil of Pablo Casals, recently performed with the Metropolitan Opera Orchestra. French horn player Thomas Newell Jr. comes from a principal horn position with the Houston Symphony.

Percussionist Thomas Gauger has been principal percussionist with the Oklahoma Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. Fine, Mr. Gauger and Mr. Newell studied at the symphony's Berkshire Music Center, Lenox.

INDUSTRIAL PHOTOGRAPHY
NEW YORK, N.Y.
MONTHLY 27,015
SEP 1963

TV Lighting System Installed in Symphony Hall

One of the very few equipment changes made in Boston's Symphony Hall since its construction at the turn of the century has recently taken place. The modification has been the installation of a unique lighting system for television broadcasting in the Hall, which is the home of both the Boston Symphony and Boston Pops Orchestra.

The new system which is a permanent one, manufactured and installed by Sylvania Electric Products, Inc., consists of sixty-three compact, powerful Sun Gun® Photo Lights placed in strategic positions in order to furnish the high level of stage illumination needed for TV broadcasting. Located on each side of the auditorium at the second balcony level are thirty Sun Guns, with an extra three lights placed at the back of the stage for podium lighting. Finished in gold, the Sun Gun lights blend in with the gold leaf of the organ pipes, proscenium arch, and balcony railings of the hall.

The new system has already been utilized with a videotape concert of the Boston Pops Orchestra, conducted by Arthur Fiedler. It is scheduled to be televised on Boston TV during mid-summer.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Sunday Republican
SPRINGFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 112,302

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Berkshire Eagle (e)
PITTSFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 29,084

BSO CONDUCTOR Erich Leinsdorf welcomes five new members to the orchestra at its first rehearsal of the 83rd season. With Mr. Leinsdorf are, left to right, Giora Bernstein, violin; Thomas Gauger, percussion; Luis Leguia, cello; Burton Fine, violin, and Thomas Newell, French horn. The five replace men who retired this year.

Won Tryouts

BSO Adds 5 New Members

At the first rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's 83rd season, Erich Leinsdorf, music director, introduced five new members to the orchestra. The new players, two violinists, a cellist, French horn player and a percussionist, were appointed to positions in the orchestra following competitive auditions held last spring.

With Goldovsky

The two violinists are Giora Bernstein and Burton Fine. Mr. Bernstein, a native of Vienna, has been living in Cambridge, where he was associated with the Cambridge Arts Festival. He has also been concertmaster for the Goldovsky Opera Company. A graduate of the Juilliard School of Music with a master's degree from Brandeis University and doctoral studies at Boston University, Mr. Bernstein has studied with Edouard Dethier and Joseph Silverstein.

Burton Fine comes to the Boston Symphony Orchestra following nine years with the National Aeronautics and Space Administration in Cleveland, Ohio. He has performed with a number of string quartets. Mr. Fine is a graduate of the Curtis Institute of Music and also holds a Ph.D. in chemistry.

Luis Leguia, cellist, has most recently been with the Metropolitan Opera Orchestra. He also studied at the Juilliard School, and formerly played in the Houston and National Symphony Orchestras. His teachers have been Pablo Casals, Andre Navarra, Kurt Reher, and Leonard Rose.

Until his appointment to the Boston Symphony Orchestra Thomas Newell Jr. has been principal horn with the Houston Symphony. He studied at the Cincinnati Conservatory where he received both bachelor and master of music degrees. His teachers include Gustav Albrecht and Mason Jones. Mr. Newell previously played with the St. Louis Symphony, the Santa Fe Opera, and the United States Air Force Band.

Thomas Gauger, percussionist attended the University of Illinois where he received a bachelor of music degree. His teachers were Paul Price and Jack McKenzie. For the past four seasons he has been the principal percussionist with the Oklahoma Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. Fine, Mr. Gauger and Mr. Newell have also studied at the Berkshire Music Center, the summer center for the advanced study of music maintained by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Herald (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 178,553

OCT 2 1963

THE ROVING EYE

Chemistry of Music

By ROBERT TAYLOR

THERE'S A LOT of discussion these days about the two cultures, science and the humanities, and recently we talked to a living example—Burton Fine, who has just come direct from NASA, the National Aeronautics and Space Administration, to a violinist's chair with the BSO, The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. Fine, a man in his early 30s, is one of the five new musicians joining the BSO this year, and we chatted with him between rehearsals in a Massachusetts avenue delicatessen near Symphony Hall. So far as he knew, he told us, while we addressed ourself to a bagel, he is the only research chemist in the present roster, although scientific and technical backgrounds are by no means rare in music, and at least one member of the Cleveland Orchestra has an advanced degree in electrical engineering.

BURTON FINE

"I've been playing the violin since I was six," he said. "My father was a professional musician. But if a child shows musical aptitude at an early age, he's apt to fall under frequent pressure to drop music in favor of a less sporadic occupation.

"Therefore I didn't make up my mind, though I continued with the violin. At 16 I joined The Musicians Union, and accompanied dad on dance band dates around Philadelphia, my home town. Then I went on to college, still keeping touch with the violin, and to graduate study, receiving a Ph. D. in chemistry from the Illinois Institute of Technology.

★ ★ ★

"GRADUATE SCHOOL and the long grind to the degree was the only point, I'd say, that I felt in danger of losing the skills of performance. The big problem consisted of finding enough practice time. Experience proved the dormitory was a poor setting. So, after the laboratory closed in the afternoon, I'd put away my chemical equipment, take out my fiddle and play for two or three hours.

"Eventually, I went to work for NASA in Cleveland, specializing in the kinetics of combustion reaction—no, more precisely, the study of the chemical reactions of flames. It's a subject that influenced the development of jet engines, and which today assumes a vital part in missile technology and the exploration of space. I can't say that I was unhappy in research, but I discovered I just didn't have the vocation.

"Meanwhile I combined two careers, first playing with amateur orchestras in Chicago, and then with The Cleveland Chamber Orchestra. One day last winter I picked up a musician's trade paper and saw an advertisement: auditions were being held by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the vacant post of violinist. The Boston was really the only orchestra I could afford to join; its opportunities for year-round employment at least compare with industry. I wrote Mr. Leinsdorf and a few days later traveled to Boston where, at the audition, I did a prepared work, a Bach Concerto, and various sight readings from the symphonic masters.

★ ★ ★

"UNTIL THE MIDDLE of August, though, I remained with NASA, and now my wife and three children are settled in West Roxbury." Mr. Fine silently composed his thoughts. "You see," he said, finally, "research isn't so different from creative work; the research scientist who creates knowledge and insight of the material universe is also performing an aesthetic activity."

Finishing the bagel, we thanked Mr. Fine and parted at the delicatessen door. Yet his final words reverberated. Did scientists make good musicians? And so we took a lead from research, and en route visited a library, which yielded the following:

Einstein played the violin in a string quartet; Pythagoras devised the mathematical division of the scale. Leonardo da Vinci was a lutenist, Sir Isaac Newton presented the theory that sensations of color and tone are similar. Rameau published a scientific treatise on harmony. Tyndal did a laboratory analysis of tone.

The physiologist, Hemholtz, wrote "The Sensation of Tone," while the composer Borodin was also a chemist. Sir William Herschel, the astronomer, played the organ and oboe and composed. Sir James Jeans, the physicist, penned "Music and Science." Dayton Miller, known for research in tone phenomena, played the oboe, and Theodore Billroth, the violist, operated, besides, as a surgeon.

Burton Fine, the violinist from the space lab, was, we decided, in good company.

12

New York World-Telegram and The Sun
D. 463,241 SAT. 175,139

SEP 1 2 1963

Academy May Lose Boston Symphony Series

The Boston Symphony Orchestra may curtail its concerts at the Brooklyn Academy of Music next year if attendance does not increase this season.

The threat of curtailment or even cancellation of the concert series, which has been one of the academy's main attractions for 75 years, was revealed in a statement sent to members of the women's committee for the concerts and confirmed today by Thomas D. Perry, manager of the Boston Symphony.

Officials of the symphony and the Brooklyn Academy have been concerned about the future of the five-concert series since last year, when subscriptions fell off sharply to 1200 for an auditorium that seats 2207.

Among the reasons given for the decline in attendance were the change in the symphony's concerts from Friday to Thursnights, the attraction of the new Philharmonic Hall in Manhattan, where the symphony also played, and the fact that the symphony had a new conductor.

In an April letter to the subscribers, academy officials warned: "Fewer than 2000 seats held by subscription will not assure keeping the Boston Symphony Orchestra series in Brooklyn."

Called a 'Crisis'

The most recent warning came in a message to members of the Women's Committee, which participates in the sale of subscriptions to the concerts. The unsigned message said that Brooklyn is in danger of losing the Boston Symphony and called the situation a "crisis." It urged the women to redouble their efforts to sell subscriptions.

Perry told the Brooklyn World-Telegram that he did not want to be an "alarmist" about the symphony's prospects in Brooklyn. But he said, "If the people in Brooklyn don't seem to want us any more than they did last season, we will have to think in terms of fewer concerts."

Perry said it is unlikely that the entire series would be canceled in the 1964-65 season because "we wouldn't want to pull the whole rug out from under them."

Contrast Noted

He said the symphony management can't help noticing the contrast between "the seemingly insatiable demand in Manhattan," where last year's concerts were sold out by subscription, and the "lack of violent demand across the river."

"I don't want to say that if we don't sell every seat we will pick up our marbles and go home," Perry added. "But if subscriptions don't go up we will have to infer that Brooklyn is not exactly panting for us. And other cities are."

Perry pointed out that it costs from $12,000 to $14,000 to put on a concert and that the deficit in Brooklyn last year amounted to about $8000 for each concert.

The question is, he said: "To what extent is the Boston public (which supports the symphony) obligated to the Brooklyn public."

He noted, however, that the symphony has "many years of happy tradition" in Brooklyn and that its management would be reluctant to cut back the concert series here.

William McKelvy Martin, director of the academy, expressed optimism about the outlook for the symphony this season.

"I believe we're going to keep the Boston Symphony," he said.

Switch Blamed

He said the main reason for last year's drop in attendance was the change in the concerts' regular Friday night spot to Thursdays. The symphony appeared Fridays and Wednesdays in the new Philharmonic Hall in Manhattan's Lincoln Center.

Other reasons given for last year's poor showing were that some of the doctors who are staunch symphony supporters have office hours on Thursdays and also that it was the first year for the Boston Symphony's new conductor, Erich Leinsdorf.

Subscription and ticket sales for the 1962-63 season reversed a general upward trend in sales for the previous seven seasons. Figures on gross receipts for subscription and single ticket sales for the last eight years are as follows (there were no substantial increases in ticket prices during these years):

1955-56—$23,741
1956-57—$24,398
1957-58—$28,418
1958-59—$25,746
1959-60—$30,864
1960-61—$30,216
1961-62—$33,012
1962-63—$27,461

Subscriptions Off

Most of the decrease last season was in subscription sales, which fell from $22,546 in 1961-62 to $19,131 in 1962-63.

This year's first Boston Symphony Concert will be on Thursday, Oct. 24, with the others—all on Thursdays—on Dec. 5, Jan. 23, Feb. 27, and April 2.

Before Oct. 1, subscription tickets to all five concerts are priced from $11.50 to $23.50. Subscription prices after that date are several dollars higher in each category. Single ticket prices are from $3 to $6.50.

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

NEW YORK NEWS
Sunday, September 15, 1963

Boston Series At Academy May Be Ended

Because subscriptions to the concert series given each year by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Brooklyn Academy of Music have fallen to 1,200, Symphony officials have indicated they may cancel the series.

The reasons given for the decline in attendance at the concerts, which have been one of the Academy's major offerings for 75 years, include changing the concert night from Friday to Thursday, the draw of the new Philharmonic Hall in Manhattan and the fact that the orchestra has changed conductors.

Committee Informed

News of the possible curtailment of the series was revealed in a note sent to the women's committee for the concerts which called the situation a "crisis."

It urged the women, who participate in the sale of subscriptions, to redouble their efforts.

A spokesman for the Symphony said the orchestra probably would continue to visit Brooklyn, but on a lesser scale.

"If the people in Brooklyn don't seem to want us anymore than they did last season, we will have to think in terms of fewer concerts," he declared. The Academy has a capacity of 2,207.

New York World-Telegram and The Sun
D. 463,241 SAT. 175,139

SEP 1 3 1963

Sad Strains

It would be a sad thing indeed if Brooklyn were to lose the fabulous Boston Symphony concert series.

Let's hope there will be enough people interested in subscribing to make it worth the orchestra's while to continue visiting the Brooklyn Academy year after year.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-2200
Traveler (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 164,299

SEP 27 1963

300 Women, One Man Ride Rails To Symphony

The first thought that came to mind was: "Who'll get up and give whom a seat"? ....

There were 300 women on two special two-car trains chartered to take them from Arlington St. MTA Station to Symphony.

A BIT OF A PROBLEM

It all started when the Women's City Club planned its annual meeting at the Statler Hilton. Following the meeting today, they were to attend a special performance at Symphony Hall.

As a simple matter of logistics, transporting 300 women to the theater could raise something of a problem—particularly when ONE woman can spend hours looking for a lost glove.

At any rate, the MTA was contacted and it agreed to put the two-car trains at the ladies' disposal.

"We don't get too many requests for this," said Joseph Purcell of the MTA, in something of understatement.

"But, if people make a request, we try to oblige."

ONE MAN, 300 WOMEN

The cars left from Park Street to await the ladies in Arlington St. subway.

Another MTA representative waited there to help keep traffic flowing as rapidly and as smoothly as possible.

Just this one man with 300 women and the subway.

What do you bet HE doesn't get a seat.

BLANK PAGE

114

V BOSTON 1

First Program

FRIDAY AFTERNOON, SEPTEMBER 27, at 2:00 o'clock

SATURDAY EVENING, SEPTEMBER 28, at 8:30 o'clock

HINDEMITH ..... Symphonic Metamorphosis of Themes by Carl Maria von Weber

I. Allegro
II. "Turandot": Scherzo
III. Andantino
IV. March

BARBER ..... Symphony No. 1 (In one movement), Op. 9
(First performance at these concerts)

INTERMISSION

BRAHMS ..... Symphony No. 1, in C minor, Op. 68

I. Un poco sostenuto; allegro
II. Andante sostenuto
III. Un poco allegretto e grazioso
IV. Adagio; allegro non troppo, ma con brio

These concerts will end about 3:50 o'clock on Friday Afternoon; 10:20 o'clock on Saturday Evening.

BALDWIN PIANO

RCA VICTOR RECORDS

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Christian Science Montor (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 174,850
SEP 28 1963

Boston Symphony Opens S

Let the music soar

By Harold Rogers

When the Boston Symphony Orchestra opened its 83d season Friday afternoon at Symphony Hall, Erich Leinsdorf initiated his second year as music director. During his first season he wrought an extraordinary change in the orchestra: whereas Charles Munch had pursued a casual though dynamic approach to music making, Mr. Leinsdorf soon marshalled order with his iron-willed discipline.

Yet it soon became obvious during Mr. Leinsdorf's first year that what the orchestra was gaining in precision, balance, poise, and clarity, it had lost in buoyancy—its ability to soar into rarer altitudes of feeling. One could praise Mr. Leinsdorf for his devotion to law and order: music is indeed an orderly art. But his emotions were held in a strait jacket; whether he tried to release them, one cannot say; by and large they remained tightly laced.

♪ ♪ ♪

During his Mozart concerts at Tanglewood this past summer a certain easement took place. Emotions indeed began to soar; the music was radiant; there is hope, one thought, that Mr. Leinsdorf, having perfected his orchestral machine, will begin to use it for the music that reaches the heart as well as the ear.

With this in mind one approached the opening concert with anticipation, with hope running high that Mr. Leinsdorf had laid his foundation and could now let go and just be — just let the music say its own say as it flowed through him and into us.

But evidently Mr. Leinsdorf is not yet ready — or never will be ready — to experience what one might call a musical paroxysm of undiluted joy. His opening concert was superb; there are no two ways about it; yet one could not conscientiously say it was superlative. Here again the orchestra was gorgeously attuned and displayed. But it did not soar. The Boston Symphony is a great orchestra, and all great orchestras should soar.

Mr. Leinsdorf did wonders with Hindemith's Symphonic Metamorphoses of Themes by Carl Maria von Weber. A darkly colored work, it can groan and growl if guided by a heavy hand; yet Mr. Leinsdorf avoided the thick shoals and made it the entertaining piece it can be.

♪ ♪ ♪

Samuel Barber's Symphony No. 1—in its first hearing at these concerts—also came forth with a lustrous glow. A certain darkling quality about it recalled Sibelius; perhaps Barber's romanticism drew rather freely from the Finnish master's way of managing his orchestral forces. Yet it was still Barber in all his romantic fervor; Mr. Leinsdorf was especially adept at delineating the slow portion of this one-movement work.

If ever there was a symphony in which a conductor can loose his emotions, it is the Brahms First. Yet lovely as it was in Mr. Leinsdorf's traversal, with every jot and every tittle noted with care, the orchestra did not soar. Perhaps he took the opening movement more spaciously than we have been used to, though tempo is a minor matter if a great performance is involved. Perhaps the Andante needed more abandon, more ebb and flow. But this is quibbling.

What it really needed was that infusion of rapturous spirit that must have been present at the première in 1876, after which some music lovers were moved to refer to it as "the Beethoven Tenth."

It was not the Beethoven Tenth under Mr. Leinsdorf's guidance; it was just the Brahms First, beautifully played.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 194,870
SEP 28 1963

Opening Concert

Leinsdorf Conducts Brahms and Barber

By MARGO MILLER

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's Friday concert, opening its 83d season, was much like a dress rehearsal.

The predominantly female audience, trying new Fall colors on the Summery day, inspected the recently-installed television lights on the second balcony and the small red bulb which glows to signal the conductor's progress from his room to the stage.

The 2600 persons present also heard a program divided between an old favorite and music composed in the last 30 years. They did not hear superlative peformances.

Erich Leinsdorf, in his second year as music director, conducted. His reading of the Brahms First Symphony was orderly to the point of confusion. If this seems a paradox, it can be explained in terms of proportion. Leinsdorf certainly knows how to balance sonorities among the choirs of the orchestra. His tempos are generally pleasing, being determined at the beginning of a movement and subtly changed within the whole.

But what he does is to lay bare the bones. Too many passages are made important, too many musical and emotional climaxes blunted because the high points are approached via high points. In other words, scale is missing. Probably a greater percentage of the Brahms First was heard Friday afternoon than on most occasions and, as a result, little was felt.

The orchestra playing sounded tentative. Was this because there was little overlap sonorally and in a construction way between passages? There were no downright instrumental muffs, indeed some fine playing in solo passages. But the vitality of the orchestra was low.

The program opened, as it will tonight at 8:30, with Hindemith's Symphonic Metamorphosis of Themes by Carl Maria von Weber. This is melodic music stylishly presented by the world's busiest occasional composer. The Symphony Metamorphosis appears not to be a commissioned work. But how grateful conductors must be for something solid but cheerful with which to begin a concert.

Samuel Barber's First Symphony was an instructive bridge between the Hindemith and the Brahms. Receiving its first Boston Symphony performance, the work looks back to the 19th century for its unabashed lyricism and ahead to the 20th for its economy of statement. The Symphony is in a single movement with three themes set out, then developed and combined in elegant legerdemain. Where Hindemith had the instruments in dialogue or chattering among themselves, Barber prefers a thicker sonority. It is an attractive work, deserving further hearing.

In the Hindemith and Barber, Leinsdorf again stressed the order he had in the Brahms. We called the concert a dress rehearsal (with its tradition of bad performance) because second hearings of works now in Leinsdorf's Boston repertoire have proved the conductor can relax his grasp on the music. Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony at Tanglewood this Summer was as fluent as one could wish. It had power and life.

For the next pair of Friday-Saturday concerts, Leinsdorf will conduct two symphonies: Beethoven's Second and Prokofiev's Fifth.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Erich Leinsdorf conducting, opened its 83d season yesterday afternoon. The Symphony Hall program, to be repeated tonight at 8:30, consisted of Hindemith's Symphonic Metamorphosis of Themes by Carl Maria von Weber, Samuel Barber's Symphony No. 1, and Brahms' Symphony No. 1.

14

V BOSTON 1

First Program

FRIDAY AFTERNOON, SEPTEMBER 27, at 2:00 o'clock

SATURDAY EVENING, SEPTEMBER 28, at 8:30 o'clock

HINDEMITH . . . . . Symphonic Metamorphosis of Themes by Carl Maria von Weber

I. Allegro
II. "Turandot": Scherzo
III. Andantino
IV. March

BARBER . . . . . Symphony No. 1 (In one movement), Op. 9
(First performance at these concerts)

INTERMISSION

BRAHMS . . . . . Symphony No. 1, in C minor, Op. 68

I. Un poco sostenuto; allegro
II. Andante sostenuto
III. Un poco allegretto e grazioso
IV. Adagio; allegro non troppo, ma con brio

These concerts will end about 3:50 o'clock on Friday Afternoon; 10:20 o'clock on Saturday Evening.

BALDWIN PIANO

RCA VICTOR RECORDS

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • Richmond 2-4200
Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ: 194,870
SEP 28 1963

Opening Concert

Leinsdorf Conducts Brahms and Barber

By MARGO MILLER

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's Friday concert, opening its 83d season, was much like a dress rehearsal.

The predominantly female audience, trying new Fall colors on the Summery day, inspected the recently-installed television lights on the second balcony and the small red bulb which glows to signal the conductor's progress from his room to the stage.

The 2800 persons present also heard a program divided between an old favorite and music composed in the last 30 years. They did not hear superlative performances.

Erich Leinsdorf, in his second year as music director, conducted. His reading of the Brahms First Symphony was orderly to the point of confusion. If this seems a paradox, it can be explained in terms of proportion. Leinsdorf certainly knows how to balance sonorities among the choirs of the orchestra. His tempos are generally pleasing, being determined at the beginning of a movement and subtly changed within the whole.

But what he does is to lay bare the bones. Too many passages are made important, too many musical and emotional climaxes blunted because the high points are approached via high points. In other words, scale is missing. Probably a greater percentage of the Brahms First was heard Friday afternoon than on most occasions and, as a result, little was felt.

The orchestra playing sounded tentative. Was this because there was little overlap sonorally and in construction way between passages? There were no downright instrumental muffs, indeed some fine playing in solo passages. But the vitality of the orchestra was low.

The program opened, as it will tonight at 8:30, with Hindemith's Symphonic Metamorphosis of Themes by Carl Maria von Weber. This is melodic music stylishly presented by the world's busiest occasional composer. The Symphony Metamorphosis appears not to be a commissioned work. But how grateful conductors must be for something solid but cheerful with which to begin a concert.

Samuel Barber's First Symphony was an instructive bridge between the Hindemith and the Brahms. Receiving its first Boston Symphony performance, the work looks back to the 18th century for its unabashed lyricism and ahead to the 20th for its economy of statement. The Symphony is in a single movement with three themes set out, often developed and combined in elegant legerdemain. Where Hindemith had the instruments in dialogue or chattering among themselves, Barber prefers a thicker sonority. It is an attractive work, deserving further hearing.

In the Hindemith and Barber, Leinsdorf again stressed the order he had in the Brahms. We called the concert a dress rehearsal (with its tradition of bad performance) because second hearings of works now in Leinsdorf's Boston repertoire have proved the conductor can relax his grasp on the music. Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony at Tanglewood this Summer was as fluent as one could wish. It had power and life.

For the next pair of Friday-Saturday concerts, Leinsdorf will conduct two symphonies: Beethoven's Second and Prokofiev's Fifth.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Erich Leinsdorf conducting, opened its 83d season yesterday afternoon. The Symphony Hall program, to be repeated tonight at 8:30, consisted of Hindemith's Symphonic Metamorphosis of Themes by Carl Maria von Weber, Samuel Barber's Symphony No. 1, and Brahms' Symphony No. 1.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • Richmond 2-4200
Christian Science Monitor (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 174,850
SEP 28 1963

Boston Symphony Opens

Let the music soar

By Harold Rogers

When the Boston Symphony Orchestra opened its 83d season Friday afternoon at Symphony Hall, Erich Leinsdorf initiated his second year as music director. During his first season he wrought an extraordinary change in the orchestra: whereas Charles Munch had pursued a casual though dynamic approach to music making, Mr. Leinsdorf soon marshalled order with his iron-willed discipline.

Yet it soon became obvious during Mr. Leinsdorf's first year that what the orchestra was gaining in precision, balance, poise, and clarity, it had lost in buoyancy—its ability to soar into rarer altitudes of feeling. One could praise Mr. Leinsdorf for his devotion to law and order: music is indeed an orderly art. But his emotions were held in a strait jacket; whether he tried to release them, one cannot say; by and large they remained tightly laced.

* * *

During his Mozart concerts at Tanglewood this past summer a certain easement took place. Emotions indeed began to soar; the music was radiant; there is hope, one thought, that Mr. Leinsdorf, having perfected his orchestral machine, will begin to use it for the music that reaches the heart as well as the ear.

With this in mind one approached the opening concert with anticipation, with hope running high that Mr. Leinsdorf had laid his foundation and could now let go and just be — just let the music say its own say as it flowed through him and into us.

But evidently Mr. Leinsdorf is not yet ready — or never will be ready — to experience what one might call a musical paroxysm of undiluted joy. His opening concert was superb; there are no two ways about it; yet one could not conscientiously say it was superlative. Here again the orchestra was gorgeously attuned and displayed. But it did not soar. The Boston Symphony is a great orchestra, and all great orchestras should soar.

Mr. Leinsdorf did wonders with Hindemith's Symphonic Metamorphoses of Themes by Carl Maria von Weber. A darkly colored work, it can groan and growl if guided by a heavy hand; yet Mr. Leinsdorf avoided the thick shoals and made it the entertaining piece it can be.

* * *

Samuel Barber's Symphony No. 1—in its first hearing at these concerts—also came forth with a lustrous glow. A certain darkling quality about it recalled Sibelius; perhaps Barber's romanticism grew rather freely from the Finnish master's way of managing his orchestral forces. Yet it was still Barber in all his romantic fervor; Mr. Leinsdorf was especially adept at delineating the slow portion of this one-movement work.

There was a symphony in which a conductor can loose his emotions, it is the Brahms First. Yet lovely as it was in Mr. Leinsdorf's traversal, with every jot and every tittle noted with care, the orchestra did not soar. Perhaps he took the opening movement more spaciously than we have been used to, though tempo is a minor matter if a great performance is involved. Perhaps the Andante needed more abandon, more ebb and flow. But this is quibbling.

What it really needed was that infusion of rapturous spirit that must have been present at the première in 1876, after which some music lovers were moved to refer to it as "the Beethoven Tenth."

It was not the Beethoven Tenth under Mr. Leinsdorf's guidance; it was just the Brahms First, beautifully played.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Herald (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 178,553

SF

The Symphony

First Fall Concert Provocative, Ideal

By ROBERT TAYLOR

The opening of the 83rd season of The Boston Symphony Orchestra, the second in the reign of Erich Leinsdorf, took place yesterday under circumstances that were socially unremarkable and musically provocative, circumstances, in short, ideal.

Tradition, to a degree, depends on its reliability. And so we shall not waste our time or yours this morning describing the atmosphere of the event. For the record let us note the ranks of limousines, the general air of cultured expectancy, the rising tribute to Mr. Leinsdorf.

More Adventurous

Let us express gratitude for such a superlative orchestra. Let us welcome the five new players: Giora Bernstein and

The Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf conducting, presented the first program of the 83rd season yesterday in Symphony Hall. The program will be repeated tonight at 8:30.

Symphonic Metamorphosis of Themes by Carl Maria von Weber.....Hindemith
Symphony No. 1 (in one movement); Op. 9.....Barber
Symphony No. 1, in C minor, Op. 68.....Brahms

Burton Fine, violinists; Luis Leguia, 'cellist; Thomas Newell Jr., French horn, and Thomas Gauger, percussionist. Let us pass on from those amenities one enjoys and can take for granted.

The musical portion of the program was less indicative of an opening than of mid-season. As a rule conductors usually seize on openings as an opportunity to mollify subscribers with conservative tastes and high tax brackets. (A typical example, the Pension Fund preview of The New York Philharmonic last Thursday, offered Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony, Debussy's "Iberia," and Scenes from "Rosenkavalier.") But Mr. Leinsdorf was yesterday more adventurous.

Against the foil of the accepted, Brahms's First Symphony, one of the justly sacrosanct scores of the standard repertoire, he set the moderns, Hindemith and Barber. Neither the Symphonic Metamorphosis nor the Symphony in One Movement is so radical in structure and idiom that conservative sensibilities would be abraded; yet, rarely encountered, supply a low-voltage stimulus. Moreover, Barber's work, a Boston debut heard in the revised version, affords the listener a chance to compare the Firsts of a master and a contemporary.

Pays Homage

Hindemith's Metamorphosis pays homage to the themes of Carl Maria von Weber. In actuality, however, it represents a low and narcissistic bow to his own image in an aural mirror. The von Weber fragaments consist of the third-rate melodies and ideas of the composer, and Hindemith lavishes on this banal material dazzling orchestral skills. Hence the musical content of the score emerges as a meager and tawdry statement, while the sonorities, colors and relationships of the orchestration express total assurance.

It seems to me rather obvious—and as parody, too cruel to be effective—to take the leavings of a man of exceptional talent, and present these as if they were characteristic. Could Hindemith better metamorphosized [illegible] Beethoven, Bach or Mozart, [illegible] would have required a talent [illegible] equivalent to the originals. Nevertheless, Hindemith makes his mocking point persuasively: he rules the orchestra not the impulse of von Weber.

Samuel Barber's Symphony in One Movement, on the other hand, is an exceptionally modest ingratiating and lyrical product, strongly tinctured by the influence of the early Sibelius. The music bears the outward structure of the classical symphony; the three themes stated in the opening Allegro non troppo develop according to the logic of the traditional four-movement format.

Heroic Character

The themes, however, exhibit a heroic character that does not invoke the tradition in the manner of, say Prokofiev's "Classical." Rather, their songful, brooding, dark textures, their forceful pointillistic timbres, their proportions, recall the epic surge of "Finlandia" and the First Sibelius. The Symphony is derivative late romanticism, but handled with grace, intelligence and vigor.

Mr. Leinsdorf's Brahms First, substantial yet flowing, supplied another brilliant testament of his familiarity with the reportoire. The selection of tempi, his light-bodied strings and dynamics declared his determination to avoid the ponderous. The finale has, if this may be called a weakness, an underscaled restraint that robs it of urgency; but the congeniality of accent and integration of detail, particularly among the horns, lent a burnish that more than compensated for the monumental.

It was meticulously conceived and splendidly delivered, and at the close Mr. Leinsdorf shared the applause with Joseph Silverstein who had played the leading violin voice so beautifully. If a summary adjective serves, the reading may be called "sensitive," an appreciation of Brahms that may not say everything, but augers anticipation of the months ahead.

Next week Mr. Leinsdorf has scheduled Beethoven's Symphony No. 2, in D major, Op. 36, and the Prokofiev Symphony No. 5, Op. 100.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Jewish Advocate
BOSTON, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 32,267

OCT 3 1963

MUSIC IN REVIEW

By GERALD A. BERLIN

BOSTON SYMPHONY OPENING

The Boston Symphony Orchestra inaugurated its 83rd season, and Erich Leinsdorf his second as its conductor, with Hindemith's Symphonic Metamorphosis of Themes by Carl Maria Von Weber, Samuel Barber's Symphony No. 1 and Brahms' Symphony Number 1 in C minor.

When it comes to sheer composing facility, Paul Hindemith stands in a class with Mozart and Schubert, and the Weber Metamorphosis seems to be a typical by-product of this characteristic. Skillfully inconsequential and unpretentious, it was admirably suited as a curtain raiser for a program of this sort. More especially, it gave the first desk wood-winds, the brass choir and the battery ample opportunity to display their wares, and they all proved to be in mid-season form.

The performance of the Barber work was the first in Boston and as such the "novelty" of the concert. Mr. Barber once described the form of his one-movement Opus as "a synthetic treatment of the four-movement classical symphony". Well, the treatment is synthetic in more ways than in form, for in content it is a derivative pastiche of neo-classic Stravinsky and the Sibelius of the Second Symphony period. It must have sounded like pretty souped up stuff even when the composer, then in his mid-twenties, wrote it in the mid-thirties. Why, then, did it suddenly lend grace to the local musical scene?

Elementary, my dear Watson. RCA Victor, for reasons best known to itself, has decided to record it. Nobody can seriously believe that the decision to record followed the decision to play it here. On the contrary. The economics of mass culture in this age, then, is such that the Symphony audiences must in effect subsidize the rehearsal recording session. (RCA, in all fairness, might argue that its recording royalties in effect subsidize the symphony audiences and someday we might develop this fascinating issue at greater length.)

The identical considerations must have dictated the choice of Brahms' First Symphony, which had not been played here since the season before last, for it too is now being recorded. If last weekend's performance is any criterion, Mr. Leinsdorf's interpretation will prove a notable addition to the vast existing phonograph library of this noble work. Purplish, driving interpretations have become almost a tradition here in rendering the C minor, but Mr. Leinsdorf turned that all around. His reading was one of restraint, perfect spacing, clarity of detail and remarkable over-all cohesion - in short, the embodiment of the intelligence and craftmanship that in one short season has become this conductor's hallmark. Warmth there was aplenty, though never to the point of flamability. Therein lay the difference between an unmistakably superior performance and an unforgettable one.

One or two other opening concert notions come to mind. As usual, the turnover in personnel in the Orchestra for the new season is remarkably minimal. Burton Fine and Giora Bernstein have replaced Joseph Leibovici and Lloyd Stonestreet in the violin section, Luis Leguia has Louis Berger's chair among the cellos, while Thomas Gauger now occupies Harold Farberman's old post among the percussion. And as usual, the listing of the contents of forthcoming concerts still spans only the two succeeding ones. One wonders why a musical director so obviously well organized as Mr. Leinsdorf cannot provide listings for the whole season ahead, as is the case with the Pittsburgh Symphony, or for at least the half-season ahead, as does the New York Philharmonic.

This week's offerings include Beethoven's Second Symphony and Prokofieff's Fifth Symphony.

16

BOSTON 2

Second Program

FRIDAY AFTERNOON, OCTOBER 4, at 2:00 o'clock

SATURDAY EVENING, OCTOBER 5, at 8:30 o'clock

CORNELIUS ..... Overture to "The Barber of Bagdad"
(First performance at these concerts)

BEETHOVEN ..... Symphony No. 2, in D major, Op. 36

I. Adagio molto; Allegro con brio
II. Larghetto
III. Scherzo: Allegro
IV. Allegro molto

INTERMISSION

PROKOFIEV ..... Symphony No. 5, Op. 100

I. Andante
II. Allegro moderato
III. Adagio
IV. Allegro giocoso

These concerts will end about 3:45 o'clock on Friday Afternoon; 10:15 o'clock on Saturday Evening.

BALDWIN PIANO

RCA VICTOR RECORDS

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 465,653
OCT 6 1963

Boston Symphony Plays 4 Concerts This Week

Four concerts will be given in Symphony Hall this week by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Erich Leinsdorf will conduct the opening program of the Sunday afternoon series today at 3. On Tuesday the first program of the Tuesday evening series will be given at 8:30 p.m.

This afternoon's concert, which will be repeated on Tuesday, includes Hindemith's Symphonic Metamorphosis, the Symphony No. 1 by Samuel Barber, and Brahms' Symphony No. 1.

The Friday-Saturday concerts this week will begin with a performance of Mozart's Symphony in C major, K. 200, which has not been played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra since 1924. This program also will include Gustav Mahler's Symphony No. 5, last performed by the orchestra in 1951.

Thursday evening at 7:30 Leinsdorf will conduct the first Open Rehearsal of the season. Subscribers to the Open Rehearsals are reminded that all seats are unreserved and that the doors will open at 6:45 p.m. This series has been sold out by season subscription.

BOSTON SYMPHONY conductor Erich Leinsdorf (left) greets new orchestra men at their first rehearsal. They are Giora Bernstein, violin; Thomas Gauger, percussion; Luis Leguia, cello; Burton Fine, violin; Thomas Newell Jr., French horn.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 465,653
2-9 1963

Beethoven, Prokofiev Next at Symphony Hall

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its first visit to Montreal since 1953 on Tuesday to participate in the opening concerts of the new Place des Arts in the Canadian city. Erich Leinsdorf will conduct the orchestra in performances of Hindemith's Symphonic Metamorphosis, Samuel Barber's Symphony No. 1, and the Symphony No. 1 by Brahms.

This week's Symphony Hall concerts on Friday and Saturday will begin with the first Boston Symphony performances of the 19th-century German composer Peter Cornelius' Overture to "The Barber of Bagdad." Also to be heard on these programs will be the Symphony No. 2 by Beethoven and Prokofiev's Symphony No. 5. The Prokofiev work was last performed in Symphony Hall by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in February 1961 when Leinsdorf was guest conductor of the orchestra.

A week from today, the first program of the Sunday series will be given in Symphony Hall at 3 p.m. The orchestra, conducted by Leinsdorf, will repeat the program which they will play in Montreal at the Place des Arts.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Christian Science Montor (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 174,850
OCT 5 1963

Music for your thoughts

Why the heart sits in silence

By Harold Rogers

The purveyors of Musak openly declare that they provide "music to be heard, but not listened to."

The current concerts by the Boston Symphony pursue a policy of purveying "music to be listened to, but not felt."

The two most potent factors in the art of communication are thought and feeling, and of these two, feeling is the greater. When they join hands with music, the music becomes great. Mediocre music is music that has been divorced, to a certain degree, from thought and feeling. If music is treated merely as a thing of sound—of balances, dynamics, and decibels—it will be robbed of its communicating power. It then appeals to the ear, not to the heart. It will be listened to, but not felt.

* * *

There is no question that Erich Leinsdorf's concerts make a strong appeal to the intellect and to the ear. Yet with certain minor exceptions the heart sits in silence. Take the Prokofiev Symphony No. 5 as a case in point. Here is a work that spans almost the entire range of human emotions, that sets moments of soaring aspiration in biting contrast with righteous anger. It sings, it pleads, it tugs, it disturbs, it elevates, but only when the man on the podium is deeply committed to its emotional message.

Who could ever forget Leonard Bernstein's hair-raising performance of the Prokofiev Fifth, both with his own New York Philharmonic and with the Boston Symphony? Did he dance a little in the second movement? He did indeed, nor was he to be commended for that.

* * *

But we felt it. We didn't just think about what an engaging rhythm it was, about what a charming piece of whimsy Prokofiev could envision in the midst of such a powerful piece of writing. We felt the rhythm; we felt the whimsy.

And were we electrified by the finale? We were indeed and basked in the glow of that fire for an hour or two thereafter.

With memories like these how can a listener respond to Mr. Leinsdorf's cool, intellectual approach with the same enthusiasm? He cannot. Prokofiev has suddenly turned bland; he becomes a genteel composer of drawing-room symphonies; the giant has been cut down to the level of a pleasant music maker.

So, too, with Beethoven's Symphony No. 2, which preceeded the Prokofiev Friday afternoon at Symphony Hall. So, too, with the Overture to "The Barber of Baghdad," fashioned by Peter Cornelius, the man who mated Wagner's chromaticism with the melos of Offenbach.

Lovely to listen to—all of it. Lovely background music for your thoughts, if that's all you require of music.

But uncommitted, disengaging, flat.

16

BOSTON 2

Second Program

FRIDAY AFTERNOON, OCTOBER 4, at 2:00 o'clock

SATURDAY EVENING, OCTOBER 5, at 8:30 o'clock

CORNELIUS ..... Overture to "The Barber of Bagdad"
(First performance at these concerts)

BEETHOVEN ..... Symphony No. 2, in D major, Op. 36

I. Adagio molto; Allegro con brio
II. Larghetto
III. Scherzo: Allegro
IV. Allegro molto

INTERMISSION

PROKOFIEV ..... Symphony No. 5, Op. 100

I. Andante
II. Allegro moderato
III. Adagio
IV. Allegro giocoso

These concerts will end about 3:45 o'clock on Friday Afternoon; 10:15 o'clock on Saturday Evening.

BALDWIN PIANO RCA VICTOR RECORDS

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • Richmond 2-4200
Sunday Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 465,653
SEP 29 1963

Beethoven, Prokofiev Next at Symphony Hall

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its first visit to Montreal since 1958 on Tuesday to participate in the opening concerts of the new Place des Arts in the Canadian city. Erich Leinsdorf will conduct the orchestra in performances of Hindemith's Symphonic Metamorphosis, Samuel Barber's Symphony No. 1, and the Symphony No. 1 by Brahms.

This week's Symphony Hall concerts on Friday and Saturday will begin with the first Boston Symphony performances of the 19th-century German composer Peter Cornelius' Overture to "The Barber of Bagdad." Also to be heard on these programs will be the Symphony No. 2 by Beethoven and Prokofiev's Symphony No. 5. The Prokofiev work was last performed in Symphony Hall by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in February 1961 when Leinsdorf was guest conductor of the orchestra.

A week from today, the first program of the Sunday series will be given in Symphony Hall at 3 p.m. The orchestra, conducted by Leinsdorf, will repeat the program which they will play in Montreal at the Place des Arts.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • Richmond 2-4200
Sunday Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 465,653
OCT 6 1963

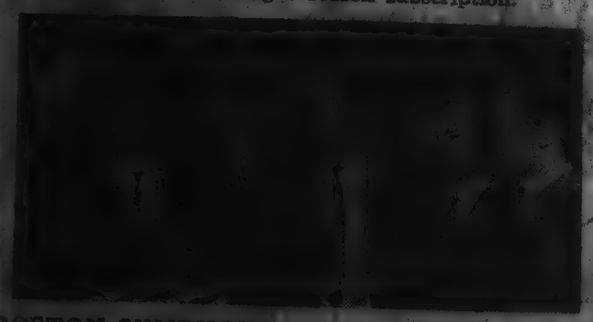
Boston Symphony Plays 4 Concerts This Week

Four concerts will be given in Symphony Hall this week by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Erich Leinsdorf will conduct the opening program of the Sunday afternoon series today at 3. On Tuesday the first program of the Tuesday evening series will be given at 8:30 p.m.

This afternoon's concert, which will be repeated on Tuesday, includes Hindemith's Symphonic Metamorphosis, the Symphony No. 1 by Samuel Barber, and Brahms' Symphony No. 1.

The Friday-Saturday concerts this week will begin with a performance of Mozart's Symphony in C major, K. 200, which has not been played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra since 1924. This program also will include Gustav Mahler's Symphony No. 5, last performed by the orchestra in 1951.

Thursday evening at 7:30 Leinsdorf will conduct the first Open Rehearsal of the season. Subscribers to the Open Rehearsals are reminded that all seats are unreserved and that the doors will open at 6:45 p.m. This series has been sold out by season subscription.



BOSTON SYMPHONY conductor Erich Leinsdorf (left) greets new orchestra men at their first rehearsal. They are Giora Bernstein, violin; Thomas Gauger, percussion; Luis Leguia, cello; Burton Fine, violin; Thomas Newell Jr., French horn.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • Richmond 2-4200
Christian Science
Monitor (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 174,850
OCT 5 1963

Music for your thoughts

Why the heart sits in silence

By Harold Rogers

The purveyors of Musak openly declare that they provide "music to be heard, but not listened to."

The current concerts by the Boston Symphony pursue a policy of purveying "music to be listened to, but not felt."

The two most potent factors in the art of communication are thought and feeling, and of these two, feeling is the greater. When they join hands with music, the music becomes great. Mediocre music is music that has been divorced, to a certain degree, from thought and feeling. If music is treated merely as a thing of sound—of balances, dynamics, and decibels—it will be robbed of its communicating power. It then appeals to the ear, not to the heart. It will be listened to, but not felt.

♪ ♪ ♪

There is no question that Erich Leinsdorf's concerts make a strong appeal to the intellect and to the ear. Yet with certain minor exceptions the heart sits in silence. Take the Prokofiev Symphony No. 5 as a case in point. Here is a work that spans almost the entire range of human emotions, that sets moments of soaring aspiration in biting contrast with righteous anger. It sings, it pleads, it tugs, it disturbs, it elevates, but only when the man on the podium is deeply committed to its emotional message.

Who could ever forget Leonard Bernstein's hair-raising performance of the Prokofiev Fifth, both with his own New York Philharmonic and with the Boston Symphony? Did he dance a little in the second movement? He did indeed, nor was he to be commended for that.

♪ ♪ ♪

But we felt it. We didn't just think about what an engaging rhythm it was, about what a charming piece of whimsy Prokofiev could envision in the midst of such powerful piece of writing. We felt the rhythm; we felt the whimsy.

And were we electrified by the finale? We were indeed, and basked in the glow of that fire for an hour or two thereafter.

With memories like these, how can a listener respond to Mr. Leinsdorf's cool, intellectual approach with the same enthusiasm? He cannot. Prokofiev has suddenly turned bland; he becomes a genteel composer of drawing-room symphonies; the giant has been cut down to the level of a pleasant music maker.

So, too, with Beethoven's Symphony No. 2, which preceeded the Prokofiev Friday afternoon at Symphony Hall. So, too, with the Overture to "The Barber of Baghdad," fashioned by Peter Cornelius, the man who mated Wagner's chromaticism with the melos of Offenbach.

Lovely to listen to—all of it. Lovely background music for your thoughts, if that's all you require of music.

But uncommitted, disengaging, flat.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 194,870

OCT 5 1963

At Symphony

Leinsdorf Conducts The Prokofiev Fifth

By MARGO MILLER

As a piece of program making, the Boston Symphony's concert yesterday was ideal. Erich Leinsdorf picked as overture the melodius curtain raiser to Peter Cornelius' "The Barber of Bagdad." Then came the pellucid Beethoven Second Symphony. And after intermission, a fifth symphony, the number it seems the muses smile on. In this case, it was the Prokofiev Fifth.

The two symphonies provided illustration again of how Leinsdorf plans an extended and ordered composition. There were some satisfying moments in the Beethoven, many more in the Prokofiev. The prevailing mood yesterday afternoon was serene.

This reviewer found the Beethoven elegantly moulded in its separate parts. The tempos were apt. The sound of the orchestra was fresh, ensemble playing supple. But this symphony can also be a joyous excursion. One longed for a sweep of something besides perfectly matched pearls.

That is perhaps why the Prokofiev symphony was more satisfying. For one thing, its very vulgarity, in parts, is a tart sorbet to the Beethoven. For another, its orchestral sound is deep in contrast to the higher and lighter Austrian work. Also to be considered is Prokofiev's use of orchestral colors which now and then assault the ear and then retreat into the less showy tints. If some kind of loftly sentiment were wanted to attach to the Russian symphony, Prokofiev wrote that he intended it as a "hymn to free and happy Man." And doubtless, a scribbler could sit down with the score and plot a program to prove the composer's intentions. It is a dramatic symphony and one which Leinsdorf moves surely in.

The Fifth Symphony was on a program conducted by Eugene Ormandy whose conception of it tended toward the robust. Leinsdorf rather ignores the excitement for excitement's sake, substituting instead a nice tension. One has only to hear the Boston Symphony strings in the opening andante to guess this ingredient, or to listen to the mellow violas late in the second movement to know musical drama. Motion toward climaxes was leisurely, as it had been in the Beethoven. But in the Prokofiev, they were properly prepared for, some backwater assuring that the falls would burst ahead.

The concert opened, as it will this evening at 8:30, with the first Boston Symphony performance of Cornelius' original overture to his opera, "The Barber of Bagdad." It is a likeable little piece—about six minutes—intended to lift an audience into a cheerful state of mind for the comic opera which would follow. The "Barber," was hissed from the Weimar stage; its pleasant overture was cordially received here yesterday.

More of the symphonic repertoire will be heard next Friday and Saturday when Leinsdorf will conduct Mozart's Symphony in C major, K. 200, and Mahler's Symphony No. 5 in C-sharp minor.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Erich Leinsdorf conducting, played yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program, to be repeated tonight at 8:30, consisted of Cornelius' Overture to "The Barber of Bagdad," Beethoven's Symphony No. 2 in D major, Op. 36, and Prokofiev's Symphony No. 5, Op. 100.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Herald (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 178,553

OCT 5 1963

The Symphony

Same Score Again Superbly Done

By ROBERT TAYLOR

"Culminating in as stirring a performance of Prokofiev's Fifth Symphony as one is apt to hear in a lifetime, the program of Erich Leinsdorf at yesterday's Boston Symphony concert was masterfully conducted."

It is bad taste to quote from oneself. Seldom, however, does one have a chance to repeat one's enthusiasms, and those words upon Mr. Leinsdorf's debut here, February 3, 1961, might well serve this weekend's occasion, taste notwithstanding. Mr. Leinsdorf repeated the impression that he made with the same score.

The Fifth does not seem to me a monumental work, and we have since heard the Leinsdorf version of Prokofiev's Sixth, an infinitely more economical, simple and cohesive statement. The music presents heroic dimensions, true, but as a "hymn to the spirit of man," conceived under the pressures of wartime Russia, struggles to freedom in the shadow of the Beethoven Ninth.

Peak to Peak

Nevertheless, Prokofiev's Fifth achieves validity, as a kind of inner-directed treatment of Beethoven's affirmation. Tortured, dark, thick-textured, and studded by longeurs as though the prevailing mood of grief lapsed into flat despair, the symphony skips from peak to peak of uneven grandeur. And Mr. Leinsdorf's sense of proportion organizes this sprawling structure.

He lets the music flow freely.

The Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf conducting, presented the second program of the 83rd season yesterday in Symphony Hall. The program will be repeated tonight at 8:30.

Overture to "The Barber of Bagdad" ..... Cornelius
Symphony No. 2, in D Maior, Op. 36 ..... Beethoven
Symphony No. 5, Op. 100 ..... Prokofiev

The temptation to pile on sonorities, colors, weight, interpreting Prokofiev as a romantic survival, is enormous. Mr. Leinsdorf, fortunately, does not sentimentalize. The virtues of his approach are propulsion, clarity, and a bold rhythmic outline. Hence the reading emerges, charged by a galvanic intensity.

Balance and intensity: these indeed become the Fifth Symphony more than exaggerated gusts of emotion. The slow movement is treated with a precision that does not allow the pungently dissonant finale to break forth like a whirlwind; the allegro giocoso innately possesses a spacious scope. What Mr. Leinsdorf accomplishes is an articulation of the music; enabling one to hear its parts in logical order and contrast.

Not Strict

The classical range of tempi and dynamics was not strict, for the conductor drove the opening andante at a brisk pace. The impact of understated emotion, though, lent the Fifth an uncommon poignance and drama. Erich Leinsdorf's conducting temperament, fastidious in its regard for form, has an affinity for Prokofiev.

Similarly, the Beethoven Second disclosed an unwavering orchestral line. Posterity is inclined to consider the symphonic thought of this music conventional, since posterity has the hindsight of the "Eroica" to contemplate. The standard of comparison is to Mozart's "Prague" symphony in the introduction, and 39th Symphony in the Larghetto. It is the apogee of Beethoven's "classical" period, the summing up.

Mr. Leinsdorf took this approach yesterday, and few can gainsay the urbanity and freshness of his interpretation. The themes had a fluent sparkle, an irresistible charm. Yet I would call this an exact, crisp performance that left out the dramatic element.

Lyricism Remains

In short, the 'romantic" Beethoven. Mr. Leinsdorf's close adherence to the text, his agreeable tempi, the substance of his phrase asserted the grace of the work. The power, however, that overwhelmed contemporary criticism, the sense that the Second expresses a shattering force, was relatively absent. Remaining was its lyricism, and that is saying a great deal; we have a splendid Beethoven conductor here; of all the Nine, the Second bears the need of revival most.

Cornelius's Overture, given for the first time at the series, makes a captivating curtain-raiser. The feathery comic mood of its tunes reveals the craft of an artist. Cornelius's is a modest art, and his prettiness has more in common with Sullivan's melodies than Rossini's, but he knows his limitations, an admirable trait in a comic writer of any kind. Mr. Leinsdorf who gave up a fine "Barber of Bagdad" on records with the Philadelphia, deserves praise for his attention to the neglected humorist.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Jewish Advocate
BOSTON, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 32,267

OCT 10 1963

MUSIC IN REVIEW

By GERALD A. BERLIN

BSO: WHITHER PROKOFIEV?

Erich Leinsdorf's memorable directing of Prokofiev's Fifth Symphony three seasons ago as a guest here was a clear indication that he was a factor to be reckoned with in the succession to the conductorship of the orchestra. Of that performance I wrote at the time: "An obviously moved audience rendered prolonged homage to a deep, probing performance of one of the finer musical evocations of the recent past."

Last weekend Mr. Leinsdorf directed the same symphony again and, I am satisfied, once more gave a very strong reading. But on this occasion the audience did not appear obviously moved. And the applause was not only not prolonged, it was not much more than perfunctory. One wonders what lies behind this. It could mean that Prokofiev's Fifth does not stand that much repetition, or that Prokofiev's music itself is obsolescing more rapidly than we know, or that the Boston listeners have already waxed blase about their new conductor, or any combination of these things.

The theory of Prokofievian obsolescence has much to be said for it. Everything he wrote after the Fifth was stale by the day it was written. Much of the brightness, imagination and acerbity of the earlier years, though, abound outwardly in this conservative symphony. It is often suggested and has been reiterated more than once in this column, that here is a work which is a great modern restatement, because it embodies Prokofiev's own tragic experience squarely within the great Western symphonic tradition.

I have been carrying on a dialogue on this subject for some years now with a critic of the passing musical scene whose musical knowledge, experience and refinement of taste are beyond exception. He has taken a decisive stand in opposition to the notion that Prokofiev, even at his best, provides a meaningful link between the great line of musical development and modernity. Indeed, it is his contention that instead of passing on the tradition, Prokofiev (as well as Shostakovitch) colluded to assassinate it. He argues that whereas in the great symphonic masters treatment of the thematic development is the core of the writing, in Prokofiev there is only uninventive, dull repetition. The themes seldom rise above the quality of circus music. The orchestra scoring is "dirty" - i.e. instrumentation is consistently used to give a pseudo-contemporaneous effect to the most commonplace harmonic treatment, much as in the compositions of amateurs. Such a Potemkin village of writing might stem from sheer laziness, since Prokofiev possessed one of the most collossal aptitudes of any composer who ever lived. Then again it might stem from spite directed towards the prevailing commissars of Soviet musical taste. Whatever its explanation, my friend insists, the fact of its existence cannot be denied.

With these arguments in mind I listened afresh to Prokofiev's masterpiece last weekend. There is indeed much truth in the assertions of my party of the other part. Yet the symphonic repertory is full of major works by composers with stupendous flaws in their techniques. Bruckner, Ives, even Schubert, come readily to mind. I still feel that for all its shortcomings, Prokofiev's Symphony No. 5, with the poignancy which throughout underlies its brittle gaiety, remains one of the more powerful statements of our generation. All of which, if you grant the quality of the performance, still leaves us with the question: Why was it so indifferently received?

The other symphony on the program was Beethoven's Second. For purposes of my friend's argument this work, with its beautifully molded classical contours, its masterly development and its delicate transparent orchestration could serve as a superb model for a Prokofiev to study and emulate. Nevertheless, despite a suave, polished reading, it too was stolidly, almost stonily received.

For this work the principals in almost every section of the orchestra were replaced by the next man in line. I discovered this in the first instance by hearing the difference, not by seeing the players. Mr. Leinsdorf often does this with the simpler, more lightly scored works. Is this to demonstrate that the second chair players play as well as the first desk? Is it to give the underlings a greater sense of participation and opportunity for self-expression? To give the first chair players a rest? Usually there is good reason for sugstituting the JV's for the first team and I am curious to know what it is.

The concert commenced with yet another of those archaeological exhumations that Mr. Leinsdorf so loves to dig out —this one the six-minute overture to "The Barber of Baghdad" by a mid-nineteenth century German yclept Peter Cornelius. Cornelius cut something of a swathe in Weimar in the hey-day of his mentors, Liszt and Wagner, and he could put notes together amiably enough in their manner. This piece, to put it charitably, is not exactly a work of incandescent genius, but as a change up from yet another serving of, say, Euryanthe it was welcome for one visit. Surely it must be one of the few overtures ever to conclude with a trombone cadenza. The performance, as may have been expected, was done to a fine turn.

This week it is at Wien at Symphony Hall, and Mr. Leinsdorf's program includes Mozart's Symphony in C major, K. 200 and Mahler's Symphony No. 5 in C sharp minor.

18 SUNDAY 1. TUESDAY 1

First Program

SUNDAY AFTERNOON, OCTOBER 6, at 3:00 o'clock

HINDEMITH ..... Symphonic Metamorphosis of Themes by Carl Maria von Weber

I. Allegro
II. "Turandot": Scherzo
III. Andantino
IV. March

BARBER ..... Symphony No. 1 (In one movement), Op. 9

INTERMISSION

BRAHMS ..... Symphony No. 1, in C minor, Op. 68

I. Un poco sostenuto; allegro
II. Andante sostenuto
III. Un poco allegretto e grazioso
IV. Adagio; allegro non troppo, ma con brio

BALDWIN PIANO RCA VICTOR RECORDS

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Traveler (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 164,299
OCT 5 1963

Series Start

Erich Leinsdorf will conduct the opening program of the Boston Symphony's Sunday series and Tuesday series. It will be the same program for both concerts.

Sunday at 3 p.m. and Tuesday at 8:30, it will be: Hindemith, Symphonic Metamorphosis of Themes by Carl Maria von Weber; Barber, Symphony No. 1 (in one movement), Op. 9, and Brahms, Sympohny No. 1 in C minor, Op. 68.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Record-American (m) (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 452,333
OCT 3 1963

BSO SUN. PROGRAM

Next Sunday the first program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Sunday series will be given in Symphony Hall at 3 p. m. The orchestra, conducted by Erich Leinsdorf, will repeat the program which they will play in Montreal. The selections are Hindemith's Symphonic Metamorphosis, Samuel Barber's Symphony No. 1 and the Symphony No. 1 by Brahms.

First Program

TUESDAY EVENING, OCTOBER 8, at 8:30 o'clock

HINDEMITH ..... Symphonic Metamorphosis of Themes by Carl Maria von Weber

I. Allegro
II. "Turandot": Scherzo
III. Andantino
IV. March

BARBER ..... Symphony No. 1 (In one movement), Op. 9

INTERMISSION

BRAHMS ..... Symphony No. 1, in C minor, Op. 68

I. Un poco sostenuto; allegro
II. Andante sostenuto
III. Un poco allegretto e grazioso
IV. Adagio; allegro non troppo, ma con brio

BALDWIN PIANO RCA VICTOR RECORDS

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Standard-Times (e)
NEW BEDFORD, Mass.
Circ. 64,012
OCT 7 1963

Boston Symphony Start Met With Enthusiasm

By EARL J. DIAS
Standard-Times Music Critic

Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony Orchestra played the first program of its annual series of six Sunday afternoon subscription concerts in Symphony Hall yesterday before a capacity audience that welcomed Mr. Leinsdorf and his musicians with considerable enthusiasm and affection.

For this opening program, Mr. Leinsdorf chose Hindemith's "Symphonic Metamorphosis of Themes by Carl Maria Von Weber," Samuel Barber's "Symphony No. 1" (in one movement), and Brahms' "Symphony No. 1 in C Minor." It was a program well calculated to display the lush sound, the commendable precision, and clarity of phrasing that have distinguished the orchestra under Mr. Leinsdorf's leadership.

Hindemith's "Metamorphosis" is a work easily assimilated by an audience. An example of interesting and imaginative orchestration, its "Turandot" Scherzo is especially attractive — a sort of blend of background music Oriental enough in sound to accompany the machinations of the sinister Dr. Fu Manchu with occasional overtones of jazz rhythm by trombones and trumpets.

In addition, the work includes an appealing and beautifully constructed Andantino and a march finale that enables the orchestra to achieve some wild and woolly but well-controlled and pleasurable effects.

Samuel Barber's "Symphony No. 1" he himself has described as "a synthetic treatment of the four-movement classical symphony." By these words, Mr. Barber means simply that the customary four movements are telescoped and follow one another without interruption. Like most of Barber's work, this symphony is in neo-Romantic style. Most of it is driving and percussive, but there are also passages in which the strings sing broadly and beautifully (somewhat reminiscent of the same composer's "Adagio for Strings.")

Mr. Leinsdorf's reading and the orchestra's playing were both in the vein — with sonorous tone and really brilliant performance in the shattering climax.

Finally, Mr. Leinsdorf breathed new life into the familiar Brahms "Symphony No. 1," being particularly effective in the magnificent final movement — affirmative music that glows with romantic power. The orchestra was in fine fettle—responsive, crisp in phrasing, playing with elan and skill.

18 SUNDAY 1. TUESDAY 1

First Program

SUNDAY AFTERNOON, OCTOBER 6, at 3:00 o'clock

HINDEMITH . . . . . Symphonic Metamorphosis of Themes by Carl Maria von Weber

I. Allegro
II. "Turandot": Scherzo
III. Andantino
IV. March

BARBER . . . . . Symphony No. 1 (In one movement), Op. 9

INTERMISSION

BRAHMS . . . . . Symphony No. 1, in C minor, Op. 68

I. Un poco sostenuto; allegro
II. Andante sostenuto
III. Un poco allegretto e grazioso
IV. Adagio; allegro non troppo, ma con brio

BALDWIN PIANO RCA VICTOR RECORDS

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Traveler (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 164,299
OCT 5 1963

Series Start

Erich Leinsdorf will conduct the opening program of the Boston Symphony's Sunday series and Tuesday series. It will be the same program for both concerts.

Sunday at 3 p.m. and Tuesday at 8:30, it will be: Hindemith, Symphonic Metamorphosis of Themes by Carl Maria von Weber, Barber, Symphony No. 1 (in one movement), Op. 9, and Brahms, Sympohny No. 1 in C minor, Op. 68.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Record-American (m) (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 452,333
OCT 3 1963

BSO SUN. PROGRAM

Next Sunday the first program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Sunday series will be given in Symphony Hall at 3 p. m. The orchestra, conducted by Erich Leinsdorf, will repeat the program which they will play in Montreal. The selections are Hindemith's Symphonic Metamorphosis, Samuel Barber's Symphony No. 1 and Symphony No. 1 by Brahms.

First Program

TUESDAY EVENING, OCTOBER 8, at 8:30 o'clock

HINDEMITH . . . . . Symphonic Metamorphosis of Themes by Carl Maria von Weber

I. Allegro
II. "Turandot": Scherzo
III. Andantino
IV. March

BARBER . . . . . Symphony No. 1 (In one movement), Op. 9

INTERMISSION

BRAHMS . . . . . Symphony No. 1, in C minor, Op. 68

I. Un poco sostenuto; allegro
II. Andante sostenuto
III. Un poco allegretto e grazioso
IV. Adagio; allegro non troppo, ma con brio

BALDWIN PIANO RCA VICTOR RECORDS

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Standard-Times (e)
NEW BEDFORD, Mass.
Circ. 64,012
OCT 7 1963

Boston Symphony Start Met With Enthusiasm

By EARL J. DIAS
Standard-Times Music Critic

Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony Orchestra played the first program of its annual series of six Sunday afternoon subscription concerts in Symphony Hall yesterday before a capacity audience that welcomed Mr. Leinsdorf and his musicians with considerable enthusiasm and affection.

For this opening program, Mr. Leinsdorf chose Hindemith's "Symphonic Metamorphosis of Themes by Carl Maria Von Weber," Samuel Barber's "Symphony No. 1" (in one movement), and Brahms' "Symphony No. 1 in C Minor." It was a program well calculated to display the lush sound, the commendable precision, and clarity of phrasing that have distinguished the orchestra under Mr. Leinsdorf's leadership.

Hindemith's "Metamorphosis" is a work easily assimilated by an audience. An example of interesting and imaginative orchestration, its "Turandot" Scherzo is especially attractive — a sort of blend of background music Oriental enough in sound to accompany the machinations of the sinister Dr. Fu Manchu with occasional overtones of jazz rhythm by trombones and trumpets.

In addition, the work includes an appealing and beautifully constructed Andantino and a marche finale that enables the orchestra to achieve some wild and woolly but well-controlled and pleasurable effects.

Samuel Barber's "Symphony No. 1" he himself has described as "a synthetic treatment of the four-movement classical symphony." By these words, Mr. Barber means simply that the customary four movements are telescoped and follow one another without interruption. Like most of Barber's work, this symphony is in neo-Romantic style. Most of it is driving and percussive, but there are also passages in which the strings sing broadly and beautifully (somewhat reminiscent of the same composer's "Adagio for Strings.")

Mr. Leinsdorf's reading and the orchestra's playing were both in the vein — with sonorous tone and really brilliant performance in the shattering climax.

Finally, Mr. Leinsdorf breathed new life into the familiar Brahms "Symphony No. 1," being particularly effective in the magnificent final movement — affirmative music that glows with romantic power. The orchestra was in fine fettle—responsive, crisp in phrasing, playing with elan and skill.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Patriot-Ledger (e)
QUINCY, Mass.
Circ. 44,419
OCT 9 1953

The Sound of Music

Bridging A Century At Symphony Hall

By Dan Webster

Much of the music in the air today traces its ancestry directly to that of Brahms. This point was made last night when the Boston Symphony Orchestra opened its Tuesday night programs at Symphony Hall.

Under the direction of Erich Leinsdorf, the orchestra played Brahms, but only after letting the near-capacity audience hear how some of the harmonic seeds he had planted in the 1870's had blossomed in the 1930's and 1940's.

Last night the late blossoming was more impressive than the early planting. Mr. Leinsdorf led the orchestra in Hindemith's Symphonic Metamorphoses on Themes of Carl Maria von Weber, and Samuel Barber's Symphony No. 1 before playing the Brahms Symphony No. 1 in C minor.

It was the same program the orchestra played to open this 83rd season 10 days ago and it came to the Tuesday audience burnished by two previous performances.

It was easy to hear where Mr. Leinsdorf's interest lay. The two 20th Century works were charged with dynamism of creative performance; the Brahms lacked that freshness.

The cause is partly implanted in the composers' approach to their music. Both the modern works are succinct. They speak their piece and stop and their impact is greater for their lack of excess.

This pithiness is the special virtue of the Barber Symphony. It is a four-movement symphony in one movement. The entire work is built on themes stated within the first minute; each section is developed and finally recapped as a whole. It is a stunning accomplishment for a man of only 25 as Barber was when he wrote it. It is distinctly American, modern, original; its debt to Brahms is heard occasionally in the composer's approach, his interest in polyphony, some of his techniques of orchestration.

The performance was taut and colorful. The Boston strings leapt at the opening octave and the rugged theme it heralds. And the strings, often individual sections divided for greater color, led in pointing up the outlines of its architecture.

Dr. Leinsdorf's direction insured that the work's construction was clear. When the opening theme reappeared in the passacaglia at the end, it was a breath of fresh air exhilarating to the listeners. The sturdiness of the brass and the precision of the winds balanced the strings to sum up a stirring performance.

The Barber symphony followed the opening Hindemith work in the searing first half of the program. Hindemith's 1943 composition has struck many as egotistical display since he has built a piece of brilliant color from shreds and tatters of some of the least impressive of von Weber's output. But the tradition of the later composer building on foundations laid by earlier writers is a long one and a valid one. And Hindemith bows to von Weber's ideas while developing their implications with 20th Century techniques.

The results are hardly academic. Mr. Leinsdorf again led a vigorous reading of the highly complex score. His grasp of the multiple lines of musical ideas are made clearly visible at the same time the wealth of detail in this score is made perfectly lucid.

Of the four divisions of this single-movement work, the opening and closing sections were most vividly presented. The oriental scherzo, built on music from von Weber's incidental music for "Turandot," is an exotic display, warmed by the mellow woodwinds. The closing section is a hunting march which contains the combined best features of both composers.

The Metamorphoses is a major work by this 68-year-old composer, one which, although 20 years old, remains a challenge to the most skillful orchestras and conductors and a satisfying musical experience for a wide circle of listeners.

The vibrancy of the performance of these two works did not carry past the intermission and into the performance of the Brahms symphony. While it takes intense concentration by conductor and orchestra to play the Barber and the Hindemith, it takes only an assurance that the orchestra will be paid to produce another reading of Brahms' first symphony.

For all the players' skill and attention to detail Mr. Leinsdorf brought to the music, it was anticlimatic. The first movement was stolid and lacking integration. The middle movements with their demands on the orchestra's woodwinds, were lighter and more finely wrought. The final movement developed drive and tension as it advanced but it could not be described as exciting.

SAMUEL BARBER

Mr. Leinsdorf called on the orchestra's principal wind players to accept the applause with him for their work in all three compositions.

The orchestra was clearly interested in the men who wrote music for our time, men who learned their craft from the 19th Century.

20

BOSTON 3

EIGHTY-THIRD SEASON • NINETEEN HUNDRED SIXTY-THREE–SIXTY-FOUR

Third Program

FRIDAY AFTERNOON, OCTOBER 11, at 2:00 o'clock

SATURDAY EVENING, OCTOBER 12, at 8:30 o'clock

MOZART ..... Symphony in C major, K. 200

I. Allegro spiritoso
II. Andante
III. Menuetto
IV. Presto

INTERMISSION

MAHLER ..... Symphony No. 5 in C-sharp minor

Part I (1) Trauermarsch
(2) Stürmisch bewegt

Part II (3) Scherzo
(French horn obbligato — James Stagliano)

Part III (4) Adagietto
(5) Rondo — Finale

These concerts will end about 3:45 o'clock on Friday Afternoon; 10:15 o'clock on Saturday Evening.

BALDWIN PIANO RCA VICTOR RECORDS

New England Newspaper Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

[137]

Jewish Advocate
BOSTON, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 32,267
OCT 17 1963

MUSIC IN REVIEW

By GERALD A. BERLIN

MAHLER'S FIFTH AT B.S.O.

The new symphony year took on an unquestionably brilliant hue last weekend with a searing performance of the Fifth Symphony of Gustav Mahler. Mr. Leinsdorf was, as the English say, unmistakably up for this one. The orchestra as an ensemble and as individuals responded magnificently to the occasion. And the audience, for the first time this season, responded in kind. The time seems now to have arrived once and for all when we can quit deliberating on every single performance of a Mahler symphony over whether the conductor is courageous in playing it at all, whether American audiences will some day get to appreciate why Mahler is so adored in Central Europe, and the rest.

As for the Fifth, it is hard to imagine any Mahler symphony that better combines the sweet tradition of the Schubert lied with the grand romantic symphonic sweep, nor one which contains more tension beneath its flowing, lyric lines. Yet, even as Mahler symphonies go, the Fifth is garrulous and over-extended, and its endless proliferation of enchanting ideas and sounds are only too easily drowned in a welter of noises.

This is where Mr. Leinsdorf comes in. The listener's attention was focused and pushed forward upon the piece in its tremendous scale but with strictest definition of rhythm and phrase. The proportions of the symphony never sounded distorted as they do often do, and the most minute musical strands came through with seldom encountered clarity. Mr. Leinsdorf has been compared, to his disadvantage, with such Mahler specialists as Bruno Walter for his strict definition of architectonic lines, the argument being that somehow the shifting, restless nuances that are Mahler's special genius get lost in a sort of fabricated framework; and that although this might make it easier for the listener to cope with, it is not Mahler.

The performance last weekend, I submit, was sufficient answer to this criticism. Here was that rare meeting of superb control and natural flow that caused the music to fly right out into the sun.

Overshadowed by its mighty program mate was the opening work, Mozart's blithe little Symphony in C major, K. 200. This sinewy little work, composed when Mozart was seventeen years old, at first blush seems little more than outdoor music, uncomplicated and straight-forward serenade stuff. But the perfection of organization and marvels of inventiveness which were to bear fruit in the later symphonies are already readily apparent here. Mr. Leinsdorf used rather a goodly complement of strings, but they did not, to me, sound too thick and creamy for the pair of oboes, horns and trumpets which the spare score employs. The ensemble work was as smooth and perfectly coordinated as one is likely to hear.

Tonight, tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening will witness the first Boston performance of Benjamin Britten's War Requiem, for Soprano, Tenor and Baritone Solos, Mixed Chorus, Boys' Choir, Full Orchestra and Chamber Orchestra, Op. 66. The forces will include the Chorus Pro Musica, the Columbus Boychoir and Phyllis Curtin, Soprano, Micholas DiVirgilio, Tenor and Tom Krause, Baritone.

Herald (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 178,553
OCT 12 1963

The Symphony

Mahler's Fifth In Heroic Outline

By ROBERT TAYLOR

Strength and struggle, vulgarity and valor, passion and poetry, eloquent epic of the human and the touching—Mahler's Fifth Symphony. Erich Leinsdorf disclosed it in a heroic outline yesterday.

Seldom, if ever, have we heard this symphony given such scope. Not even Dr. Koussevitzky notably sympathetic though he was to Mahler, presented the work so monumentally. For the closest comparison to yesterday one must go to Bruno Walter, the dedicated and understanding disciple of the master.

The Fifth will not appeal to those of classical tastes, who prefer order, symmetry and balance in musical expression. To the fastidious persuasion, the work attempts too much at inordinate length. But what constitutes the long-winded in music?

Only material that fails to justify its dimensions. And the Fifth is vulnerable to this charge at no point save the scherzo where the restatement of themes each altered by a fresh context, allows Mahler to indulge his elaborate imagination.

All Movements

Actually, an ordering principle runs through all five movements: the thematic quotes from one section to another. Mr. Leinsdorf enabled us to grasp this significant element of the cyclic structure from the first three notes of the unaccompanied trumpet solo that opens the score through the brass chorus in D bringing the symphony to a close in the spirit of The Ode to Joy. Always the music surged ahead, through the hesitations, pauses, the blazing fury and vehemence and unexpected lyricism comprising in itself the texture of Mahler's musical thought.

The symphony is supposedly abstract, and it seems to me a waste of time to compose a narrative hypothesis, although the design hints at one occasionally. A conductor can discover plentiful opportunities for over-interpretation, yet Mr. Leinsdorf did not inflate the adagietto melodies or the many turbulent climaxes.

The keen sense of organization, I'd say, is even more important to a romantic work than it is to a classical one. Here it established coherence, but also grandeur.

Clarified It

Mahler clarified the orchestration of the Fifth many times. Interestingly enough, Mr. Leinsdorf preferred the slapstick as the additional percussion instrument in the third movement. (The score calls for a Holzklapper' or 'wood rattle', which can be anything from castanets to a wood block.) Moreover, during the scherzo, James Stagliano, who played the horn obbligato magically, was stationed among the first violins. The resultant duet between the obbligato horn and the stopped first horn then acquired a dimension of spacious and captivating echo, as veiled by the nostalgia of legend as the Overture to "A Midsummer Night's Dream."

But the reading was crammed with felicities. Let us remark the steady impulse of the funeral march, the agitated but amazingly delicate second movement, the grace of the landler waltzes in the pizzicato-punctuated scherzo, the restful string-and-harp sheen of the adagietto, and the fabric of Wagnerian transformations leading to the contrapuntal Finale.

The interpretation's transparency supplied the details, and these were far from episodic, accumulating a pattern of immense vigor. The Fifth ranges afield in its emotion. Mr. Leinsdorf stated the complete compass.

Recall Little

One is glad he scheduled Mozart's youthful confection first, though, in consequence, I'm afraid I can recall very little about it. If the Mahler is encrusted by meanings, the Symphony in C speaks a graceful, measured language that has all the polish and pure surface of compliments exchanged in a patrician ballroom.

The melodies are pretty and exceedingly well-manufactured, the burden supports a mannered charm. It isn't very expressive music, nor is it intended to be, the diversions of a genius with a convention of writing. Minor Mozart, the score hasn't been offered since Monteux in 1924. The performance showed a cheerful glitter, but the slenderness of content declared the reason why revivals are infrequent.

Next week an extra performance of Britten's "War Requiem" has been scheduled Thursday night. The forces are those of the Tanglewood premiere, with the Chorus Pro Musica and Columbus Boychoir.

The Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf conducting, presented the third program of the 83rd season yesterday in Symphony Hall. The program will be repeated tonight at 8:30.

Symphony in C major, K. 200 ... Mozart
Symphony No. 5, in C-sharp minor ... Mahler

20

BOSTON 3

EIGHTY-THIRD SEASON • NINETEEN HUNDRED SIXTY-THREE–SIXTY-FOUR

Third Program

FRIDAY AFTERNOON, OCTOBER 11, at 2:00 o'clock

SATURDAY EVENING, OCTOBER 12, at 8:30 o'clock

MOZART ..... Symphony in C major, K. 200

I. Allegro spiritoso
II. Andante
III. Menuetto
IV. Presto

INTERMISSION

MAHLER ..... Symphony No. 5 in C-sharp minor

Part I (1) Trauermarsch
(2) Stürmisch bewegt
Part II (3) Scherzo
(French horn obbligato — James Stagliano)
Part III (4) Adagietto
(5) Rondo — Finale

These concerts will end about 3:45 o'clock on Friday Afternoon; 10:15 o'clock on Saturday Evening.

BALDWIN PIANO RCA VICTOR RECORDS

Herald (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 178,553
OCT 12 1963

The Symphony

Mahler's Fifth In Heroic Outline

By ROBERT TAYLOR

Strength and struggle, vulgarity and valor, passion and poetry, eloquent epic of the human and the touching—Mahler's Fifth Symphony. Erich Leinsdorf disclosed it in a heroic outline yesterday.

Seldom, if ever, have we heard this symphony given such scope. Not even Dr. Koussevitzky notably sympathetic though he was to Mahler, presented the work so monumentally. For the closest comparison to yesterday one must go to Bruno Walter, the dedicated and understanding disciple of the master.

The Fifth will not appeal to those of classical tastes, who prefer order, symmetry and balance in musical expression. To the fastidious persuasion, the work attempts too much at inordinate length. But what constitutes the long-winded in music?

Only material that fails to justify its dimensions. And the Fifth is vulnerable to this charge at no point save the scherzo where the restatement of themes each altered by a fresh context, allows Mahler to indulge his elaborate imagination.

All Movements

Actually, an ordering principle runs through all five movements: the thematic quotes from one section to another. Mr. Leinsdorf enabled us to grasp this significant element of the cyclic structure from the first three notes of the unaccompanied trumpet solo that opens the score, through the brass chorus in D bringing the symphony to a close in the spirit of The Ode to Joy. Always the music surged ahead, through the hesitations, pauses, the blazing fury and vehemence and unexpected lyricism comprising in itself the texture of Mahler's musical thought.

The symphony is supposedly abstract, and it seems to me a waste of time to compose a narrative hypothesis, although the design hints at one occasionally. A conductor can discover plentiful opportunities for over-interpretation, yet Mr. Leinsdorf did not inflate the adagietto melodies or the many turbulent climaxes.

The keen sense of organization, I'd say, is even more important to a romantic work than it is to a classical one. Here it established coherence, but also grandeur.

Clarified It

Mahler clarified the orchestration of the Fifth many times. Interestingly enough, Mr. Leinsdorf preferred the slapstick as the additional percussion instrument in the third movement. 'The score calls for a Holzklapper' or 'wood rattle', which can be anything from castanets to a wood block.) Moreover, during the scherzo, James Stagliano, who played the horn obbligato magically, was stationed among the first violins. The resultant duet between the obbligato horn and the stopped first horn then acquired a dimension of spacious and captivating echo, as veiled by the nostalgia of legend as the Overture to "A Midsummer Night's Dream."

But the reading was crammed with felicities. Let us remark the steady impulse of the funeral march, the agitated but amazingly delicate second movement, the grace of the landler waltzes in the pizzicato-punctuated scherzo, the restful string-and-harp sheen of the adagietto, and the fabric of Wagnerian transformations leading to the contrapuntal Finale.

The interpretation's transparency supplied the details, and these were far from episodic, accumulating a pattern of immense vigor. The Fifth ranges afield in its emotions. Mr. Leinsdorf stated the complete compass.

Recall Little

One is glad he scheduled Mozart's youthful confection first, though, in consequence I'm afraid I can recall very little about it. If the Mahler is encrusted by meanings, the Symphony in C speaks a graceful, measured language that has all the polish and pure surface of compliments exchanged in a patrician ballroom.

The melodies are pretty and exceedingly well-manufactured, the burden supports a mannered charm. It isn't very expressive music, nor is it intended to be, the diversions of a genius with a convention of writing. Minor Mozart, the score hasn't been offered since Monteux in 1924. The performance showed a cheerful glitter, but the slenderness of content declared the reason why revivals are infrequent.

Next week an extra performance of Britten's "War Requiem" has been scheduled Thursday night. The forces are those of the Tanglewood premiere, with the Chorus Pro Musica and Columbus Boychoir.

The Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf conducting, presented the third program of the 83rd season yesterday in Symphony Hall. The program will be repeated tonight at 8:30.

Symphony in C major, K. 200 ..... Mozart
Symphony No. 5, in C-sharp minor ..... Mahler

Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-6200
Jewish Advocate
BOSTON, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 32,267
OCT 1-7 1963

MUSIC IN REVIEW

By GERALD A. BERLIN

MAHLER'S FIFTH AT B.S.O.

The new symphony year took on an unquestionably brilliant hue last weekend with a searing performance of the Fifth Symphony of Gustav Mahler. Mr. Leinsdorf was, as the English say, unmistakably up for this one. The orchestra as an ensemble and as individuals responded magnificently to the occasion. And the audience, for the first time this season, responded in kind. The time seems now to have arrived once and for all when we can quit deliberating on every single performance of a Mahler symphony over whether the conductor is courageous in playing it at all, whether American audiences will some day get to appreciate why Mahler is so adored in Central Europe, and the rest.

As for the Fifth, it is hard to imagine any Mahler symphony that better combines the sweet tradition of the Schubert lied with the grand romantic symphonic sweep, nor one which contains more tension beneath its flowing, lyric lines. Yet, even as Mahler symphonies go, the Fifth is garrulous and over-extended, and its endless proliferation of enchanting ideas and sounds are only too easily drowned in a welter of noises.

This is where Mr. Leinsdorf comes in. The listener's attention was focused and pushed forward upon the piece in its tremendous scale but with strictest definition of rhythm and phrase. The proportions of the symphony never sounded distorted as they do often do, and the most minute musical strands came through with seldom encountered clarity. Mr. Leinsdorf has been compared, to his disadvantage, with such Mahler specialists as Bruno Walter for his strict definition of architectonic lines, the argument being that somehow the shifting, restless nuances that are Mahler's special genius get lost in a sort of fabricated framework; and that although this might make it easier for the listener to cope with, it is not Mahler.

The performance last weekend, I submit, was sufficient answer to this criticism. Here was that rare meeting of superb control and natural flow that caused the music to fly right out into the sun.

Overshadowed by its mighty program mate was the opening work, Mozart's blithe little Symphony in C major, K. 200. This sinewy little work, composed when Mozart was seventeen years old, at first blush seems little more than outdoor music, uncomplicated and straight-forward serenade stuff. But the perfection of organization and marvels of inventiveness which were to bear fruit in the later symphonies are already readily apparent here. Mr. Leinsdorf used rather a goodly complement of strings, but they did not, to me, sound too thick and creamy for the pair of oboes, horns and trumpets which the spare score employs. The ensemble work was as smooth and perfectly coordinated as one is likely to hear.

Tonight, tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening will witness the first Boston performance of Benjamin Britten's War Requiem, for Soprano, Tenor and Baritone Solos, Mixed Chorus, Boys' Choir, Full Orchestra and Chamber Orchestra, Op. 66. The forces will include the Chorus Pro Musica, the Columbus Boychoir and Phyllis Curtin, Soprano, Nicholas DiVirgilio, Tenor, and Tom Krause, Baritone.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 194,870

At Symphony

Leinsdorf Conducts Mozart and Mahler

By MARGO MILLER

In a certain New York orchestra, programs coupling Mozart and Mahler might receive the formal title of Austria Week. The Boston Symphony Orchestra presented the music Friday afternoon on its merits. And what a splendid concert it was.

Two more disparate symphonies it would be difficult to imagine. The Mozart C major (K. 200) is a graceful piece, one which sounds very pleased with itself; the 17-year-old composer was putting the best possible face on Salzurg residence in the archbishop's court. Mahler's Symphony No. 5 in C-sharp minor takes over an hour to play its five varied movements. On whatever page of the two symphonies, the Boston Symphony was its brilliant self, with Erich Leinsdorf in full command on the podium.

Because of their virtuosic playing, mention should be made immediately of the trumpet section, Roger Voisin, principal, and of James Stagliano, first French horn. In the Mahler, each instrument has nearly a movement to itself. The work opens to a stately march with four trumpets soon engaged in strident dialogue. Voisin had the more intricate part; his handling of the soft self-echo passages was as deftly done as the bold song was full and incisive. Stagliano was no less impressive. Tucked between the first and second violins, his horn came through with great richness in the Scherzo.

The Scherzo might be one place in which Mahler seems to overstay his welcome were it not for the horn obligato and an elaborate division of the strings producing all sorts of textures and voices. The waltzes, attractive as they might be singly, never cease coming forth. If there were a place where the conductor might show preference for one line over another it would be here. Otherwise, in the other movements Leinsdorf shaped the flow of music in very satisfying ways.

The Mozart symphony was a delight. Leinsdorf, as is his wont, has the orchestra take most or all of the repeats. In some Mozart and Haydn, especially the multi-movement divertimentos, this is a little too much music to entertain the senses. This C major symphony, however, is such an engaging work that the insistent figures are pleasing to hear again. And while purists may plead for a Mozart-sized ensemble, the Boston Symphony strings, somewhat trimmed in numbers, are agile enough to give the work the lightness and grace it demands. Especially admirable was the conductor's way in sculpting longer passages so that the elegant small phrases didn't take on more life than proportion requires.

Concerts next week will be devoted to a single work, Benjamin Britten's "War Requiem." It will have its first Boston performance Thursday evening in a non-subscription concert, and will be repeated in Friday and Saturday. Leinsdorf will conduct the same forces as at the Tanglewood American premiere. They include Phyllis Curtin, soprano; Nicholas DiVirgilio, tenor; Tom Krause, baritone; the Chorus pro Musica, the Columbus Boychoir, and Daniel Pinkham, portative organ.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Erich Leinsdorf conducting, played Friday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program, to be repeated tonight at 8:30, consisted of Mozart's Symphony in C major, K. 200, and Mahler's Symphony No. 5 in C-Sharp minor.

OR, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 12, 1963 Arts—Entertainment 5

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR

Mahler and his Fifth

By Harold Rogers

Said Bruno Walter:

"The première of his Fifth Symphony in Cologne stands out in my memory for a special reason; it was the first, and, I believe, the only, occasion when the performance of a work of Mahler's under his own baton left me dissatisfied."

Then Walter goes on to explain that the orchestration —later drastically revised by the composer—failed to bring out clearly the contrapuntal tissue of the voices.

* * *

Even the masters do not always bring forth a masterful performance. Had Mahler been a rank egotist, satisfied with the first version of his Fifth, he would have left us an inferior work. Yet he was forever tormented by doubts of self; again and again he searched the inmost reaches of his heart; in humility he was driven to his knees for enlightenment and guidance.

And the answers came. Clarity appeared. The arduous work of revision was undertaken, and the masterpiece eventually came to light.

* * *

If Erich Leinsdorf's reading of the Mahler Fifth Friday afternoon was something less than masterful, it none the less had much to commend it. No Walterian heights were scaled. Yet "the contrapuntal tissue of the voices" was beautifully elucidated; if anyone can bring order, Mr. Leinsdorf can.

Thus he provided a listening experience of unusual delights. Mahler's glowing textures were clean and shining. The extraordinary counter-melodies sang forth as only Mahler's counter-melodies can. For more than an hour the ear could revel in the law and order brought to the performance by the conductor.

* * *

This was also true of the Mozart Symphony in C major, K. 200, with which Mr. Leinsdorf opened this program by the Boston Symphony; Mozart and Mahler indeed fare well under the Leinsdorf approach.

Yet in the adagietto of the Mahler something special happened. One felt that aura of wonderment so loved by those who love Mahler—that rare mood that strangely partakes of both yearning and fulfillment. Mr. Leinsdorf doubtless felt it, too, or he could not have projected it to his listeners.

* * *

At this moment—as indeed he has done at times before—he lighted a candle of hope. If he, like Mahler, could search the inmost reaches of his heart and learn what happened in moments like these, there would be no reason whatever why he could not sustain this emotion through an entire symphony, or through an entire concert.

One cannot seek without finding.

22

MONTREAL

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sun (e)
LOWELL, Mass.
Circ. 45,001
SEP 28 1963

The Boston Symphony orchestra will make its first visit to Montreal since 1953 next Tuesday, Oct. 1. The celebrated orchestra will participate in the opening concerts of the new Palace des Arts in the Canadian city. Erich Leinsdorf will conduct the orchestra in performances in Hindemith's "Symphonic Metamorphosis," Samuel Barber's Symphony No. 1 and the Symphony No. 1 by Brahms. Next week's concerts on Friday and Saturday will begin with the first Boston Symphony orchestra performance of the 19th century German composer, Peter Cornelius' Overture to "The Barber of Bagdad." Also to be heard will be the Symphony No. 2 by Beethoven and Prokofiev's Symphony No. 5. The Prokofiev work was last performed in Symphony hall by the Boston orchestra in February 1961. Mr. Leinsdorf was the orchestra's guest conductor on that occasion.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Journal (m)
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
Circ. 61,299
SEP 28 1963

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Telegram (m)
WORCESTER, Mass.
Circ. 59,451
SEP 28 1963

SYMPHONY TO TRAVEL

BOSTON (UPI) — The Boston Symphony Orchestra will visit Montreal Oct. 1 for the first time in 10 years. The orchestra will take part in opening concerts for the Canadian metropolis' new Place des Arts.

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

Albany Knickerbocker News
Thursday, October 3, 1963

Canada Center Opens

By DENIS O'BRIEN

Montreal (UPI) — The two-week festival opening Montreal's new center for the performing arts Tuesday night featured a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its regular conductor, Erich Leinsdorf.

The program consisted of American composer Samuel Barber's Symphony No. 1, Hindemith's symphonic metamorphoses and Brahms Symphony No. 1, and a full house of 3,000 gave the Bostonians an even more enthusiastic reception than was accorded the London Philharmonic Orchestra Sunday night.

Leinsdorf, on his first visit to the Canadian metropolis as conductor of the Boston Symphony, delighted the audience with his flamboyant podium style and both he and the orchestra seemed to find the magnificent $9 million concert hall just what the composer ordered.

NEW YORK TIMES 9/29/63 MUSIC THE N

LATEST CULTURAL ENTRY

By HAROLD C. SCHONBERG

BEFORE the turn of the century, cultural-minded Montrealers were agitating for a concert hall. It was not until eight days ago that the happy event came to pass, with the opening of La Grande Salle of the Place des Arts. Naturally it was a big evening in the life of the city. The long entrance walk to the building was lined on each side with uniformed members of the Sûretéte Provincial, and thousands of citizens thronged the approaches watching the V.I.P.'s enter the hall.

The Grande Salle rises, white and modern, above the buildings in a depressed area—much as Lincoln Center is rising over one of the former slums of New York. It occupies what Montrealers call "The Plateau," above St. Catherine Street to the south and Ontario Street to the north. Eventually several buildings will occupy the site. A theater seating up to 1500, and a recital hall of up to 800, are planned, as is a commercial building. It is hoped that rentals from the commercial building will help pay some of the costs of the Place des Arts.

Operating Plan

In many respects, the Place des Arts will operate like Lincoln Center. It is run by the 21-member Sir George Etienne Cartier Center (seven members appointed by the province, seven by the city, seven by private participants), which acts as the agent for the center. The new Grande Salle is the permanent home of the Montreal Symphony, just as Philharmonic Hall is the permanent home of the New York Philharmonic. When not occupied by the Montreal Symphony, the Grande Salle can be rented to any organization. Canadian Concerts and Artists, Inc., has already taken the hall for events ranging from solo piano recitals to La Compagnie Marie Bell and Stars of the Bolshoi Ballet.

No one is yet willing to give a firm estimate on the final price of the Place des Arts. The Grande Salle has cost $9 million, though part of that has gone into an underground garage and a plaza. City and provincial governments supplied the land, and, in addition, $5 million. Almost $2 million has come from the public. The City of Montreal has agreed to guarantee bank loans of up to $10 million to be absorbed by a bond issue. Montreal has a World's Fair in 1967, and that is the target date for the completion of the Place des Arts.

The new Grande Salle has been designed as an all-purpose auditorium. It is a large and handsome hall, with three balconies and a series of side boxes above the parterre. It seats 3000.

An all-purpose hall is an

Montreal Finally Gets A Big Concert Hall in An Arts Center

American phenomenon. At its best, it is a compromise hall of the kind that is going up all over the United States and Canada. An all-purpose hall is designed to handle any kind of musical event, from recital to ballet and opera.

It has come into being because of economic necessity. In Europe, very few concert halls and opera houses have more than 2,000 seats. But in America, a 2,000-seat auditorium is impractical. As there is no active form of subsidy for the arts, the profit motive cannot be ignored. A concert manager who handles a large-scale attraction —a ballet company, a touring symphony orchestra, a theater group—has a very expensive proposition on his hands. He cannot book these groups into small halls, for the "nut" is too large. Thus he is forced to bypass those cities that do not have large auditoriums. The result is the almost forced erection of large hall throughout the country.

But the trouble with large auditoriums is that they can be acoustic monstrosities. The bigger the hall, the more the sound dissipates. What good is a great, big, expensive, handsome new hall if the music cannot be heard well in it? Thus the designers of new halls are faced with a formidable problem.

Outside Pressure

In Montreal, while the Place des Arts was under discussion, considerable pressure from some concert managers was exerted. One of these managers tried every means he knew to have the Grande Salle pushed to 4,000 and more seats. It naturally was to his interest to have as many seats as possible. But what would happen when singers are booked into such a barn? No one pair of vocal cords can fill a 4,000-seat house, and it would be necessary to use amplification. And amplification means the death of singing.

As things turned out, the Grande Salle, with its 3,000 seats, is a good compromise hall of its kind. Naturally it cannot be compared with the great halls of the world. Only in the parterre and in the top balcony can the music be heard with real clarity. Under each of the balconies are large dead areas where the Montreal Symphony, on opening night, sounded thin and lackluster. Already the technicians of the Grande Salle are whispering that when an opera or theater company comes in, some discreet amplification will have to be used.

(While on the subject, what about the forthcoming Metropolitan Opera in Lincoln Center, with about 3,800 seats? One can only lean back, quietly pray, and hope that the new Met is going to find some way to abolish a few basic laws of physics.)

It may be that there is no alternative now to the all-purpose hall. Art, in our civilization, cannot successfully grapple with the demands of commerce. What it comes down to is that a city must have a concert hall of a certain minimum size, or it will not have certain kinds (and the most popular kinds) of music. It is unfortunate, but that is the way it is.

Thus Montreal has done the best it could have done. By 1967 it will have a handsome arts center as a solid symbol of the dedication of some public-spirited citizens, aided by the city itself and the Province of Quebec. Even in the best of all possible worlds this is an accomplishment in which the participants can take satisfaction and pride. It is also a sign of the times. Arts centers, big and little, are starting to rise throughout both countries, and so, in the United States, are local and state arts councils. In years to come they will interlock, all working with each other ad gloriam artis.

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
NEW YORK SERVICE
SEPTEM 1963
NEWS BUREAU
N.Y.
PAPER
INGS
SERVICE
ANDARD 1963

A Landmark For The Arts In Montreal

By LUCIA LEWIS

CHICAGO (CDN) — A major September event in a completely different field will be the Montreal festival celebrating the opening of that city's great new concert and opera house, first unit in a cultural center that should rival (perhaps surpass) New York's Lincoln Center.

The festival program recently announced promises to make the new art center as important musically as it is in appearance.

Opening Sept. 21 and extending through Oct. 5, the festival will feature the Montreal Symphony under its distinguished conductor, Zubin Mehta; the Boston Symphony with Erich Leinsdorf; and London's Royal Philharmonic. Charles Munch will also conduct the Montrealers on Sept. 25 with Rudolf Serkin as soloist.

An interesting example of Canada's stature in the music world will be the Montreal Symphony's performance of Beethoven's 95th symphony with a Canadian conductor—Wilfred Pelletier—and a solo quartet of a caliber rarely assembled anywhere: Lois Marshall, Leopold Simoneau, Donald Bell, Maureen Forrester. All internationally famous, and the Canadian.

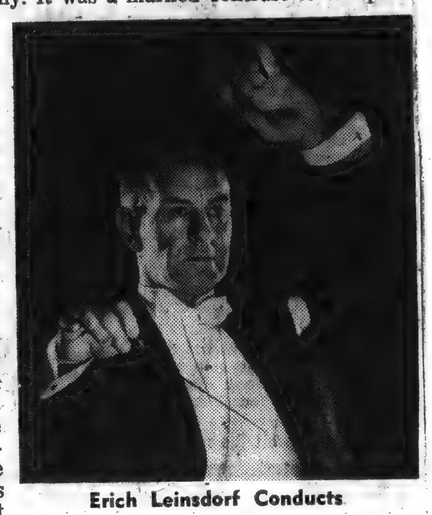
Operatic productions during the festival will be "Otello" with Lili Chookasian and Tito Gobbi, and "Lucia Di Lammermoor" with Joan Sutherland in the title role. Verdi's "Requiem" and Les Grands Ballets Canadiens are other productions on the festival calendar.

10 ★ Montreal THE GAZETTE, WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 2, 1963

Boston Symphony Strings Superb Under Leinsdorf

By Walter Christopherson

Another new sound, the richest yet, came to La Grande Salle last night with the Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Erich Leinsdorf, and again the new concert hall proved soundworthy. It was a marked contrast to the performance two nights previous by London's Royal Philharmonic Orchestra and it satisfied a few doubts about the acoustics of the Place des Arts hall itself.



Erich Leinsdorf Conducts

Where the English orchestra had been brilliant with overpowering brass, the Boston symphony was massive with the reserve power of strings. The way the strings came through indicated clearly that it is not the fault of the hall, as some had feared, if the brass section of an orchestra seems dominant. If the strings are there, and they were last night — 18 first violins, 16 second violins, 12 violas, 11 cellos and nine doublebass (minus one violin who was called away by a sudden illness in the family) — they will be heard, even if there are a total of 106 instruments in the full orchestra.

There also were differences in the seating of the two orchestras. The Philharmonic violins were all placed to the conductor's left. The Boston's strings used the conventional pattern of first violins left and seconds right. As the concertmaster of the Boston symphony remarked last night, any new hall needs some experimenting with, even by its own orchestra.

But Leinsdorf made up his mind about positioning his musicians in an 18 minute rehearsal at 7 p.m. (the concert began at 8.30 p.m.) and the results justified his judgment.

At a press conference yesterday morning Leinsdorf, who succeeded Charles Munch as the Boston Symphony's music director last year, said that he was "almost suspicious" about what he had heard of La Grande Salle because there had been no adverse criticism. Munch, who conducted the Montreal Symphony here Sept. 24, and Pianist Rudolf Serkin, who played the Emperor Concerto at the same concert, had been delighted.

Last night Leinsdorf agreed they had been right.

"Believe me, it's no hardship to play here," he declared. "I wish a few more of the cities we play in had halls as good as this. It's very pleasant."

His musicians backed him up. They said they found La Grande Salle "live" and clear and they could hear themselves so well it had almost an "amplification" effect. There was no doubt, they said, that Montreal's 3,000-seat hall is on a par with the best on this continent.

Naturally it was in the Brahms First Symphony that the Boston string section revealed its greatest powers and Leinsdorf his splendid characteristics as a conductor. Here was command and authority that controlled the mighty music in a majestic flow.

The superb balance, for which the orchestra is famous, made the music rich and warm, the brass and woods winds mellow but their high notes still striking like lightning through the full tone of the surging strings. Climaxes were never anticipated the sound was sustained no matter how high or low the volume.

Leinsdorf, who looks for something "meaningful to the listener" in contemporary music rather than for the "press announcement of a premiere to hang like a trophy on the wall," chose well in the Symphony in One Movement by the American composer Samuel Barber and Paul Hindemith's Symphonic Metamorphosis of Themes.

Both compositions gave the orchestra opportunity to develop a wide range of instrumental color in ever-changing sound effects and rhythms, sometimes intricate sometimes almost hypnotic in their steady marching.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 465,653
SEP 2 2 1963

★

Yesterday was a highlight in Montreal's Summer season with the opening of the city's great new concert and opera house—the Place des Arts. It is the first unit in a cultural center that will rival the Lincoln Center in New York. The Montreal Festival willl run through Oct. 5 and will feature, among other attractions, the appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Charles Munch will conduct the Montreal Symphony Orchestra in a concert this Wednesday.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Record-American (m) (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 452,333
OCT 7 1963

SMART SET By ROSE WALSH

Music-Lovers in Montreal

Just returned from Montreal where the Boston Symphony Orchestra participated in the opening concerts of the new Place des Arts last week, Harry Ellis Dickson, first violinist, had interesting information to offer guests at Friday's Pre-Symphony luncheon at the Midtown Motor Inn. The popular assistant conductor of the Boston Pops and conductor of the Youth Symphony Orchestra, is a top favorite with the Friday symphony concert-goers.

Commenting on the Canadian city's handsome first concert Hall, he said "It is almost perfect acoustically. After playing just a few notes we knew it was a good hall. Its seating capacity is a little under 3000; the decor is silver gray and black with red plush seats, and it has no center aisle."

Mrs. Serge Koussetvisky sent a wire of best wishes to the head table guests at the luncheon which honored notables of the Berkshire Music Center, Tanglewood, established by the B.S.O. in fulfillment of the ambition of her late husband.

Among other music lovers present were Richard Burgin, Mrs. Richard Ely with a group of guests; Mrs. Russell Coolidge, Robert Montgomery, Senora de Villalba, wife of the Consul General of Spain; Mrs. C. Chauncey Gray, Mrs. Charles F. Bacon, Mrs. Henry Halliday, Mrs. Wallace Woodworth, Mrs. Thomas Perry, Mrs. Charles E. Donovan, Mrs. Loring Jordan and Mrs. Howell Stevens.

★ ★ ★

NORTHAMPTON

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Berkshire Eagle (e)
PITTSFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 29,084
OCT 9 1963

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
News (e)
SPRINGFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 101,591
OCT 9 1963

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Transcript-Telegram (e)
HOLYOKE, Mass.
Circ. 26,214
OCT 11 1963

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Union (m)
SPRINGFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 83,691
OCT 9 1963

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Hampshire Gazette (e)
NORTHAMPTON,
Mass.
Circ. 13,256
OCT 8 1963

Boston Symphony To Open College Concert Series

First in the Smith College Concert series of this year will be the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Erich Leinsdorf on Sunday at 8:15 p.m. in John M. Greene Hall.

The program will open with the Overture to the Barber of Baghdad by Cornelius, followed by the Second Symphony of Bethoven. The second half of the program will present the Fifth Symphony of Prokofiev.

Beethoven's joyous Second Symphony in D major, op. 36, was composed in 1802, and was not at first well received, because of its too abrupt dynamics and its too harsh harmonies for the ears of the critics of the time! The long, slow introduction leads to the vigorous Allegro con brio. The second movement, perhaps most familiar, is the lovely, songful Larghetto, contrasting with the playful Scherzo and Trio of the third movement. The boisterous finale, Allegro molto, is also scherzo-like in its abrupt and unexpected accents.

The Symphony No. 5, Op. 100 of the late Serge Prokofiev, was composed in 1944 and first performed in Moscow in 1945. The composer called it "a symphony about the spirit of man" and "the culmination of a larger period of my creative life." Though dissonant and modern from start to finish, it is romantic in the best sense, with a leisurely expanse of forms, long lyric melodies, singing tone of strings, and softening of the march-like dissonances of his earlier works. The opening Andante is both melodic and dramatic in its combinations of themes. The second, Allegro marcato, is close to a classical Scherzo. The Adagio third movement is again dramatic, passionate, almost tragic, in strong contrast to the finale, Allegro giocoso, a satirical treatment of the Rondo.

Prof. Emeritus Arthur Locke will talk on the program Thursday at 5 p.m. in Sage Hall 5.

Hampshire Gazette (e)
NORTHAMPTON,
Mass.
Circ. 13,256
OCT 14 1963

Boston Orchestra Opens Smith College Concerts

Last evening at John M. Greene Hall, the Smith College Concert Series opened with the beloved Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted with dynamism and dash by Erich Leinsdorf, in a program of two symphonies, Beethov n's No. 2 in D major, Op36, and Prokofiev's No. 5, Op100.

When Beethoven's second symphony was first performed, it received a barrage of criticism, some critics finding it strange and unnatural; about the finale one said it was like "a repulsive monster a wounded tail-lashing serpent, dealing wild and furious blows as it stiffens into its death agony." On the other hand, Berlioz called it "a scherzo in two time its playfulness...something still more piquant, more delicate." The whole symphony he felt, was energetic, noble and proud.

It was composed at the time when Beethoven's deafness was becoming increasingly worse after its original and recent outbreak. But nowhere does one find in the music any despair, although as it was played by the Boston Symphony, one often despaired of feeling any sense of the joyousness, and the playful delicacy inherent in the music. Mr. Leinsdorf was seeking to interpret the suposed despondency of the composer he believes lies in the unexpected turnings and directions the music takes. Somehow it is, and was, difficult to image anything somber in the tonality, the structure, or the development, especially in the abandoned third movement, fragments of themes tumbling from one instrument to another. We honestly feel that the overall mood was disheartening leaden. Mr. Leinsdorf succeeded in his intent. But we are inclined to listen to the symphony recording several times and search out that which this conductor has attempted to discover.

It is always something of a shock, albeit pleasant, to view the BSO in its winter attire. One was really disturbed, though, at not seeing the familiar faces of each section's leading players, except for the concertmaster.

It was soon remembered, however, that Mr. Leinsdorf likes to give the associate players first place whenever possible, usually with a reduced orchestra, as in the Beethoven.

There was no doubt of the immense span of emotions encompassing the second work on the program, Prokofiev himself calling it representative of the spirit of man. The fullness of the andante opening movement was excitingly displayed through Mr. Leinsdorf's precisely clear interpretation, the two themes, one in triple and one in double time, contrastingly developed. The ambulatory character of the allegro moderato with its theme trotting from one wind to another suggests a classical scherzo, with reminiscent Prokofiev, and a host of amusing happenings, beginning and ending in 4-4 time, in the middle of sort of trio section in 3-4 time.

Dark and foreboding throughout is the undercurrent of the expressive Adagio, replete with strange episodic melodies, hesitant, uncertain, with a short moment of reprise. In the final Allegro Giocoso, the divided cellos and basses take the quiet introduction, followed by the skittish first theme; the lengthy development and warmth of the hall caught one cellist in a broad yawn, and not a few listeners anxious for the end, which built to a grand climax, pouring forth more and more dissonances. It is possible that the Beethoven suffered from the enormously wide contrast between the two symphonies, or is it possible that contemporary music with its magnitudinous dissonances and necessary extravagant orchestration is necessary for satisfying today's musically esthetic needs?

—M. de B. B.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Berkshire Eagle (e)
PITTSFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 29,084
OCT 14 1963

Music Review

The BSO at Smith

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

THE BOSTON Symphony Orchestra reached the perigee of its winter orbit in relation to the Berkshires when it appeared in the John M. Greene Hall of Smith College at Northampton last night. In brilliance of performance, it attained the apogee of its Tanglewood flights.

In a program of Beethoven and Prokofieff, Erich Leinsdorf conducted two meticulously prepared symphonies: the Beethoven second and the Prokofieff fifth. With the latter one, the Boston Orchestra has had long and honored association from the time Koussevitzky introduced it to America in the same year (1945) it had its premiere in Moscow until two months ago at Tanglewood under Ormandy.

* * *

THIS SYMPHONY requires a huge personnel. Leinsdorf had reduced the number of strings in the Beethoven well in proportion to the nature of the music, but for Prokofieff, not only was the full complement of strings employed, but also additional wind from piccolo to tuba, with expanded requirements in nearly every section, as well as a small squad of percussion and also piano and harp.

Prokofieff alternates his four movements between slow, introspective and deeply felt chapters and swifter ones which rise to an exaltation in no way related to the superficial witty role he had at times previously assumed. It afforded the orchestra plentiful opportunities to allow their rich sonorities to be heard, and Leinsdorf equally rewarding occasions to show his large architectural planning.

* * *

THIS FEATURE of the conductor's attributes was more patently observible in the smaller Beethoven, in which the exquisite details were achieved. But the larger canvas was obviously always in mind as the symphony progressed through its four gem-like episodes.

Any of us whose acquaintance with the Boston is restricted to Tanglewood could not fail to notice that in other situations they do also own and play in white-tie, formal clothes, some of which possibly were of the vintage of their fine Italian instruments. The audience, which filled the last seat in the large hall, recalled Leinsdorf repeatedly, but he clung to the Boston and Tanglewood formula and did not add a note to the printed program, a procedure which is not always the rule under similar conditions in that hall whose audience consist in large part of a fantastic assembly of beautiful young women.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Union (m)
SPRINGFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 83,691
OCT 14 1963

SMITH CONCERT SERIES OPENED BY LEINSDORF

Boston Symphony Fills John Greene Hall On College Campus

By R. C. HAMMERICH

NORTHAMPTON—More than 2000 listeners filled all but a dozen seats in John M. Greene Hall Sunday night to hear Prokofieff's Fifth Symphony performed with startling brilliance.

Great Enthusiasm

The Boston Symphony Orchestra under the baton of Erich Leinsdorf was there to open this season's Smith College concert course, and the listeners greeted the musicians efforts with great enthusiasm.

The combination of Prokofieff's myriad orchestral colors and dynamic drama, the hall's acoustical liveliness and Leinsdorf's penchant for exact precision produced an exciting 50 minutes.

Beethoven's Second Symphony, which preceded intermission and which was ill received when it was first heard because the listeners of 1802 thought its contrasting dynamics too abrupt, seemed pallid beside Leinsdorf's view of Prokofieff Sunday.

It was, in places, nearly blinding—especially at the climaxes at the ends of the first, second and fourth movements.

They followed propulsively rhythmic passages that gradually and relentlessly built the volume and tension to the edge of nervous acceptance and the climaxes came with satisfying, sudden crashes.

Logical Flow of Ideas

Their dramatic success can be attributed, at least in part, to Leindorf's care in establishing a logical flow of musical ideas—a continuity of style and shape that is not easy with Prokofieff's extensive variety of rhythms, tempos and contrasting moods but is essential if the listener is to receive a sense of unity.

Although the Beethoven Second Symphony seemed to take a handful of measures to establish itself, it, too, was shaped with a careful consistency that made its sudden, surprising big chords all the more dramatic.

And the brightness of the sound in Greene Hall helped the woodwinds buried in the rear rows to be heard more clearly.

Leinsdorf regularly conducts from memory without scores when his orchestra is performing without soloists—a business-like procedure that frees his eyes and attention for more rigorous control over changing tempos and dynamics.

Both symphonies Sunday were notable for these constantly changing speeds and volumes and the conductor was obviously in full control of every nuance.

We look forward to the orchestra's performance at Mount Holyoke a week from tonight.

Next event in the Smith concert course will present the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra on Nov. 11.

CAMBRIDGE 1. BOSTON 4

25 1 3

First Program

EVENING, OCTOBER 15, at 8:30 o'clock

HINDEMITH ..... Symphonic Metamorphosis of Themes by Carl Maria von Weber

I. Scherzo

BARBER ..... Symphony No. 1 (In one movement), Op. 9

INTERMISSION

BRAHMS ..... Symphony No. 1, in C minor, Op. 68

I. Un poco sostenuto; allegro
II. Andante sostenuto
III. Un poco allegretto e grazioso
IV. Adagio; allegro non troppo, ma con brio

BALDWIN PIANO RCA VICTOR RECORDS

Fourth Program

THURSDAY EVENING, OCTOBER 17, at 8:30 o'clock
FRIDAY AFTERNOON, OCTOBER 18, at 2:00 o'clock
SATURDAY EVENING, OCTOBER 19, at 8:30 o'clock

BRITTEN — War Requiem, for Soprano, Tenor and Baritone Solos, Mixed Chorus, Boys' Choir, Full Orchestra and Chamber Orchestra, Op. 66

Text from the Missa pro Defunctis and the poems of Wilfred Owen

I. Requiem Aeternam
  Chorus and Boys' Choir: Requiem aeternam
  Tenor solo: "What passing-bells for these who die as cattle?"
  Chorus: Kyrie eleison
II. Dies Irae
  Chorus: Dies Irae
  Baritone solo: "Bugles sang, saddening the evening air—"
  Soprano solo and Chorus: Liber scriptus
  Tenor and Baritone solos: "Out there, we've walked quite friendly up to Death—"
  Chorus: Recordare
  Baritone solo: "Be slowly lifted up, thou long black arm—"
  Chorus and Soprano solo: Dies Irae
  Tenor solo: "Move him into the sun—"
  Chorus: Pie Jesu Domine

Intermission

III. Offertorium
  Boys' Choir and Chorus: Domine Jesu Christe
  Baritone and Tenor solos: "So Abram rose, and clave the wood, and went—"
  Boys' Choir: Hostias et preces
IV. Sanctus
  Soprano solo and Chorus: Sanctus
  Baritone solo: "After the blast of lightning from the East—"
V. Agnus Dei
  Tenor solo: "One ever hangs where shelled roads part."
  Chorus: Agnus Dei
  Tenor solo: "Near Golgotha strolls many a priest—"
  Chorus: Agnus Dei
  Tenor solo: "The scribes on all the people shove—"
  Chorus: Dona nobis pacem
VI. Libera Me
  Chorus and Soprano solo: Libera me
  Tenor solo: "It seemed that out of battle I escaped—"
  Baritone solo: "'None,' said the other, 'save the undone years'"
  Boys' Choir, Chorus and Soprano solo: In paradisum

(First performance in Boston)

CHORUS PRO MUSICA, ALFRED NASH PATTERSON, Director
COLUMBUS BOYCHOIR, DONALD BRYANT, Director
PHYLLIS CURTIN, Soprano NICHOLAS DiVIRGILIO, Tenor
TOM KRAUSE, Baritone

These concerts will end about 3:50 o'clock on Friday Afternoon; 10:20 o'clock on Thursday and Saturday Evenings.

The Patriot Ledger, Wed., Oct. 9, 1963 Page 32

The Sound of Music

Bridging A Century At Symphony Hall

By Dan Webster

Much of the music in the air today traces its ancestry directly to that of Brahms. This point was made last night when the Boston Symphony Orchestra opened its Tuesday night programs at Symphony Hall.

Under the direction of Erich Leinsdorf, the orchestra played Brahms, but only after letting the near-capacity audience hear how some of the harmonic seeds he had planted in the 1870's had blossomed in the 1930's and 1940's.

Last night the late blossoming was more impressive than the early planting. Mr. Leinsdorf led the orchestra in Hindemith's Symphonic Metamorphoses on Themes of Carl Maria von Weber, and Samuel Barber's Symphony No. 1 before playing the Brahms Symphony No. 1 in C minor.

It was the same program the orchestra played to open this 83rd season 10 days ago and it came to the Tuesday audience burnished by two previous performances.

It was easy to hear where Mr. Leinsdorf's interest lay. The two 20th Century works were charged with dynamism of creative performance; the Brahms lacked that freshness.

The cause is partly implanted in the composers' approach to their music. Both the modern works are succinct. They speak their piece and stop and their impact is greater for their lack of excess.

This pithiness is the special virtue of the Barber Symphony. It is a four-movement symphony in one movement. The entire work is built on themes stated within the first minute; each section is developed and finally recapped as a whole. It is a stunning accomplishment for a man of only 25—as Barber was when he wrote it. It is distinctly American, modern, original; its debt to Brahms is heard occasionally in the composer's approach, his interest in polyphony, some of his techniques of orchestration.

The performance was taut and colorful. The Boston strings leapt at the opening ment developed drive and tension as it advanced but it could not be described as exciting.

Mr. Leinsdorf called on the orchestra's principal wind players to accept the applause with him for their work in all three compositions.

The orchestra was clearly interested in the men who wrote music for our time, men who learned their craft from the 19th Century.

octave and the rugged theme it heralds. And the strings, often individual sections divided for greater color, led in pointing up the outlines of its architecture.

Dr. Leinsdorf's direction insured that the work's construction was clear. When the opening theme reappeared in the passacaglia at the end, it was a breath of fresh air exhilarating to the listeners. The sturdiness of the brass and the precision of the winds balanced the strings to sum up a stirring performance.

The Barber symphony followed the opening Hindemith work in the searing first half of the program. Hindemith's 1943 composition has struck many as egotistical display since he has built a piece of brilliant color from shreds and tatters of some of the least impressive of von Weber's output. But the tradition of the later composer building on foundations laid by earlier writers is a long one and a valid one. And Hindemith bows to von Weber's ideas while developing their implications with 20th Century techniques.

The results are hardly academic. Mr. Leinsdorf again led a vigorous reading of the highly complex score. His grasp of the multiple lines of musical ideas are made clearly visible at the same time the wealth of detail in this score is made perfectly lucid.

Of the four divisions of this single-movement work, the opening and closing sections were most vividly presented. The oriental scherzo, built on music from von Weber's incidental music for "Turandot," is an exotic display, warmed by the mellow woodwinds. The closing section is a hunting march which contains the combined best features of both composers.

The Metamorphoses is a major work by this 68-year-old composer, one which, although 20 years old, remains a challenge to the most skillful orchestras and conductors and a satisfying musical experience for a wide circle of listeners.

The vibrancy of the performance of these two works did not carry past the intermission and into the performance of the Brahms symphony. While it takes intense concentration by conductor and orchestra to play the Barber and the Hindemith, it takes only an assurance that the orchestra will be paid to produce another reading of Brahms' first symphony.

For all the players' skill and attention to detail Mr. Leinsdorf brought to the music, it was anticlimatic. The first movement was stolid and lacking integration. The middle movements with their demands on the orchestra's woodwinds, were lighter and more finely wrought. The final move-

SAMUEL BARBER

CAMBRIDGE 1. & BOSTON 4

25

First Program

TUESDAY EVENING, OCTOBER 15, at 8:30 o'clock

HINDEMITH ..... Symphonic Metamorphosis of Themes by Carl Maria von Weber

I. Allegro
II. "Turandot": Scherzo
III. Andantino
IV. March

BARBER ..... Symphony No. 1 (In one movement), Op. 9

INTERMISSION

BRAHMS ..... Symphony No. 1, in C minor, Op. 68

I. Un poco sostenuto; allegro
II. Andante sostenuto
III. Un poco allegretto e grazioso
IV. Adagio; allegro non troppo, ma con brio

BALDWIN PIANO

RCA VICTOR RECORDS

Fourth Program

THURSDAY EVENING, OCTOBER 17, at 8:30 o'clock
FRIDAY AFTERNOON, OCTOBER 18, at 2:00 o'clock
SATURDAY EVENING, OCTOBER 19, at 8:30 o'clock

BRITTEN — War Requiem, for Soprano, Tenor and Baritone Solos, Mixed Chorus, Boys' Choir, Full Orchestra and Chamber Orchestra, Op. 66

Text from the Missa pro Defunctis and the poems of Wilfred Owen

I. Requiem Aeternam
  Chorus and Boys' Choir: Requiem aeternam
  Tenor solo: "What passing-bells for these who die as cattle?"
  Chorus: Kyrie eleison
II. Dies Irae
  Chorus: Dies Irae
  Baritone solo: "Bugles sang, saddening the evening air—"
  Soprano solo and Chorus: Liber scriptus
  Tenor and Baritone solos: "Out there, we've walked quite friendly up to Death—"
  Chorus: Recordare
  Baritone solo: "Be slowly lifted up, thou long black arm—"
  Chorus and Soprano solo: Dies Irae
  Tenor solo: "Move him into the sun—"
  Chorus: Pie Jesu Domine

Intermission

III. Offertorium
  Boys' Choir and Chorus: Domine Jesu Christe
  Baritone and Tenor solos: "So Abram rose, and clave the wood, and went—"
  Boys' Choir: Hostias et preces
IV. Sanctus
  Soprano solo and Chorus: Sanctus
  Baritone solo: "After the blast of lightning from the East—"
V. Agnus Dei
  Tenor solo: "One ever hangs where shelled roads part."
  Chorus: Agnus Dei
  Tenor solo: "Near Golgotha strolls many a priest—"
  Chorus: Agnus Dei
  Tenor solo: "The scribes on all the people shove—"
  Chorus: Dona nobis pacem
VI. Libera Me
  Chorus and Soprano solo: Libera me
  Tenor solo: "It seemed that out of battle I escaped—"
  Baritone solo: " 'None,' said the other, 'save the undone years' "
  Boys' Choir, Chorus and Soprano solo: In paradisum

(First performance in Boston)

CHORUS PRO MUSICA, ALFRED NASH PATTERSON, Director
COLUMBUS BOYCHOIR, DONALD BRYANT, Director
PHYLLIS CURTIN, Soprano NICHOLAS DiVIRGILIO, Tenor
TOM KRAUSE, Baritone

These concerts will end about 3:50 o'clock on Friday Afternoon; 10:20 o'clock on Thursday and Saturday Evenings.

The Patriot Ledger, Wed., Oct. 9, 1963 Page 32

The Sound of Music

Bridging A Century At Symphony Hall

By Dan Webster

Much of the music in the air today traces its ancestry directly to that of Brahms. This point was made last night when the Boston Symphony Orchestra opened its Tuesday night programs at Symphony Hall.

Under the direction of Erich Leinsdorf, the orchestra played Brahms, but only after letting the near-capacity audience hear how some of the harmonic seeds he had planted in the 1870's had blossomed in the 1930's and 1940's.

Last night the late blossoming was more impressive than the early planting. Mr. Leinsdorf led the orchestra in Hindemith's Symphonic Metamorphoses on Themes of Carl Maria von Weber, and Samuel Barber's Symphony No. 1 before playing the Brahms Symphony No. 1 in C minor.

It was the same program the orchestra played to open this 83rd season 10 days ago and it came to the Tuesday audience burnished by two previous performances.

It was easy to hear where Mr. Leinsdorf's interest lay. The two 20th Century works were charged with dynamism of creative performance; the Brahms lacked that freshness.

The cause is partly implanted in the composers' approach to their music. Both the modern works are succinct. They speak their piece and stop and their impact is greater for their lack of excess.

This pithiness is the special virtue of the Barber Symphony. It is a four-movement symphony in one movement. The entire work is built on themes stated within the first minute; each section is developed and finally recapped as a whole. It is a stunning accomplishment for a man of only 22 as Barber was when he wrote it. It is distinctly American, modern, original; its debt to Brahms is heard occasionally in the composer's approach, his interest in polyphony, some of his techniques of orchestration.

The performance was taut and colorful. The Boston strings [illegible] ment developed drive and tension as it advanced but it could not be described as exciting.

Mr. Leinsdorf called on the orchestra's principal wind players to accept the applause with him for their work in all three compositions.

The orchestra was clearly interested in the men who wrote music for our time, men who learned their craft from the 19th Century.

octave and the rugged theme it heralds. And the strings, often individual sections divided for greater color, led in pointing up the outlines of its architecture.

Dr. Leinsdorf's direction insured that the work's construction was clear. When the opening theme reappeared in the passacaglia at the end, it was a breath of fresh air exhilarating to the listeners. The sturdiness of the brass and the precision of the winds balanced the strings to sum up a stirring performance.

The Barber symphony followed the opening Hindemith work in the searing first half of the program. Hindemith's 1943 composition has struck many as egotistical display since he has built a piece of brilliant color from shreds and tatters of some of the least impressive of von Weber's output. But the tradition of the later composer building on foundations laid by earlier writers is a long one and a valid one. And Hindemith bows to von Weber's ideas while developing their implications with 20th Century techniques.

The results are hardly academic. Mr. Leinsdorf again led a vigorous reading of the highly complex score. His grasp of the multiple lines of musical ideas are made clearly visible at the same time the wealth of detail in this score is made perfectly lucid.

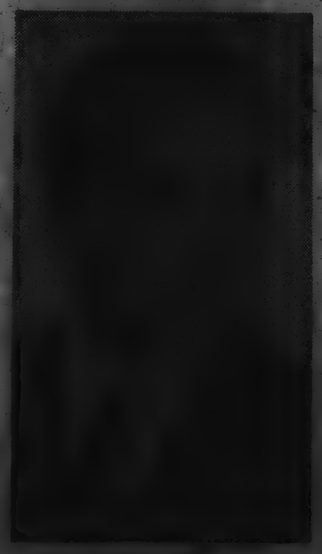
Of the four divisions of this single-movement work, the opening and closing sections were most vividly presented. The oriental scherzo, built on music from von Weber's incidental music for "Turandot," is an exotic display, warmed by the mellow [illegible]

[illegible] march which contains the combined best features of both composers.

The Metamorphoses is a major work by this 68-year-old composer, one which, although 20 years old, remains a challenge to the most skillful orchestras and conductors and a satisfying musical experience for a wide circle of listeners.

The vibrancy of the performance of these two works did not carry past the intermission and into the performance of the Brahms symphony. While it takes intense concentration by conductor and orchestra to play the Barber and the Hindemith, it takes only an assurance that the orchestra will be paid to produce another reading of Brahms' first symphony.

For all the players' skill and attention to detail Mr. Leinsdorf brought to the music, it was anticlimatic. The first movement was stolid and lacking integration. The middle movements with their demands on the orchestra's woodwinds, were lighter and more finely wrought. The final move-



SAMUEL BARBER

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 465,653
OCT 13 1963

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Ledger-Times
BOSTON, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 14,000
OCT 17 1963

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Herald
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 283,819
OCT 13 1963

Boston Symphony This Week

NICHOLAS DI VIGGILIO

PHYLLIS CURTIN

3 'War Requiem' Performances Set

Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will present the first Boston performances of Benjamin Britten's "War Requiem" on three occasions in Symphony Hall this week. In addition to the regular Friday and Saturday concerts, the orchestra has scheduled a special non-subscription performance for Thursday evening at 8:30.

At this summer's Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood the Orchestra gave the American Premiere of the "War Requiem," and Mr. Leinsdorf has invited the same soloists who collaborated in the Tanglewood premiere to join the orchestra for the Boston concerts.

Phyllis Curtin will be the soprano, Nicholas Di Viggilio tenor, and Tom Krause, baritone, with the Chorus pro musica and Columbus Boychoir.

A few tickets for the non-subscription performance of the "War Requiem" on Thursday evening are available at the Symphony Hall Box Office.

On Tuesday the first program of the orchestra's "Cambridge" series will be given in Symphony Hall. The "Cambridge" series replaces the concerts given for many years in Sanders Theatre.

For this program Leinsdorf will conduct the "Symphonic Metamorphosis" by Paul Hiidemith, Samuel Barber's Symphony No. 1, and Brahms' Symphony No. 1.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Traveler (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 164,299
OCT 18 1963

With Symphony

PHYLLIS CURTIN will be soprano soloist in Britten's "War Requiem," to be performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra this afternoon and tomorrow evening.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Republican
SPRINGFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 112,302
SEP 15 1963

BSO TO PERFORM 'WAR REQUIEM'

NEW YORK—The first American performance of Benjamin Britten's "War Requiem" by an orchestra other than the Boston Symphony is scheduled for San Antonio in December. Participating under the direction of Victor Alessandro, will be Frances Yeend, soprano, Richard Cassilly, tenor, Chester Ludgin, baritone, the University of Texas choir and the San Antonio Boys' Choir. The unusual cost of preparation will be met by a gift of the Tobin Foundation.

I. K.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Patriot-Ledger (e)
QUINCY, Mass.
Circ. 44,419
OCT 10 1963

'War Requiem' At Symphony Hall

The first Boston performances of Benjamin Britten's "War Requiem" will be given in Symphony Hall next week.

Erich Leinsdorf will lead the soloists who collaborated in the American premiere of the work at Tanglewood last summer on Oct. 17 at 8:30 p.m., Oct. 18 at 2 p.m. and Oct. 19 at 8:30 p.m.

Phyllis Curtin will be soprano soloist, with Nicholas Di Virgilio the featured tenor and Tom Krause the featured baritone. The Chorus Pro Musica and Columbus Boychoir will be accompanied by more than 130 musicians—a large orchestra and a chamber group.

The "War Requiem" is a juxtaposition of the Latin Mass for the dead and the anti-war poems of Wilfred Owen.

Next Tuesday at 8:30 the orchestra will repeat Hindemith's "Symphonic Metamorphoses," Barber's Symphony No. 1 and Brahms' Symphony 1 in Symphony Hall.

The fourth season of organ recitals will begin in Symphony Hall Nov. 10 with a program by Marilyn Mason. Italian organist Fernando Germani will appear Dec. 8. John Ferris, Harvard University organist and choirmaster, will be heard Jan. 26. Robert Lloyd Town, winner of the Young Artists competion, will perform Feb. 16.

On March 1, John Weaver will play and E. Power Biggs will conclude the series April 5.

The 6 p.m. Sunday series will be sold on a series subscription and an individual program basis.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Jewish Advocate
BOSTON, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 32,267
OCT 24 1963

MUSIC IN REVIEW

By GERALD A. BERLIN

BSO: BRITTEN'S WAR REQUIEM

Few musical events of recent years, abroad or at home, have produced the excitement and commentary of Benjamin Britten's "A War Requiem."

The origins and subsequent reception of the piece are by now familiar. Commissioned to celebrate the consecration in May 1962 of the restored St. Michael's Cathedral in Coventry, it was dedicated to four friends of the composer killed in World War II. To the framework of the traditional requiem mass, the missa pro defunctis, Britten welded passages of the poetry of Wilfred Owen, described by the poet as "War and the pity of War." Owen, who was killed just seven days before the Armistice in 1918, is, of course, no ordinary poet, and his outcries against the filth and ugliness and inhumanity of war remain among the most meaningful poetic utterances of our time. This is in turn a subject upon which Britten could seize with more than ordinary measure of passion and conviction, for he has long and articulately labored for the cause of pacifism.

"A War Requiem" was more than immediately accepted in England. Indeed, it was at once heralded not only as Britten's masterpiece but as one of the great choral works of the twentieth century, a work fully worthy of a place directly in the great line of the Berlioz and Verdi Requiems. It received its American premiere last summer at the Berkshire Music Festival, where it was dedicated to the memory of Serge Koussevitzky and, with some exceptions, was similarly hailed. The reception to last week's revival here at Symphony Hall, both lay and critical, was almost exultant.

The origins of this long requiem clearly derive from early baroque roots, but Britten's treatment is most unorthodox if not radical. For the traditional requiem portion he employs a mixed chorus, boys' choir, organ, soprano solo and very large orchestra.

For the poetry setting he uses a tenor and baritone soloist accompanied by a twelve-piece chamber group, consisting largely of the principals of the orchestra. The solo passages are exhaustively interwound with instrumental figurations, with the chorus and even with each other. The musical style and harmony represent no departure whatsoever from the familiar and rather easily accessible idiom of Britten, which for all its biting dissonances has a conservatively tonal base.

"A War Requiem" is terribly effective. Britten is a master technician and he is at his deadliest earnest here. His incredible manipulation of orchestral resource, the power of his theme and lucidity of its organization, and above all the awesome impact of Wilfred Owen's burning lines all combine to produce that rare phenomenon in contemporary music, an immediate and deep communication between composer and listener.

Yet, having said so much, I remain unpersuaded that this piece is by any means destined to become one of the great musical monuments of this century. For all the enormous effectiveness of the music in its detail and the dramatic impact of the structure as a whole, in the last anlysis we run into the inherent limitations of Britten as a composer. At his very best — and "A War Requiem" is vintage Britten — he cannot and never will speak to all humanity in the universal terms of any number of greater creators. To bracket him with two immediately in point, Berlioz and Verdi, is simply out of the question. Exploitation of prodigies of technique and alliance with a poet who can speak so directly give the impression of an attainment that, I believe, repeated hearing will in considerable measure diminish rather than enhance. For instance, what would almost every single one of the tenor and baritone solos amount to as music without the intriguing instrumental figures which accompany them? Or for that matter, what would the orchestral underpinnings of the entire work amount to without these figures? The answer would be surprisingly modest.

There was nothing modest about the performance, however. Of this only superlatives are in order. The vast array of singers and instrumentalists whom Mr. Leinsdorf conducted included the Orchestra, the Chorus Pro Musica, the Columbus Boychoir, Phyllis Curtin, soprano, Nicholas DiVirgilio, tenor, Tom Krause, baritone, and Daniel Pinkham, organist. These were the same forces who gave the work in Tanglewood and their rendering here was completely secure, beautifully balanced and smoothly integrated.

This week the same performers are taking the Requiem on the road for three concerts in New York. I predict that a lot of people will have been overwhelmed ere Sunday next.

The following week-end the Orchestra's associate conductor, Richard Burgin, will present a program that includes Berlioz' Overture, "The Corsair," Hindemith's Symphonia Serena and Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 6, in B minor, Op. 74, the "Pathetique."

TIGHT BINDING

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Christian Science Monitor (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 174,850
OCT 19 1963

Lenscraft Photos, Inc.

Who Needs a Classroom?

Columbus Boychoir students learn math on steps of Symphony Hall, Boston.

Boychoir Brings Its Teachers

By Abraham Oseroff
Staff Writer of The Christian Science Monitor

"Have teachers. Will travel." That could be the motto of the Columbus Boychoir School in Princeton, N.J. In Boston this week for concerts with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the 70 boys of the organization won't miss a single moment of class work. They've brought their teachers with them.

One of a number of boychoir schools in the United States, the Columbus school has an outstanding reputation. As one reviewer put it in typical praise after a Tanglewood concert last July, "It was not until the pure, poured tone of the boy singers came in from the side . . . that the music began to evoke the rebuilding and the deep penience for war."

Performed at Coventry

Performed at that time was Benjamin Britten's War Requiem, commissioned for celebrations in Coventry in May, 1962, when St. Michael's Cathedral was consecrated again above its war-shattered ruins. The boys are in Boston again to participate in the same work.

Five academic teachers travel with the boys, who are on the road three months during the nine months of school. Classes are held on the buses, specially equipped with pull-down desks at each seat. Or in lunchrooms, as at Symphony Hall this week. Or in theater dressing rooms or hotel rooms.

"Being children, they are able to shift immediately," a teacher says. "We sit them down and they are ready to go."

Classes Orderly

Obviously, "they must be outstanding in their academic work before they are admitted," he adds.

Symphony Hall classes were orderly and chatter-free. Inspection in the garretlike lunchroom was almost equivalent to private tutoring.

"Your vertical line between subject and predicate is where, Tom?" asked Mrs. D. C. Wolfe forcefully. The correct answer shot back.

"And your simple subject is what, Richie?" came the next question immediately. There was no time for fooling.

The boys were wearing white open-necked short sleeve shirts, blue blazers with a school seal, and gray trousers. All study Latin and French.

"Our purpose is to build a better man through the music education," Robert Haley, assistant musical director, explains, "but it is not to send them into the music world.

Next Stop, New York

"It's just to have them have a better outlook on life and appreciate the better things of life."

The private, nonprofit, interdenominational school will hold its 25th anniversary next year. Earnings from concerts and recordings are "turned back into the boys' education."

Next stop for the boys is Philharmonic Hall in New York. A Christmas night television performance is scheduled on the Bell Telephone Hour.

Listening to their performance Thursday during a rehearsal, Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony made such comments as: "Perfect. Perfect . . . I adore this sound. . . . Enchanting. . . . Just see that everything sounds that way [tonight] from A to Z and I am happy."

He later added in an interview, "They're marvelous. I think they are wonderful."

'Celestial' Voices

Benjamin Britten wants to manifest "three different levels of spirituality" in the War Requiem, Mr. Leinsdorf said. "The children's voices are on the highest level. . . . What we want are celestial voices, so it is a great problem."

He feels the Columbus boys provide the answer. "They obviously have very good music training. They are very flexible, which is unusual with children's voices. . . . I like the purity of these voices very much."

Training indeed they get. Several hours of rehearsal a day, plus three hours a week of music theory, plus original composition training. In addition, of course, to regular subjects studied by youngsters in grades four through nine. And football, for those interested.

"It isn't hard, not really," says a youth, his eyes aglow. "But it does take work."

Britten's Requiem

A profound experience

By Harold Rogers

Death is seen as no friend in Benjamin Britten's War Requiem. Here is no glorified Mass for the Dead, no praise for the fallen by those who escaped. Britten pulls the veil of illusion aside and reveals—as never revealed before in music—the utter futility of death.

My subject is War, and the pity of War.
The Poetry is in the pity.
All a poet can do is warn.

The words are Wilfred Owen's, inscribed as a motto on the title page of Britten's score. Killed in World War I when only 24, Owen came not to praise but to warn. And now Britten comes like some latter-day Jeremiah crying havoc—deepening the poet's emotion by the intenser emotions of music.

Here is a requiem in tune with our times—in tune, indeed, with all times in which man kills his brother man. There is a grimness in the Britten-Owen warning, a certain desperate hope that peace can be maintained in a stalemate of fear. Marches come and go, but they are marches of despair. Trumpets of battle blare with a ghastly ring. The tuba, its throat throttled with a mute, gives the hollowest sound to victory.

Heard in its Boston première Thursday night at Symphony Hall under Erich Leinsdorf's direction, this sardonic masterwork was given eloquent statement by the Boston Symphony, the Chorus pro Musica, the Columbus Boychoir, and by three marvelously matched soloists—Phyllis Curtin, soprano, Nicholas DiVirgilio, tenor, and Tom Krause, baritone.

It would be hard to imagine a performance more beautifully balanced or more completely realized than that offered by Mr. Leinsdorf on this occasion. Again and again he and his colleagues were called to the stage to accept the praise. With him were the soloists, of course, and Alfred Nash Patterson and Donald Bryant, directors respectively of the Chorus pro Musica and the Columbus Boychoir.

As most of us know by now, the extraordinary feature of Britten's War Requiem is the juxtaposition of the Latin text of the Requiem Mass with Owen's forthright lines in English. The choral forces, singing in Latin, represent in a sense the timelessness of the Church; Britten handles them in terms close to traditional. Here we have the orthodox pictures of doomsday and salvation.

In ironic contrast are interspersed Owen's verses, sung in this performance by the Messrs, DiVirgilio and Krause, commanding artists of polished musicianship and ringing vocalism. Herr Britten fashions the melodies in contemporary terms. Miss Curtin lent her soaring soprano from time to time to the choral sections, underlining the aloofness of tradition.

What listener could remain unmoved by the mordant bitterness of the Offertorium? Here Owen represents Abraham as not heeding God's directions for the salvation of Isaac:

But the old man would not so, but slew his son,—
And half the seed of Europe, one by one.

At this point Britten drives home the irony through repetition of the final line while the boys' voices chant angelically in the distance.

Though the warning is sharp and stark, it is eventually mitigated both in Owen's verses and in Britten's music. The only true solution—the solution offered by love—is timidly set forth almost as something too remote, too elusive to seize upon as a present panacea:

But they who love the greater love
Lay down their life; they do not hate.

And the basic unreality of death is hinted when Owen gives one of the fallen these words to say to his fallen brother:

I am the enemy you killed, my friend.

28

MUSIC

War Requiem Profound, Poignant

By ROBERT TAYLOR

The Boston premiere of Benjamin Britten's War Requiem last night reinforced the impression of the first American performance in July at Tanglewood. It is one of the profound, poignant and probably enduring scores of the century.

Hearing the work for the second time in 10 weeks points up a few of its technical weaknesses; but I am not inclined to modify my opinion of its exalted grandeur. The elements were once again identical for the extra concert, the first time within memory that a performance of this series has been repeated thrice — the Chorus Pro Musica in superb estate, the ethereal Columbus Boychoir, and the excellent soloists, Phyllis Curtin, Nicholas DiVirgilio and Tom Krause, all under the sympathetic direction of Erich Leinsdorf.

Enormous in Scope

So enormous is the scope of the Requiem that the Symphony Hall mounting poses problems not encountered in the expanses of the Tanglewood Shed. During the performance the Boychoir, invisibly stationed in the corridor of the second balcony, sang through the open doors, thus observing the composer's directions for a remote, churchly separation from the rest. (They appeared in front of the stage for their bow, looking cherubic enough to make one burn one's copy of "Lord of the Flies.")

To hold the chorus, orchestra and supplementary chamber groupings, the stage apron had been extended almost into the first row, and every inch of space was needed.

For the War Requiem is grand in its dimensions and concept. Setting the contrasts of Wilfred Owens's disturbingly lovely war poetry and the Latin Mass for the Dead, Britten has achieved a musical synthesis that comments on, reflects, ultimately transcends the 20th Century's root problem: man's capacity to destroy himself. If the harmonic devices and orchestral colors are contemporary, the source is also an ageless medieval liturgical tradition; if the surfaces of the score are cerebral, the music is felt, too, by the emotions at a deep perceptual level.

In short, paradox, plays over the vast design like the glint of a cathedral's rose window. The solo lines are perhaps most open to criticism; save for the radiant close in the Requiem's inspired final pages, they are a form of recitative in which the sense of the words means more than the musical structure.

Moreover, rather than composing throughout, Britten achieves many of his vivid highlights by means of sound effects, brilliant coups of theater and undeniably effective, but sheer instrumental wizardry all the same.

Resists Flaws

The great stature of the design, however, resists all minor flaws. One experiences at every point the nobility of a charitable and indomitable conception of man translated into musical terms. The blaze of bells introducing the soprano's Sanctus, the interwoven dialogue of the earthly and the divine, the very want of ornamentation over the words, serve a purpose that goes beyond dramatic contrivance. The integration of the piece demands every possible resource bent to the urgency of expressing a total attitude about war's meanings.

Once again the Chorus Pro Musica mustered an impre choral weight in the massive

THE Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf conducting, presented the fourth program of the 83rd season last night at Symphony Hall: Benjamin Britten's "War Requiem," Op. 66. The Chorus Pro Musica, Alfred Nash Patterson, director; and The Columbus Boychoir, Donald Bryant, director were the choral forces. The soloists were Phyllis Curtin, soprano; Nicholas DiVirgilio, tenor, and Tom Krause, baritone. The Boston premiere will be repeated today at 2 P.M. and tomorrow night at 8:30.

Libera Me, the minatory Dies Irae; but the balance and transparency of tone proved equally compelling in the Offertorium's fine-spun pianissimos. The complex rhythmic detail in the emphases of the Latin text supplied a challenge that few choirs could meet today; the Chorus Pro Musica excelled it, being Boston's finest.

The floating, silvery timbre of the Columbus Boychoir disclosed the utterly fetching musicality of the boys' voices. Miss Curtin sang the soprano role with a focus, an authority and a lambent understanding. If some of the words were lost in the tenor and baritone solos, it is scarcely amazing, for these roles mingle with the ensemble frequently.

Mr. DiVirgilio and Mr. Krause sang with distinction, power and moving expressivity as two soldiers from opposing armies. As for Mr. Leinsdorf, his command over the complex and manifold dimensions of the score and the singers represented authoritative insight. Britten's War Requiem will be heard for years to come, but the present performace has an impact that derives from first acquaintance with a score of remarkable eloquence.

Boston Globe--October 18, 1963

Boston Premiere

'War Requiem' Disarms In Music and Verse

By MARGO MILLER

The originals of the Symphony Hall statues were executed in an age when Horace could write, "It is sweet and fitting to die for one's country." Thursday evening, Benjamin Britten's "War Requiem," in its Boston premiere, exploded the Big Lie entertained by poets through World War I. The "War Requiem" is a work conceived in anger at war's waste, yet suffused with hope for the future of mankind. The Symphony Hall audience acknowledged it with an ovation.

Performances were in keeping with the power of Britten's sentiment. Erich Leinsdorf, and the Boston Symphony were joined by the same splendid forces as is the American premiere July 27 at Tanglewood. Phyllis Curtin's soprano voice is a glittering instrument which can purl notes of velvet in her top register.

Nicholas DiVirgilio has a pleasant tenor which he fits nicely to the music. The Finnish baritone Tom Krause has power and taste accompanying rich tones of great beauty. And, as usual, the Chorus pro Musica, prepared by Alfred Nash Patterson, was an ensemble sensitive to Leinsdorf's demands and those of the music. From the second balcony corridor came the cool voices of the Columbus Boychoir, here conducted by Richard Burgin, with Daniel Pinkham at the portativ organ.

The "War Requiem" was commissioned for the reconsecration May 30, 1962, of St. Michael's Cathedral in Coventry, England. The ancient church had been blitzed by German bombers. In the form of the "War Requiem," the composer pays special tribute to the role of the church in society. Mindful of early medieval drama, in which vernacular playlets helped explain parts of the Latin Mass, Britten has set verses of the English war poet, Wilfred Owen, among the Latin texts of the Missa de Profundis. The soprano and boys' choir sing the Mass against a large symphony orchestra, the tenor and baritone become Owen's soldiers to the accompaniment of a chamber group.

Owen, more than his better-known contemporary, the poet Rupert Brooke, set down the true nature of war. Brooke died early on; Owen invalided out, returned to battle to be killed a week before the Armistice. Britten's dedication is to four friends who fell in World War II. The motto of his score is Owen's verse, "My subject is . . . the pity of War. All a poet can do is warn."

If the scheme of the "War Requiem" seems merely clever on paper, hearing it in performance should disarm the listener. For all the forces involved the music is spare, the tonalities invite the ear as the verses instruct the mind and warm the heart. The songs for the soldier-soloists are perhaps the more distinctive parts of the work. Britten is master of the lofting line, the musical figure which depicts the word, the occasional chromaticism which lends a color, the assured point of view which musically heightens already strong verse.

Nor does Britten reglect the Latin Mass. The soprano and chorus are Church Mourning rather than Church Militant. They sing pages of music which suggests in its serenity the everlasting kingdom of God. They also wring phrases acknowledging earthly terror at death, whatever its source. The medieval world was fond of seeing in the microcosm the macrocosm. Britten combines the confined world of the soldier with the panorama of faith. They are trenchant comments on one another, most particularly—and spectacularly—stressed in the music.

Leinsdorf, the Boston Symphony, chorus and soloists will repeat Britten's "War Requiem" Friday afternoon at 2 and Saturday evening at 8:30, before taking it to New York for performances in Philharmonic Hall next week.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Erich Leinsdorf conducting, played the first Boston performance of Benjamin Britten's "War Requiem," Op. 66, Thursday evening in Symphony Hall. Soloists were Phyllis Curtin, soprano; Nicholas DiVirgilio, tenor; Tom Krause, baritone. Also participating were the Chorus pro Musica and the Columbus Boychoir.

TOUR 1963 SEP 29

SOUTH HADLEY

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 465,653
OCT 20 1963

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Herald
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 283,819
OCT 20 1963

Symphony Is on Tour This Week

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will be out of town this week on its first tour of the 83d season. The orchestra will visit Mt. Holyoke College in South Hadley and Yale University's Woolsey Hall before opening its 78th season in New York City, Wednesday evening at Philharmonic Hall.

Concerts will also be given in Brooklyn on Thursday, Friday and Saturday in Philharmonic Hall.

The three programs in Philharmonic Hall on Wednesday, Friday, and Saturday will be the first New York performances of Benjamin Britten's "War Requiem." Saturday afternoon's concert will be a special non-subscription performance of the "War Requiem." Eric Leinsdorf, music director, will conduct all of the concerts on this tour.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Patriot-Ledger (e)
QUINCY, Mass.
Circ. 44,419
OCT 19 1963

BSO To Tour

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its first tour of the season next week, visiting Mt. Holyoke College, South Hadley, and Yale University, New Haven, before opening its 78th season in New York City.

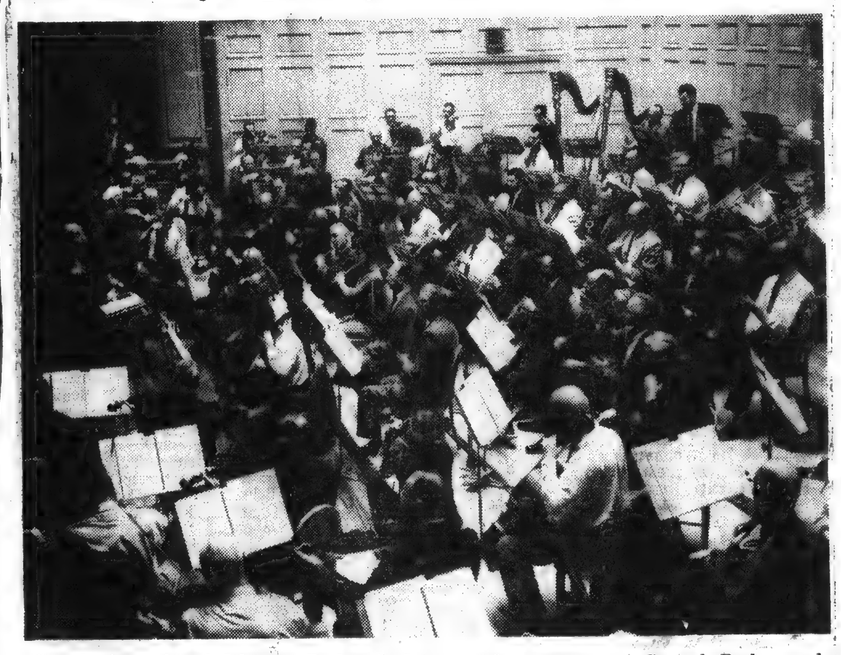
New York concerts will be given in Philharmonic Hall Oct. 23 and Oct. 26 and in Brooklyn Oct. 24 and 25. The Philharmonic Hall programs will introduce Benjamin Britten's "War Requiem."

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
News (m)
BANGOR, Me.
Circ. 76,086
OCT 28 1963

PROVIDENCE, R.I. (UPI)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its 82nd Providence series in the capital city Tuesday night. The concert will be conducted by Erich Leinsdorf.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Republican
SPRINGFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 112,302
OCT 20 1963

Boston Symphony Performs Tomorrow



Symphonic works of Johannes Brahms and two modern composers, Samuel Barber and Paul Hindemith, will be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Mount Holyoke College Monday. The concert, which is the first event in the "Arts in Performance" series, at Mount Holyoke, will be held at 8 p. m. in Chapin Auditorium.

The program opens with Paul Hindemith's "Symphonic Metamorphosis of Themes by Carl Maria von Weber." Completed in 1943, the "Symphonic Metamorphosis" is written in symphonic form with four movements. The themes of the first, third and fourth movements are taken from Weber's piano music for four hands; the second movement, the "Turandot Scherzo" is derived from Weber's incidental music to Schiller's play "Turandot."

In Hindemith's opinion none of the fragments represent Weber at his best, and consequently he has made alterations to suit his requirements.

Samuel Barber's Symphony No. 1, Op. 9, will follow the Hindemith. Composed during the winter of 1935-36, the symphony in one movement is a synthetic treatment of the four-movement classical symphony. In 1944 Barber revised the symphony in the form in which it will be played tomorrow.

Brahms' famous First Symphony in C minor will be played after an intermission. The symphony, which was first sketched in 1856, was not completed until 1876. Beginning quietly it proceeds with dramatic power and emerges in the last of the four movements into a resplendent C major. It is reminiscent though not imitative of Beethoven's symphonies.

New conductor Erich Leinsdorf will be leading the orchestra at the Mount Holyoke College concert. He succeeded Charles Munch as conductor and musical director last year. Since then he has made his first trans-American tour, and has led the orchestra at the recent Tanglewood and Berkshire Music Festivals.

Mr. Leinsdorf, who is well known for conducting opera, as chief music consultant and conductor of the Metropolitan Opera, has also had wide experience in orchestral conducting. A former director of both the Cleveland and the Rochester Philharmonic Orchestras, he has been guest conductor of some of the world's most famous orchestras, including the Vienna Philharmonic, the Berlin Philharmonic, the Amsterdam Concertgebouw and the Philadelphia Orchestra.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
anscript-Telegram (e)
HOLYOKE, Mass.
Circ. 25,214
OCT 22 1963

Boston Symphony Pleases Greatly At Mount Holyoke

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its first concert at Chapin Auditorium, Mount Holyoke College, Monday night, and the event was a great success. For years it was claimed that the orchestra was too big for that stage, but it managed to squeeze itself in, and with the aid of an arrangement of panels satisfactory acoustics were achieved.

Conductor Erich Leinsdorf brought his combination of diligence and verve to a hearty program that well deserved the applause a pleased college audience likes to give. It opened with a brilliant showpiece by Hindemith. Symphonic Metamorphosis of themes by Carl Maria von Weber. The interplay of conventional themes and bizarre tonal decoration makes this work fun to listen to, and the instrumental display is made to order for the fine performers of the Boston Symphony.

Less diverting—a more thoughtful example of 20th Century composition—was Symphony No. 1 by Samuel Barber. This had its murky moments, although Leinsdorf held a firm discipline to keep its tricky passages in line. The Leinsdorf conducting style is interesting in itself. He throws himself into the orchestra, and his personality more or less ricochets back to the audience.

Although the relatively modern works made this concert especially interesting, they remained to be outshadowed by the Boston Symphony performance of Brahms' Symphony No. 1. Even in this small hall, playing under some physical difficulties, the orchestra presented this great symphony with a luster that disdained familiarity. It seemed that it had never been played just that way before, with so much loving enthusiasm.

—By Anabel B. Murphy

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Union (m)
SPRINGFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 83,691
OCT 22 1963

SOUTH HADLEY

MT. HOLYOKE SERIES OPENED BY LEINSDORF

Boston Symphony Gives Performance Monday At College Campus

By R. C. HAMMERICH

SOUTH HADLEY — Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave Mount Holyoke College an exalted, powerful Brahm's First Symphony Monday night.

First in Series

The orchestra, providing the first event in the college's 1963-64 Arts in Performance series, was making its first appearance at the college. Tonight it will perform in New Haven, Wednesday in New York, Thursday in Brooklyn and in New York again Friday and Saturday.

With Brahm's First Symphony Monday the orchestra was close to perfection—especially during the lyrical second movement. The famous string section sent it violins soaring with the high melodies and its violas, cellos and basses floating lightly, but solidly, through the middle and underneath.

The first and fourth movements had the surge and urgency expected from Beethoven and not always heard in performances of this work.

The only quibble we have to offer is with the third movement which, although performed with Leinsdorf's admirable exactness, might have been taken at a slightly faster pace.

The movement was consistent with the conductor's inclusive sense of overall shape, however, and his feeling for appropriate changing internal speeds and volumes gave it continuity.

Infused With Sparkle

Seldom is the Brahm's First heard infused with so much life and sparkle.

There was plenty of sparkle, also, in the Hindemith piece called "Symphonic Metamorphoses of Themes by Carl Maria Von Weber," which opened the program.

This piece has nearly none of the turgid harmonies so often heard in Hindemith's music. It is, and was Monday, jaunty and gay and stuffed with bright instrumental colors, syncopated rhythms and bouncy melodies.

It is an orchestral show piece, especially for the glittering percussive instruments, and the orchestra made the most of its entertainment values.

The other piece on the program, Samuel Barber's First Symphony, was equally colorful, but its colors were darker, less glistening.

There was a good deal of off-center, eccentric rhythm in it and many intricate, overlapping, short, almost spasmodic phrases that kept the players on their toes and this listener on the edge of his seat wondering if each section would come in on time.

There was no need to worry. The orchestra made it sound easy.

30 NEW HAVEN 1 AUG

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Register (e)
NEW HAVEN, Conn.
Circ. 97,672
OCT 22 1963

Boston Symphony To Offer Mahler In City Tonight

Making the second event of the 1963-64 Woolsey Hall Series under the auspices of the Yale School of Music, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the second concert of the season tonight, starting at 8:30. Erich Leinsdorf will conduct.

The program will consist of two symphonies, opening with the Mozart Symphony in C, (K. 200), followed by the Symphony No. 5 by Gustave Mahler, often called the "Giant Symphony" because of its sprawling proportions. Tonight's concert is sold out.

This program is the same one that met with great favor at Symphony Hall in Boston last Saturday night, and will be repeated at the Brooklyn Academy of Music this coming Thursday evening. The Boston Symphony is making its first trip of the season to New York this week, and in its two concerts in Lincoln Center will be heard in Britten's "War Requiem."

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Journal-Courier (m)
NEW HAVEN, Conn.
Circ. 28,971
OCT 22 1963

Boston Ensemble Plays Tonight At Woolsey Hall

The famed Boston Symphony Orchestra, always a highlight of New Haven's musical season, comes to Woolsey Hall tonight to give the second concert of the 1063-64 Woolsey Hall Series under the auspices of the Yale School of Music.

Erich Leinsdorf, who succeeded Charles Munch as Music Directory of the 110-piece symphonic ensemble, will be on the podium to conduct, first the Mozart Symphony in C (K. 200) and then the great Mahler Symphony No. 5, one of the most complex writings in symphonic literature.

The Boston Symphony did the same program at Symphony Hall in Boston Saturday night, and will repeat it at the Academy of Music in Brooklyn this coming Thursday evening.

Yehudi Menuhin, distinguished American violinist, who is returning to the concert platform after a year's absence, will give the next concert of the Woolsey Hall Series two weeks from tonight.

Journal-Courier (m)
NEW HAVEN, Conn.
Circ. 28,971
OCT 23 1963

Theater In Review

Boston Symphony Glows At Woolsey Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra paid its first visit to New Haven Tuesday night in the second event of the season in the Woolsey series and Erich Leinsdorf and his remarkable organization never gave a more enjoyable concert.

Starting off with the precise work of Mozart as shown in the composer's Symphony in C Major K. 200, the beautiful program had for its after-intermission work the mystifying and fascinating Symphony No. 5 in C-sharp minor by Mahler.

At its conclusion, as the last fiery notes came to a dramatic halt, the audience responded in a perfect frenzy of applause and Leinsdorf was recalled to the stage several times. Acknowledging the applause, he included his men, and not only soloists, but whole sections responded to his command to arise.

The Mozart symphony was given the exacting performance that gives such pleasure to listeners. The lovely, almost formal mood of the symphony with its well-placed moments of frivolity, was given a clear-cut reading by Leinsdorf, who, incidently, conducted the entire concert without a score before him.

The many moods of Mahler's Symphony No. 5, found Leinsdorf and his men presenting a vivid procession of romantic inventions with many infrequently-used instruments emphasized. Particularly fascinating was the work for the French horn with James Stagliano as soloist, presenting a melancholy but beautiful melody which was picked up in a fanciful manner by the strings.

Mahler's so-called "Giant Symphony" was given a most exhilarated reading by Leinsdorf and, as mood succeeded mood, and the various sections of the orchestra were brought to the fore, the audience responded with rapt attention. This fifth symphony, composed to death, has no mourning note in it and its majestic sweep as presented by the Boston, was most compelling. Particularly exciting was the performance of the final rondo with the strings and the winds fairly exulting in the excitement of the mood. This giant symphony needs a giant of an orchestra for proper presentation and that is just what it had Tuesday night.

F. R. S.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Register (e)
NEW HAVEN, Conn.
Circ. 97,672
OCT 23 1963

Boston Group Scores Again In Woolsey Concert

24 ITAL—BOSTON SYMPHONY

Mozart and Mahler made rather strange "bedfellows" in the Boston Symphony's concert here as the second event of the Woolsey series Tuesday evening. Erich Leinsdorf conducted this first seasonal concert by the orchestra in Woolsey Hall. The playing was just fine but the program was something else again!

Programs here by this great orchestra over the years have invariably been notable for contrasting offerings and this latest one was no exception. The two works which made up the program were Mozart's Symphony in C major (K. 200) and Mahler's Symphony No. 5 in C-sharp minor. The former was "short and sweet" and the latter was "long and boring." We suspect that the applause at the conclusion of the bizarre and sprawling Mahler work was more for the conductor and orchestra than for the composer.

Mahler has never been a "popular" composer and this symphony, perhaps more than some of his others, furnishes the explanation. Even his worst detractors will grudgingly admit that he had a spark of genius with a musical message in whatever he wrote. His principal fault was that, for all his originality and sincerity in composing, he allowed and indomitable spirit to run away with his talents. And so he came up with works that are too long, emotionally extravagant and stylistically confusing. Tnis fifth symphony is a musical hodge-podge of funeral marches, fanfares, waltzes, rondos, fugues, and what have you.

At the hands of a less skillful conductor than Leinsdorf this gigantic symphony with its huge instrumentation can really fall apart. Fortunately some of the Boston conductor's enthusiasm for the work and his ability to make the most of its sometime brilliance rubbed off on listeners. Conducting without score, Leinsdorf's reading had an intensity and elan which providentially brought about a triumph of "virtuosity over banality."

The youthful Mozart symphony was beautifully done. Her all was tuneful, zestful, colorful, and precisioned, especially in the characteristic ornamental playing of the strings.

We are more convinced than ever that the Boston Symphony is in good hands, literally and figuratively. Leinsdorf doesn't even need a baton!

G.E.A.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Register
NEW HAVEN, Conn.
Circ. 105,605

H TUO 2

Boston Symphony To Play Tuesday

ERICH LEINSDORF directs the Boston Symphony Orchestra which will appear at Woolsey Hall at 8:30 p.m. Tuesday in the second concert of the Woolsey Hall series.

By GORDON E. ARMSTRONG

Our musical season seems to be getting under way with an "orchestral binge." The Royal Philharmonic Orchestra of London sounded the season's "fanfare" in the opening event of the Woolsey series, and this past week the New Haven Symphony opened its series in impressive fashion. Now comes the Boston Symphony for its first season concert on Tuesday evening as the second event in the Woolsey series and the climactic concert in this orchestral splurge.

Our first acquaintance with the Boston Orchestra's new conductor last season was both reassuring and pleasurable in the extreme. Erich Leinsdorf's two appearances here in his first year as the orchestra's musical director left no doubt in anybody's mind that this great ensemble was launched on another illustrious era. Leinsdorf clearly showed himself to be a consummate musician and a brilliant conductor — a worthy successor to his predecessors in one of the most coveted orchestral posts in the world.

Leinsdorf is a dedicated musician whose consuming ambition is to maintain the great musical traditions of the Boston Symphony. Prior to taking over the conductor's post, he had this to say with regard to his discussions with he orchestra's management: "Whatever came up the musical necessity had its way. From having seen musical organizations abroad and in this country, this is rare. As I don't know all musical organizations I cannot in fairness say it is unique, but I have a suspicion it is unique. I am going to do my very best to keep it this way."

The new conductor has some new and progressive ideas of his own. Some of these were in evidence this past summer at the Berkshire Music Festival which had drawn the fire of critics in recent years. He vitalized the programs which had become somewhat stereotyped and commonplace, and his radically new approach to the work of the Berkshire Music Center, the festival's school, won widespread approval. Leinsdorf's immediate predecessor, Charles Munch, admittedly showed little interest in the Center, preferring to confine his energies to conducting. On the other hand, Leinsdorf considers the school to be a most important part of the festival's activities and has taken an active interest in all of its phases.

The new conductor's remarkable ability to assimilate new scores in a hurry was one of the first things which won him the admiration and respect of the Boston musicians. A week before he was scheduled to conduct Samuel Barber's new Piano Concerto, he had not received the score. This didn't bother him in the least. Another time he rehearsed Walter Piston's Symphony No. 7, which he conducted here last season, from memory. Said the astonished composer and former Harvard professor, "I wasn't prepared for a man to know my score better than I did."

Two of Leinsdorf's favorite conductors — Mozart and Mahler, will be represented in Tuesday's program by the Bostonians. The former's Symphony in C (K. 200) will take up the first half of the program and the latter portion will be given over to Mahler's Symphony No. 5 in C sharp. The inclusion of this so-called "Giant Symphony" may raise a few eyebrows! A work of sprawling and huge proportions, it is one of the more controversial Mahler symphonies. But if any orchestra can win converts to this enigmatic work, the Bos-

* * *

A recent announcement concerning next year's Berkshire Music Center by the Boston conductor has some local interest. Donald Martino of the Yale Music School faculty is one of 10 composers who have been awarded commissions for new works to be performed at the Center next season in a Contemporary American Music Festival. Nine of the commissions, for chamber music compositions, were made available by the Fromm Music Foundation of Chicago. The 10th commission for a choral work was made possible by the Samuel Wechsler Commission of New York.

NEW YORK.

31

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Times (m)
NEW YORK, N. Y.
Circ. 681,612
OCT 25 1963

Music: Britten's Interweaving of 2 Strands of Pity

'War Requiem' Played by Boston Symphony

By ROSS PARMENTER

IF an audience might be said to be stunned by pity, that is probably the best way to describe what happened Wednesday night at Philharmonic Hall when the Boston Symphony Orchestra presented the first New York performance of Benjamin Britten's "War Requiem."

Actually, the work is an interweaving of two strands of pity. One is the age-old pity that humanity has always felt for the death of the body. The other is the pity for men killed in war. Britten has woven them together through the use of two marvelous texts, which, by some alchemy, he has made to seem like one.

•

For the older pity, the composer has utilized the Latin text of the Roman Catholic Mass for the Dead. For the newer one he has taken a series of poems by Wilfred Owen, who was killed in World War I. Not only do the Latin and English texts keep throwing unexpected lights on each other, but they also are illuminated, as it were, by a third cross light: the music that Britten has devised to bring out his own feelings.

That music, besides being interesting in itself, unifies the disparate texts. And besides furnishing a continuum, it provides a stimulus to the imagination so that everything mentioned in the text seems to rise before the listener as a living reality; whether it be Abraham, disregarding the angel and killing Isaac, or souls crying out in fear at the imminent judgment of the world by fire.

When Erich Leinsdorf led the same forces in the United States premiere of the "War Requiem" at the Berkshire Festival this summer, the audience, after the first impact of the work, broke loose into an ovation that lasted 17 minutes. That did not happen Wednesday night. Perhaps it was the difference between a Tanglewood audience and the regular assemblage—the first of the season—of the orchestra's New York subscribers.

Yet one did not feel the absence of cheers was a sign of indifference. On the contrary, one gained the impression of an audience too saddened, and at the same time too uplifted by the beauty that transfigures the final pity of the "Libera me" to be in any mood for anything but deep and yet appreciative reflection.

One felt the audience did not want to shatter the effect of Britten's music by making too much sound of its own.

Under Mr. Leinsdorf's direction everyone seemed so deeply immersed in the music, including the conductor himself, that one gained the impression that this was more an imaginative re-creation than an actual performance. Which in the long run is saying it was the very finest sort of performance.

Nicholas DiVirgilio was the tenor soloist and Tom Krause the baritone. They sang the Owen words with extraordinary compassion. And besides the feeling and the beauty of tone they brought to them, they enunciated so clearly that no shades of meaning were lost.

•

Phyllis Curtin was the soprano whose vocal lines are like an angelic descant that soars above the texture at given moments. Always her voice was clear and flowing, and a beautiful tonal foil to the voices of the men.

The adult choir was the Chorus Pro Musica of Boston, which is led by Alfred Nash Patterson. The Columbus Boychoir, led by Donal Bryant, provided the boys' voices. Bob Lyon, one of the boy sopranos, was so outstanding that he was brought forward to share the applause with the other performers.

The orchestra will present the work again Friday night and will repeat it at a special non-subscription matinee Sunday. Those who have not yet heard perhaps the finest work that has yet emerged from World War II should certainly try to hear it.

Erich Leinsdorf, who conducted the Boston Symphony here

The Program

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Erich Leinsdorf, conductor; Phyllis Curtin, soprano; Nicholas DiVirgilio, tenor; Tom Krause, baritone; Chorus Pro Musica, Alfred Nash Patterson, director; Columbus Boychoir, Donald Bryant, director. At Philharmonic Hall.

War Requiem.....Benjamin Britten

NEW YORK, N.Y.
VILLAGE VOICE
W 18,649
OCT 31 1963

GREAT BRITTEN

The value of Benjamin Britten's "War Requiem" as a heroic indictment of war has not been seriously challenged. Its musical value, on the other hand, has been questioned in some quarters (not in this one). To this listener, last week's New York premiere performances by the Boston Symphony at Philharmonic Hall emphatically solidified last July's Tanglewood conviction that this is music of vast imagination and persuasiveness. It also seems undeniable now that, when the great music of this century is listed, the "War Requiem" will have to take a high place.

The previous impressions of the individual sections (VV, August 8) remain intact. There is still the burning and ironic defiance by Wilfred Owen's World War I poems as they refuse the external consolation of the Mass. But the music, while still graphically descriptive and basically conservative, shows more and more a largeness of design and consistency of strength that utterly dominate and drive forward all the awesome and moving things that are said in words.

As at Tanglewood, Erich Leinsdorf conducted last Saturday afternoon a triumphant performance. If anything, Phyllis Curtin and tenor Nicholas DiVirgilio sang with greater freedom and beauty than before, and the Finnish baritone Tom Krause made something simple and overwhelming of the final pages where futile anger gives way to reconciliation. Also as before, Boston's Chorus Pro Musica and the Columbus Boy Choir sang without any apparent flaw.

ROSTROPOVICH

Let's hope it was only a coincidence that while Britten's Op. 66 (the "War Requiem") was being given its first New York performances at Lincoln Center last Wednesday, Friday, and Saturday, the Russian cellist Mstislav Rostropovich last Friday night at Carnegie Hall gave New York its first hearing of the same composer's Op. 65, an inventive little Sonata in C Major for Cello and Piano. But if this was opportunism, it was made the most of. Rostropovich, to whom the piece is dedicated, happens to be a musician of fantastic gifts, and he gobbled up all of the work's virtuoso tricks as if they had been potatoes in a plate of borscht. Especially effecting in the writing, as in the performing, was a march consisting mainly of ghostly slides up and down the strings.

The cellist also played an expansive, never fussy but never careless performance of Bach's Third Suite for Unaccompanied Cello; a juicily Slavic job of Kabalevsky's juicily slavic Sonata, also dedicated to Mr. R. and here given its local premiere; and Schumann's Four Pieces in Folk Style. Alexander Dedukhin was such a sensitive pianist in the Britten, Schumann, and Kabalevsky that one longed to hear him meet the cellist on equal footing, with the piano lid all the way up.

STRAVINSKY SYMPHONIES

Leonard Bernstein once wrote somewhere that an all-Stravinsky program could offer more variety than a concert given over exclusively to any other composer. The point perhaps is arguable, but Mr. Bernstein and the New York Philharmonic seemed to set out to prove it a couple of weeks ago by playing not only an all-Stravinsky program but one that was all neoclassic Stravinsky. Variety was established, all right, but established more importantly was the sunlit charm of the Symphony in C, the mystery and beauty, unsurpassed in our time, of the "Symphony of Psalms," and the power and excitement of the Symphony in Three Movements.

Because Bernstein had somehow hurt an eye, he hadn't been able to rehearse the Symphony in C, so one of his assistant conductors, Zdenek Kosler of Czechoslovakia, took over the piece and led it with a kind of firm, unhistrionic control his boss doesn't always achieve.

Top Bernstein

Bernstein himself was in top form, however, as he invariably is when Stravinsky is the subject to be expounded. With the Choral Art Society in luminous voice, the "Symphony of Psalms," was often breathtaking, especially in the gently swelling "Alleluias" at the end. The Symphony of Three Movements came through as more of a showpiece than some would have liked, but such a masterpiece as this can take a little souping up here and there without losing its shape and drive.

—Leighton Kerner

New York World-Telegram and The Sun
D. 463,241 SAT. 175,139
OCT 24 1963

Music

Britten's Blow for Peace

By LOUIS BIANCOLLI

The drama, impact and anti-war fervor of Benjamin Britten's "War Requiem" were even more shattering in Philharmonic Hall last night than were at Tanglewood last summer.

Louis Biancolli

This was the work's first performance in New York, and once more Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony, supported by the same staff of soloists and choruses, were the giftbearers. It was again a great night for music and for peace.

One naturally missed the expectancy and atmosphere of the American premiere of July. There in the Berkshires, the thousands that sat enthralled on folding chair or grass at great distances from the stage were part of the drama.

But this was a real hall, one of the most beautiful in the world, capacious yet friendly, and a perfect setting for music as concentrated and incisive as Britten's. Here all was luminous as sunlight.

Leinsdorf was incredible in his absolute command of detail and scope. Thanks to him the performance was like a prodigious mosaic in which the tiniest unit reflected the grandeur of the whole.

The orchestra was a marvel of virtuosity, and same applies to the chorus pro musica. As for the Columbus Boychoir, the sweet weightless voices seemed to float down from some secret altitudes of the hall.

All three of last summer's soloists—Phyllis Curtin, Nicholas Di Virgilio and Tom Krause—were as devoted and artistic as before, with a little added margin for personal splendor this time. Theirs was not an easy assignment.

But then none of this "War Requiem" is easy—either to sing, play, conduct, or grasp in its entirety. There are voices within voices in this score, orchestras within orchestras, texts within texts.

But for all its subtlety and complex patterns of idiom, an immediately communicable compassion pervades this work. The two-fold passion behind it is from Britten's heart and soul.

New York
Journal American
NEW YORK, N.Y.
D. 501,625 S. 760,395

OCT 24 1963

BOSTONIANS AT PHILHARMONIC HALL

'War Requiem' Hailed

By MILES KASTENDIECK

HAILED AS A MASTERPIECE ever since its world premiere last January, Britten's "War Requiem" sustained that impression at its first New York hearing in Philharmonic Hall last night.

The Boston Symphony presented it with Erich Leinsdorf conducting the same forces that participated in the American premiere at Tanglewood last July.

A typically Britten work, it nevertheless surpasses any other in his career. The subject-matter obviously touched him deeply as the dedication to the memory of his four friends who died in World War II indicates.

It also pointed up his pacifism and his humanitarianism as he juxtaposed Wilfred Owen's poems with the Missa Pro Defunctis.

It is the irony of that juxtaposition that Britten's work vividly conveys, while his resolution in the benediction expresses how fervently he hopes that these dead truly may not have died in vain.

How he fashions this all musically in the duality of his formal pattern retains its fascination on a second hearing.

Having reported extensively on this aspect last summer, I repeat that this is a singular work, quite worthy of the three performances (a special non-subscription one on Saturday) being given here.

This performance did not exert quite the powerful impact of the American premiere until the second half of its rendition last night.

At the culmination in the "Libera Me," it caught the essence of the work in the fullness of its meaning. Earlier in the "Dies Irae" it sounded less searing than it should.

Some of this might be attributed to Mr. Leinsdorf's too crisp and dry (almost non-dramatic) treatment of the score, some to his too scrupulous attention to detail, some to the brilliance and clarity of the hall.

This music can be more moving than it was on this occasion however admirably the soloists —Phyllis Curtin, soprano; Nicholas Divirgilio, tenor, and Tom Krause baritone.

The chorus Pro Musica, and the Columbus Boy Choir sang. With the orchestra it became a question of balancing sound for the bells tolled more loudly than hauntingly, the brasses sounded less menacing.

By the sanctus the performance had created its atmosphere. Then as the meaning of text sank in, the audience was caught up in the beauty of Britten's concept.

Mr. Krause sang the final baritone solo with just the right inflection to crystalize the mood. Then the profundity of the work as a whole came through.

With it might be heard an echo from Emerson's essay on "War." In this he expresses the hope for the evolution of civilization beyond the fratricide that war is and the peace that should be more than just vision.

NEW YORKER
NEW YORK, N.Y.
W. 442,539

NOV 2 1963

MUSICAL EVENTS

Requiem

BENJAMIN BRITTEN'S "War Requiem" has been almost universally hailed as one of the greatest works of its kind produced in our century. Its theme—the pity and futility of war—is a noble one. The poetry of Wilfred Owen, which intersperses the verses of the traditional Latin Missa pro Defunctis, is very moving indeed, and the consciousness that Owen himself was killed in action, at twenty-four, and only a week before the armistice that closed the First World War, gives it an extra note of pathos. The composer's dedication of the work to four friends who died in the more recent World War attests his deep sincerity in writing it. Furthermore, the composer's device of contrasting the Mass with more modern and immediate poetic expression is an extremely dramatic one, for as Owen's heart-rending lines alternate with the age-old Latin, they seem at times to mock it and at others to lend it extra pertinence and nobility. Add to this the huge format of the composition—employing a full orchestra, a chamber orchestra, a mixed chorus, a boys' choir, and three vocal soloists—and it becomes clear that the effect is bound to be stirring.

In listening to its New York première, by the Boston Symphony and additional forces, under the baton of Erich Leinsdorf, in Philharmonic Hall on Wednesday evening of last week, I felt this effect, particularly in the insistent rhythms of the Carl Orff-like "Dies Irae," in the tenor solo "Move him into the sun," in the later tenor solo that begins the "Agnus Dei," and especially in the closing episode, in which two enemy soldiers confront each other in death. Yet I was aware throughout the work of the fact that I was being moved more by the ideas presented to my conscious mind than by the music itself. It was as if I were looking at some deft illustrations purporting to convey, but not actually conveying, the subject of a profound book. The "War Requiem" is a very literary work, and, to my mind, the Britten music embellishes the literature without taking over that literature's function. To some extent, this is the fault of Britten's general musical style, which has always been theatrical and contrived, making great use of sound for sound's sake and of effect for effect's sake—and which remains theatrical and contrived even in this, probably his most deeply felt work. I do not mean to imply that those who are profoundly impressed by the "War Requiem" are in any way being cheated. As I have said, they have before them a great subject dramatically presented, some interesting musical scoring, some verses of exalted quality, and the grandeur of the Mass, and these things are impressive enough. But Britten's music does not assume priority among them, as, say, Mozart's and Beethoven's music does in their Masses. Perhaps I can make myself clearer by saying that if the "War Requiem" were stripped of its words and its associations, the musical remnant would not cause any great ripple of excitement. You may argue that this is beside the point, since it is not so stripped, and you will, of course, be right. But I can still answer that what you find moving about this work is, nearly all of it, extra-musical.

The performance the other night was, I am sure, as fine as one could wish for. Mr. Leinsdorf conducted the work clearly and with an air of solemnity. The soloists—Phyllis Curtin, Nicholas DiVirgilio, and Tom Krause—all sang magnificently, as did the Chorus Pro Musica of Boston and the Columbus Boychoir. Among the soloists, Miss Curtin had the most difficult assignment, and not only did she carry it out like the highly intelligent artist she is but she sang with what appeared to be a new opulence of voice. Mr. Krause, a Finnish baritone, was making his début here. He is a splendid vocalist, and one hopes to hear more of him.

Herald Tribune NEW YORK
D. 355,898 S. 451,270

OCT 25 1963

Britten's 'War Requiem'ce —A Masterpie

PHILHARMONIC HALL
Lincoln Center
Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Erich Leinsdorf; soloists: Phyllis Curtin, soprano; Nicholas DiVirgilio, tenor; Tom Krause, bass. Chorus pro Musica of Boston conducted by Alfred Nash Patterson; Columbus Boychoir conducted by Donald Bryant. The program:
"War Requiem" (first N. Y. performance) ..... Britten

By Alan Rich

Benjamin Britten's "War Requiem" is a masterpiece, one of the genuinely great works of the 20th Century. This is not to say that it is a perfect work, but its flaws do not detract from its stature. It moves, both in the sense of time and in the emotional connotation.

It got its first New York performance Wednesday night at the opening concert of the Boston Symphony's Philharmonic Hall series, and the treatment it received at the hands of Erich Leinsdorf and some 300 singers and instrumentalists under him mirrored totally the quality of the music. This may sound as if Wednesday night was a major one for music in New York. It is supposed to sound that way.

The flaws of the work arise out of certain tendencies in Britten's musical style toward easy effects. In the "War Requiem" there are a few passages, mostly in the early sections for the two male soloists, that are almost embarrassingly contrived. Where one hopes for deeply spiritual music, reflecting the bitterness and irony of Wilfred Owen's anti-war poetry, one gets, instead, a kind of naive pictorialism in the orchestra that spoils the effect.

But by the end of the second section, the "Dies Irae," this kind of artificiality seems suddenly to disappear. Perhaps Britten has gotten a second wind; perhaps the listener has had a chance to warm to his kind of writing, as the two soldiers find ultimate reconciliation in death and the chorus softly intones the "In Paradisum" around their last words, one is completely fulfilled.

The plan of the work could easily lend itself to even more trickery than Britten supplies. To intermingle contemporary pacifist poetry with the traditional Latin wood last July, were superb. text of the Burial Service is an immense temptation to write tracts instead of music. And Britten himself has been guilty in the past of that kind of writing.

But not here. It might be interesting, just as an experiment, to see how the two "halves" of this work would sound by themselves: just the Latin text, and just the For whatever reason, the piece definitely improves as it goes along. At the ending, Owen poetry. They would probably sound magnificent, because the music they contain is so beautifully written, in the main. But here is one of those rare instances where a piece comprising disparate elements really comes off as a total conception.

Erich Leinsdorf, conductor.

Unquestionably, the work is going to remain in circulation for a long time to come. Just the amount of adulation that it has already won (to which these words are humbly appended) would insure that. That it can get a better performance than the one under Leinsdorf's direction is, however, open to a lot of questioning.

The performance was simple, spacious, and wholly just. Even the architecture of Philharmonic Hall played its part, since the boys' choir was able to sing from a position behind the scrim high above the stage, and float the tones of angels over the earthly proceedings below.

The boys sang wonderfully, and so did the larger chorus on stage. The three soloists, the same ones who participated in the American premiere of the music at Tangle- Mention should go especially, however, to the rich nobility of the singing of the young Finnish baritone, Tom Krause. This was his first New York appearance; the first of many, one earnestly hopes.

There will be two more performances of the "War Requiem" this week. That a single seat should go empty at either (Friday night and Saturday afternoon) is unthinkable.

New York
Journal American
NEW YORK, N.Y.
D. 501,625 S. 760,395

OCT 24 1963

BOSTONIANS AT PHILHARMONIC HALL

'War Requiem' Hailed

By MILES KASTENDIECK

HAILED AS A MASTERPIECE ever since its world premiere last January, Britten's "War Requiem" sustained that impression at its first New York hearing in Philharmonic Hall last night.

The Boston Symphony presented it with Erich Leinsdorf conducting the same forces that participated in the American premiere at Tanglewood last July.

A typically Britten work, it nevertheless surpasses any other in his career. The subject-matter obviously touched him deeply as the dedication to the memory of his four friends who died in World War II indicates.

It also pointed up his pacifism and his humanitarianism as he juxtaposed Wilfred Owen's poems with the Missa Pro Defunctis.

It is the irony of that juxtaposition that Britten's work vividly conveys, while his resolution in the benediction expresses how fervently he hopes that these dead truly may not have died in vain.

How he fashions this all musically in the duality of his formal pattern retains its fascination on a second hearing.

Having reported extensively on this aspect last summer, I repeat that this is a singular work, quite worthy of the three performances (a special non-subscription one on Saturday) being given here.

This performance did not exert quite the powerful impact of the American premiere until the second half of its rendition last night.

At the culmination in the "Libera Me," it caught the essence of the work in the fullness of its meaning. Earlier in the "Dies Irae" it sounded less searing than it should.

Some of this might be attributed to Mr. Leinsdorf's too crisp and dry (almost non-dramatic) treatment of the score, some to his too scrupulous attention to detail, some to the brilliance and clarity of the hall.

This music can be more moving than it was on this occasion however admirably the soloists —Phyllis Curtin, soprano; Nicholas Divirgilio, tenor, and Tom Krause baritone.

The chorus Pro Musica, and the Columbus Boy Choir sang. With the orchestra it became a question of balancing sound for the bells tolled more loudly than hauntingly, the brasses sounded less menacing.

By the sanctus the performance had created its atmosphere. Then as the meaning of text sank in, the audience was caught up in the beauty of Britten's concept.

Mr. Krause sang the final baritone solo with just the right inflection to crystalize the mood. Then the profundity of the work as a whole came through.

With it might be heard an echo from Emerson's essay on "War." In this he expresses the hope for the evolution of civilization beyond the fratricide that war is and the peace that should be more than just vision.

NEW YORKER
NEW YORK, N.Y.
W. 442,539

NOV 2 1963

MUSICAL EVENTS

Requiem

BENJAMIN BRITTEN'S "War Requiem" has been almost universally hailed as one of the greatest works of its kind produced in our century. Its theme—the pity and futility of war—is a noble one. The poetry of Wilfred Owen, which intersperses the verses of the traditional Latin Missa pro Defunctis, is very moving indeed, and the consciousness that Owen himself was killed in action, at twenty-four, and only a week before the armistice that closed the First World War, gives it an extra note of pathos. The composer's dedication of the work to four friends who died in the more recent World War attests his deep sincerity in writing it. Furthermore, the composer's device of contrasting the Mass with more modern and immediate poetic expression is an extremely dramatic one, for as Owen's heart-rending lines alternate with the age-old Latin, they seem at times to mock it and at others to lend it extra pertinence and nobility. Add to this the huge format of the composition—employing a full orchestra, a chamber orchestra, a mixed chorus, a boys' choir, and three vocal soloists—and it becomes clear that the effect is bound to be stirring.

In listening to its New York première, by the Boston Symphony and additional forces, under the baton of Erich Leinsdorf, in Philharmonic Hall on Wednesday evening of last week, I felt this effect, particularly in the insistent rhythms of the Carl Orff-like "Dies Irae," in the tenor solo "Move him into the sun," in the later tenor solo that begins the "Agnus Dei," and especially in the closing episode, in which two enemy soldiers confront each other in death. Yet I was aware throughout that I was being moved more by the ideas presented to my conscious mind than by the music itself. It was as if I were looking at some deft illustrations purporting to convey, but not actually conveying, the subject of a profound book. The "War Requiem" is a very literary work, and, to my mind, the Britten music embellishes the literature without taking over that literature's function. To some extent, this is the fault of Britten's general musical style, which has always been theatrical and contrived, making great use of sound for sound's sake and of effect for effect's sake—and which remains theatrical and contrived even in this, probably his most deeply felt work. I do not mean to imply that those who are profoundly impressed by the "War Requiem" are in any way being cheated. As I have said, they have before them a great subject dramatically presented, some interesting musical scoring, some verses of exalted quality, and the grandeur of the Mass. And these things are impressive enough. But Britten's music does not assume priority among them, as, say, Mozart's and Beethoven's music does in their Masses. Perhaps I can make myself clearer by saying that if the "War Requiem" were stripped of its words and its associations, the musical remnant would not cause any great ripple of excitement. You may argue that this is beside the point, since it is not so stripped, and you will, of course, be right. But I can still answer that what you find moving about this work is, nearly all of it, extra-musical.

The performance the other night was, I am sure, as fine as one could wish for. Mr. Leinsdorf conducted the work clearly and with an air of solemnity. The soloists—Phyllis Curtin, Nicholas DiVirgilio, and Tom Krause—all sang magnificently, as did the Chorus Pro Musica of Boston and the Columbus Boychoir. Among the soloists, Miss Curtin had the most difficult assignment, and not only did she carry it out like the highly intelligent artist she is but she sang with what appeared to be a new opulence of voice. Mr. Krause, a Finnish baritone, was making his début here. He is a splendid vocalist, and one hopes to hear more of him.

Herald Tribune NEW YORK
D. 355,898 S. 451,270

OCT 25 1963

Britten's 'War Requiem'ce —A Masterpie

PHILHARMONIC HALL
Lincoln Center
Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Erich Leinsdorf; soloists: Phyllis Curtin, soprano; Nicholas DiVirgilio, tenor; Tom Krause, bass. Chorus pro Musica of Boston conducted by Alfred Nash Patterson; Columbus Boychoir, conducted by Donald Troxell. The program:
"War Requiem" (first N. Y. performance) ..... Britten

By Alan Rich

Benjamin Britten's "War Requiem" is a masterpiece, one of the genuinely great works of the 20th Century. This is not to say that it is a perfect work, but its flaws do not detract from its stature. It moves, both in the sense of time and in the emotional connotation.

It got its first New York performance Wednesday night at the opening concert of the Boston Symphony's Philharmonic Hall series, and the treatment it received at the hands of Erich Leinsdorf and some 300 singers and instrumentalists under him mirrored totally the quality of the music. This may sound as if Wednesday night was a major one for music in New York. It is supposed to sound that way.

The flaws of the work arise out of certain tendencies in Britten's musical style toward easy effects. In the "War Requiem" there are a few passages, mostly in the early sections for the two male soloists, that are almost embarrassingly contrived. Where one hopes for deeply spiritual music, reflecting the bitterness and irony of Wilfred Owen's anti-war poetry, one gets, instead, a kind of naive pictorialism in the orchestra that spoils the effect.

But by the end of the second section, the "Dies Irae," this kind of artificiality seems suddenly to disappear. Perhaps Britten has gotten a second wind; perhaps the listener has had a chance to warm to his kind of writing, as the two soldiers find ultimate reconciliation in death and the chorus softly intones the "In Paradisum" around their last words, one is completely fulfilled.

The plan of the work could easily lend itself to even more trickery than Britten supplies. To intermingle contemporary pacifist poetry with the traditional Latin wood last July, were superb. text of the Burial Service is an immense temptation to write tracts instead of music. And Britten himself has been guilty in the past of that kind of writing.

But not here. It might be interesting, just as an experiment, to see how the two "halves" of this work would sound by themselves; just the Latin text, and just the Owen poetry. They would probably sound magnificent, because the music they contain is so beautifully written, in the main. But here is one of those rare instances where a piece comprising disparate elements really comes off as a total conception.

Erich Leinsdorf, conductor

For whatever reason, the piece definitely improves as it goes along. At the ending, Owen's poetry. They probably sound magnificent, because the music they contain is so beautifully written, in the main. But here is one of those rare instances where a piece comprising disparate elements really comes off as a total conception.

Unquestionably, the work is going to remain in circulation for a long time to come. Just the amount of adulation that it has already won (to which these words are humbly appended) would insure that. That it can get a better performance than the one under Leinsdorf's direction is, however, open to a lot of questioning.

The performance was simple, spacious and wholly just. Even the architecture of Philharmonic Hall played its part, since the boys' choir was able to sing from a position behind the scrim high above the stage, and float the tones of angels over the earthly proceedings below.

The boys sang wonderfully, and so did the larger chorus on stage. The three soloists, the same ones who participated in the American premiere of the music at Tanglewood, deserve mention should go especially, however, to the rich nobility of the singing of the young Finnish baritone, Tom Krause. This was his first New York appearance; the first of many, one earnestly hopes.

There will be two more performances of the "War Requiem" this week. That a single seat should go empty at either (Friday night and Saturday afternoon) is unthinkable.

New York Post
D. 372,679 S. 255,557
OCT 24 1963

WORDS and MUSIC

By Harriett Johnson

Bostonians Open With 'War Requiem'

Benjamin Britten's "War Requiem," given its N. Y. premiere by the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night, is to the British composer what Picasso's "Guernica," masterpiece of protest against war, is to the great Spanish painter. Though Britten is a pacifist and Picasso is not, their points of view and their creations serve the same purpose: to depict in their own terms the horror of war and to arouse mankind to a deeper understanding of its futile negations.

Mounting the "Guernica," on the walls of the Modern Museum of Art, however was a far less complex job than trying to get the multitude of forces required for the "Requem's performance on stage last night at Philharmonic Hall. For weeks now the orchestra's staff has been confronted with the problems of mounting tons of equipment and 300 musicians.

In order to make the performance possible, the Columbus Boychoir, representing an angelic host, was set in a large booth to the right, high above the stage. A dark blue scrim allowed the vocal sound to come through beautifully, but the portable organ, played by Daniel Pinkham, which accompanied this chorus alone, unfortunately couldn't be heard at all on occasion. In the "Offertorium," for instance, the singing phrases alternate with passages for the organ marked f (loud.) The ear, however, was greeted by silence.

Composed to Honor Coventry

In order to accommodate the large orchestra, mixed chorus and soloists, soprano Phyllis Curtin, tenor Nicholas DiVirgilio and baritone Tom Krause, an extension of the stage necessitated taking out two rows of seats.

The "War Requiem" was composed on commission by Britten to honor the rebuilding of St. Michael's Cathedral at Coventry, destroyed during World War II in an air raid by the Germans. Its world premiere was at Coventry, May 30, 1962.

Britten dedicated the work to the memory of four of his friends who were killed during the war and its spirit expresses man's contirtion for the "sin of such holocaust." Mingled with the traditional Latin Requiem text are excerpts from the searing war poems of Wilfred Owen, England's most gifted and realistic poet of World War I who saw war without illusion. Killed in action at the age of 24, he died one week before the armistice was signed.

Last July 27 at Tanglewood during the Berkshire Festival, the Bostonians and their collaborators of last night, gave the work its American premiere in an unforgettable presentation. During their current visit the ensemble will perform the work three times at Philharmonic Hall, the final rendition a non-subscription matinee Saturday at 3. The entire subscription series of six concerts this season by the orchestra here is sold out.

Wished for Tanglewood

Though the massive proportions with the kettledrums stationed far out in front facing the stage left, made the work at times overpowering in sound (not helped by any of the still dubious, over-bright acoustics of the auditorium) this was a minor matter last night compared to the privilege of hearing the masterpiece itself. Under Leinsdorf's dedicated leadership, his magnificent array of forces performed the work superbly. If the working conditions were not ideal, these can be tolerated for the more significant benefits.

CAPITOL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER
CLIPPINGS
NEW YORK
SERVICE

Herald Tribune
D. 359,813 S. 428,011
OCT 20 1963

But the major event of the week by all odds will be the first New York performances of Benjamin Britten's "War Requiem," which Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give at Philharmonic Hall on Wednesday and Friday evening and Saturday afternoon. Participating in the performance will be the same vocal forces that gave the work its American premiere under Leinsdorf at Tanglewood last summer: Phyllis Curtin, Nicholas DiVirgilio and Tom Krause, soloists, the Chorus Pro Musica and the Columbus Boychoir.

Britten composed this 90-minute piece for the dedication of the rebuilt Coventry Cathedral, and it was first performed there in the spring of 1962. The plan of the work is on a large scale, with chorus and orchestra divided into two separate performing groups in an antiphonal manner reminiscent of many Renaissance religious compositions.

The layout of the text also resembles certain bygone religious works. The scaffold of the composition is the text of the traditional Burial Service, the same words that occur in the Requiems of Mozart, Berlioz and Verdi. But interspersed with these Latin words is a series of poems by the English writer, Wilfred Owen, who met a premature death in World War I. Owen was a pacifist by nature and conviction, and his terse poetic meditations on the uselessness of war have a poignance and beauty that seem to act as intermediary between the austerity of the Latin words and our own time.

The "War Requiem" has become one of the most-discussed compositions of recent times. Its acclaim, at its English premiere, at subsequent performances, from its recording (for London) and at Tanglewood, makes it inescapable that the work is one of the major creations of the century. Not everyone has liked it all the way, of course, but that's beside the point. The point is to beg, borrow or steal your way into Philharmonic Hall this week.

A. R.

CUE
NEW YORK, N.Y.
W, 167,032
PAGE ONE CERTIFIED
AUG 24 1963

SOPRANO Phyllis Curtin, with several orchestral dates, sings Britten's "War Requiem" with the Boston Symphony. Below: conductor Leinsdorf and chorus director Patterson

►The Boston Symphony under Erich Leinsdorf's direction will visit the city twice this fall. Their initial concerts (Oct. 23 and 25), spelled by the usual excursion to Brooklyn (Oct. 24), will be given over entirely to the "War Requiem" of Benjamin Britten, or so it appears at this writing. The manifold problems attendant upon a performance of this work may yet preclude its being done here. But if it is, an additional, non-subscription performance may be anticipated. Dec. 4 and 6 are the orchestra's pre-Christmas dates in New York, Dec. 5 in Brooklyn.

►Remaining highlights of the forthcoming season at Philharmonic Hall include two evenings by the Koutev Bulgarian National Ensemble (Oct. 6 and 9), a recital by the young American violinist Erick Friedman (Oct. 16); a concert by Jose Iturbi, with orchestra (Oct. 30); and a recital by mezzo-soprano Shirley Verrett, inaugurating this year's "Great Names in Music" series on Nov. 4. The following evening New Yorkers will be treated to a survey of "The Worlds of Benny Goodman." On Nov. 25 the Concert Opera Association, under Thomas Scherman, launches its second season with Wagner's rarely performed "Rienzi."

HERALD
OCT 7, 1963

Things musical often needlessly complicated

By DELOS SMITH
United Press International

NEW YORK — When you think of Mildred Dilling traveling around the world with 9 harps, and of 300 musicians commuting between Boston and New York with tons of instruments, you get a sense of even musical things being more complicated than they really need to be.

In the case of the 9 harps, the complication was the musician's own choice. Fine harpist though she is, Miss Dilling can play on only one at a time. But she owns more than a hundred, and for her world concert tour, she just couldn't separate herself from 9 of them.

In the case of the Boston musicians the complication was the choice of the contemporary British composer, Benjamin Britten. He composed a "War Requiem" which is the current conversation piece of the music world. And he didn't spare the musical horses.

He composed for a full symphony orchestra, and "full" means about 110 players. He also called for a chamber orchestra, a full chorus of 140 male and female voices, a chorus of boys' voices, and three solo singers.

So much for the players and singers who do the work. Their work is to oppose the Latin language to the English and to contest human voices in varying numbers with tubas, drums strings and woodwinds in varying strata.

The Latin is that of the Roman Catholic Requiem Mass. The English is that of the British poet Wilfred Owen who was killed in World War I. He had poetized effectively against war. By manipulating his English against liturgic Latin and with instruments and voices, Britten constructed a powerful musical preachment on the stupidity of war.

Audiences have found it so, since its first performance at the dedication of the restored Coventry Cathedral. Some critics have raved and gotten way out on the limb of superlatives but the sober judgments have been that the composer made trouble not only for himself but for musicians and musical people by invariably choosing the complicated.

Who is to judge the means of the artistic creator? Without indulging in such foolish wrestling with imponderables, conservative and traditional musical judgments have been that Britten could have been equally effective with less performance weight and fewer performing complexities.

What ever truth there may be in that, Britten's "War Requiem" has kept the Boston Symphony, its music director, Erich Leinsdorf and the behind the scene workers responsible for the non-musical labors, hopping. The Bostonians have the exclusive American performing rights for the time.

They gave the first American performance in Tanglewood during the summer. A few weeks ago they put it on again in their regular season in Boston.

New York Post
D. 372,679 S. 255,557
OCT 24 1963

WORDS and MUSIC

By Harriett Johnson

Bostonians Open With 'War Requiem'

Benjamin Britten's "War Requiem," given its N. Y. premiere by the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night, is to the British composer what Picasso's "Guernica," masterpiece of protest against war, is to the great Spanish painter. Though Britten is a pacifist and Picasso is not, their points of view and their creations serve the same purpose: to depict in their own terms the horror of war and to arouse mankind to a deeper understanding of its futile negations.

Mounting the "Guernica," on the walls of the Modern Museum of Art, however was a far less complex job than trying to get the multitude of forces required for the "Requem's performance on stage last night at Philharmonic Hall. For weeks now the orchestra's staff has been confronted with the problems of mounting tons of equipment and 300 musicians.

In order to make the performance possible, the Columbus Boychoir, representing an angelic host, was set in a large booth to the right, high above the stage. A dark blue scrim allowed the vocal sound to come through beautifully, but the portable organ, played by Daniel Pinkham, which accompanied this chorus alone, unfortunately couldn't be heard at all on occasion. In the "Offertorium," for instance, the singing phrases alternate with passages for the organ marked f (loud.) The ear, however, was greeted by silence.

Composed to Honor Coventry

In order to accommodate the large orchestra, mixed chorus and soloists, soprano Phyllis Curtin, tenor Nicholas DiVirgilio and baritone Tom Krause, an extension of the stage necessitated taking out two rows of seats.

The "War Requiem" was composed on commission by Britten to honor the rebuilding of St. Michael's Cathedral at Coventry, destroyed during World War II in an air raid by the Germans. Its world premiere was at Coventry, May 30, 1962.

Britten dedicated the work to the memory of four of his friends who were killed during the war and its spirit expresses man's contirtion for the "sin of such holocaust." Mingled with the traditional Latin Requiem text are excerpts from the searing war poems of Wilfred Owen, England's most gifted and realistic poet of World War I who saw war without illusion. Killed in action at the age of 24, he died one week before the armistice was signed.

Last July 27 at Tanglewood during the Berkshire Festival, the Bostonians and their collaborators of last night, gave the work its American premiere in an unforgettable presentation. During their current visit the ensemble will perform the work three times at Philharmonic Hall, the final rendition a non-subscription matinee Saturday at 3. The entire subscription series of six concerts this season by the orchestra here is sold out.

Wished for Tanglewood

Though the massive proportions with the kettledrums stationed far out in front facing the stage left, made the work at times overpowering in sound (not helped by any of the still dubious, over-bright acoustics of the auditorium) this was a minor matter last night compared to the privilege of hearing the masterpiece itself. Under Leinsdorf's dedicated leadership, his magnificent array of forces performed the work superbly. If the working conditions were not ideal, these can be tolerated for the more significant benefits.

Herald Tribune
D. 359,813 S. 428,011
OCT 20 1963

But the major event of the week by all odds will be the first New York performances of Benjamin Britten's "War Requiem," which Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give at Philharmonic Hall on Wednesday and Friday evening and Saturday afternoon. Participating in the performance will be the same vocal forces that gave the work its American premiere under Leinsdorf at Tanglewood last summer: Phyllis Curtin, Nicholas DiVirgilio and Tom Krause, soloists; the Chorus Pro Musica and the Columbus Boychoir.

Britten composed this 90-minute piece for the dedication of the rebuilt Coventry Cathedral, and it was first performed there in the spring of 1962. The plan of the work is on a large scale, with chorus and orchestra divided into two separate performing groups in an antiphonal manner reminiscent of many Renaissance religious compositions.

The layout of the text also resembles certain bygone religious works. The scaffold of the composition is the text of the traditional Burial Service, the same words that occur in the Requiems of Mozart, Berlioz and Verdi. But interspersed with these Latin words is a series of poems by the English writer, Wilfred Owen, who met a premature death in World War I. Owen was a pacifist by nature and conviction, and his terse poetic meditations on the uselessness of war have a poignance and beauty that seem to act as intermediary between the austerity of the Latin words and our own time.

The "War Requiem" has become one of the most-discussed compositions of recent times. Its acclaim, at its English premiere, at subsequent performances, from its recording (for London) and at Tanglewood, makes it inescapable that the work is one of the major creations of the century. Not everyone has liked it all the way, of course, but that's beside the point. The point is to beg, borrow or steal your way into Philharmonic Hall this week.

A. R.

CUE
NEW YORK, N.Y.
M. 167,032
PAGE ONE CERTIFIED
AUG 24 1963

SOPRANO Phyllis Curtin, with several orchestral dates, sings Britten's "War Requiem" with the Boston Symphony. Below: conductor Leinsdorf and chorus director Patterson

►The Boston Symphony under Erich Leinsdorf's direction will visit the city twice this fall. Their initial concerts (Oct. 23 and 25), spelled by the usual excursion to Brooklyn (Oct. 24), will be given over entirely to the "War Requiem" of Benjamin Britten, or so it appears at this writing. The manifold problems attendant upon a performance of this work may yet preclude its being done here. But if it is, an additional, non-subscription performance may be anticipated. Dec. 5 and 6 are the orchestra's pre-Christmas dates in New York, Dec. 5 in Brooklyn.

►Remaining highlights of the forthcoming season at Philharmonic Hall include two evenings by the Koutev Bulgarian National Ensemble (Oct. 6 and 9), a recital by the young American violinist Erick Friedman (Oct. 16); a concert by José Iturbi with orchestra (Oct. 30); and a recital by mezzo-soprano Shirley Verrett, inaugurating this year's "Great Names in Music" series on Nov. 4. The following evening New Yorkers will be treated to a survey of "The Worlds of Benny Goodman." On Nov. 25 the Concert Opera Association, under Thomas Scherman, launches its second season with Wagner's rarely performed "Rienzi."

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

TIMES HERALD
[illegible], November 7, 1963

Things musical often needlessly complicated

By DELOS SMITH
United Press International

NEW YORK — When you think of Mildred Dilling traveling around the world with 9 harps, and of 300 musicians commuting between Boston and New York with tons of instruments, you get a sense of even musical things being more complicated than they really need to be.

In the case of the 9 harps, the complication was the musician's own choice. Fine harpist though she is, Miss Dilling can play on only one at a time. But she owns more than a hundred, and for her world concert tour, she just couldn't separate herself from 9 of them.

In the case of the Boston musicians the complication was the choice of the contemporary British composer, Benjamin Britten. He composed a "War Requiem" which is the current conversation piece of the music world. And he didn't spare the musical horses.

He composed for a full symphony orchestra, and "full" means about 110 players. He also called for a chamber orchestra, a full chorus of 140 male and female voices, a chorus of boys' voices, and three solo singers.

So much for the players and singers who do the work. Their work is to oppose the Latin language to the English and to contest human voices in varying numbers with tubas, drums strings and woodwinds in varying strata.

The Latin is that of the Roman Catholic Requiem Mass. The English is that of the British poet Wilfred Owen who was killed in World War I. He had poetized effectively against war. By manipulating his English against liturgic Latin and with instruments and voices, Britten constructed a powerful musical preachment on the stupidity of war.

Audiences have found it so, since its first performance at the dedication of the restored Coventry Cathedral. Some critics have raved and gotten way out on the limb of superlatives but the sober judgments have been that the composer made trouble not only for himself but for musicians and musical people by invariably choosing the complicated.

Who is to judge the means of the artistic creator? Without indulging in such foolish wrestling with imponderables, conservative and traditional musical judgments have been that Britten could have been equally effective with less performance weight and fewer performing complexities.

What ever truth there may be in that, Britten's "War Requiem" has kept the Boston Symphony, its music director, Erich Leinsdorf and the behind the scene workers responsible for the non-musical labors, hopping. The Bostonians have the exclusive American performing rights for the time.

They gave the first American performance in Tanglewood during the summer. A few weeks ago they put it on again in their regular season in Boston.

234

the village VOICE, October 31, 1963

GREAT BRITTEN

The value of Benjamin Britten's "War Requiem" as a heroic indictment of war has not been seriously challenged. Its musical value, on the other hand, has been questioned in some quarters (not in this one). To this listener, last week's New York premiere performances by the Boston Symphony at Philharmonic Hall emphatically solidified last July's Tanglewood conviction that this is music of vast imagination and persuasiveness. It also seems undeniable now that, when the great music of this century is listed, the "War Requiem" will have to take a high place.

The previous impressions of the individual sections (VV, August 8) remain intact. There is still the burning and ironic defiance by Wilfred Owen's World War I poems as they refuse the external consolation of the Mass. But the music, while still graphically descriptive and basically conservative, shows more and more a largeness of design and consistency of strength that utterly dominate and drive forward all the awesome and moving things that are said in words.

As at Tanglewood, Erich Leinsdorf conducted last Saturday afternoon a triumphant performance. If anything, Phyllis Curtin and tenor Nicholas DiVirgilio sang with greater freedom and beauty than before, and the Finnish baritone Tom Krause made something simple and overwhelming of the final pages, where futile anger gives way to reconciliation. Also as before, Boston's Chorus Pro Musica and the Columbus Boy Choir sang without any apparent flaw.

SATURDAY REVIEW
NEW YORK, N.Y.
W. 298,174

NOV 9 1963

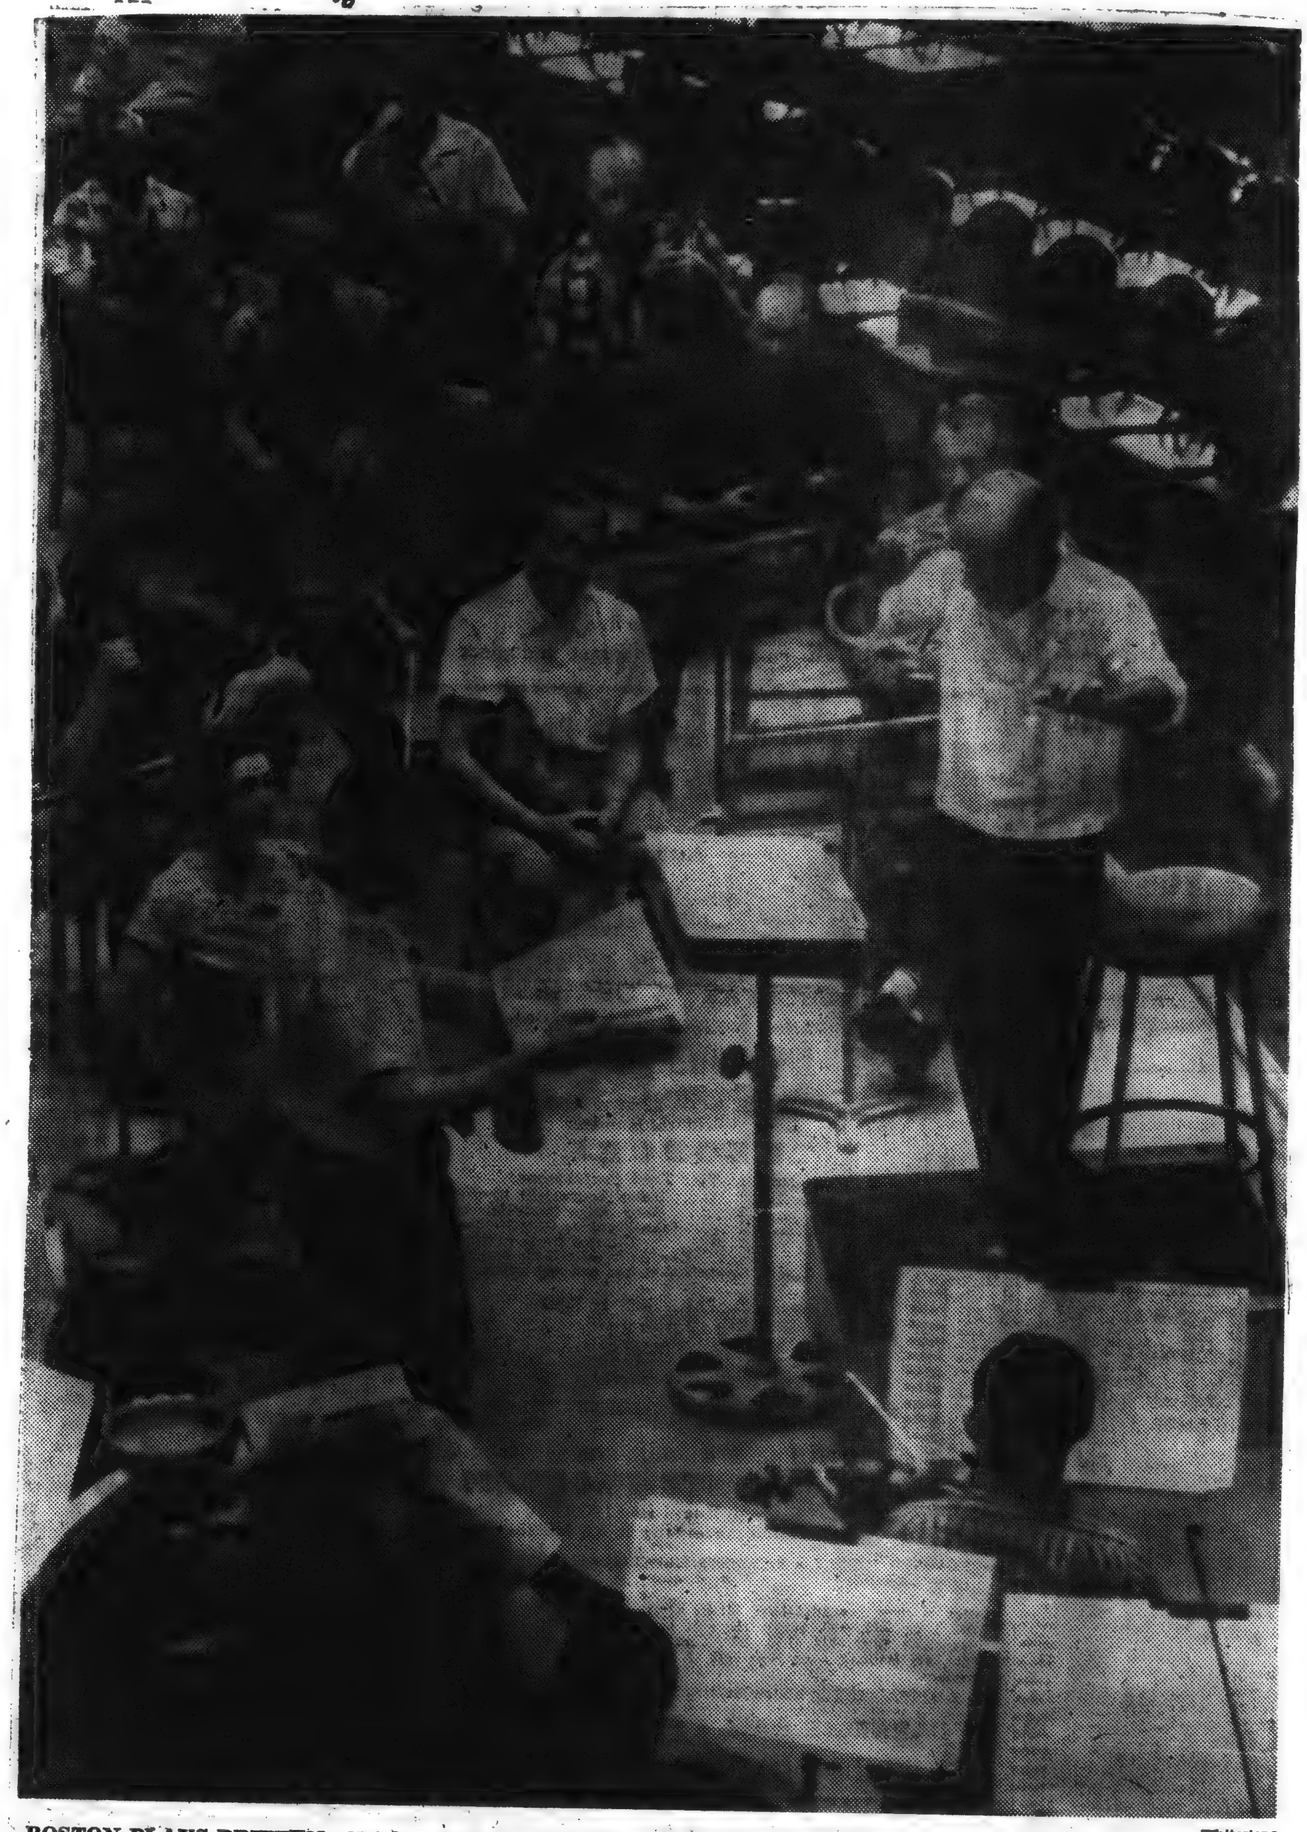
In other circumstances, the first three performances in New York of Benjamin Britten's War Requiem would have headed rather than concluded this resumé, but the auspices in Philharmonic Hall were exactly those of its American première at Tanglewood last summer: the Boston Symphony, the Pro Musica Chorus, and the Columbus Boychoir led by Erich Leinsdorf, with soprano Phyllis Curtin, tenor Nicholas di Virgilio, and baritone Tom Krause. Opinions may vary as to this or that detail, but the facts are that three audiences listened with unvarying absorption in the tidal flow of Britten's musical imagery, with a thunderous ovation at the last extra performance on Saturday afternoon.

As an example of compositional science, Britten's War Requiem is overwhelming in its majesty. Now that it has been exposed by Leinsdorf, one may look forward to hearing it expounded by others, until all its values are known. Under his direction, every element of the science was weighed, calibrated, and checked out, but this did not assure total justice to Britten's creation.

—IRVING KOLODIN.

The New York Times
D. 681,612 S. 1,304,447

OCT 20 1963



Whitestone

BOSTON PLAYS BRITTEN—Erich Leinsdorf, conductor of the Boston Symphony, on podium, leads a rehearsal of Benjamin Britten's "War Requiem," which will have its first New York performances this week at Philharmonic Hall. One of the three singing soloists, Nicholas de Virgilio, stands between Phyllis Curtin and Tom Krause, seated.

734

the village VOICE, October 31, 196[illegible]

GREAT BRITTEN

The value of Benjamin Britten's "War Requiem" as a heroic indictment of war has not been seriously challenged. Its musical value, on the other hand, has been questioned in some quarters (not in this one). To this listener, last week's New York premiere performances by the Boston Symphony at Philharmonic Hall emphatically solidified last July's Tanglewood conviction that this is music of vast imagination and persuasiveness. It also seems undeniable now that, when the great music of this century is listed, the "War Requiem" will have to take a high place.

The previous impressions of the individual sections (VV, August 8) remain intact. There is still the burning and ironic defiance by Wilfred Owen's World War I poems as they refuse the external consolation of the Mass. But the music, while still graphically descriptive and basically conservative, shows more and more a largeness of design and consistency of strength that utterly dominate and drive forward all the awesome and moving things that are said in words.

As at Tanglewood, Erich Leinsdorf conducted last Saturday afternoon a triumphant performance. If anything, Phyllis Curtin and tenor Nicholas DiVirgilio sang with greater freedom and beauty than before, and the Finnish baritone Tom Krause made something simple and overwhelming of the final pages, where futile anger gives way to reconciliation. Also as before, Boston's Chorus Pro Musica and the Columbus Boy Choir sang without any apparent flaw.

The New York Times
D. 681,612 S. 1,304,447

OCT 20 1963

BOSTON PLAYS BRITTEN—Erich Leinsdorf, conductor of the Boston Symphony, on podium, leads a rehearsal of Benjamin Britten's "War Requiem," which will have its first New York performances this week at Philharmonic Hall. One of the three singing soloists, Nicholas de Virgilio, stands between Phyllis Curtin and Tom Krause, seated. Whitestone

SATURDAY REVIEW
NEW YORK, N.Y.
P. 298,174

NOV 9 1963

In other circumstances, the first three performances in New York of Benjamin Britten's War Requiem would have headed rather than concluded this resumé, but the auspices in Philharmonic Hall were exactly those of its American premiere at Tanglewood last summer: the Boston Symphony, the Pro Musica Chorus, and the Columbus Boychoir led by Erich Leinsdorf, with soprano Phyllis Curtin, tenor Nicholas di Virgilio, and baritone Tom Krause. Opinions may vary as to this or that detail, but the facts are that three audiences listened with unvarying absorption to the tidal flow of Britten's musical imagery, with a thunderous ovation at the last extra performance on Saturday afternoon.

As an example of compositional science, Britten's War Requiem is overwhelming in its majesty. Now that it has been exposed by Leinsdorf, one may look forward to hearing it expounded by others, until all its values are known. Under his direction, every element of the science was weighed, calibrated, and checked out, but this did not assure total justice to Britten's creation.

—Irving Kolodin.

BROOKLYN

BROOKLYN, N.Y.
BROOKLYN HEIGHTS
PRESS
W. 4,225

OCT 10 1963

An Alarming Note

For three quarters of a century, Brooklynites have derived a mixture of personal enjoyment, cultural benefit and civic pride from the annual visits of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. However, due to failing attendance at last season's concerts there is the unpleasant possibility that the series will be curtailed or altogether eliminated.

To obtain a greater bedrock of supporters for the series, the Brooklyn Academy of Music, which hosts the concerts, has begun a vigorous drive for more subscribers. When one considers that the Boston Symphony Orchestra draws the bulk of its financial support from the citizens of Boston, and that the bargain ticket prices for the Brooklyn concerts do not nearly cover operating costs, the Academy's arguments become even more persuasive.

The Academy's appeal sounds an alarming and strident note, after 75 years of beautiful music. Let us hope that it does not herald a rueful and empty final passage. This is a note that definitely should be heeded.

New York World-Telegram
and
The Sun
D. 463,241 SAT. 175,139

SEP 17 1963

Business Asked to Rescue Symphony

Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are turning to business leaders for financial support in their fight to keep the orchestra from curtailing or eliminating its five-concert series at the Brooklyn Academy of Music.

The Women's Committee of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, decided yesterday to ask members of the Brooklyn Chamber of Commerce to buy subscriptions to the concert series.

The 10-member committee sent out 800 invitations for yesterday's meeting, held on the academy's stage. Fewer than 50 women were at the meeting.

William McKelvy Martin, a academy director, said 740 more seats per concert must be sold to meet the goal of 2000. Since more than 300 seats usually are sold at the door, he said, only 400 subscription sales are needed to make the drive a success.

Continued on Page B2

William McKelvy Martin, director of the Brooklyn Academy of Music, speaks to a small band of Boston Symphony Orchestra enthusiasts.

"Cultural activity is very hard to sell in Brooklyn," Martin told the meeting.

Comedian Sam Levenson, who brought his younr daughter Emily, along, echoed Martin's statement.

"People don't value culture as much as when their parents arrived in this country," Levenson said. Looking at the empty seats on the stage he added, "If Elvis Presley were here we'd have a full house."

Attendance at the concert series slumped sharply last year, after several years of increases. Thomas D. Perry, manager of the Boston Symphony, said:

"If the people in Brooklyn don't seem to want us any more than they did last season, we will have to think in terms of fewer concerts."

The first concert this season will be given on Oct. 24.

OVER

BROOKLYN, N.Y.
BROOKLYN HEIGHTS
PRESS
W. 4,226

OCT 24 1963

Subscription Drive at 1,832

On the evening of the opening of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's 76th season of local concerts, Brooklyn Academy of Music Director William McKelvy Martin told this newspaper that 1,832 prepaid series subscriptions had been obtained.

Noting that the Academy had fallen 168 subscriptions short of the original goal, Mr. Martin explained that persons may still subscribe at a reduced rate to the next four concerts. They will be held on Dec. 5, Jan. 23, Feb. 27 and April 2.

The initial concert, which begins tonight at 8:30 features Mozart's Symphony in C Major, K. 200 and Mahler's Symphony No. 5. Erich Leinsdorf will direct the orchestra.

Subscriptions may be ordered by mail from the Academy at 30 Lafayette Ave.

New York World-Telegram
and
The Sun
D. 463,241 SAT. 175,139

SEP 18 1963

Concerted Effort

Businessmen will be asked to rescue the Boston Symphony. Not the Brooklyn Symphony, mind you, but visiting fiddlers from Massachusetts.

It's an unhappy state of affairs that tickets have not sold as well as many had hoped.

And if the fabulous Boston Symphony is to return to the Academy of Music, as it should, then why not turn to businessmen for help? The response should be strong. It's their community, too.

DAILY NEWS
NEW YORK'S PICTURE NEWSPAPER
D. 2,055,266 S. 3,157,103

SEP 15 1963

Boston Series At Academy May Be Ended

Because subscriptions to the concert series given each year by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Brooklyn Academy of Music have fallen to 1,200, Symphony officials have indicated they may cancel the series.

The reasons given for the decline in attendance at the concerts, which have been one of the Academy's major offerings for 75 years, include changing the concert night from Friday to Thursday, the draw of the new Philharmonic Hall in Manhattan and the fact that the orchestra has changed conductors.

Committee Informed

News of the possible curtailment of the series was revealed in a letter sent to the women's committee for the concerts which called the situation a "crisis."

It urged the women, who participate in the sale of subscriptions, to redouble their efforts.

A spokesman for the Symphony said the orchestra probably would continue its visit Brooklyn, but on a lesser scale.

"If the people in Brooklyn don't seem to want us anymore than they did last season, we will have to think in terms of fewer concerts," he declared. The Academy has a capacity of 2,207.

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER
CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

N. Y. JOURNAL-AMERICAN
Wednesday, October 16, 1963

Bostonians Set to Open Season Here

The Boston Symphony Orchestra under the baton of Erich Leinsdorf, its permanent music director, will open its 76th season at the Brooklyn Academy of Music Thursday Oct. 24 at 8:30 p.m.

The concert is the first in a series of five Thursday evening performances, which the Orchestra will present at the Academy during the 1963-64 season.

Works by Mozart and Mahler will be highlighted. Mozart's Symphony in C major, K. 200 will open the program, while Mahler's Symphony No. 5 in C-sharp minor will conclude the program.

1 36

BROOKLYN, N.Y.
BROOKLYN HEIGHTS
PRESS
W. 4,226

PAGE ONE CERTIFIED

OCT 10 1963

Academy Launches Drive to Save Boston Symphony Brooklyn Concerts

William McKelvy Martin

The Brooklyn Academy of Music has launched a subscription drive to combat the possible danger of losing some or all of its Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts in future seasons.

Noting that attendance at the box office "fell off badly" last season, William McKelvy Martin, Academy director, said that emphasis has been placed on obtaining pre-paid subscriptions for this season's five concerts, the first of which will be given Oct. 24. He laid the drop in attendance to the fact that last season's concerts were switched from Friday to Thursday evenings because of the Boston Symphony's Friday night commitments at Lincoln Center's Philharmonic Hall. The 1963-1964 performances here also will be given on Thursdays.

Asked if the Academy, which has hosted the Boston Symphony's visits for 75 years, was in danger of losing or curtailing this program, Mr. Martin said:

"An attraction like the Boston Symphony Orchestra certainly is not going to appear any place where there is going to be a number of empty seats of any consequence. Many communities would be glad to have the services of this orchestra. These concerts are a rare opportunity."

While subscriptions have held steady during recent years -- and even have increased by some 300 as a result of the current campaign -- the Academy evidently was jolted last season by the drop in ticket purchases at the box office. There are some 1400 concert subscribers now. The goal is 2,000. The Academy's music hall seats 2,207 persons.

"There is evidence of an awakening on the part of the public," Mr. Martin said of the recent rise in subscriptions. "But there is not a large enough volume yet."

The program for the Oct. 24 concert includes Mahler's Symphony No. 5 and Mozart's Symphony in C, K. 200. The orchestra is under the direction of Erich Leinsdorf, now in his second season.

Subscriptions for all five concerts are priced at the following rates: orchestra, $20 and $24; mezzanine, $18, $20, and $24; balcony, $14 and $16. They may be had by writing the Academy of Music, 30 Lafayette Ave. Mrs. C. Lester Hargert, 35 Garden Pl., is chairman of the subscription campaign, which has been undertaken by a special women's committee.

New York World-Telegram and The Sun
D. 463,241 SAT. 175,139

OCT 25 1963

'Encouraging Start' for Boston

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's first Brooklyn concert of the season was called "an encouraging start" by an Academy of Music spokesman today.

There had been some fear that the Boston Symphony might curtail its yearly visits to Brooklyn when last year's sale of subscription tickets for the five-concert series dropped to 1200 last year.

An intensive campaign by the Women's Committee for the Boston Symphony Concerts in Brooklyn sold 941 season subscriptions. The Academy sold 897 more, bringing the total to 1838 subscriptions, just short of the goal of 2000.

There were only 14 empty seats at last night's concert, a spokesman for the Academy said. "And those were scattered singles," he added.

Erich Leinsdorf conducted Mozart's Symphony 29 and Gustav Mahler's Fifth Symphony in C Sharp. "The reception was terrific," the Academy spokesman said. "The audience was very enthusiastic."

The Boston Symphony's series in Brooklyn has been one of the Academy's main attractions for 75 years. Formerly, the Boston played in Brooklyn on Friday nights, but last year's switch to Thursdays seemed to have been the leading cause in the sharp drop in subscriptions. The concerts remain on Thursdays this year, but the day seemed to have little effect on last night's attendance.

Attendance was so bad last year that there was an $8000 deficit for each of the symphony's concerts. It costs from $12,000 to $14,000 to produce a Boston Symphony concert at the Academy.

BROOKLYN, N.Y.
BROOKLYN HEIGHTS
PRESS
W. 4,226

PAGE ONE CERTIFIED

OCT 17 1963

Drive to Save 'Boston' Concerts Gains Ground

Erich Leinsdorf

With the Boston Symphony Orchestra due to open its 76th season of concerts in Brooklyn a week from today, a women's committee striving to insure such visits in future seasons reported that it was 283 subscriptions short of its goal.

Concern had been voiced recently by the Brooklyn Academy of Music, host to the concerts, that the traditional visits might have to be curtailed or completely eliminated if last year's trend of lagging attendance was not reversed. Box office sales slumped during the 1962-1963 season due to a switch in performance dates from Thursday to Friday evenings. The Boston Symphony last season was committed to Friday night concerts at Lincoln Center's Philharmonic Hall, the first year of the hall's existence.

However, prepaid subscriptions to all five of the concerts in the series held firm last year and started off just as strongly this season. This provided the groundwork for the current drive to increase subscriptions. The ultimate goal is 2,000, which would guarantee that at least all but 207 of the Academy's seats would be filled or paid for on each of the five Thursday evenings "The Boston" came to brooklyn.

According to William McKelvy Martin, Academy director, a wave of 400 subscriptions received in the last 15 days provided an "encouraging" sign. He emphasized, however, that the drive would continue until Oct. 24, the date of the first concert.

On behalf of the women's committee, which is headed by Mrs. Ann Barkley Hargert, 35 Garden Pl., Mr. Martin reported that the campaign had enrolled 826 new subscribers. Added to the 891 persons who renewed their subscriptions of last season, this makes a total of 1,717.

Concert No. 1 opening the 76th season of visits includes Mozart's Symphony in C Major, K. 200. Mahler's Symphony No. 5 rounds out the program. The orchestra is directed by Erich Leinsdorf, who replaced the now-retired Charles Munch after the 1961-1962 season.

Series subscriptions may be ordered by mail from the Academy, 30 Lafayette Ave. They are priced as follows: Orchestra seats, $20 and $24; mezzanine, $18, $20 and $24; balconv. $14 and $16.

New York World-Telegram and The Sun
D. 463,241 SAT. 175,139

OCT 16 1963

It's Music to Their Ears

Subscription ticket sales for the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts are running far ahead of last year's figures, the women who do much of the selling learned yesterday.

In a report to the Women's Committee of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mrs. Anne Barclay Hargert said total subscription sales for the five concerts at the Brooklyn Academy of Music have reached 1717. This is almost 600 more subscriptions than last year's total of 1119.

Of this total, 891 are renewed subscriptions and 826 are new. Mrs. Hargert, chairman of the sales campaign, said 283 subscriptions remain to be sold to reach the goal of 2000.

This favorable subscription sale seems to remove the threat that the Boston Symphony might have to curtail its performances in Brooklyn. Officials of both the symphony and Academy of Music had warned that this might happen if sales were not better than last year.

William McKelvy Martin, director of the Brooklyn Academy, said he was "very encouraged" by the subscription sales and commended the Women's Committee for putting "a new surge of life and power" in the campaign.

He said that approximately 200 to 300 single tickets are usually sold for each concert. If the goal of 2000 subscriptions is reached, this may mean that the Boston Symphony would be playing to standing-room-only audiences in the Academy's Opera House, which seats 2207.

The Boston Symphony's first concert will be on Oct. 24. Subscription prices for the five concerts range from $12 to $24.

NEW YORK
AND BROOKLYN DAILY
D. 40,130 S. 40,130

OCT 14 1963

Boston Symphony Orchestra Opens

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Erich Leinsdorf, its permanent music director conducting, will open its 76th season at the Brooklyn Academy of Music on Thursday evening, Oct. 24th, at 8:30 p.m. The concert is the first in a series of five Thursday evening performances, which the renowned Bostonians will present at the Academy during the 1963-64 season.

In Europe and the United States, Leinsdorf has often proven his versatility in many types of music. At the October 24th concert, he will conduct the music of two composers for whom he has shown an especial affinity—Mozart and Mahler. Mozart's symphony in C major, K. 200 will open the program. The Mahler Symphony is his No. 5 in C-sharp minor. This program of Mozart and Mahler will be the only performance of classical and romantic works on the Orchestra's first visit to the metropolitan area.

There will be only five new instrumentalists in the Boston Symphony Orchestra when it takes the stage in the Academy's Opera House. Two violinists, a 'cellist, a horn player and a member of the percussion section will make their Brooklyn debuts. The small turnover in orchestra personnel is one of the main reasons for the consistent excellence of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Many competent judges and critics believe Leinsdorf, in his first season as music director, has brought this orchestra, founded in 1881 by Henry Lee Higginson, to higher achievements of performance perfection.

Tickets for the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert are priced at $3.50, $4.00, $4.50, $5.00 and $6.00. Mail orders must accompanied by check or money order, along with a stamped, self-addressed envelope.

MUSICAL LEADER
CHICAGO, ILL.
MONTHLY-CIRC. N. AVAIL.

NOV 1963

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The Boston Symphony, under Music Director Erich Leinsdorf, presented two symphonic rarities on its first visit of the season to the Brooklyn Academy of Music (Oct. 24). The first was a Mozart gem, the Symphony No. 28 in C, K. 200. The unfamiliar score proved so rich in delicious surprises as it zestfully bubbled along, that the critical listener, wishing for greater delicacy, for lighter, more incisive string attacks, found himself seduced into unquestioning enjoyment of the music itself. Gustav Mahler's Fifth Symphony followed, a rich outpouring of the incredible Mahlerian gamut of orchestral colors and emotions from Funeral March to Waltz to Triumph. Mr. Leinsdorf led this from memory,—a particularly brilliant feat, considering that virtually all of the hundreds of minute expression marks, tempo changes and performance instructions in the score were scrupulously obeyed. Indeed, it was a model of the type of faithful musical re-creation which is much more difficult and thus much scarcer than the freer "inspirational" approach. Most significantly, to be sure, the broad sweep and spirit of the symphony were conveyed with equal devotion here, for which much credit is due the virtuoso instrumentalists from Boston.—H.F. . . . This Brooklyn concert, however, was but a breather in the midst of a four-day stand at Philharmonic Hall, during which the Boston Symphony introduced to New York a most important contemporary work, Benjamin Britten's War Requiem. Having already given it its United States premiere in Tanglewood this summer and offered it at both subscription concerts opening the New York season, the Orchestra under Mr. Leinsdorf, with the assistance of the Chorus Pro Musica, the Columbus Boychoir and soloists Phyllis Curtin, Nicholas DiVirgilio and Tom Krause, collaborated at a profound and inspiring performance on Oct. 26, a special non-subscription matinee. The juxtaposition of the Latin text of the Requiem Mass and the World War I poetry of Wilfred Owen was striking in its dramatic impact. Although the textual contrast was heightened by the use of the boys' choir, chamber orchestra and chorus in addition to the full orchestra and chorus, a musical and emotional unity was skillfully woven and sustained throughout the work.—C.J.

New York World-Telegram
and
The Sun
D. 463,241 SAT. 175,139

OCT 21 1963

At Academy of Music

Boston's Spirited 76th

By NINA McCAIN

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its 76th season at the Brooklyn Academy of Music Thursday night with Erich Leinsdorf conducting a program of Mozart and Mahler.

Leinsdorf, who is in his second season with the Boston Symphony, has shown a special feeling for the works of these two composers. Mozart's symphony in C Major and Mahler's Symphony No. 5 in C-sharp Minor will be the only classical and romantic works the symphony will play on its first visit to the metropolitan area this year.

Leinsdorf is the latest in a long series of distinguished conductors who have led the Boston Symphony in its performances at the academy. Among his predecessors have been Artur Nikisch, Karl Muck, Serge Kussevitxsky, Pierre Monteux and Charles Munch.

The Boston Symphony's annual appearances have played an important part in the history of the Academy. They began only a few years after the founding of the symphony when the academy was still in its old home on Montague St. When the academy's building burned down, the symphony continued to come to Brooklyn and played in churches until the new academy went up at 30 Lafayette Ave.

Attendance fell off for the symphony's performances last year, and it looked as though the symphony might have to reduce the number of concerts given at the academy. Bt this year's subscription sales have been well ahead of last year's

So far 1717 subscriptions have been sold out of a goal of 2000. With the usual sale of 200 to 300 single tickets for each performance, it seems likely that the symphony will be playing to a full house this year.

Thursday night's concert, which begins at 8:30 p.m., is the first in a series of five performances. The others are on Dec. 5, Jan. 23, Feb. 27 and April 2. Tickets are priced from $3.50 to $6 and can be obtained by writing to the academy.

* * *

BROOKLYN, N.Y.
TABLET
W. 139,611 (C)
OCT 31 1963

Getting to Know Music

By KEN MESSER

BROOKLYN: HOME OF THE LIVING

LAST Thursday evening the Boston Symphony under the direction of Erich Leinsdorf returned to the Brooklyn Academy of Music for another season of concerts with a program comprised of Mozart's "Symphony No. 28 in C, K. 200" and Mahler's "Symphony No. 5." All we can say is, "Welcome back, Mr. Leinsdorf!"

As we indicated in an earlier column, the B.S.O.'s return was doubtful. Last year attendance figures dropped to the point of creating considerable front office concern. But if Mr. Leinsdorf maintains varied and interesting programs and attendance still remains low, forcing the orchestra to discontinue the series, then Brooklyn patrons have only themselves to blame. However, we shall wait and see.

NEW YORK AND BROOKLYN DAILY
D. 40,190 S. 40,190
OCT 14 1963

Boston Symphony Orchestra Opens

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Erich Leinsdorf, its permanent music director conducting, will open its 76th season at the Brooklyn Academy of Music on Thursday evening, Oct. 24th, at 8:30 p.m. The concert is the first in a series of five Thursday evening performances, which the renowned Bostonians will present at the Academy during the 1963-64 season.

In Europe and the United States, Leinsdorf has often proven his versatility in many types of music. At the October 24th concert, he will conduct the music of two composers for whom he has shown an especial affinity—Mozart and Mahler. Mozart's symphony in C major, K. 200 will open the program. The Mahler Symphony is his No. 5 in C-sharp minor. This program of Mozart and Mahler will be the only performance of classical and romantic works on the Orchestra's first visit to the metropolitan area.

There will be only five new instrumentalists in the Boston Symphony Orchestra when it takes the stage in the Academy's Opera House. Two violinists, a 'cellist, a horn player and a member of the percussion section will make their Brooklyn debuts. The small turnover in orchestra personnel is one of the main reasons for the consistent excellence of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Many competent judges and critics believe Leinsdorf, in his first season as music director, has brought this orchestra, founded in 1881 by Henry Lee Higginson, to higher achievements of performance perfection.

Tickets for the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert are priced at $3.50, $4.00, $4.50, $5.00 and $6.00. Mail orders must accompanied by check or money order, along with a stamped, self-addressed envelope.

MUSICAL LEADER
CHICAGO, ILL.
MONTHLY-CIRC. N. AVAIL.
NOV 1963

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The Boston Symphony, under Music Director Erich Leinsdorf, presented two symphonic rarities on its first visit of the season to the Brooklyn Academy of Music (Oct. 24). The first was a Mozart gem, the Symphony No. 28 in C, K. 200. The unfamiliar score proved so rich in delicious surprises as it zestfully bubbled along, that the critical listener, wishing for greater delicacy, for lighter, more incisive string attacks, found himself seduced into unquestioning enjoyment of the music itself. Gustav Mahler's Fifth Symphony followed, a rich outpouring of the incredible Mahlerian gamut of orchestral colors and emotions from Funeral March to Waltz to Triumph. Mr. Leinsdorf led this from memory,—a particularly brilliant feat, considering that virtually all of the hundreds of minute expression marks, tempo changes and performance instructions in the score were scrupulously obeyed. Indeed, it was a model of the type of faithful musical re-creation which is much more difficult and thus much scarcer than the freer "inspirational" approach. Most significantly, to be sure, the broad sweep and spirit of the symphony were conveyed with equal devotion here, for which much credit is due the virtuoso instrumentalists from Boston.—H.F. . . . This Brooklyn concert, however, was but a breather in the midst of a four-day stand at Philharmonic Hall, during which the Boston Symphony introduced to New York a most important contemporary work, Benjamin Britten's War Requiem. Having already given it its United States premiere in Tanglewood this summer and offered it at both subscription concerts opening the New York season, the Orchestra under Mr. Leinsdorf, with the assistance of the Chorus Pro Musica, the Columbus Boychoir and soloists Phyllis Curtin, Nicholas DiVirgilio and Tom Krause, collaborated at a profound and inspiring performance on Oct. 26, a special non-subscription matinee. The juxtaposition of the Latin text of the Requiem Mass and the World War I poetry of Wilfred Owen was striking in its dramatic impact. Although the textual contrast was heightened by the use of the boys' choir, chamber orchestra and chorus in addition to the full orchestra and chorus, a musical and emotional unity was skillfully woven and sustained throughout the work.—C.J.

New York World-Telegram and The Sun
D. 463,241 SAT. 175,139
OCT 21 1963

At Academy of Music

Boston's Spirited 76th

By NINA McCAIN

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its 76th season at the Brooklyn Academy of Music Thursday night with Erich Leinsdorf conducting a program of Mozart and Mahler.

Leinsdorf, who is in his second season with the Boston Symphony, has shown a special feeling for the works of these two composers. Mozart's symphony in C Major and Mahler's Symphony No. 5 in C-sharp Minor will be the only classical and romantic works the symphony will play on its first visit to the metropolitan area this year.

Leinsdorf is the latest in a long series of distinguished conductors who have led the Boston Symphony in its performances at the academy. Among his predecessors have been Artur Nikisch, Karl Muck, Serge Kussevitxsky, Pierre Monteux and Charles Munch.

The Boston Symphony's annual appearances have played an important part in the history of the Academy. They began only a few years after the founding of the symphony when the academy was still in its old home on Montague St. When the academy's building burned down, the symphony continued to come to Brooklyn and played in churches until the new academy went up at 30 Lafayette Ave.

Attendance fell off for the symphony's performances last year, and it looked as though the symphony might have to reduce the number of concerts given at the academy. Bt this year's subscription sales have been well ahead of last year's

So far 1717 subscriptions have been sold out of a goal of 2000. With the usual sale of 200 to 300 single tickets for each performance, it seems likely that the symphony will be playing to a full house this year.

Thursday night's concert, which begins at 8:30 p.m., is the first in a series of five performances. The others are on Dec. 5, Jan. 28, Feb. 27 and April 2. Tickets are priced from $3.50 to $6 and can be obtained by writing to the academy.

BROOKLYN, N.Y.
TABLET
W. 139,611 (C)
OCT 31 1963

Getting to Know Music

By KEN MESSER

BROOKLYN: HOME OF THE LIVING

LAST Thursday evening the Boston Symphony under the direction of Erich Leinsdorf returned to the Brooklyn Academy of Music for another season of concerts with a program comprised of Mozart's "Symphony No. 28 in C, K. 200" and Mahler's "Symphony No. 5." All we can say is, "Welcome back, Mr. Leinsdorf!"

As we indicated in an earlier column, the B.S.O.'s return was doubtful. Last year attendance figures dropped to the point of creating considerable front office concern. But if Mr. Leinsdorf maintains varied and interesting programs and attendance still remains low, forcing the orchestra to discontinue the series, then Brooklyn patrons have only themselves to blame. However, we shall wait and see.

38 PROVIDENCE 1

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Telegram (m)
WORCESTER, Mass.
Circ. 59,451
OCT 28 1963

BSO TOURS

PROVIDENCE, R.I. (UPI)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its 82nd Providence series in the capital city Tuesday night. The concert will be conducted by Erich Leinsdorf.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Times (e)
PAWTUCKET-CENTRAL FALLS, R. I.
Circ. 38,168
OCT 25 1963

Boston Symphony In R. I. Series

The Boston Symphony Orchestra directed by Erich Leinsdorf will present the opening concert of the 1963-'64 Providence series Tuesday, Oct. 29, at 8:15 p. m. in Veterans Memorial Auditorium, Providence.

The program will include works of two contemporary composers, Paul Hindemuth and Samuel Barber, and Johannes Brahms.

The orchestra will play five concerts in the Providence series, all on Tuesday evenings at 8:15 p. m. as follows: Oct. 29, Dec. 10, Jan. 14, Jan. 28 and March 17.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Journal (m)
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
Circ. 61,299
OCT 30 1963

Music Last Night

Boston Symphony Orchestra Opens Providence Series

By RUTH TRIPP

The Boston Symphony Orchestra played in Providence last night at Veterans Memorial Auditorium. Erich Leinsdorf conducted this program which was the 371st in Providence. The orchestra has long since reached a high point of perfection and as we listened last night, it was a source of wonderment that this excellence is maintained season after season.

The program included two works unfamiliar here, Hindemith's Symphonic Metamorphosis of Themes by Carl Maria von Weber and Samuel Barber's Symphony No. 1, Op. 9. It closed with Symphony No. 1, by Brahms. There was not a single dull moment in the entire concert.

Hindemith's work, completed in 1943, made excellent use of the borrowed fragments. Its construction was a marvel of creative writing. Its chief point of interest at the outset was its rhythmic vitality. Then the skillful use of materials began to be understood. Orchestral color of all sorts abounded and in the second movement, everyone was busy about something important with the result, an exciting performance. The percussion was assigned to emphatic statements. Fascinating imitations among the string sections and delicate threads of sound from solo flute against a single tone from the chimes, were some of the elements of this movement.

The third movement achieved some extravagant orchestral sound with great economy of themes. The marching rhythm which prevailed at times was stirring. This was fresh and attractive music.

The Barber Symphony featured the wonderful strings of this orchestra and they produced rich tones, with all shades of color. The first section of this work which is written in one movement, was complex. The second section spoke with a true Barber voice and in comparison to the Hindemith work, it held its own, without question.

The beauty of the Brahms First was set forth with artistry almost beyond description. Every voice was balanced beautifully with its contrasting theme and there were some exceptional solo themes. Erich Leinsdorf generously singled out each first desk player for his or her share of the tumultuous applause and most certainly this opening concert could be called an outstanding success for conductor and orchestra. It makes it hard to wait for the 372nd concert which comes Dec. 10th.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Times (e)
PAWTUCKET-CENTRAL FALLS, R. I.
Circ. 38,168
OCT 30 1963

Music In Review

Boston Symphony Pleases With Modern Composers

The Boston Symphony Orchestra opened another series of concerts in Providence, its 83rd season, Tuesday night to a filled Veterans Memorial Auditorium and received a warm, enthusiastic and sincere reception for a splendid performance.

Erich Leinsdorf, musical director, again brought out the ultimate in beautiful sound from these superior musicians and presented a varied program that gratified the tastes of all, if the resounding applause is the criterion.

Two contemporary composers, Hindemith and Barber, were presented in the first half of the program. Four themes of von Weber's lesser known works were scored by Hindemith as "Symphonic Metamorphosis of Themes by Carl Maria von Weber," and the result was pleasing to those who care for modern fragments of dissonance balanced by equal consonance.

The Barber number, "Symphony No. 1 (In one movement) opus 9" had many of the faults most modern composers seem to suffer from — lack of sustaining inspiration. The inspired part is usually about 32 bars of sublime melody, set about midway in a 30-minute mass of noise, sound and broken rhythms and you wonder why it was on the program. Is it to please the audience? To test the ability of the musicians? Or is it an attempt to make an inferior work popular by frequent repetition? The concert patrons should be polled for their preferences to ascertain what is liked and enjoyed and what is not wanted but endured.

The evening was salvaged for those who love the traditional grandeur and beauty of what a symphony should be when the orchestra played Brahms' "Symphony No. 1 in C-Minor" in which the andante, second movement, was perhaps the most rapturous music Brahms ever composed. The horn and woodwind solos sang with a passion that charmed the ear and quieted the spirit. And the concluding movement moving, from adagio to allegro non troppo, ma con brio (rapid not too much but with brightness) soared to a sparkling and emphatic close.

C.H.L.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Journal
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
Circ. 193,108
OCT 27 1963

Boston Symphony

BOSTON SYMPHONY music director Erie Leinsdorf, commenting on this week's Providence concert, said that the program will begin with "two delightful works by living composers, and end up with that old favorite, the First Symphony of Brahms."

The opening number, Leinsdorf said, will be Hindemith's "Symphonic Metamorphosis of Themes by Carl Maria von Weber which "in contrast to the ponderous title is a gay romp of pleasurable sound and vivacious rhythms."

The Symphony's concert is among four major music activities which are scheduled for this week.

TUESDAY

THE FIRST in a series of five programs by the Boston Symphony in Providence begins at 8:15 p.m. at Veterans Memorial Auditorium.

The program, for which tickets are available at Avery Piano Company, is as follows:

Symphonic Metamorphosis of Themes by Carl Maria von Weber ..... Hindemith
Allegro
"Turandot"; Scherzo
Andantino
March

Symphony No. 1 (in one movement), Op. 9 ..... Barber

Symphony No. 1, in C minor, Op. 68 ..... Brahms
Un poco sostenuto; allegro
Andante sostenuto
Un poco allegretto e grazioso
Adagio; allegro non troppo, ma con brio

BLANK PAGE

BOSTON 5

39

140

BOSTON 5

Fifth Program

FRIDAY AFTERNOON, NOVEMBER 1, at 2:00 o'clock

SATURDAY EVENING, NOVEMBER 2, at 8:30 o'clock

RICHARD BURGIN, Conductor

BERLIOZ . . . . . Overture, "The Corsair," Op. 21

HINDEMITH . . . . . Symphonia Serena

Moderately fast
Geschwindmarsch by Beethoven, Paraphrase
Colloquy
Solo violins: Joseph Silverstein, Alfred Krips
Solo violas: Joseph de Pasquale, Jean Cauhapé
Finale; gay

INTERMISSION

TCHAIKOVSKY . . . *Symphony No. 6, in B minor, Op. 74, "Pathétique"

I. Adagio; allegro non troppo
II. Allegro con grazia
III. Allegro molto vivace
IV. Finale: Adagio lamentoso

These concerts will end about 3:50 o'clock on Friday Afternoon; 10:20 o'clock on Saturday Evening.

BALDWIN PIANO

*RCA VICTOR RECORDS

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Patriot-Ledger (e)
QUINCY, Mass.
Circ. 44,419
NOV 6 1963

The Sound of Music

Dash, Not Flair, At Symphony Hall

By Dan Webster

In other seasons, Richard Burgin's programs have cut across the mainstream of the Boston Symphony's musical movement. In the years with Dr. Munch, it was Mr. Burgin who seasoned the Gallic programming with dashes of Mahler and Bruckner and the spice of some contemporaries.

This year, his programs are a little less distinctive but only because they move more with the stream of Erich Leinsdorf's ideas.

However, last night's concert by the orchestra under Mr. Burgin, the second in the new Tuesday night series, lacked the flair of novelty Mr. Burgin has often shown. The music was Berlioz, Beethoven and Tchaikowsky, an equation of solidity and romantic orchestral color.

The orchestra enjoys playing for Mr. Burgin, the regular associate conductor who was for more than 40 years the orchestra's concertmaster. In the air of affability, however, is lost some of the needle-sharp attacks and the carefully ordered dynamics which mark the orchestra's playing under Mr. Leinsdorf.

The orchestra's work in the Berlioz overture to "The Corsair" had buoyance, color and dash, but it also showed some rough seams in the opening bars. Mr. Burgin, himself a solid violinist, drove his violins very nearly to the limit in the overture — one of those displays that Boston audiences have come to take for granted.

Berlioz's brass writing draws maximum color from his orchestra; the orchestra kept its head through the intoxicating brass passages and emerged sounding very grand.

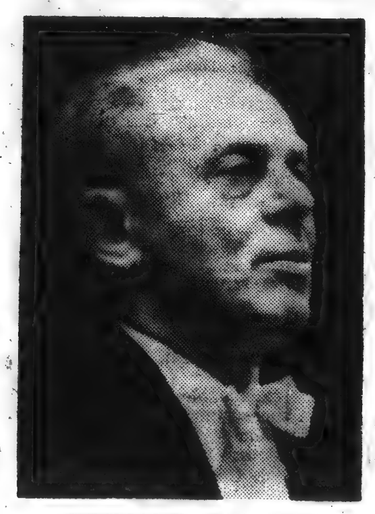
The effect of grandeur was lost somewhat in the Beethoven second symphony. Mr. Burgin reduced his orchestra to meet Beethoven's concepts of his middle period style, but in the cutting back, nearly all the first desk men stayed in the wings. The result was worth study. The first desk men exert considerable leadership and strong hands in insuring precision. Without them, individual parts may sound as good, but the greatness of the orchestra is dimmed a little, especially in the wind ensemble.

Mr. Burgin's work in the Beethoven gathered momentum. If the first movement seemed a little fitful, the symphony began to take shape in the slow movement, build in the scherzo and acquire real stature in the last movement. Mr. Burgin's manner of introducing a hush in the midst of the lovely line of the slow movement prevented it from making its full impact.

The return of the first desk men for the Tchaikowsky sixth symphony "The Pathetique" removed from consideration some of the hesitancy evident in the Beethoven. Mr. Burgin enjoys a broad, relaxed view of this symphony, turns his brass players loose in the climaxes and coaxes the broadest colors from his orchestra.

The 70-year-old symphony need not show its age, and it did not last night. Its provocative construction with the somber finale dampening the enthusiasm the third movement march always arouses shows it a more serious work than Tchaikowsky's other two most popular symphonies. Placed between colorful, but somber opening and closing movements are the 5/4 waltz and the march, high points in the composer's output. In these middle movements the orchestra played its dazzling best. Mr. Burgin's approach to the waltz was straightforward — and effective; to the march he brought a continuing and growing tension and excitement lighted by the outbursts in the high brasses.

Mr. Burgin's direction of the last movement preserved some of Tchaikowsky's most original orchestral writing. The sweeping unisons in the strings, the color of the individual winds, the peculiar effect of low muted horns all do their part in closing the work with a subdued intensity. The performance put new light on a sometimes tarnished symphony.



RICHARD BURGIN

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Herald
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 283,819
OCT 27 1963

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 465,653
OCT 27 1963

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sun (e)
LOWELL, Mass.
Circ. 45,001
OCT 26 1963

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Record-American (m) (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 452,333
OCT 28 1963

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Patriot-Ledger (e)
QUINCY, Mass.
Circ. 48,500
OCT 25 1963

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Ledger-Times
BOSTON, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 12,500
OCT 31 1963

Burgin To Conduct Symphony This Week

Richard Burgin, Associate Conductor, will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the next two weeks while Erich Leinsdorf is on vacation. For his concerts on Friday (Nov. 1, 2:00) and Saturday (Nov. 2, 8:30) Mr. Burgin will begin with Berlioz' Overture to "The Corsair," Op. 21. He will conduct performances of "Symphonia Serena" by Hindemith and Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 6, in B minor, Open 74, "Pathetique."

In the Hindemith work, last performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1948, the solo violinists will be Joseph Silverstein, Concertmaster and Alfred Krips, Associate Concertmaster. Joseph de Pasquale, Principal Viola, and Jean Cauhape will be the viola soloists.

Vaurie 11/6/63

Aud's Wrong Movement Exit Shakes Hub Symph Buffs, Amuses Batoner

Boston, Nov. 5.

Symphony buffs were shook up here Friday (1) when most of the audience walked out at Symphony Hall after the third movement of Tchaikovsky's "Pathetique," believing it was the finale of the work.

As all good Symphony Hall buffs know, this symphony has four movements, not three. And, to have this happen in Boston is just too much. There was mortification and shame among the little old ladies of Hub who sometimes stomp and cheer at symphony.

As for conductor Richard Burgin, he got a kick out of the whole thing. As several hundred of the audience got up to go when he brought the third movement to its close, Burgin faced the customers, bowed, then signaled for the orch to up. Then he turned his back to the audience, and reliable sources report laughed and laughed, while the music lovers filed out.

Those who knew their Tchaikovsky refused to budge, and as Burgin began the fourth movement, some of the surprised departing audience turned around and came back to hear the rest.

140

V BOSTON 5

EIGHTY-THIRD SEASON • NINETEEN HUNDRED SIXTY-THREE–SIXTY-FOUR

Fifth Program

FRIDAY AFTERNOON, NOVEMBER 1, at 2:00 o'clock

SATURDAY EVENING, NOVEMBER 2, at 8:30 o'clock

RICHARD BURGIN, Conductor

BERLIOZ ..... Overture, "The Corsair," Op. 21

HINDEMITH ..... Symphonia Serena

Moderately fast
Geschwindmarsch by Beethoven, Paraphrase
Colloquy
Solo violins: Joseph Silverstein, Alfred Krips
Solo violas: Joseph de Pasquale, Jean Cauhapé
Finale; gay

INTERMISSION

TCHAIKOVSKY ..... *Symphony No. 6, in B minor, Op. 74, "Pathétique"

I. Adagio; allegro non troppo
II. Allegro con grazia
III. Allegro molto vivace
IV. Finale: Adagio lamentoso

These concerts will end about 3:50 o'clock on Friday Afternoon; 10:20 o'clock on Saturday Evening.

BALDWIN PIANO *RCA VICTOR RECORDS

[265]

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Herald
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 283,819
OCT 27 1963

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Ledger-Times
BOSTON, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 12,500
OCT 31 1963

Burgin To Conduct Symphony This Week

Richard Burgin, Associate Conductor, will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the next two weeks while Erich Leinsdorf is on vacation. For his concerts on Friday (Nov. 1, 2:00) and Saturday (Nov. 2, 8:30) Mr. Burgin will begin with Berlioz' Overture to "The Corsair," Op. 21. He will conduct performances of "Symphonia Serena" by Hindemith and Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 6, in B minor, Open 74, "Pathetique."

In the Hindemith work, last performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1948, the solo violinists will be Joseph Silverstein, Concertmaster and Alfred Krips, Associate Concertmaster. Joseph de Pasquale, Principal Viola, and Jean Cauhape will be the viola soloists.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 465,653
OCT 27 1963

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sun (e)
LOWELL, Mass.
Circ. 45,001
OCT 26 1963

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Record-American (m) (a)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 452,333
OCT 28 1963

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Patriot-Ledger (e)
QUINCY, Mass.
Circ. 48,500
OCT 25 1963

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Patriot-Ledger (e)
QUINCY, Mass.
Circ. 44,419
NOV 6 1963

The Sound of Music

Dash, Not Flair, At Symphony Hall

By Dan Webster

In other seasons, Richard Burgin's programs have cut across the mainstream of the Boston Symphony's musical movement. In the years with Dr. Munch, it was Mr. Burgin who seasoned the Gallic programming with dashes of Mahler and Bruckner and the spice of some contemporaries.

This year, his programs are a little less distinctive but only because they move more with the stream of Erich Leinsdorf's ideas.

However, last night's concert by the orchestra under Mr. Burgin, the second in the new Tuesday night series, lacked the flair of novelty Mr. Burgin has often shown. The music was Berlioz, Beethoven and Tchaikowsky, an equation of solidity and romantic orchestral color.

The orchestra enjoys playing for Mr. Burgin, the regular associate conductor who was for more than 40 years the orchestra's concertmaster. In the air of affability, however, is lost some of the needle-sharp attacks and the carefully ordered dynamics which mark the orchestra's playing under Mr. Leinsdorf.

The orchestra's work in the Berlioz overture to "The Corsair" had buoyance, color and dash, but it also showed some rough seams in the opening bars. Mr. Burgin, himself a solid violinist, drove his violins very nearly to the limit in the overture — one of those displays that Boston audiences have come to take for granted.

Berlioz's brass writing draws maximum color from his orchestra; the orchestra kept its head through the intoxicating brass passages and emerged sounding very grand.

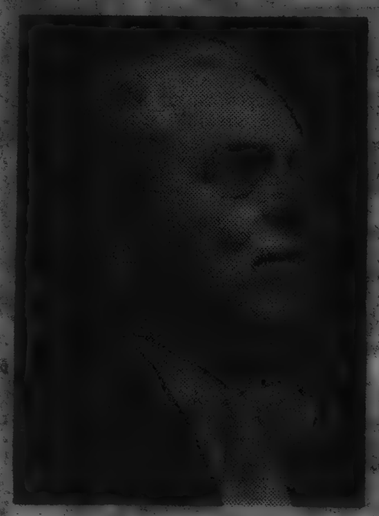
The effect of grandeur was lost somewhat in the Beethoven second symphony. Mr. Burgin reduced his orchestra to meet Beethoven's concepts of his middle period style, but in the cutting back, nearly all the first desk men stayed in the wings. The result was worth study. The first desk men exert considerable leadership and strong hands in insuring precision. Without them, individual parts may sound as good, but the greatness of the orchestra is dimmed a little, especially in the wind ensemble.

Mr. Burgin's work in the Beethoven gathered momentum. If the first movement seemed a little fitful, the symphony began to take shape in the slow movement, build in the scherzo and acquire real stature in the last movement. Mr. Burgin's manner of introducing a hush in the midst of the lovely line of the slow movement prevented it from making its full impact.

The return of the first desk men for the Tchaikowsky sixth symphony "The Pathetique" removed from consideration some of the hesitancy evident in the Beethoven. Mr. Burgin enjoys a broad, relaxed view of this symphony, turns his brass players loose in the climaxes and coaxes the broadest colors from his orchestra.

The 70-year-old symphony need not show its age, and it did not last night. Its provocative construction with the somber finale dampening the enthusiasm the third movement march always arouses shows it a more serious work than Tchaikowsky's other two most popular symphonies. Placed between colorful, but somber opening and closing movements are the 5/4 waltz and the march, high points in the composer's output. In these middle movements the orchestra played its dazzling best. Mr. Burgin's approach to the waltz was straightforward — and effective; to the march he brought a continuing and growing tension and excitement lighted by the outbursts in the high brasses.

Mr. Burgin's direction of the last movement preserved some of Tchaikowsky's most original orchestral writing. The sweeping unisons in the strings, the color of the individual winds, the peculiar effect of low muted horns all do their part in closing the work with a subdued intensity. The performance put new light on a sometimes tarnished symphony.



RICHARD BURGIN

Aud's Wrong Movement Exit Shakes Hub Symph Buffs, Amuses Batoner

Boston, Nov. 5. Symphony buffs were shook up here Friday (1) when most of the audience walked out at Symphony Hall after the third movement of Tchaikovsky's "Pathetique," believing it was the finale of the work.

As all good Symphony Hall buffs know, this symphony has four movements, not three. And, to have this happen in Boston is just too much. There was mortification and shame among the little old ladies of Hub who sometimes stomp and cheer at symphony.

As for conductor Richard Burgin, he got a kick out of the whole thing. As several hundred of the audience got up to go when he brought the third movement to its close, Burgin faced the customers, bowed, then signaled for the orch to up. Then he turned his back to the audience, and reliable sources report laughed and laughed, while the music lovers filed out.

Those who knew their Tchaikovsky refused to panic, and as Burgin began the fourth movement [illegible]

It happened, regretfully, in Boston...

By Harold Rogers

It seems incredible it could have happened in Boston . . .

Richard Burgin was conducting Tchaikovsky's Sixth Symphony, Tchaikovsky, of all things. Had he been conducting Handel's "Faithful Shepherd' Suite, one might have understood.

But he was conducting Tchaikovsky's "Pathétique," and one would have thought that nearly every music lover in the world—well, at least nearly every music lover who would come to Symphony Hall to hear the Boston Symphony — would have known that this symphony has four movements, not three.

Of course, the third movement does end in a blaze of glory, much as if it were a fourth movement. But Tchaikovsky had a good reason for handling it this way—if we must, at this late date, go into reasons. He simply wished to conclude his work on a pathetic note, and this is not done fortissimo full orchestra.

* * *

Well, when Mr. Burgin brought the third movement to its giddy close on Friday afternoon, it was followed by a burst of applause. Even this can be understood and forgiven; Leonard Bernstein once taught his conducting class at Tanglewood that if they wanted applause, they should choose to end their concerts with a climax-building movement: the applause follows simply as a nervous response.

But this was more than just misplaced applause. This was final, conclusive applause. Many of the ladies —well, several hundred of them, perhaps—got up as if to go and headed for the doors.

Mr. Burgin, meanwhile, vastly enjoyed the spectacle. He faced the audience. He bowed. He then signaled for the orchestra to rise. Then he turned his back to the audience and laughed heartily while the exodus proceeded.

* * *

Fortunately the majority of the listeners were not taken in by the delusion. Either they knew their Tchaikovsky, or they knew how to count. When Mr. Burgin began the fourth movement, a few of the departing ones straggled back inside to hear the rest.

* * *

And what they heard—both before and after the booboo—was superb. Mr. Burgin, of course, has always been good with Tchaikovsky, and why not? They are both Russian. But on this occasion the performance was splendid, both technically and emotionally.

So, too, with the Berlioz "Corsair" Overture and Hindemith's "Symphonia Serena."

In connection with Handel's "Faithful Shepherd" Suite, mentioned above, a Boston audience made a similar mistake when Sir Thomas Beecham was conducting the piece during a visit by the Royal Philharmonic of London.

It was in seven movements, but the fifth movement concluded with a sense of finality, and nearly everyone applauded. Sir Thomas bowed. He had his orchestra take a bow. Then, when the applause had subsided, he said:

"If you are under any impression that the piece has concluded, I regret to inform you that it has not!"

And then played the last two movements.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Herald (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 178,553
NOV 2 1963

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
x 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 194,870

At Symphony

Tchaikovsky's Gift To the Orchestra

By MARGO MILLER

Chestnut though it is, how the "Pathetique" warms the heart. It should be played once a season if only to remind the concert-goer what a superior orchestra plays in Symphony Hall. First, in this Tchaikovsky Symphony are the strings. Speak all you want of the dark riches of the Philadelphia, Boston has a bloom in its middle registers and a sheen to the top. Richard Burgin, who conducted, is a string man himself, longtime concertmaster of the orchestra, with an appreciation verging on adulation of his fellow fiddles. So the violins glowed. But he does not neglect the resonant cellos and the neighboring violas. Then, too, there are other instruments capable of legato lines: the trombones, for one, heard to fine advantage early in the Symphony as in the finale, or the bassoons reaching to the depths with no danger of scraping the ear.

Burgin put all of them together in a most satisfying way. More frenzied "Pathetiques" have been heard in Symphony Hall; Charles Munch often uncorked steaming music which was not without its effect. Burgin is the master of the small swell which he never quite lets die back. In fact, this quality added to the brassy ending of the third movement caused the usually attentive Friday afternoon audience to break into applause. And they still had the finale, worthy of real cheers but concluding in a whisper, ahead. Here the music built to really sublime heights. To say that Burgin made it thrust would be inaccurate. That he made it compelling is to give him and the orchestra its due.

By way of introducing the Tchaikovsky, Burgin conducted Hindemith's Symphonia Serena. The composer has explained that the work is "entirely away from the 'Pathetique' style." The phrase might pass for the understatement of the year were it not for certain, if few, broad melodies that creep in. Otherwise, the Symphonia Serena is a balanced work. The outer two movements for full orchestra frame two movements, one for winds alone, the other for string orchestra. The section for strings is again divided. And besides this division, there are solo passages for violin and viola, each of which has its offstage shadow. Joseph Silverstein and Joseph de Pasquale played well from the usual seats. Alfred Krips and Jean Cauhape were the antiphonal strings. The inner workings of the music can be charted also (as can any symphony). But the very reasonableness of Hindemith's mind somehow mitigates the enjoyment of the Symphony. To be sure, the music is fluent and not restless, in the manner of some neoclassicists, and the light texture and high sonorities make it a fine contrast to the Tchaikovsky, but it remains laced up in its cleverness.

The concert opened with Berlioz' "Corsair" Overture.

Next week Richard Burgin will again conduct. Jeanne-Marie Darre will be soloist in the Schumann Piano Concerto in A minor. The program also includes Haydn's Symphony in C major, No. 97, and Symphony No. 5 in E-Flat major by Sibelius.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, with Richard Burgin as guest conductor, played Friday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program, to be repeated tonight at 8:30 p.m., consisted of Berlioz' Overture, "Le Corsaire," Hindemith's Symphonia Serena, and Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 6 in B minor, Op. 74, "Pathetique."

Dutiful Routine, Tepid Afternoon

By ROBERT TAYLOR

The orchestra always plays well for Richard Burgin, but his presence and the responsive pulse of the Boston Symphony did not sustain yesterday's concert. It was a tepid afternoon of dutiful routine.

This reaction can be attributed for the most part to the program. On paper, the architecture was solid: an unfamiliar overture, a contemporary work of merit, a cherished romantic symphony. In practice, however, the result proved innocuous.

The lively "Corsair" Overture proceeded with melodic vigor, though one was conscious as always of the village-band stridency of the composer's writing for brass. Such Latin flamboyance does no harm to a piece meant for the expression of gusto; that goes "like a shot from a pistol," and that captivates by means of swashbucking ebullience. The music conforms to the shape of a tradition. Audiences must wake up, and the spell of Berlioz's strings would only be resisted by a churl.

Splendid Example

It is harder to discover the validity of Hindemith's "Symphonia Serena," although Antal Dorati's otherwise accurate program notes regard the score as a harbinger of a future literature which will replace the antique symphonic form. The "Symphonia Serena" is a splendid example of craft, and the instrumentation brilliantly conceived. The form discloses a compelling pattern, while the contrapuntal detail bears the stamp of a master technician. Yet the statement itself represents a triumph of sheer execution.

After hearing the Symphonia, one is reminded of Flaubert's comment that the novel of the future would be plotless. Both the novel and the symphony stress the art of development. The bugaboo of content often annoys artists in either form, who, striving to eliminate obstacles to direct communion with sound or words, emphasize the importance of the creative act itself as experience.

Yet I think it natural for an audience to feel somehow cheated of a basic ingredient; they are more aware of the fact that diminished content, in turn, creates obstacles, as a wholly cerebral and calculated effect. Hindemith four movements present a tissue of intriguing colors, and he introduces thematic material of some promise—then dissipates the latter by his enchantment with pure technique.

Solo Violin

The opening observes sonata form; in the erstwhile "scher-

The Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Richard Burgin conducting, presented the fifth program of the 83rd season yesterday in Symphony Hall. The program will be repeated tonight at 8:30.

Overture, "The Corsair," Op. 21, Berlioz
Symphonia Serena . . . . . Hindemith
Symphony No. 6, in B minor, Op. 74, "Pathetique" . . . . Tchaikovsky zo" bits and pieces of a Beethoven military march composed between 1809 and 1810 are scattered haphazardly by the winds; the third movement divides the strings into a lyric section and a pizzicato grouping, with two solo violins in the balcony corridor providing recitative bridges; and finally a complex and brisk polyphonic movement brings a close.

Despite the composer's orchestral skill, the want of emotional urgency in his content leaves the score a hollow shell. Here is complacent music, phlegmatic, earnest and long-winded: the essence of learned debate. Hindemith did not intend it without content, but the result is the same.

The "Pathetique" received a ponderous and blocky reading. In part, the tendency of the audience to ignore the sentiment of the symphony and the fact that it has a final melancholy movement, provided a jolting interruption. Yesterday they cheered the frenzied allegro, but this is scarcely unusual and has gone on for years. More significantly, the interpretation stayed on the surface.

Mr. Burgin's four-square, clear beat brought out the orchestral lines neatly; his tempi were designed for clarity and contrast. There was little feeling of dramatic rhetoric, though, in his sturdy approach.

Other Masters

In such a logical and carefully-modelled performance the excitement of tumultuous, passionate forces never emerged. The "Pathetique" requires more temperamental excess. Nevertheless, though he is not the man for Tchaikowsky, Mr. Burgin serves other masters faithfully. The warmth of the applause on his first appearance testified to the esteem and affection in which Boston holds the associate conductor.

Next week he has scheduled Schumann's Piano Concerto in A Minor, with Jeanne-Marie Darre as soloist. Haydn's Symphony in C Major, No. 97, and Sibelius's Symphony No. 5, in E-flat major, Op. 82, will also be heard.

H2

CONCORD, N.H.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Herald
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 283,819
NOV 3 1963

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 465,653
NOV 3 1963

Burgin Will Conduct The Boston Symphony

The Boston Symphony visits Concord, N.H., for the first time today. The orchestra will play in the Capitol Theater at 3 p.m. in a special concert presented without admission charge for the residents of the state capital. William H. Giles established a trust fund to be used for this and similar events. Richard Burgin, former concertmaster of the orchestra who continues as associate music director, will conduct.

Later this week the Boston Symphony will give three concerts in Symphony Hall. Burgin will conduct the orchestra at each of the concerts scheduled for Tuesday evening at 8:30, Friday afternoon at 2 and Saturday at 8:30. Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony, is on a short vacation and will return to conduct the orchestra's concerts on Nov. 15 and 16.

Tuesday's program will consist of Berlioz' Overture to "The Corsair," Op. 21; the Symphony No. 2, in D major, Op. 36 by Beethoven; and Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 6, in B minor, Op. 74, "Pathetique."

Jeanne-Marie Darre will be Burgin's guest for the Friday-Saturday concerts. The French pianist will perform the Schumann Piano Concerto in A minor, Op. 54. Miss Darre last appeared with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1962 when she made her American debut. Also to be heard at these concerts will be the Symphony in C major, Op. 97 by Haydn and Sibelius' Symphony No. 5 in E-flat major, Op. 82.

JEANNE MARIE DARRE

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • Richmond 2-4200
Sun (e)
LOWELL, Mass.
Circ. 45,001
NOV 2 1963

Tomorrow afternoon at 3:00 p.m. in Symphony hall, Boston, Richard Burgin will conduct the first program ever presented in Concord, N.H., by the world famous Boston Symphony orchestra. The Orchestra will play in the Capitol theater at a special concert that will be free of charge for the residents of the New Hampshire capital. The concert is being made possible through the establishment of a trust fund by William H. Giles.

Marilyn Mason will be heard in the first Symphony hall organ concert of the season next Sunday, Nov. 10, at 6:00 o'clock. A student of Palmer Christian, Miss Mason has also studied at the University of Michigan. A series of six concerts will be given this season. Among those to be heard will be John Ferris, Robert Lloyd Town, Fernando Germani, John Weaver and E. Power Biggs.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Monitor & New Hampshire Patriot (e)
CONCORD, N. H.
Circ. 13,613
NOV 4 1963

World Famed Boston Symphony Show Skill At Gile Concert

By RICHARD J. GAGLIUSO

On Sunday afternoon Concord residents once more were enriched by the beneficence of the Gile Fund as they heard the world famous Boston Symphony orchestra in concert at the Capitol theater. The orchestra was under the direction of its associate conductor, Richard Burgin, former concert-master of the B.S.O.

The program opened with a lesser - known Berlioz concert overture, The Corsair, Op. 21. The overture contains the typical Berlioz harmonies, rhythmic novelties and brilliant orchestration that reflect his fiery temperament, and make his music an enjoyable event. The work did not go as much like "a shot from a pistol" as I would have liked, and I feel it lost some of its brilliance because of the slower tempo. However, the orchestra "cleared its throat" with this opener and settled the audience for the remainder of the program.

Mildly Modern

Most contemporary works are filled with much too much cacophony to be musical, and I listen to most avant-garde music dutifully. Hindemith's Symphonia Serena is mildly modern, however, and refreshingly different. It is not an emotional work, as the title indicates, and is more in the style of a concerto for orchestra.

Here was a series of exercises for the individuals and sections of the orchestra to display their usual talents. The work was well seasoned with chromatics, angular melodic lines, very interesting tonal colors and textures, and unusual rhythmic patterns. This was a show piece for an orchestra that had much to show.

Few Lapses

The Germanic discipline, returned to the orchestra by its permanent conductor, Mr. Leinsdorf, was quite evident in all phases of orchestral technique. The very few lapses of discipline, musical and otherwise, that were allowed, would have been controlled at Symphony Hall under his direction. Each section attained a tonal blend, balance and precision that is attained by few orchestras. If the trumpet sounded too loud in places, and the solo clarinet too soft, in others, this might well have been due to the acoustics.

The first chair men in each section were outstanding. Mr. Silverstein, the concert master, appears to be a true leader, not only of his section but of the entire orchestra. This is the mark of a superior concert-master. The linear writing of Hindemith gave each section an opportunity to be heard in its own voice, independent of harmonies. Some examples would include the string ostinato with the French horn solo; the tuned wood blocks with English horn, double bassoon, piccolo and flute arpeggios. In the slow movement for strings, the concert master has cadenza which is echoed by a second solo violin playing in the wings. Simple as it is, the effect is magical and Hindemith repeats it with two solo violas.

Mr. Hindemith, formerly of the Yale music department and now residing in Switzerland, is recognized as one of the foremost Twentieth Century composers. He is a Neo-Classicist, combining classical form, polyphony, contrapuntal writing with modern harmonies and rhythms. This is Bach, but in terms of the Twentieth Century.

Expression Shown

If the Symphonia Serena was conceived in the mind, precise and logical, so then was the Tchaikovsky conceived in the heart annd soul, human and emotional. It was in the Pathetique, Symphony No. 6, in B Minor, that the orchestra came together to show th eintensity of sound and expression of which this orchestra is capable. By contrast, it made the first two works seem trifling. Mr Burgin drew some very inspiring sounds from th eorchestra with this work. The audience applauded spontaneously after the third movement. Tchaikovsky wrote some confident music for a man who had doubts about his abilities as a composer. This was his favorite symphony and his swan song. The work has a tragic note throughout, with some respite in the second and third movements.

The Finale ends in what is considered to be the most thorough expression of introspective misery ever written. The wailing of human disappointment (and of a baby in the audience!?) and self-pity echoed in his writing, reflect the depression that often locked Tchaikovsky in grief. The final notes that descended to the depths of this grief, left the audience quiet for a moment before they broke into the final ovation that brought Mr. Burgen back to the podium several times.

We are thankful to the owners of the Capitol theater for the use of their facilities because it allows a maximum number of Concord residents to benefit from these concerts. However, the theater is not ideally suited for use as a concert hall and many of the sounds produced onstage never reach the audience as they were conceived. When Concord builds its new civic auditorium we can hope then that all of the sounds will come through to an even greater number of grateful music lovers. The Boston Symphony, nontheless, provided a memorable afternoon of incomparable virtuosity. We are indebted to the Gile Fund, to Herbert Rainie and his committee for bringing us the very best in the orchestral world.

CONCORD DAILY MONITOR 11/6/63

NOT SYMPHONY'S BEST

Editor, Monitor-Patriot: It is not the fault of the Gile Fund Committee that the Boston Symphony Orchestra should come to Concord and give a careless, callous, cavalier performance such as the one given in the Capitol Theater yesterday afternoon.

In spite of Mr. Gagliuso's well-intentioned review in the November 4 issue of your newspaper I think certain things need to be said. And I know that I am not one voice in the saying.

Over the years I have been a regular attendant at the Boston concerts. I have heard the orchestra on tour, and many times at Tanglewood. I have heard performances that brought the audience to its feet. I have been moved to tears. But deeply moving or not, the music has always come through with the purest brilliance, and was what one could expect from the epitome of personal technique, exceptional discipline and superlative leadership.

The half-hearted accolade at the conclusion of yesterday's concert was a pathetic tribute to what the orchestra means to the music public. It was not a tribute to anything heard during the afternoon's concert.

Trying to excuse the performance to myself, I reviewed in my mind the poor accommodations, the crowding of the players, the bare brick walls. Even if these were detrimental there was no excuse for the thinly disguised horseplay that was going on between the three first desks; Samuel Mayes, cello, di Pasquale, first violist, and first violin Silverstein. This was visible even in the balcony, as well as to persons in the first row seats. It's a far cry from the dedicated orchestra of other years. It compares badly with the Warsaw Orchestra which played on the same stage under the same conditions. It is the first concert I have attended in Concord where the performing artists seemed totally indifferent to the audience reaction.

Some years ago one of the Boston Symphony violinists, shrugging off a concert played under a guest conductor to whom the orchestra was antagonistic said "We are so good ...we play anyway". This was one of the Russian coterie, a great personal egotist, speaking off the record. But it was true at the time... that time is obviously past.

If the Boston Symphony Orchestra, as advertised, is to play, then it should play at full strength, under its regular conductor. Surely the amount of money available in the Gile Fund to hire it, merits us a first class performance.

DOROTHY WYMAN

TUESDAY 2 BOSTON 6

43

Second Program

VENING, NOVEMBER 5, at 8:30 o'clock

HARD BURGIN, Conductor

BE[illegible] ....Overture, "The Corsair," Op. 21

BE[illegible] ....Symphony No. 2, in D major, Op. 36

: Allegro con brio

[illegible]gio

[illegible]

INTERMISSION

TCHAIKOVSKI ....Symphony No. 6, in B minor, Op. 74, "Pathétique"

I. [illegible] allegro non troppo
II. [illegible]o con grazia
III. [illegible]o molto vivace
IV. [illegible] Adagio lamentoso

BALDWIN PIANO

*RCA VICTOR RECORDS

Sixth Program

FRIDAY AFTERNOON, NOVEMBER 8, at 2:00 o'clock

SATURDAY EVENING, NOVEMBER 9, at 8:30 o'clock

RICHARD BURGIN, Conductor

HAYDN ....Symphony in C major, No. 97

I. Adagio; Vivace
II. Adagio ma non troppo
III. Menuetto: Allegretto
IV. Finale: Presto assai

SCHUMANN ....Piano Concerto in A minor, Op. 54

I. Allegro affettuoso
II. Intermezzo: Andantino grazioso
III. Allegro vivace

INTERMISSION

SIBELIUS ....Symphony No. 5 in E-flat major, Op. 82

I. Tempo molto moderato
II. Allegro moderato, ma poco a poco stretto
III. Andante mosso, quasi allegretto
IV. Allegro molto

SOLOIST
JEANNE-MARIE DARRÉ
Mme. DARRÉ plays the Baldwin Piano

These concerts will end about 3:55 o'clock on Friday Afternoon; 10:25 o'clock on Saturday Evening.

BALDWIN PIANO

RCA VICTOR RECORDS

CSM

NOVEMBER 9, 1963 Real Estate—Building 11

Darré at keyboard

Radiant Schumann

By Harold Rogers

Jeanne-Marie Darré is a pianist's pianist, yet her appeal is universal; in striving for the highest of musical ideals she reaches the minds and hearts of both musicians and the people at large.

For Mme Darré is no mere "concerto pianist" who can cut through the orchestra with dazzlement for the ear alone. This she can do, true enough; the ear is delighted by the brilliance of her tone, the clarity of her articulation, the speed of her execution.

But she can do far more than this. She can take a display piece like Schumann's A minor Concerto—as she did Friday afternoon with the Boston Symphony—and turn it into a poem of monumental stature. This is doubtless what Schumann intended it to be. This is what we are seldom given to hear.

It is her poetic nature that lends added radiance to Mme Darré's music making; a soft patina tempers what otherwise might become a blare of untempered sound. Tints and shades of tone give us the clue to her musical heart. Only one who is sensitive to the music's inner substance can bring forth the nuance of delicacy. Only the highest artistry can shape a phrase with such eloquence.

On his behalf Richard Burgin guided the orchestra in sympathetic rapport with Mme Darré; theirs was a commendable collaboration.

* * *

Mr. Burgin opened with an adroit reading of Haydn's Symphony in C major, No. 97, unheard at these concerts for the past 18 seasons. Haydn's abundance of surprising invention indeed leaves one surprised that the 97th is not revived more often.

Although Mr. Burgin's exposition of the Sibelius Symphony No. 5 was not so refined as it might have been (the Helsinki City Symphony Orchestra plays it with less polish but more grace), this work nevertheless spoke in its most powerful terms. It quite naturally leads the listener into believing that Sibelius must have truly been a giant of a man — even physically. Paintings and sculpture have so presented him.

* * *

Yet when I met Sibelius as his home in Jarvenpaa I was struck by what a little man he was. I had thought that I would be the one to look up into his eyes, yet it was he who looked up into mine. (His friends later told me that in his final years he had indeed grown smaller).

But Sibelius was truly a giant in spirit. One need only listen again to the Fifth to marvel at his extraordinary originality, his unique way of treating the orchestra with those moody doublings that sing on the north winds of Finland's folklore.

TUESDAY 2 BOSTON 6

43

Second Program

EVENING, NOVEMBER 5, at 8:30 o'clock

RICHARD BURGIN, Conductor

BERLIOZ ..... Overture, "The Corsair," Op. 21

BEETHOVEN ..... Symphony No. 2, in D major, Op. 36

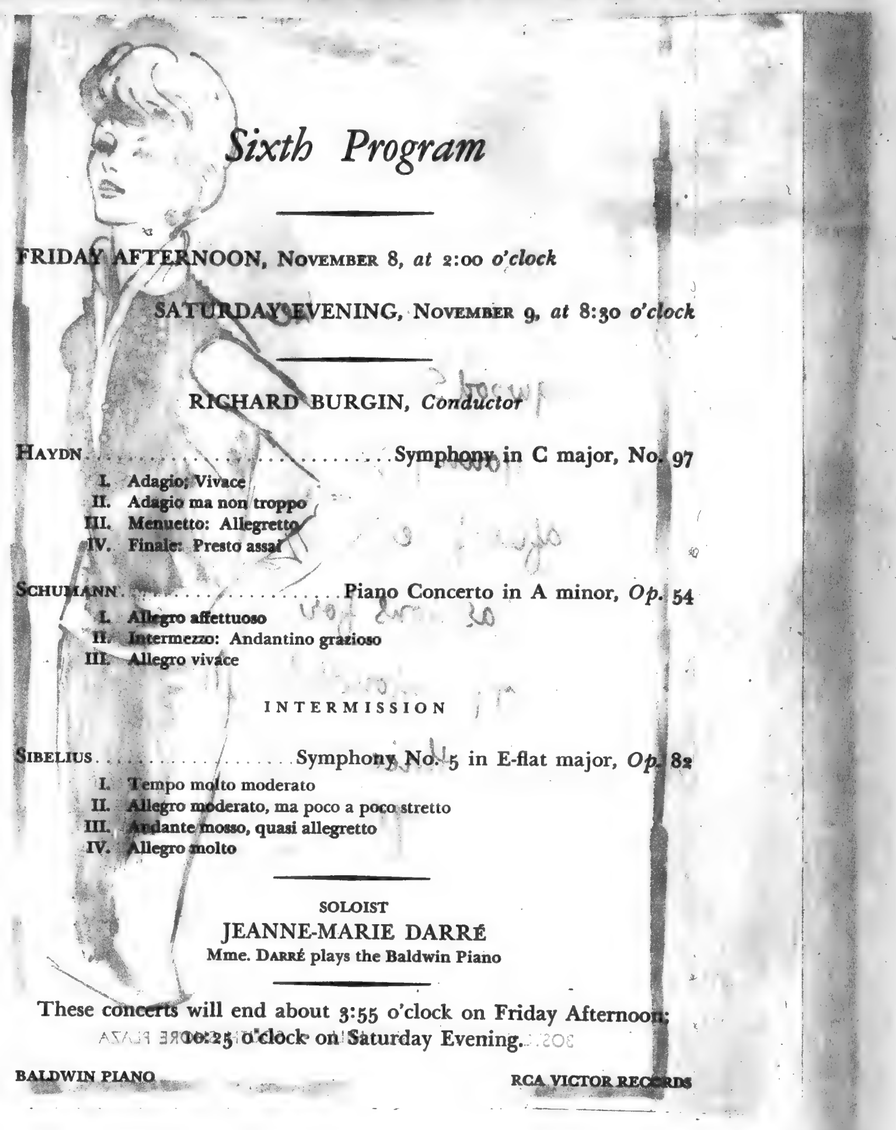
I. Adagio molto; Allegro con brio
II. Larghetto
III. Scherzo: Allegro
IV. Allegro molto

INTERMISSION

TCHAIKOVSKY *Symphony No. 6, in B minor, Op. 74, "Pathétique"

I. Adagio; allegro non troppo
II. Allegro con grazia
III. Allegro molto vivace
IV. Finale: Adagio lamentoso

BALDWIN PIANO *RCA VICTOR RECORDS



Sixth Program

FRIDAY AFTERNOON, NOVEMBER 8, at 2:00 o'clock

SATURDAY EVENING, NOVEMBER 9, at 8:30 o'clock

RICHARD BURGIN, Conductor

HAYDN ..... Symphony in C major, No. 97

I. Adagio; Vivace
II. Adagio ma non troppo
III. Menuetto: Allegretto
IV. Finale: Presto assai

SCHUMANN ..... Piano Concerto in A minor, Op. 54

I. Allegro affettuoso
II. Intermezzo: Andantino grazioso
III. Allegro vivace

INTERMISSION

SIBELIUS ..... Symphony No. 5 in E-flat major, Op. 82

I. Tempo molto moderato
II. Allegro moderato, ma poco a poco stretto
III. Andante mosso, quasi allegretto
IV. Allegro molto

SOLOIST
JEANNE-MARIE DARRÉ
Mme. DARRÉ plays the Baldwin Piano

These concerts will end about 3:55 o'clock on Friday Afternoon; 10:25 o'clock on Saturday Evening.

BALDWIN PIANO RCA VICTOR RECORDS

CSM

NOVEMBER 9, 1963 Real Estate—Building 11

Darré at keyboard

Radiant Schumann

By Harold Rogers

Jeanne-Marie Darré is a pianist's pianist, yet her appeal is universal; in striving for the highest of musical ideals she reaches the minds and hearts of both musicians and the people at large.

For Mme Darré is no mere "concerto pianist" who can cut through the orchestra with dazzlement for the ear alone. This she can do, true enough; the ear is delighted by the brilliance of her tone, the clarity of her articulation, the speed of her execution.

But she can do far more than this. She can take a display piece like Schumann's A minor Concerto—as she did Friday afternoon with the Boston Symphony—and turn it into a poem of monumental stature. This is doubtless what Schumann intended it to be. This is what we are seldom given to hear.

It is her poetic nature that lends added radiance to Mme Darré's music making; a soft patina tempers what otherwise might become a blare of untempered sound. Tints and shades of tone, give us the clue to her musical heart. Only one who is sensitive to the music's inner substance can bring forth the nuance of delicacy. Only the highest artistry can shape a phrase with such eloquence.

On his behalf Richard Burgin guided the orchestra in sympathetic rapport with Mme Darré; theirs was a commendable collaboration.

* * *

Mr. Burgin opened with an adroit reading of Haydn's Symphony in C major, No. 97, unheard at these concerts for the past 18 seasons. Haydn's abundance of surprising invention indeed leaves one surprised that the 97th is not revived more often.

Although Mr. Burgin's exposition of the Sibelius Symphony No. 5 was not so refined as it might have been (the Helsinki City Symphony Orchestra plays it with less polish but more grace), this work nevertheless spoke in its most powerful terms. It quite naturally leads the listener into believing that Sibelius must have truly been a giant of a man — even physically. Paintings and sculpture have so presented him.

* * *

Yet when I met Sibelius at his home in Jarvenpaa I was struck by what a little man he was. I had thought that I would be the one to look up into his eyes, yet it was he who looked up into mine. (His friends later told me he had indeed grown smaller).

But Sibelius was truly a giant in spirit. One need only listen again to the Fifth to marvel at his extraordinary originality, his unique way of treating the orchestra with those moody doublings that sing on the north winds of Finland's folklore.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Evening Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 146,915
NOV 9 1963

At Symphony

Jeanne-Marie Darre Superb in Schumann

By MARGO MILLER

The Schumann Piano Concerto, written for one woman, was played by another yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Jeanne-Marie Darre was the splendid soloist. If the feminine aspect seems overstressed, it can be explained in this way. Mme. Darre is like a housewife with an exquisite Aubusson carpet, for much of the piano part lies under the orchestra. But does she hide the pattern? Not for a minute. She goes rippling on in such a manner that the ear is drawn to her, however soft her part. There she is caressing every phrase with her superb sense of dynamics, her feathery touch which at the same time is most firm, eliciting pleasant sounds. She has also the pliancy which makes the rhythms crackle.

Clara Schumann for whom the Concerto was written, had always wanted a "great bravura piece" by her husband. Some pianists take "bravura" at face value, regarding the work solely as a showpiece of fiery proportions. Others approach the Concerto as a confection upon which another furrow of icing would hardly be noticed. Mme. Darre eschews both views. Her music is not prettified but vital. While she has no little power in the pyrotechnics department, she is also interested in the work given her when the major focus is on the orchestra. She is a craftsman, hence, an artist, as was conspicuous yesterday afternoon.

Richard Burgin conducted the Boston Symphony. He began and concluded the program with two symphonies, Haydn's No. 97, from the London group, and the Sibelius Fifth. In the genial Haydn, the orchestra best caught the spirit of the supple adagio and finale. At other times the work sounded somewhat heavy, even though Burgin had pared down the number of his players to around 60, this including the four pairs of winds. Burgin seems to opt for a kind of grandeur in the music, when there is also in Haydn a considerable elegance which also to be heard. But listeners should find the last movement's excursions great fun indeed.

The orchestra responded in the Sibelius like a drum set humming. Burgin's reading stressed the serene aspects, proper for a work which had left behind the broad melodies and heavier sonorities, say, of the Symphony No. 2 and the tone poems. Listening to this Sibelius Fifth is listening to Burgin listen to the composer.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Richard Burgin conducting, played Friday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program, to be repeated tonight at 8:30, comprised Haydn's Symphony in C major, No. 97; Schumann's Piano Concerto in A minor, Op. 54, with Jeanne-Marie Darre as soloist; and Sibelius' Symphony No. 5 in E-flat major, Op. 82.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Jewish Advocate
BOSTON, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 35,304
NOV 14 1963

BSO's Sixth Program

Burgin Conducts; Darre is Soloist

BY ALLAN SLY

By the time this is read, it will be general knowledge that Jeanne-Marie Darre graced the BSO's sixth program in the Schumann piano concerto, that Mr. Burgin opened with Haydn No. 97 (in C) and closed with Sibelius No. 5 (in an early performance of which he once played under Sibelius himself).

It is doubtful that I can add any encomiums to the general acclaim already published; but a few notions that came to me during a most satisfying evening may be worth setting down.

It is well said that a conductor's main function is to communicate experience; when Mr. Burgin pilots the BSO and its hearers through Haydn (or Schubert) it is a benign journey and we emerge the better for it. Reflected in Haydn's august style we recognize a better image of ourselves and we readily smile inwardly, or feel our hearts warmed, or hasten our steps, or deepen our reflections. This happens best (or perhaps only) when our pilot, like Mr. Burgin, has had already a long innings and has surmounted innumerable challenges; and when his medium, like the BSO, can collectively match his experience with its own. For me, the Haydn alone would have made the evening, the while it far outstripped the power of words to describe it.

But words there have to be; we are stuck with that necessity. They fail less in describing Schumann, perhaps, since that composer had his own literary bent. I personally was a little puzzled at Mme. Darre's Schumann. Last year she made of a Saint-Saens concerto an unforgettably exciting thing — possibly because our earlier impressions of the work had been so-so. The Schumann needs no such elevation and we were free to admire the soloist's superb instinct for ensemble playing — the mark of a musical gentlewoman — and marvel at her technical equipment for bringing about flashes of high rhetoric or profound introspection as the work unfolded. And yet toward the end of the finale I felt again that Schumann had driven himself to complete a work that had started out in the heat of inspiration. Not even the Darre-Burgin association could dispel this misgiving.

Sibelius seems to be well into his second innings. Do you recall the first, in the early '30's, when Koussevitzsky projected him, continent-wide, over the airwaves? This second innings is the more interesting in that there has been time to observe a whole generation of composers influenced by the first—Walton positively, Britten perhaps negatively; and now we can reassess the claims of Sibelius fans (including Ernest Newman) that he may be the logical successor to Beethoven.

So how did No. 5 sound last week? Dated? Oversized? Headstrong? Maybe, but I can account for one listener who is by no means through with it, and not only for nostalgic reasons. Here is the muse in the act of fashioning musical equivalents of human experience — not the whole of it, but certain aspects of it — and some of these only recently pressing for recognition. This I find also true of Walton and Britten, Vaughan Williams and Honegger. Having learned their musical language, I now find doors opening for me when listening to Sibelius and such communication as then seems available becomes, for me, a source of nourishment, of a fuller understanding of life. Such a disposition, I suppose, admits me to the vast company of those who have (very recently) flocked to performances of the Britten War Requiem and sets me apart from those who, like my predecessor (and host) in this space, find Britten's easy communication an insecure footing for an elevation to greatness. Be that as it may, I am enjoying Sibelius' second innings, and look forward with more hope than assurance to another chance (in Boston) with those other twentieth-century oracles.

The BSO, with Mr. Burgin, did nobly by Sibelius (too bad some Bostonians go off half-cocked with their premature applause; our city will be getting a bad name). Now we are to be swept into mid-season, on Mr. Leinsdorf's return, with Wagner, Berg and Dvorak.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Herald (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 178,553
NOV 9 1963

The Symphony

Pure Display Marks Symphony

By ROBERT TAYLOR

Jeanne-Marie Darre presented an idiomatic but mild account of Schumann's Piano Concerto as the featured soloist of yesterday's varied Symphony Concert.

Miss Darre's qualities as a pianist are known to the Boston audience. Two years ago she gave a dazzling performance of the Second Concerto of Saint-Saens, in G Minor, with the Orchestra, and has since concertized here. Although she is an artist of more bravura than the salon traditions of France customarily produce, her approach to the A minor is essentially Gallic: logical, crisp and unsentimental—and as a result, her reading was over-intellectualized.

The work itself holds unusual appeal for women; the roster of Boston performances is studded with names on the order of Adele Aus de Ohe and Nicole Henriot.

At Fingertips

Ranking among the finest of modern times must surely be the performance of Myra Hess, who captured the emotional freshness of the music as well as its exceedingly sophisticated mechanics. It is not a difficult repertory piece, but requires the gift of projecting passion in terms of understatement.

All the essentials were at Miss Darre's fingertips yesterday. She uttered a tone of scope and brilliance (her piano, however, sounded at times high-pitched), and her ideas about the concerto's proportions disclosed a persuasive authority. Yet in the end the score emerged, probably not the way she intended, as pure display.

A lack of warmth caused the pianist to remain on the surface, drawing attention to the machine-tooled articulation of the notes. Except for some noticeable faltering in the staccato chords of Schumann's cadenza, the performing had a clockwork evenness. The tactful tuttis of Mr. Burgin, the integration of soloist and orchestra, established a fine partnership in which the strings were leaner than usual inexture. Miss Darre gave the impression that her first-rate technic and her personal involvement belonged in two separate categories.

Haydn's C Major Symphony, last done by George Szell as tha orchestra's guest conductor at the beginning of 1945, apparently comes up at 20 year intervals, for the score was presented before that by Monteux in 1924. So it was a pleasure to hear an infrequent revival. Nearly everything in the prodigal treasury of Haydn literature yields rewards of some kind or another. Here, the descending forte phrase of the finale clearly suggests the age of Beethoven.

More Gallantry

However, the reason for the music's rarity in live performance is not unremarkable. Among the Salomon symphonies of Haydn, No. 97, a polished, well-crafted score, imparts little of the inspiration of the others. It may well be the culmination of Haydn's "trumpet" symphonies, but compared to the miraculous felicities of 98, 100, "The Clock" and the "Paukenwirbel," the writing declares more gallantry than excitement.

And so it proved, with Mr. Burgin's Haydn orchestra shaping a glossy and suave treatment in which the radiance of the strings shone, and elegance prevailed. The tempos were precise balances and dynamic contrasts neat, and a purling sweetness of tone lent a high finish to the outline. Perhaps some of the sharp-edged phrasings gave the work a certain tightness. On the whole it was a forthright rendering of a relatively minor masterwork.

Best at Last

Saving the best for the last, Mr. Burgin touched the summit of his current fortnight as guest: the Sibelius Fifth. This is a symphony that could be diffuse in the hands of one less conversant with its ideas; Richard Burgin directs it with the ease and eloquence of long dedication.

The magical and mysterious northern moods, soaring climactic moments, generous emotive span, weight, vigor and detail of the Fifth, culminate in an unusually satisfactory translation. Mr. Burgin accents dramatic contrast, but the memorable aspect is, rather, his resplendent tonal color. After the course Sibelius of the Royal Philharmonic earlier this season it becomes a revelation to hear the composer's luminous shadings restored by a devoted disciple.

Next week, George Zazofsky of the orchestra is soloist in Berg's Violin Concerto. Mr. Leinsdorf, returning, also programs Wagner's "A Siegfried Idyll" and Dvorak's Symphony No. 6, in D major, Op. 60.

The Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Richard Burgin conducting, presented the sixth program of the 83rd season yesterday in Symphony Hall. Jeanne-Marie Darre was the piano soloist. The program will be repeated tonight at 8:30.

Symphony in C Major, No. 97.... Haydn
Piano Concerto in A Minor, Op. 54..... Schumann
Symphony No. 5, in E-flat Major, Op. 82..... Sibelius

SUNDAY Herald

45 1 3

...ASON • NINETEEN HUNDRED SIXTY-THREE–SIXTY-FOUR

Second Program

...FTERNOON, NOVEMBER 10, at 3:00 o'clock

...ICHARD BURGIN, Conductor

HAY... ..... Symphony in C major, No. 97

...vace
...non troppo
... Allegretto
...esto assai

SCHU... ..... Piano Concerto in A minor, Op. 54

...llegro ...ettuoso
...ntermezzo: Andantino grazioso
...Allegro vivace

INTERMISSION

SIBELIUS ..... Symphony No. 5 in E-flat major, Op. 82

I. Tempo molto moderato
II. Allegro moderato, ma poco a poco stretto
III. Andante mosso, quasi allegretto
IV. Allegro molto

SOLOIST
JEANNE-MARIE DARRÉ
Mme. DARRÉ plays the Baldwin Piano

BALDWIN PIANO — RCA VICTOR RECORDS

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Standard-Times
NEW BEDFORD, Mass.
Circ. 52,312
NOV ... 63

French Pianist Soloist With Boston Symphony

Jeanne-Marie Darre, the French pianist who will play a recital here on Dec. 5 in the New Bedford Concert Series, made a sensational debut last season with the Boston Symphony in a dazzling performance of St.-Saens "Piano Concerto No. 2 in G Minor."

Last Sunday afternoon, Madam Darre returned to the Symphony Hall stage to appear as soloist with the Boston Symphony in Schumann's "Piano Concerto in A Minor." Once again she scored a great success with the Symphony Hall audience, who recalled her to the stage five times in a spontaneous ovation.

Although her approach to this lyrical and intensely romantic work was somewhat intellectual, Madam Darre displayed some notable pianistic qualities—a varied dynamic range, a nice palette of tone color, clear-cut phrasing and a fluent and flowing technique. However, to judge a pianist by her playing of one work is a difficult task; consequently, we look forward happily to the opportunity to assess Madam Darre's full capabilities in her recital here next month.

Mr. Burgin, concluding his two-week tenure of conducting while Erich Leinsdorf was on a brief vacation, also performed Haydn's "Symphony No. 97 in C Major" and Sibelius' "Symphony No. 5 in E Flat Major."

Although we had some reservations concerning Mr. Burgin's reading of the Haydn, we had none whatsoever concerning his masterly conception of the Sibelius. This was a thrilling and deeply perceptive performance, with the great finale, our nomination for Sibelius' most magnificently affirmative piece of music, rising to a moving climax that fairly lifted the audience from their seats. Mr. Burgin has, indeed, a way with Sibelius.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Standard-Times (e)
NEW BEDFORD, Mass.
Circ. 65,046
NOV 11 1963

Miss Darre Scores In Boston Concert

By EARL J. DIAS
Standard-Times Music Critic

Jeanne-Marie Darre, the French pianist who will perform here Dec. 5 in the New Bedford Concert Series, appeared as guest soloist yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Maestro for the occasion was Richard Burgin, associate conductor of the orchestra, substituting for Erich Leinsdorf, who returns this week after a brief vacation.

Miss Darre chose to play Schumann's "Piano Concerto in A Minor," an appropriate selection since it was a woman, the composer's wife, Clara Wieck Schumann, who introduced the concerto to the world in 1845.

The concerto, like most of Schumann's music, is dependent to a high degree on tone color. After all, Schumann was not a great master of counterpoint nor of orchestration nor of the exacting from a performer the last measure of technical ability.

But in the hands of an artist who can bring richness and variety of tone color to Schumann's mastery of pure style and form, the "A Minor" concerto can be a delightful experience.

That Madam Darre is a sensitive and intelligent artist is obvious at once in her playing. She has a commendably wide dynamic range, the ability to phrase clearly and crisply, a fluent technique, and, in short, well-controlled pianism. Her approach to the concerto, however, is somewhat intellectual — not so warmly lyrical, for example, as Rubinstein's fairly recent recording of the work.

Nevertheless, hers was a performance that pleased the audience mightily; in fact, she was called back to the stage five times. The orchestra, as always, gave the soloist excellent support.

For the other selections on the program, Mr. Burgin elected to do Haydn's "Symphony in C Major, No. 97," one of the London group, and Sibelius' "Symphony No. 5 in E Flat Major." The Haydn, except in portions of the second adagio movement and the scintillating minuet, seemed to lack the requisite lightness of touch in Mr. Burgin's reading.

In the Sibelius, however, Mr. Burgin was impeccable. That he has an affinity for the Finnish composer was patent in his magnificent interpretation.

The great finale, for example, our nomination for the most stirring piece of music ever written by Sibelius, was a performance virtually electric in its effect—the orchestra rising to the rousingly affirmative climaxes with brilliance of tone and remarkable cohesive ensemble playing.

Although some may prefer Sibelius' "Symphony No. 2" to the 5th, we prefer the latter—particularly if it is given so deeply perceptive a reading as Mr. Burgin offered yesterday afternoon.

Second Program

SUNDAY AFTERNOON, NOVEMBER 10, at 3:00 o'clock

RICHARD BURGIN, Conductor

HAYDN ..... Symphony in C major, No. 97

I. Adagio; Vivace
II. Adagio ma non troppo
III. Menuetto: Allegretto
IV. Finale: Presto assai

SCHUMANN ..... Piano Concerto in A minor, Op. 54

I. Allegro affettuoso
II. Intermezzo: Andantino grazioso
III. Allegro vivace

INTERMISSION

SIBELIUS ..... Symphony No. 5 in E-flat major, Op. 82

I. Tempo molto moderato
II. Allegro moderato, ma poco a poco stretto
III. Andante mosso, quasi allegretto
IV. Allegro molto

SOLOIST
JEANNE-MARIE DARRÉ
Mme. DARRÉ plays the Baldwin Piano

BALDWIN PIANO RCA VICTOR RECORDS

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Standard-Times
NEW BEDFORD, Mass.
Circ. 52,312
NOV 17 1963

French Pianist Soloist With Boston Symphony

Jeanne-Marie Darre, the French pianist who will play a recital here on Dec. 5 in the New Bedford Concert Series, made a sensational debut last season with the Boston Symphony in a dazzling performance of St.-Saens "Piano Concerto No. 2 in G Minor."

Last Sunday afternoon, Madam Darre returned to the Symphony Hall stage to appear as soloist with the Boston Symphony in Schumann's "Piano Concerto in A Minor." Once again she scored a great success with the Symphony Hall audience, who recalled her to the stage five times in a spontaneous ovation.

Although her approach to this lyrical and intensely romantic work was somewhat intellectual, Madam Darre displayed some notable pianistic qualities—a varied dynamic range, a nice palette of tone color, clear-cut phrasing and a fluent and flowing technique. However, to judge a pianist by her playing of one work is a difficult task; consequently, we look forward happily to the opportunity to assess Madam Darre's full capabilities in her recital here next month.

Mr. Burgin, concluding his two-week tenure of conducting while Erich Leinsdorf was on a brief vacation, also performed Haydn's "Symphony No. 97 in C Major" and Sibelius' "Symphony No. 5 in E Flat Major."

Although we had some reservations concerning Mr. Burgin's reading of the Haydn, we had none whatsoever concerning his masterly conception of the Sibelius. This was a thrilling and deeply perceptive performance, with the great finale, our nomination for Sibelius' most magnificently affirmative piece of music, rising to a moving climax that fairly lifted the audience from their seats. Mr. Burgin has, indeed, a way with Sibelius.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Standard-Times (e)
NEW BEDFORD, Mass.
Circ. 65,046
NOV 11 1963

Miss Darre Scores In Boston Concert

By EARL J. DIAS
Standard-Times Music Critic

Jeanne-Marie Darre, the French pianist who will perform here Dec. 5 in the New Bedford Concert Series, appeared as guest soloist yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Maestro for the occasion was Richard Burgin, associate conductor of the orchestra, substituting for Erich Leinsdorf, who returns this week after a brief vacation.

Miss Darre chose to play Schumann's "Piano Concerto in A Minor," an appropriate selection since it was a woman, the composer's wife, Clara Wieck Schumann, who introduced the concerto to the world in 1845.

The concerto, like most of Schumann's music, is dependent to a high degree on tone color. After all, Schumann was not a great master of counterpoint nor of orchestration nor of the ex acting from a performer the last measure of technical ability.

But in the hands of an artist who can bring richness and variety of tone color to Schumann's mastery of pure style and form, the "A Minor" concerto can be a delightful experience.

That Madam Darre is a sensitive and intelligent artist is obvious at once in her playing. She has a commendably wide dynamic range, the ability to phrase clearly and crisply, a fluent technique, and, in short, well-controlled pianism. Her approach to the concerto, however, is somewhat intellectual — not so warmly lyrical, for example, as Rubinstein's fairly recent recording of the work.

Nevertheless, hers was a performance that pleased the audience mightily; in fact, she was called back to the stage five times. The orchestra, as always, gave the soloist excellent support.

For the other selections on the program, Mr. Burgin elected to do Haydn's "Symphony in C Major, No. 97," one of the London group, and Sibelius' "Symphony No. 5 in E Flat Major." The Haydn, except in portions of the second adagio movement and the scintillating minuet, seemed to lack the requisite lightness of touch in Mr. Burgin's reading.

In the Sibelius, however, Mr. Burgin was impeccable. That he has an affinity for the Finnish composer was patent in his magnificent interpretation.

The great finale, for example, our nomination for the most stirring piece of music ever written by Sibelius, was a performance virtually electric in its effect,—the orchestra rising to the rousingly affirmative climaxes with brilliance of tone and remarkable cohesive ensemble playing.

Although some may prefer Sibelius' "Symphony No. 2" to the 5th, we prefer the latter—particularly if it is given so deeply perceptive a reading as Mr. Burgin offered yesterday afternoon.

1 46 CAMBRIDGE, Mass. BOSTON 7

Second Program

TUESDAY EVENING, NOVEMBER 12, at 8:30 o'clock

SCHUMANN ..... Piano Concerto in A minor, Op. 54

I. Allegro affettuoso
II. Intermezzo: Andantino grazioso
III. Allegro vivace

INTERMISSION

MAHLER ..... Symphony No. 5, in C-sharp minor

Part I
(1) Trauermarsch
(2) Stürmisch bewegt
Part II
(3) Scherzo
Part III
(4) Adagietto
(5) Rondo Finale

SOLOIST
THEODORE LETTVIN
Mr. LETTVIN plays the Baldwin Piano

BALDWIN PIANO — RCA VICTOR RECORDS

Seventh Program

FRIDAY AFTERNOON, NOVEMBER 15, at 2:00 o'clock

SATURDAY EVENING, NOVEMBER 16, at 8:30 o'clock

WAGNER ..... A Siegfried Idyll

BERG ..... Concerto for Violin and Orchestra

Andante — Allegretto
Allegro — Adagio

INTERMISSION

DVOŘÁK ..... Symphony No. 6, in D major, Op. 60

I. Allegro non tanto
II. Adagio
III. Scherzo (Furiant): Presto; Trio
IV. Finale: Allegro con spirito

SOLOIST
GEORGE ZAZOFSKY

These concerts will end about 3:45 o'clock on Friday Afternoon; 10:15 o'clock on Saturday Evening.

BALDWIN PIANO — RCA VICTOR RECORDS

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 465,653
NOV 10 1963

Jewish Advocate
BOSTON, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 35,304
NOV 21 1963

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Herald
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 283,819
NOV 10 1963

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Record-American (m) (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 452,333
NOV 13 1963

Leinsdorf Returns

Lettvin, Zazofsky Symphony Soloists

Erich Leinsdorf, who returns this week from a short vacation, has invited pianist Theodore Lettvin and George Zazofsky, violinist, to be soloists with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Lettvin will be heard Tuesday evening at the second concert of the "Cambridge series", and Zazofsky will play at the Friday-Saturday concerts.

Tuesday's concert includes two works—Schumann's Concerto for Piano and Orchestra in A minor with Lettvin as soloist and Gustav Mahler's Symphony No. 5. This program will be televised live by WGBH-TV, Channel 2 beginning at 8:30 p.m.

Thursday at 7:30 p.m. Leinsdorf will conduct the second open rehearsal of the season.

Zazofsky, a member of the orchestra, will perform Berg's Concerto for Violin and Orchestra at the Friday-Saturday concerts. The program will also include "A Siegfried Idyl" by Wagner and Dvorak's Symphony No. 6, in D major, Op. 60.

GEORGE ZAZOFSKY

Today at 3 Richard Burgin will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in performances of Haydn's Symphony in C major, No. 97; the Piano Concerto in A minor by Schumann with Jeanne-Marie Darre as soloist; and the Symphony No. 5 in E-flat major, Op. 82 by Sibelius.

MUSIC IN REVIEW

By GERALD A. BERLIN

ZAZOFSKY IN BERG CONCERTO

There must be precious few violinists in a major symphony today who have not at some early stage in their careers thought of themselves as another Heifetz in the making. But Heifetzes or any virtuosi are rarely come by, and our symphony violinists must needs resign themselves to sawing away ever after in a fiddle section, ruefully reflecting upon every guest violin soloist's appearance that there but for the grace of God go I.

With George Zazofsky the story has had a happier ending. Mr. Zazofsky may be no Heifetz, but he is a superb craftsman of his instrument. Last weekend he was given his opportunity and the hard working veteran showed what mettlesome qualities can lie within the Boston Symphony Orchestra's string section. His vehicle was the redoubtable concerto of Alban Berg.

Though Berg is one of the most important composers of modern times, he seems to have fallen, at least for repertory purposes, between the two stools of Strauss and Mahler on the one hand and Schoenberg and Webern on the other. His incredible capacity for welding into his works the finest elements of both great lines somehow seems only to have succeeded in alienating the adherents of each, with the result that Berg's own singular and highly original genius has never quite asserted itself to the fullest.

The violin concerto, if perhaps not Berg at his greatest, nonetheless stands as a magnificent exercise of his art. Its form was inspired by the death of Mahler's 18-year-old daughter, for whom he had deep affection and for whom he composed it as a sort of requiem. In the first movement he expressly states a musical vision of the dead girl; the second he divides into "catastrophe" and "deliverance"; and in the third he introduces the chorale "Esist genug", from Bach's Cantata, "O Ewigkeit, du Donnerwort". As it turned out, the Concerto was to be something of Berg's own requiem, for he died just on its completion.

The appealing and tragic circumstances of its composition aside, the attentive listener will find it a piece suffused with a direct and simple lyricism, a warm expressiveness and a fastidiousness of musical thought that make it one of the finer contemporary works in the violin concerto form. Mr. Zazofsky played it with a suavity, strength and musical consistency that would be the envy of a battle-hardened veteran who does this sort of thing every week of the year. All kudos to him for the way in which he met and surmounted the challenge, and the same to Mr. Leinsdorf, who had the perception and imagination to give him the opportunity. It should hearten every member of the Orchestra.

Even rarer in these parts than a choice of soloist from out of the Symphony string ranks is a performance of Dvorak's Symphony No. 6, in D major, Op. 60. The last performance of this piece, incredible though it may seem, was in Nikisch's reign nearly three-quarters of a century back. (For the record, this work is what was for many, many years known as the First Symphony, until Burghauser published his new and enlarged catalogue in Prague in 1960.)

I say incredible, for seldom did Dvorak more wondrously channel his spontaneous, exuberant gift of melody and rich feeling for orchestral color in so clean limned, classically proportioned a vessel. Following as it did but upon the murky expressionism of Berg, this piece seemed absolutely redolent of pastoral joyousness and emotionally uncomplicated natural impulse. As always with Mr. Leinsdorf the sheer sound of the orchestra - here enhanced with judicious doubling in certain of the winds - was wondrously beautiful, and the over-all reading was ennobled by admirable expressiveness, grace and discipline. Even the last movement, whose thematic materials leave a great deal to be desired, shone on account of the care with which Mr. Leinsdorf paced and brought out the winsomeness of the details. It was Sibelius, I think, who once said, "It must have been fun to write music like Dvorak's." Well, Sibelius was right and that fact certainly communicated itself last weekend to the listener.

This week's program will again be conducted by Mr. Leinsdorf and includes the first performance at these concerts of Handel's Concerto Grosso for Woodwinds and Strings, in B-flat, Op. 3, No. 1; Rachmaninoff's Third Piano Concerto, with Idil Biret as soloist; the first performance of Sydeman's Study for Orchestra No. 2; and Rimsky-Korsakov's Suite from "Le Coq d'Or".

4b CAMBRIDGE, MASS. 7

Second Program

TUESDAY EVENING, NOVEMBER 12, at 8:30 o'clock

SCHUMANN ..... Piano Concerto in A minor, Op. 54

I. Allegro affettuoso
II. Intermezzo: Andantino grazioso
III. Allegro vivace

INTERMISSION

MAHLER ..... Symphony No. 5, in C-sharp minor

Part I
(1) Trauermarsch
(2) Stürmisch bewegt
Part II
(3) Scherzo
Part III
(4) Adagietto
(5) Rondo Finale

SOLOIST
THEODORE LETTVIN
Mr. LETTVIN plays the Baldwin Piano

BALDWIN PIANO — RCA VICTOR RECORDS

Seventh Program

FRIDAY AFTERNOON, NOVEMBER 15, at 2:00 o'clock

SATURDAY EVENING, NOVEMBER 16, at 8:30 o'clock

WAGNER ..... A Siegfried Idyll

BERG ..... Concerto for Violin and Orchestra

Andante — Allegretto
Allegro — Adagio

INTERMISSION

DVOŘÁK ..... Symphony No. 6, in D major, Op. 60

I. Allegro non tanto
II. Adagio
III. Scherzo (Furiant): Presto; Trio
IV. Finale: Allegro con spirito

SOLOIST
GEORGE ZAZOFSKY

These concerts will end about 3:45 o'clock on Friday Afternoon; 10:15 o'clock on Saturday Evening.

BALDWIN PIANO — RCA VICTOR RECORDS

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 465,653
NOV 10 1963

Jewish Advocate
BOSTON, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 35,304
NOV 21 1963

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Herald
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 283,819
NOV 10 1963

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Record-American (m) (e
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 452,333
NOV 13 1963

Leinsdorf Returns

Lettvin, Zazofsky Symphony Soloists

Erich Leinsdorf, who returns this week from a short vacation, has invited pianist Theodore Lettvin and George Zazofsky, violinist, to be soloists with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Lettvin will be heard Tuesday evening at the second concert of the "Cambridge Series", and Zazofsky will play at the Friday-Saturday concerts.

Tuesday's concert includes two works—Schumann's Concerto for Piano and Orchestra in A minor, with Lettvin as soloist and Gustav Mahler's Symphony No. 5. This program will be televised live by WGBH-TV, Channel 2 beginning at 8:30 p.m.

Thursday at 7:30 p.m. Leinsdorf will conduct the second open rehearsal of the season.

Zazofsky, a member of the orchestra, will perform Berg's Concerto for Violin and Orchestra at the Friday-Saturday concerts. The program will also include "A Siegfried Idyl" by Wagner and Dvorak's Symphony No. 6, in D major, Op. 60.

GEORGE ZAZOFSKY

Today at 2 Richard Burgin will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in performances of Haydn's Symphony in C major, No. 97; the Piano Concerto in A minor by Schumann with Jeanne-Marie Darre as soloist; and the Symphony No. 5 in E-flat major, Op. 82 by Sibelius.

MUSIC IN REVIEW

By GERALD A. BERLIN

ZAZOFSKY IN BERG CONCERTO

There must be precious few violinists in a major symphony today who have not at some early stage in their careers thought of themselves as another Heifetz in the making. But Heifetzes of any virtuosi are rarely come by, and our symphony violinists must needs resign themselves to sawing away ever after in the fiddle section, ruefully reflecting upon every guest violin soloist's appearance that there but for the grace of God go I.

With George Zazofsky the story has had a happier ending. Mr. Zazofsky may be no Heifetz, but he is a superb craftsman of his instrument. Last weekend he was given his opportunity, and the hard working veteran showed what mettlesome qualities can lie within the Boston Symphony Orchestra's string section. His vehicle was the redoubtable concerto of Alban Berg.

Though Berg is one of the most important composers of modern times, he seems to have fallen, at least for repertory purposes, between the two stools of Strauss and Mahler on the one hand and Schoenberg and Webern on the other. His incredible capacity for welding into his works the finest elements of both great lines somehow seems only to have succeeded in alienating the adherents of each, with the result that Berg's own singular and highly original genius has never quite asserted itself to the fullest.

The violin concerto, if perhaps not Berg at his greatest, nonetheless stands as a magnificent exercise of his art. Its form was inspired by the death of Mahler's 18-year-old daughter, for whom he had deep affection and for whom he composed it as a sort of requiem. In the first movement he expressly states a musical vision of the dead girl; the second he divides into "catastrophe" and "deliverance"; and in the third he introduces the chorale "Esist genug", from Bach's Cantata, "O Ewigkeit, du Donnerwort". As it turned out, the Concerto was to be something of Berg's own requiem, for he died just on its completion.

The appealing and tragic circumstances of its composition aside, the attentive listener will find it a piece suffused with a direct and simple lyricism, a warm expressiveness and a fastidiousness of musical thought that make it one of the finer contemporary works in the violin concerto form. Mr. Zazofsky played it with a suavity, strength and musical consistency that would be the envy of a battle-hardened veteran who does this sort of thing every week of the year. All kudos to him for the way in which he met and surmounted the challenge, and the same to Mr. Leinsdorf, who had the perception and imagination to give him the opportunity. It should hearten every member of the Orchestra.

Even rarer in these parts than a choice of soloist from out of the Symphony string ranks is a performance of Dvorak's Symphony No. 6, in D major, Op. 60. The last performance of this piece, incredible though it may seem, was in Nikisch's reign nearly three-quarters of a century back. (For the record, this work is what was for many, many years known as the First Symphony, until Burghauser published his new and enlarged

I say incredible, for seldom did Dvorak more wondrously channel his spontaneous, exuberant gift of melody and rich feeling for orchestral color in so clean limned, classically proportioned a vessel. Following as it did but upon the murky expressionism of Berg, this piece seemed absolutely redolent of pastoral joyousness and emotionally uncomplicated natural impulse. As always with Mr. Leinsdorf the sheer sound of the orchestra - here enhanced with judicious doubling in certain of the winds - was wondrously beautiful, and the over-all reading was ennobled by admirable expressiveness, grace and discipline. Even the last movement, whose thematic material leave a great deal to be desired, shone on account of the care with which Mr. Leinsdorf paced and brought out the winsomeness of the details. It was Sibelius, I think, who once said, "It must have been fun to write music like Dvorak's." Well, Sibelius was right and that fact certainly communicated itself last weekend to the listener.

This week's program will again be conducted by Mr. Leinsdorf and includes the first performance at these concerts of Handel's Concerto Grosso for Woodwinds and Strings, in B-flat, Op. 3, No. 1; Rachmaninoff's Third Piano Concerto, with Jail Biret as soloist; the first performance of Sydeman's Study for Orchestra, No. 2; and Rimsky-Korsakov's Suite from "Le Coq d'Or".

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • Richmond 2-4200
Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 194,870
NOV 16 1963

At Symphony
George Zazofsky Plays Berg Concerto

By MARGO MILLER

Where to start with the Berg Violin Concerto? With its commission and dedication to a valiant young girl? With the pulse of emotion which set a usually deliberate composer to write the work in but six weeks? Or with the soloist? By all means, let us start with George Zazofsky who was the music itself yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall.

His credentials are in order: member of the Boston Symphony since 1941, concertmaster of a number of other ensembles, student of Louis Krasner who commissioned the Berg Concerto. Mention of his technical equipment would include, besides his Guarneri del Gesu, a luminous tone, keen ear, fingers and bow in full control. Zazofsky has in addition the kind of general view of the Berg Concerto which demonstrates that this is music of great tenderness (as the composer intended) and of no little power. We catergorize here, lest audiences suppose that Berg's twelve-note system makes the music prickly to the ear and not immediately approachable. Zazofsky says otherwise.

He sees its large and small patterns thrusting the music forward. There are to be sure the arching lines which open the concerto and the other rising passages which elsewhere propel. It's a matter for the soloist to loft the lines as well as land them. Here Zazofsky inserts pungent accents as punctuation. Or perhaps it will be necessary on the next page to topple one phrase, the better to build upon it the next. Or maybe it's the simple and pleasurable decision to loose lovely tones from his fiddle.

The sum of these details is a piece of music quick with life, artistic and emotional.

Two works for orchestra alone framed the concerto. Erich Leinsdorf chose "A Siegfried Idyll" by Wagner to begin the concert. There was also on the program a kind of premiere. Dvorak's Symphony No. 6 was last played by this orchestra in 1890, thus predating Symphony Hall itself by a decade. Both works began auspiciously with the Boston Symphony strings caressing Wagner's musical birthday present to his wife and then later launching into the good-humored D major Symphony.

But, as sometimes happens with Leinsdorf, there comes a hiatus while the composer recasts his material and the conductor follows him too devotedly. These excursions are delightful and would be evocative if one sensed that the involvement would again pick up. Somewhere, however, the thread is lost and so is the interest. It's as though Leinsdorf were admiring a preposition in a mighty statement.

At next week's concerts on Friday and Saturday, the young Turkish pianist Idil Biret will make her U.S. debut in the Third Rachmaninoff Concerto. The program will also include Handel's Concerto Grosso for Woodwinds and Strings in B flat, Op. 3, No. 1, and Rimsky-Korsakov's Suite from "Le Coq d'Or." Study for Orchestra No. 2 by William Sydeman will have its first performance.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Erich Leinsdorf, conducting, played Friday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program, to be repeated tonight at 8:30, comprised: Wagner's "A Siegfried Idyll;" Berg's Concerto for Violin and Orchestra with George Zazofsky as soloist, and Dvorak's Symphony No. 6 in D major, Op. 60.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • Richmond 2-4200
Herald (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 178,553
NOV 16 1963

The Symphony

Zazofsky Hailed In Berg Concerto

By ROBERT TAYLOR

Alban Berg's Violin Concerto, a testament of solace before the ambiguities of death, can be treated dramatically—or, as George Zazofsky chooses to present it at this weekend's Symphony concerts, in terms of consecrated introspection.

Accorded the honor of the soloist's role after 21 years as an ensemble musician, Mr. Zazofsky (playing, incidentally, a 1731 Guarneri del Gesu named "The Baltic") gratifyingly demonstrated the solid attainment that lies within the ranks of the orchestra itself.

Always Agreeable

It is always agreeable to find a desk man distinguished by the spotlight. Moreover, since he was a student of Louis Krasner, who commissioned the work and first played it here, Mr. Zazofsky is peculiarly equipped to carry on the apostolic succession, as it were, after the manner of the pupils of Liszt.

Yet his performance in the Concerto differs materially; he has his own ideas. The mood of the score is one of reconciliation, expressed in technique as well as content, a concordat between 12-tone music and the tonal realm, between the radiant acceptance of a Bach chorale and dotted rhythms of fear and apprehension.

Thus the artist may interpret it as a turbulent, virtuosic tempest of tensions and relief. Mr. Zazofsky, however, elected a quieter exploration of the music, lyric and meditative and intimately scaled. Either approach is valid, and here especially so, the analytic and tender dimension prevailing throughout. One does not expect an orchestral musician to develop the virtuoso temperament overnight; but one may insist upon his justification as soloist by the individual statement he makes. Mr. Zazofsky gave us fresh insights yesterday.

Fresh Insights

He offered the opening arpeggios crisply, than the scherzo's Viennese landler motifs and

The Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf conducting, presented the sevent hconcert of the 83rd season yesterday in Symphony Hall. George Zazofsky, violin, was the soloist. The performance will be repeated tonight at 8:30.

A Siegfried Idyll ..... Wagner
Concerto for Violin and Orchestra ..... Berg
Symphony No. 6, in D Maior, Op. 60 ..... Dvorak

Carinthian folk melody, gentle echoes of gaiety. The rhapsodic improvisatory character of the allegro again hinted at doom, and the agonies of the climax were no less expressive because they seemed to spring from stricken despair rather than heaven-storming grief.

The chorale was majestic and four-square and its reunion of Bach's Cantata, 'Oh Eternity, thou word of thunder' with the simplicities of the folk tune ended on a tone row transformation of celestial emotion.

What I liked about Mr. Zazofsky's reading was its persuasive serenity. He did not impose himself on the music. While he has the power of stoppings or bowings to create a brilliant performance, he brought out the exceedingly personal aspect. A more intense involvement could have lent the waltz and the folk tunes a glitter they lacked, but in the end, the organic solemnity of the score achieves greater meaning.

Odd Programming

Mr. Leinsdorf, who is usually impeccable in matters of programming, permitted himself a rare lapse by placing The Siegfried Idyll and the Berg side by side. The former received a particularly fine account, each phrase modelled with sensitivity and the orchestral detail a fabric of luminous sound. The character of the score, however, relates too strongly to the Concerto as a hushed interlude, the poetry of melancholy, with the result that a somewhat lugubrious air surrounded the first half.

This was dispelled by the novel Dvorak Sixth Symphony according to the latest catalogue of the composer's nine), which has not been done here since March, 1890, under the baton of Nikisch. Mr. Leinsdorf does us a service by its revival, for the work, resolutely joyous, bright and high-spirited, has much to commend it.

The reason why the Dvorak Sixth lies neglected is obvious. It does not conform to the taste of, presumably, a more sophisticated time. You don't have to be musically literate to recognize the orchestral cliches of its development, right down to the coda.

Bold Textures

On the other hand, the colorful and bold Czech textures, the instrumentation that accents each section of the ensemble so affectionately, the amiable tunes and cheerful outline impart infectious joy.

The performance moved along with sparkle, ease and uncomplicated lines. Save for the adagio, which seems a trifle long-winded, I found the restoration delightful.

The young Turkish performer, Miss Idil Biret, makes her debut here next week in Rachmaninoff's Third Piano Concerto in D minor. Mr. Leinsdorf has also scheduled the premiere of Sydeman's "Study for Orchestra No. 2," Handel's Concerto Grosso for Woodwins and Strings, No. 3 in B-flat, and Rimsky-Korsakov's Suite from "Le Coq d'Or".

Berg and all that noise

By Harold Rogers

Said one little lady to another little lady at intermission time, "How did you like that noise?"

She was referring to—of all things—that conservative piece of classicism from the early atonal period of Schoenbergian expressionism, otherwise known as Alban Berg's Concerto for Violin and Orchestra.

That it could still be considered noise in these latter days is incredible. She should listen to what noise really is. A Babbitt piece for a programed computer and caterwauling soprano, for instance. If Berg affects her as noise, Babbitt would send her running from the hall in blind terror.

But for those of us long since accustomed to the sonic madness of our times, the Berg fell upon our tired ears like sweetest balm. With textures of shimmering impressionistic silk, with muted dynamics, with moods fashioned by a true poet, the concerto again impressed me as a masterpiece of its kind.

♪ ♪ ♪

The soloist on this occasion was George Zazofsky, a member of the first violin section of the Boston Symphony; he made the most of his day in the sun on Friday afternoon; he was magnificently supported by Erich Leinsdorf and his orchestra colleagues.

Mr. Zazofsky described the lyrical melodies with warmth of tone, beauty of phrase. He was applauded by both the audience and his fellow musicians. Had there been fewer in the audience under the impression that the Berg was noise, Mr. Zazofsky would have received more of the acclaim he deserved.

Mr. Leinsdorf opened with a performance of "A Siegfried Idyll," in which he truly caressed Wagner's lovely serenade. With no great imagination one can see Cosima in an ecstacy of heaving sighs as Richard surprised her with this birthday gift on that Christmas morning in 1870. Had she had the Boston Symphony outside her window, she surely would have fainted "for mingled pain and bliss."

♪ ♪ ♪

Mr. Leinsdorf closed with Dvořák's Symphony in D major, first published as No. 1, now known as No. 6. Unheard here since 1890 under Nikisch, this winsome work merits its revival.

It was not so tidy as are most of Mr. Leinsdorf's readings, yet somehow it was all the more appealing for its unschooled exuberance. The Furiant was Bohemia in the epitome as the rhythm spinned dizzily.

As for noise, it was far noisier than the Berg; any decibel rating would have proved that. But it is not the intensity that strikes the ear as noise; it is merely an unfamiliar pattern.

There will come a day when the grandmothers who come to Symphony Hall will put the Berg Violin Concerto on their stereos to send their grandchildren off to sleep.

1 48

MONDAY 1. TUESDAY 3

First Program

MONDAY EVENING, NOVEMBER 18, at 8:30 o'clock

HINDEMITH ..... Symphonic Metamorphosis of Themes by Carl Maria von Weber

WAGNER ..... A Siegfried Idyll

INTERMISSION

BRAHMS ..... Symphony No. 1, in C minor, Op. 68

I. Un poco sostenuto; allegro
II. Andante sostenuto
III. Un poco allegretto e grazioso
IV. Adagio; allegro non troppo, ma con brio

BALDWIN PIANO

RCA VICTOR RECORDS

EIGHTY-THIRD SEASON • NINETEEN HUNDRED SIXTY-THREE–SIXTY-FOUR

Third Program

TUESDAY EVENING, NOVEMBER 19, at 8:30 o'clock

BERG ..... Concerto for Violin and Orchestra

Andante — Allegretto
Allegro — Adagio

INTERMISSION

MAHLER ..... Symphony No. 5, in C-sharp minor

Part I
(1) Trauermarsch
(2) Stürmisch bewegt
Part II
(3) Scherzo
Part III
(4) Adagietto
(5) Rondo Finale

SOLOIST
GEORGE ZAZOFSKY

BALDWIN PIANO

RCA VICTOR RECORDS

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Patriot-Ledger (e)
QUINCY, Mass.
Circ. 44,419
NOV 20 1963

The Sound of Music

A Night To Remember

By Dan Webster

A program of nearly perfect architecture was fashioned by Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony last night. Playing at Symphony Hall in the third concert in the new Tuesday night series, the orchestra played music to stretch the mind and to sear the heart. It was Berg and Mahler, prophets of the musical fervor in Vienna in the early day of this century.

To the concert goer the Berg violin concerto is one of the great rewards of a season. It is music that is talked about, revered, but seldom played; it is familiar to the conservatory student and unseen after he graduates to the professional orchestras.

The conditions for its performance last night were all favorable. The soloist, George Zazofsky, a member of the orchestra, is years deep in playing it. A student of Louis Krasner, the violinist who commissioned the work, Mr. Zazofsky has probed its depths during long study and association.

It is a work important to Mr. Leinsdorf as well for its musical merit and as a vehicle for putting the orchestra on its mettle. Conductor, soloist and orchestra were on their mettle last night.

Composed in 1935, just before Berg's death, the music is more accessible than much of his earlier production. No longer angry or so deeply in need of writing music to illustrate the atonalist's credo, he wrote intensely and he wrote for music's sake.

The music has a cumulative impact. Mr. Zazofsky played his Guarnarius instrument with the grand design in mind, opening, the music drily, drawing richer sounds and greater intensity as the music grew.

The effect of the first movement is lyrical despite the difficulties atonalism imposes on the player; the intervals and harmonies are extremely difficult, the meter complex, the dynamics subtle and demanding. It is a virtuoso concerto in which virtuosity is less displayed than concealed from the ear.

Mr. Zazofsky is cold and austere on the stage, but his playing has warmth and beauty. In the second movement, the music heightens its tragic note and deepens its intensity. Here the violinist was swept into the music more, achieving deep emotional impact when the clear theme of the Bach chorale emerges midway in the final movement.

While audience attention focused on the soloist the orchestra's role could not be ignored. It is music scored for large forces, yet the textures are woven of single strands of transparent sound: cymbals touched lightly, a muted tuba, light-throated woodwind combinations, with only an occasional outbreak of full orchestral sound.

And it is exciting to see Mr. Leinsdorf pulling these strands together, combining, sorting, building.

The Berg Work was in vivid contrast to the Mahler Symphony No. 5 in c sharp minor. The symphony is sprawling while the concerto is succinct. The symphony is extravagantly scored; the concerto, austerity itself.

Where the symphony cries out in anguish, its impact is diffused by a sweetness in the strings or the hint of a happy waltz or laendler; where it dances with peasant freedom, it also moans in anguish. It is an ultimate statement by an ultimate romantic.

The orchestra revelled in the sounds the symphony demands. Roger Voisin, principal trumpet, and James Stagliano, principal horn, were singled out for solo bows at the end. Mr. Stagliano's obligato solo through the scherzo was an immaculate demonstration of the expressive range of his cantankerous instrument. Both proved that brass need not be confused with brash and that the pianissimo can be as exciting as the loudest fanfare.

Mahler's writing for strings was especially congenial to the Boston forces: the sound was rich, the phrasing graceful and precise.

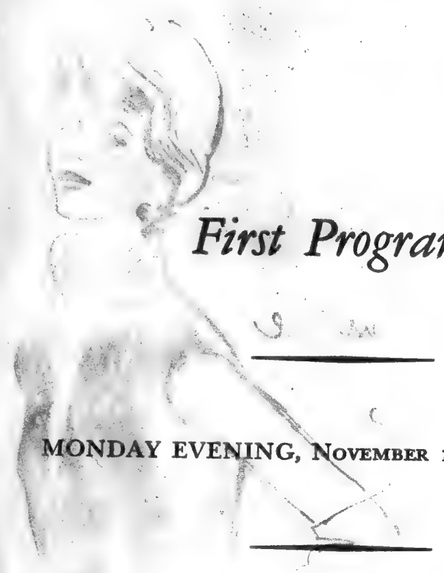
Mr. Leinsdorf guided his players without the help of the score — his custom except in concerti — but in this case it amounted to conducting a concerto for conductor and orchestra. The complexity of the score was never obtrusive as he carefully balanced the sections, molded the phrases, shaded the dynamics. Seeing his performance left no doubts about the source of the new achievements of the orchestra. It was a program and a performance to remember.

GEORGE ZAZOFSKY

48.

MONDAY 1. TUESDAY 3

EIGHTY-THIRD SEASON • NINETEEN HUNDRED SIXTY-THREE–SIXTY-FOUR



First Program

MONDAY EVENING, NOVEMBER 18, at 8:30 o'clock

HINDEMITH ..... Symphonic Metamorphosis of Themes by Carl Maria von Weber

WAGNER ..... A Siegfried Idyll

INTERMISSION

BRAHMS ..... Symphony No. 1, in C minor, Op. 68

I. Un poco sostenuto; allegro
II. Andante sostenuto
III. Un poco allegretto e grazioso
IV. Adagio; allegro non troppo, ma con brio

BALDWIN PIANO • CHESTNUT HILL • SOUTH SHORE • RCA VICTOR RECORDS

EIGHTY-THIRD SEASON • NINETEEN HUNDRED SIXTY-THREE–SIXTY-FOUR

Third Program

TUESDAY EVENING, NOVEMBER 19, at 8:30 o'clock

BERG ..... Concerto for Violin and Orchestra

Andante — Allegretto
Allegro — Adagio

INTERMISSION

MAHLER ..... Symphony No. 5, in C-sharp minor

Part I
(1) Trauermarsch
(2) Stürmisch bewegt
Part II
(3) Scherzo
Part III
(4) Adagietto
(5) Rondo Finale

SOLOIST
GEORGE ZAZOFSKY

BALDWIN PIANO RCA VICTOR RECORDS

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Patriot-Ledger (e)
QUINCY, Mass.
Circ. 44,419
NOV 20 1963

The Sound of Music

A Night To Remember

By Dan Webster

A program of nearly perfect architecture was fashioned by Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony last night. Playing at Symphony Hall in the third concert in the new Tuesday night series, the orchestra played music to stretch the mind and to sear the heart. It was Berg and Mahler, prophets of the musical fervor in Vienna in the early day of this century.

To the concert goer the Berg violin concerto is one of the great rewards of a season. It is music that is talked about, revered, but seldom played; it is familiar to the conservatory student and unseen after he graduates to the professional orchestras.

The conditions for its performance last night were all favorable. The soloist, George Zazofsky, a member of the orchestra, is years deep in playing it. A student of Louis Krasner, the violinist who commissioned the work, Mr. Zazofsky has probed its depths during long study and association.

It is a work important to Mr. Leinsdorf as well for its musical merit and as a vehicle for putting the orchestra on its mettle. Conductor, soloist and orchestra were on their mettle last night.

Composed in 1935, just before Berg's death, the music is more accessible than much of his earlier production. No longer angry or so deeply in need of writing music to illustrate the atonalist's credo, he wrote intensely and he wrote for music's sake.

The music has a cumulative impact. Mr. Zazofsky played his Guarnarius instrument with the grand design in mind, opening the music drily, drawing richer sounds and greater intensity as the music grew.

The effect of the first movement is lyrical despite the difficulties atonalism imposes on the player; the intervals and harmonies are extremely difficult, the meter complex, the dynamics subtle and demanding. It is a virtuoso concerto in which virtuosity is less displayed than concealed from the ear.

Mr. Zazofsky is cold and austere on the stage, but his playing has warmth and beauty. In the second movement, the music heightens its tragic note and deepens its intensity. Here the violinist was swept into the music more, achieving deep emotional impact when the clear theme of the Bach chorale emerges midway in the final movement.

While audience attention focused on the soloist the orchestra's role could not be ignored. It is music scored for large forces, yet the textures are woven of single strands of transparent sound: cymbals touched lightly, a muted tuba, light-throated woodwind combinations, with only an occasional outbreak of full orchestral sound.

And it is exciting to see Mr. Leinsdorf pulling these strands together, combining, sorting, building.

The Berg Work was in vivid contrast to the Mahler Symphony No. 5 in c sharp minor. The symphony is sprawling while the concerto is succinct. The symphony is extravagantly scored; the concerto, austerity itself.

Where the symphony cries out in anguish, its impact is diffused by a sweetness in the strings or the hint of a happy waltz or laendler; where it dances with peasant freedom, it also moans in anguish. It is an ultimate statement by an ultimate romantic.

The orchestra revelled in the sounds the symphony demands. Roger Voisin, principal trumpet, and James Stagliano, principal horn, were singled out for solo bows at the end. Mr. Stagliano's obligato solo through the scherzo was an immaculate demonstration of the expressive range of his cantankerous instrument. Both proved that brass need not be confused with brash and that the pianissimo can be as exciting as the loudest fanfare.

Mahler's writing for strings was especially congenial to the Boston forces: the sound was rich, the phrasing graceful and precise.

Mr. Leinsdorf guided his players without the help of the score — his custom except in concerti — but in this case it amounted to conducting a concerto for conductor and orchestra. The complexity of the score was never obtrusive as he carefully balanced the sections, molded the phrases, shaded the dynamics. Seeing his performance left no doubts about the source of the new achievements of the orchestra. It was a program and a performance to remember.

GEORGE ZAZOFSKY

BOSTON 8

49 1 3

Eighth Program

NOON, NOVEMBER 22, at 2:00 o'clock

SATURDAY EVENING, NOVEMBER 23, at 8:30 o'clock

Concerto Grosso in B-flat major, Op. 3, No. 1
I – Largo – Allegro
(First performance at these concerts)

Study for Orchestra No. 2
(First performance)

RIMSKY-KORSAKOV ..... Suite from "Le Coq d'Or"
I. King Dodon in his palace
II. King Dodon in the country
III. King Dodon with the Queen of Shemakha
IV. Wedding March and the lamentable end of King Dodon

INTERMISSION

RACHMANINOFF ..... Piano Concerto No. 3, in D minor
I. Allegro ma non tanto
II. Intermezzo: Adagio
III. Finale

SOLOIST
IDIL BIRET
Miss BIRET plays the Baldwin Piano

BALDWIN PIANO

RCA VICTOR RECORDS

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sun (e)
LOWELL, Mass.
Circ. 45,001
NOV 16 1963

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Herald
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 283,819
NOV 17 1963

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 465,653
NOV 17 1963

Idel Biret to Play

Symphony Debut For Young Pianist

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will present two debuts at its regular Friday-Saturday concerts this week in Symphony Hall. Idel Biret, young Turkish pianist, will make her first appearances in the United States at these concerts, and music by the American composer William Sydeman will be performed for the first time by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

IDEL BIRET

Erich Leinsdorf has invited Miss Biret to perform the Rachmaninoff Piano Concerto No. 3 with the Orchestra on the Friday-Saturday program. Mr. Sydeman's "Study for Orchestra" No. 2 will be given its world premiere in the second half of these concerts.

The weekend program will also include the Concerto Grosso in B flat major, Op. 3, No. 1, by Handel and Rimsky-Korsakov's Suite from "Le Coq d'Or."

Tomorrow evening the Boston Symphony Orchestra will present the opening concert in the series of six Monday evening programs. Mr. Leinsdorf will conduct the Orchestra in Hindemith's "Symphonic Metamorphosis"; the "Siegfried Idyl" by Wagner; and the Symphony No. 1 by Brahms.

George Zazofsky will be soloist on Tuesday evening in a performance of the Concerto for Violin and Orchestra by Alban Berg. At that concert Mr. Leinsdorf will also conduct Mahler's Symphony No. 5.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Evening Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 146,915

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Christian Science
Monitor (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 174,850

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Christian Science
Monitor (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 174,850
NOV 23 1963

Marcia funebre

Idil Biret's debut

By Harold Rogers

Idil Biret, Turkist pianist, will make her United States debut with the Boston Symphony on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Erich Leinsdorf conducting.

Erich Leinsdorf stepped on the podium, faced the audience, lifted his hand for silence, then spoke:

"Ladies and gentlemen, we have received a report from the press . . . that our President has been the victim of an assassination."

Gasps of dismay arose from the Symphony Hall audience.

"We shall therefore now play the Funeral March from Beethoven's 'Eroica.'"

Shouts of "No! No!" rang out spontaneously, yet the listeners rose to their feet as Mr. Leinsdorf led the Boston Symphony Orchestra into the first bars.

Many times have we all heard Beethoven's masterful statement—its serene affirmation of life eternal—yet to few of us, I dare say, has this music ever spoken more profoundly, more personally. Here was the union of actual tragedy with Beethoven's unequaled poetic expression of a hero's life.

Mr. Leinsdorf had conducted two pieces before his announcement — Handel's Concerto Grosso in B-flat major, Op. 3, No. 1, and the world premiere of William Sydeman's Study for Orchestra No. 2. The Suite from Rimsky-Korsakov's "Le Coq d'Or" relinquished its place on the program to the Beethoven Funeral March.

* * *

After the intermission Henry B. Cabot, the Boston Symphony's president, came to the front of the stage and said:

"Many of the ladies and gentlemen of the orchestra have come to me during the intermission to ask if our concert this afternoon should be discontinued. I told them . . ." (and here his voice broke) ". . . that on the day my father died I came to the symphony for consolation, and I know that now you'll receive it yourselves."

There were two major reasons why Mr. Cabot did well to continue the concert. Idil Biret, the 22-year-old Turkish pianist, was scheduled to make her debut in the United States. And the Rachmaninoff Concerto No. 3, her vehicle on this occasion, carried forward the affirmative mood so magnificently set forth in the Beethoven.

A great healing took place as Miss Biret lifted our hearts above the mists; clouds parted; great shafts of light poured through as she evoked the passion and ardor of Rachmaninoff's sweeping themes.

* * *

There was a buoyant quality to her playing; a great warmth of tone was in no way dispelled by her technical skill. Power she gave us without a bang; emotion without a sentimental tear. There is no question that Miss Biret is one of the most extraordinary of our younger musicians, and many of her listeners testified to her artistry by giving her a standing ovation, punctuated by bravas.

Mr. Sydeman was also on hand to accept the resulting applause from his Study for Orchestra No. 2. His is a skillfully wrought score, highly inventive, distinguished by its lyricism though apparently atonal. In one movement, the work moves through four distinct sections, contrasting great swells of tension with areas of release.

Moods vary widely — sometime impressionistic, at others expressionistic — through contemplation, aspiration, eruptive anger, dithyrambic gaiety, and loneliness as the flute sings a sad melody at the conclusion.

BOSTON 8

49

Eighth Program

FRIDAY AFTERNOON, NOVEMBER 22, at 2:00 o'clock

SATURDAY EVENING, NOVEMBER 23, at 8:30 o'clock

HANDEL . . . . . Concerto Grosso in B-flat major, Op. 3, No. 1
Allegro — Largo — Allegro
(First performance at these concerts)

SYDEMAN . . . . . Study for Orchestra No. 2
(First performance)

RIMSKY-KORSAKOV . . . . . Suite from "Le Coq d'Or"
I. King Dodon in his palace
II. King Dodon in the country
III. King Dodon with the Queen of Shemakha
IV. Wedding March and the lamentable end of King Dodon

INTERMISSION

RACHMANINOFF . . . . . Piano Concerto No. 3, in D minor
I. Allegro ma non tanto
II. Intermezzo: Adagio
III. Finale

SOLOIST
IDIL BIRET
Miss BIRET plays the Baldwin Piano

BALDWIN PIANO

RCA VICTOR RECORDS

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sun (e)
LOWELL, Mass.
Circ. 45,001
NOV 16 1963

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Herald
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 283,819
NOV 17 1963

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 465,653
NOV 17 1963

Idel Biret to Play
Symphony Debut For Young Pianist

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will present two debuts at its regular Friday-Saturday concerts this week in Symphony Hall. Idel Biret, young Turkish pianist, will make her first appearances in the United States at these concerts, and music by the American composer William Sydeman will be performed for the first time by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

IDEL BIRET

Erich Leinsdorf has invited Miss Biret to perform the Rachmaninoff Piano Concerto No. 3 with the Orchestra on the Friday-Saturday program. Mr. Sydeman's "Study for Orchestra" No. 2 will be given its world premiere in the second half of these concerts.

The weekend program will also include the Concerto Grosso in B flat major, Op. 3, No. 1, by Handel and Rimsky-Korsakov's Suite from "Le Coq d'Or."

Tomorrow evening the Boston Symphony Orchestra will present the opening concert in the series of six Monday evening programs. Mr. Leinsdorf will conduct the Orchestra in Hindemith's "Symphonic Metamorphosis"; the "Siegfried Idyl" by Wagner; and the Symphony No. 1 by Brahms.

George Zazofsky will be soloist on Tuesday evening in a performance of the Concerto for Violin and Orchestra by Alban Berg. At that concert Mr. Leinsdorf will also conduct Mahler's Symphony No. 5.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Evening Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 146,915
NOV 20 1963

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Christian Science Monitor (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 174,850
NOV 18 1963

Idil Biret, Turkist pianist, will make her United States debut with the Boston Symphony on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Erich Leinsdorf conducting.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Christian Science Monitor (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 174,850
NOV 23 1963

Marcia funebre

Idil Biret's debut

By Harold Rogers

Erich Leinsdorf stepped on the podium, faced the audience, lifted his hand for silence, then spoke:

"Ladies and gentlemen, we have received a report from the press . . . that our President has been the victim of an assassination."

Gasps of dismay arose from the (Symphony) Hall audience.

"We shall therefore now play the Funeral March from Beethoven's 'Eroica.'"

Shouts of "No! No!" rang out spontaneously, yet the listeners rose to their feet as Mr. Leinsdorf led the Boston Symphony Orchestra into the first pars.

Many times have we all heard Beethoven's masterful statement—its serene affirmation of life e[illegible]—yet so few of us, I dare say, has this music ever spoken more profoundly, more personally. Here was the union of actual tragedy with Beethoven's unequaled poetic expression of a hero's life.

Mr. Leinsdorf had conducted two pieces before his announcement — Handel's Concerto Grosso in B-flat major, Op. 3, No. 1, and the world premiere of William Sydeman's Study for Orchestra No. 2. The Suite from Rimsky-Korsakov's "Le Coq d'Or" relinquished its place on the program to the Beethoven Funeral March.

* * *

After the intermission Henry B. Cabot, the Boston Symphony's president, came to the front of the stage and said:

"Many of the ladies and gentlemen of the orchestra have come to me during the intermission to ask if our concert this afternoon should be discontinued. I told them . . ." (and here his voice broke) ". . . that on the day my father died I came to the symphony for consolation, and I know that now you'll receive it yourselves."

There were two major reasons why Mr. Cabot did well to continue the concert. Idil Biret, the 22-year-old Turkish pianist, was scheduled to make her debut in the United States. And the Rachmaninoff Concerto No. 3, her vehicle on this occasion, carried forward the affirmative mood so magnificently set forth in the Beethoven.

A great healing took place as Miss Biret lifted our hearts above the mists; clouds parted; great shafts of light poured through as she evoked the passion and ardor of Rachmaninoff's sweeping themes.

* * *

There was a buoyant quality to her playing; a great warmth of tone was in no way dispelled by her technical skill. Power she gave us without a bang; emotion without a sentimental tear. There is no question that Miss Biret is one of the most extraordinary of our younger musicians, and many of her listeners testified to her artistry by giving her a standing ovation, punctuated by bravas.

Mr. Sydeman was also on hand to accept the resulting applause from his Study for Orchestra No. 2. His is a skillfully wrought score, highly inventive, distinguished by its lyricism though apparently atonal. In one movement, the work moves through four distinct sections, contrasting great swells of tension with areas of release.

Moods vary widely — sometime impressionistic, at others expressionistic — through contemplation, aspiration, eruptive anger, dithyrambic gaiety, and loneliness as the flute sings a sad melody at the conclusion.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 194,870

NOV 23 1963

At Symphony

Tribute to Kennedy Is Solace in Music

By MARGO MILLER

The Boston Symphony Orchestra played the funeral march from Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony, following Erich Leinsdorf's announcement to a stunned audience of Rresident John F. Kennedy's death. As the tribute began, the Symphony Hall audience rose to its feet, remaining with heads bowed through the movement A moment of silence followed.

The concert had begun in normal fashion just on 2 p.m. But one heard after the opening work, a Handel Concerto Grosso, rumors passed among the audience. The concert continued with the premiere of William Sydeman's Study for Orchestra No. 2. Those who slipped out of the hall for confirmation of the President's death gave the news to their seatmates. And upon stage the orchestra's librarians were passing out new music to the players. Leinsdorf entered, hushed the audience, and said that "reports over the wireless can no longer be doubted. The President has been the victim of an assassin."

The "Eroica' 'marcia funebre' is one of the great moments in music. The dread beat of the march cannot be disguised. Yet there is a middle section of the movement, a time of incredible energy and involvement, somehow, or so it seemed Friday, expressing eternal hope. And that music gives solace to the mourner was in the words of Henry B. Cabot, president of the B.S.O. trustees. At intermission some members of the orchestra had suggested the remainder of the program be cancelled. Cabot bid them and the audience stay, recalling that on the day of his father's death he had gone to Symphony for consolation. Most listeners took heed.

So it was the task of the orchestra, of Leinsdorf and of a young Turkish pianist, making her U.S. debut, to provide comfort through music. The work, as scheduled, was Rachmaninoff's Third Piano Concerto. Idil Biret attacked it with the rapture of youth.

The fiery qualities in the piece are well within her grasp. She has in addition an ability to project its lyric moments. Her talents are evenly distributed among touch (her round sounds in the opening allegro were as pleasing and apt as the glittering tones she drew later in the finale) and dynamic range. And her sense of phrasing was unerring.

Miss Biret, whose 22d birthday fell yesterday, was the wunderkind of Turkey. At four she played for her head of state, at seven the Turkish government sent her to Paris, where she was placed under the tutalage of Nadia Boulanger. Having concertized in England, France and Russia, she began her American visit in Boston fulfilling European recommendations. May her subsequent appearances fall on happier days.

Sharing the program Friday was a new work by William Sydeman. His Second Study for Orchestra evokes some interesting effects from the orchestra. His writing for strings is solid, his structural organization is totally sustained choir to choir. But the whole piece impresses one as a study of the orchestra rather than music for it.

Leinsdorf began a series of programs offering Boston Symphony principals as soloists with Handel's Concerto Grosso in B-flat major, Op. 3, No. 1. The piece was done with great flair, notably by Ralph Gomberg, first oboe; John Holmes, as the second oboe; and Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster. Next week Silverstein will be joined by Doriot Anthony Dwyer and James Pappoutsakis, flutes, in the Fourth Brandenberg Concerto of Bach. The program will also include

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Herald (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 178,553

NOV 23 19

The Symphony

Leinsdorf, Orchestra In Kennedy Tribute

By ROBERT TAYLOR

A dazed cry of incredulity, shock and pain burst from the audience at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon as conductor Erich Leinsdorf, midway through the concert, announced the death of President Kenedy.

Stepping quietly before the conductor's platform, Mr. Leinsdorf held up his hand and said: "Ladies and gentlemen, there is a press report, just received, that The President of the United States has been the victim of an assassination." The collective voice that greeted these words was like a vast billow of horrified breath.

Noble Music

"In honor of the late President we shall now play the Funeral March from Beethoven's 'Eroica' Symphony," continued Mr. Leinsdorf as soon as the echoes subsided. He turned to the orchestra and brought down his hands, and the grave, slow, noble music of the heroic march flooded through the hall.

At the first strains, the audience spontaneously rose, and with bowed heads, remained standing throughout. The impact of the news dawned on face after face while the solemn tread of the melody—marked in the score, 'Funeral March upon the death of a hero'—asserted the lamentation of a proud immortal spirit. Nowhere, however, was the general dismay more clearly expressed than within the ranks of the orchestra itself.

Violinist Alfred Krips fought to control his emotions, laid down his instrument, dabbed at his eyes and rejoined the ensemble. The facial muscles of Bernard Parronchi, an ordinarily impassive 'cellist, worked uncontrollably. The inexorable pulse of the music broadened and crested over the standing, silent throng. Such profundity of grief could only be expressed in the surge of shee sound. Through that long u spoken arch existed the meaning of a stricken grandeur.

Then Mr. Leinsdorf dropped his hands, the music ceased, and he remained frozen in an attitude of prayer. The still immobile audience, touched by random weeping, joined the tribute. Then Mr. Leinsdorf quickly strode toward the stage exit.

The substitution of Beethoven's Funeral March for Rimsky-Korsakoff's Coq d'Or Suite recalled the death of President Wilson on an afternoon when the great Negro tenor, Roland Hayes, had been scheduled for a Symphony Hall recital. Mr. Hayes announced the President's passing and in the subsequent hush, with his eyes closed, his hands folded, he sang unforgettably the movin spiritual, 'Goin' Home,' to close the concert.

But on this occasion the concert did not end with the declaration of a national tragedy. Henry B. Cabot, President of the Boston Symphony's Trustees, informed the audience why he had decided to continue.

Partly Filled

The hall, after intermission, was only partly filled for the remaining score, Rachmaninoff's Third Piano Concerto, which would introduce the 22-year-old Turkish artist, Idel Biret. Mr. Cabot, a tall lean man, the very embodiment of a New England idealism that made its way into the distinguished leaders produced in every phase of the best of our regional life, was at first interrupted by cries of "Louder!" and in a firm voice reiterated:

"The ladies and gentlemen of the orchestra behind me have asked whether or not the concert should continue; and I told them it should go on."

His voice acquired a trembling edge of deeply-felt conviction.

"The day my father died I came to The Symphony for consolation, and I hope you will accept my present decision in this same spirit."

Seldom has a debut performer confronted a less favorable environment than that afforded Miss Biret by the sudden and catastrophic events of history. Let us say that she met and dispelled chaos not only by gallantry and determination: she did it by the wizardry of art. Under the circumstances Rachmaninoff's Concerto, highly-charged with impassioned ardor and fiery dynamism, proved an outlet: a more subdued score would only thicken the atmosphere of mourning. It was a brilliant performance, strong, intense and sparkling; it justified Mr. Cabot's remarks and established Miss Biret as a persuasive virtuoso under conditions that do not require enlargement.

Rumors had seethed outside Symphony Hall prior to the concert, and motorists stopped to yell the assassination bulletin at inswarming patrons, although the mass of listeners were unprepared. At two the press department of The Hall knew only that Mr. Kennedy had undergone emergency surgery.

Handel's Concerto Grosso proceeded pleasantly; to those conscious of the fact that The President's life hung by a thread, the world premiere of William Sydeman's Study for Orchestra No. 2 came across as a large, brutal and strident burst of musical inertia.

At 2:35 Thomas Perry, the Symphony's manager, made his way through the hall and conducted a whispered colloquy with Mr. Cabot, who departed during the Sydeman. And, at 2:40, as soon as the young, bearded Mr. Sydeman had taken his bow, personnel came onstage and began distributing the parts of Beethoven's Funeral March.

One woman turned and said to her seatmate: "What's the matter? Don't they have their music?"; but nearby a man who realized the significance of the interruption spoke involuntarily.

"He's dead," he gasped, his lips struggling to comprehend the consonants. "He's dead."

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Traveler (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 164,299
NOV 23 1963

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Journal (m)
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
Circ. 61,299
NOV 23 1963

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Transcript-Telegram (e)
HOLYOKE, Mass.
Circ. 26,214

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sun (e)
LOWELL, Mass.
Circ. 45,001

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
News (e)
SPRINGFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 101,591

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Journal-Courier (m)
NEW HAVEN, Conn.
Circ. 28,971
NOV 23 1963

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Enterprise & Times (e)
BROCKTON, Mass.
Circ. 45,777
NOV 23 1963

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Express (e)
PORTLAND, Me.
Circ. 28,962
NOV 23 1963

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
News (e)
SPRINGFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 101,591
NOV 23 1963

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Republican (m)
WATERBURY, Conn.
Circ. 23,414
NOV 23 1963

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Herald (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 178,553

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Journal (e)
HAVERHILL, Mass.
Circ. 12,291
NOV 23 1963

Common Howitzer Breaks Silence:

Boston In Deep Mourning For President Kennedy

BOSTON (UPI) — This city, hometown of President Kennedy, today was in deep mourning.

Residents, red-eyed from crying, were shocked into silence. They still could hardly believe that the President was dead—the victim of an assassin's bullet.

The roar of a 105 millimeter howitzer broke the morning stillness. It was fired every half hour on historic Boston Common from dawn to dusk in honor of the late President.

Virtualy every aspect of community life was at a standstill.

The gala Christmas festival which was to start Friday was canceled.

Religious services were scheduled by all faiths for today, Sunday and Monday. Only emergency public buildings remained open. Flags were at halfstaff.

U.S. Naval ships in Boston Harbor fired one gun salutes every half hour. The artillery brigade at Fort Banks in Winthrop also joined in the half-hour salutes.

Most weekend events were canceled, including the traditional Harvard - Yale football game.

Tough men and women shoppers wept unashamedly.

A lettered sign in the downtown office of a Boston newspaper spelled out the tragic news. "The President is dead" it said—simply and finally.

Stores bought full pages in today's newspapers to run pictures of the late President and to express grief. The comic strip section was dropped from today's Boston Globe.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, a longtime favorite of President and Mrs. Kennedy, was in the midst of its afternoon performance when the news of the President's death was announced.

An audience of more than 2,600 stood for 20 minutes in shocked and sobbing tribute as the orchestra played the funeral march from Beethoven's Third Symphony in honor of the late President. Cries of grief swept through Symphony Hall when conductor Erich Leinsdorf faced the audience and told of the assassination.

RENO, NEV.
NEVADA STATE JOURNAL
D: 5,542 S 26,585
NOV 23 1963

AUDIENCE IN TRIBUTE

BOSTON (UPI)—An audience of more than 2,600 stood nearly 20 minutes in shocked and sobbing tribute Friday as the Boston Symphony Orchestra played the funeral march from Beethoven's Third Symphony in honor of the late President Kennedy.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Record-American (m) (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 452,333
NOV 23 1963

Sad Symphony On Sad Day

More than 2600 attending the regular Friday afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Erich Leinsdorf, arose with shocked, protesting cries of "Oh! No! No! No!" when the conductor interrupted to announce President Kennedy's death.

Leinsdorf had left the podium between the second and third numbers while the stage was reset and returned to the stage, held up a hand for silence and said:

"We have just been informed that the President of the United States has been assassinated."

The groans and cries welled up from every corner of the hall.

Beethoven's 3rd Symphony "Eroica" was substituted for the gay Russian number scheduled and at its end the audience stood with bowed heads for a moment of prayer.

52

TUESDAY 4.

EIGHTY-THIRD SEASON • NINETEEN HUNDRED SIXTY-THREE–SIXTY-FOUR

Fourth Program

TUESDAY EVENING, NOVEMBER 26, at 8:30 o'clock

HANDEL ..... Concerto Grosso in B-flat major, Op. 3, No. 1
Allegro — Largo — Allegro

SYDEMAN ..... Study for Orchestra No. 2

WAGNER ..... Prelude, Good Friday Spell, and Death March of Titurel, from "Parsifal," Act III

IN MEMORIAM
JOHN F. KENNEDY
1917 – 1963

INTERMISSION

RACHMANINOFF ..... Piano Concerto No. 3, in D minor

I. Allegro ma non tanto
II. Intermezzo: Adagio
III. Finale

SOLOIST
IDIL BIRET
Miss BIRET plays the Baldwin Piano

BALDWIN PIANO RCA VICTOR RECORDS

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 465,653
NOV 24 1963

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Herald
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 283,819
NOV 24 1963

Orchestra Principals Soloists This Week

Five members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be heard as soloists at this week's Friday-Saturday concerts in Symphony Hall. The programs will begin with the Brandenburg Concerto No. 4 by Johann Sebastian Bach. Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster; Doriot Anthony Dwyer, principal flute; and James Pappoutsakis, flute, will be heard in this work.

Erich Leinsdorf will also conduct performances of Schubert's Symphony No. 3 and "Don Quixote," Fantastic Variations on a Theme of Knightly Character, Op. 35 by Strauss. For the performances of "Don Quixote" Samuel Mayes, principal cellist, and Joseph de Pasquale, principal violist, will be the soloists.

On Tuesday evening Leinsdorf will conduct the fourth concert of the Tuesday Evening Series with Idil Biret as his soloist. The young Turkish pianist will perform Rachmaninoff's Piano Concerto No. 3. Leinsdorf will also conduct the Concerto Grosso in B flat major, Op. 3, No. 1 by Handel; the American composer William Sydeman's "Study of Orchestra No. 2" and the Suite from "Le Coq d'Or" by Rimsky-Korsakov.

WGBH-TV, Channel 2, will telecast the 1362 Berkshire Festival performance of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony on Thanksgiving evening at 8:30. This concert was Charles Munch's final program as Music Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Patriot-Ledger (e)
QUINCY, Mass.
Circ. 44,419
NOV 27 1963

The Sound of Music

Symphony Homage To John F. Kennedy

By Peter M. Knapp

Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony paid their homage to the late President John F. Kennedy last night at Symphony Hall.

It was a moving symphonic tribute — music from Wagner's "Parsifal," Act III. Included were the Prelude, Good Friday Spell and Death March of Titurel.

Orchestra and conductor reached the heights that the occasion demanded. Mr. Leinsdorf, noted for his direction of Wagner operas at New York's Metropolitan Opera, evoked an exalted performance. The music itself runs deeply, rich with the mystic symbolism of the story of redemption through spiritual love. And everything in it shone forth under the conductor's baton.

When musicians respond completely to their leader and to each other, memorable moments are created. Such was the case last night. The strings were especially magnificent: dark, lustrous and profound. Then the last note of memorial faded, the moment had passed and there was an emotion-charged silence.

There were two musical events of importance and high artistic achievement on last night's program. The second was the appearance of the young Turkish pianist, Idil Biret, in the Rachmaninoff third piano concerto after intermission.

The Rachmaninoff concerto is one of the glories of the romantic piano literature. Spacious, melodious and grueling, it calls for a performance in the grand style. The concerto's masculinity marks it for the big men of the keyboard, those with wrists and fingers of steel like Cliburn or Horowitz. That a lady — especially one so young and slender — should dare to touch the concerto seems absurd.

It didn't take long, however, for Miss Biret to demonstrate who was in charge. Her mastery of this concerto fully deserved the adjective "sensational," and right now there is a bruised and battered Baldwin grand in Symphony Hall that probably requires first aid.

Miss Biret tore into the Rachmaninoff work with an almost chilling fury. The grand moments were there with clangorous chords and cascades of sound; and there were tender and lyrical moments, too, even if the tone was a trifle hard.

Miss Biret is only 22. At age four she played for the president of Turkey, and later the Turkish government passed a special law guaranteeing her studies. A student of Nadia Boulanger in Paris, she has collected a number of prizes and accolades in Europe.

From her performance last night, one doesn't have to go very far out on a limb in predicting a brilliant career ahead for her. Miss Biret proved to be an exciting, virtuoso pianist.

IDIL BIRET

She drew gasps from the audience as she hammered the keys. But there was no show for show's sake; for all the virtuosity, the music came first. And at the end she received a standing acclamation.

Lost between these two peaks of artistry was the second performance of William Sydeman's Study for Orchestra No. 2. The work might be titled, "Workout for Orchestra," for it is scored for an enormous number of instruments which all receive generous treatment.

Sydeman's "Study" is a nervous development of lean and angular thematic material. The motif is introduced by solo flute, then tossed about to different instruments in contrasting slow and agitated sections as the orchestra emits intermittent plunks, rattles and clanks.

The second allegro section, driven by a relentless rhythm and reaching an ear-cracking climax, is the most satisfying part of the work. Mr. Leinsdorf introduced the composer — tall, greying, bearded — to the audience and the work received polite applause.

The concert opened with a light-handed and good-humored reading of Handel's Concerto Grosso in B-flat major, Op. 3, No. 1, in which oboist Ralph Gomberg and Concertmaster Joseph Silverstein played leading parts.

52

TUESDAY 4.

EIGHTY-THIRD SEASON • NINETEEN HUNDRED SIXTY-THREE–SIXTY-FOUR

Fourth Program

TUESDAY EVENING, NOVEMBER 26, at 8:30 o'clock

HANDEL ..... Concerto Grosso in B-flat major, Op. 3, No. 1
Allegro — Largo — Allegro

SYDEMAN ..... Study for Orchestra No. 2

WAGNER ..... Prelude, Good Friday Spell, and Death March of Titurel, from "Parsifal," Act III

IN MEMORIAM
JOHN F. KENNEDY
1917 - 1963

INTERMISSION

RACHMANINOFF ..... Piano Concerto No. 3, in D minor
I. Allegro ma non tanto
II. Intermezzo: Adagio
III. Finale

SOLOIST
IDIL BIRET
Miss BIRET plays the Baldwin Piano

BALDWIN PIANO — RCA VICTOR RECORDS

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Patriot-Ledger (e)
QUINCY, Mass.
Circ. 44,419
NOV 27 1963

The Sound of Music

Symphony Homage To John F. Kennedy

By Peter M. Knapp

Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony paid their homage to the late President John F. Kennedy last night at Symphony Hall.

It was a moving symphonic tribute — music from Wagner's "Parsifal," Act III. Included were the Prelude, Good Friday Spell and Death March of Titurel.

Orchestra and conductor reached the heights that the occasion demanded. Mr. Leinsdorf, noted for his direction of Wagner operas at New York's Metropolitan Opera, evoked an exalted performance. The music itself runs deeply, rich with the mystic symbolism of the story of redemption through spiritual love. And everything in it shone forth under the conductor's baton.

When musicians respond completely to their leader and to each other, memorable moments are created. Such was the case last night. The strings were especially magnificent: dark, lustrous and profound. Then the last note of memorial faded, the moment had passed and there was an emotion-charged silence.

There were two musical events of importance and high artistic achievement on last night's program. The second was the appearance of the young Turkish pianist, Idil Biret, in the Rachmaninoff third piano concerto after intermission.

The Rachmaninoff concerto is one of the glories of the romantic piano literature. Spacious, melodious and grueling, it calls for a performance in the grand style. The concerto's masculinity marks it for the big men of the keyboard, those with wrists and fingers of steel like Cliburn or Horowitz. That a lady — especially one so young and slender — should dare to touch the concerto seems absurd.

It didn't take long, however, for Miss Biret to demonstrate who was in charge. Her mastery of this concerto fully deserved the adjective "sensational," and right now there is a bruised and battered Baldwin grand in Symphony Hall that probably requires first aid.

Miss Biret tore into the Rachmaninoff work with an almost chilling fury. The grand moments were there with clangorous chords and cascades of sound; and there were tender and lyrical moments, too, even if the tone was a trifle hard.

Miss Biret is only 22. At age four she played for the president of Turkey, and later the Turkish government passed a special law guaranteeing her studies. A student of Nadia Boulanger in Paris, she has collected a number of prizes and accolades in Europe.

From her performance last night, one doesn't have to go very far out on a limb in predicting a brilliant career ahead for her. Miss Biret proved to be an exciting, virtuoso pianist.

IDIL BIRET

She drew gasps from the audience as she hammered the keys. But there was no show for show's sake; for all the virtuosity, the music came first. And at the end she received a standing acclamation.

Lost between these two peaks of artistry was the second performance of William Sydeman's Study for Orchestra No. 2. The work might be titled, "Workout for Orchestra," for it is scored for an enormous number of instruments which all receive generous treatment.

Sydeman's "Study" is a nervous development of lean and angular thematic material. The motif is introduced by solo flute, then tossed about to different instruments in contrasting slow and agitated sections as the orchestra emits intermittent plunks, rattles and clanks.

The second allegro section, driven by a relentless rhythm and reaching an ear-cracking climax, is the most satisfying part of the work. Mr. Leinsdorf introduced the composer — tall, greying, bearded — to the audience and the work received polite applause.

The concert opened with a light-handed and good-humored reading of Handel's Concerto Grosso in B-flat major, Op. 3, No. 1, in which oboist Ralph Gomberg and Concertmaster Joseph Silverstein played leading parts.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 465,653
NOV 24 1963

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Herald
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 283,819
NOV 24 1963

Orchestra Principals Soloists This Week

Five members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be heard as soloists at this week's Friday-Saturday concerts in Symphony Hall. The programs will begin with the Brandenburg Concerto No. 4 by Johann Sebastian Bach. Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster; Doriot Anthony Dwyer, principal flute; and James Pappoutsakis, flute, will be heard in this work.

Erich Leinsdorf will also conduct performances of Schubert's Symphony No. 3 and "Don Quixote," Fantastic Variations on a Theme of Knightly Character, Op. 35 by Strauss. For the performances of "Don Quixote" Samuel Mayes, principal cellist, and Joseph de Pasquale, principal violist, will be the soloists.

On Tuesday evening Leinsdorf will conduct the fourth concert of the Tuesday Evening Series with Idil Biret as his soloist. The young Turkish pianist will perform Rachmaninoff's Piano Concerto No. 3. Leinsdorf will also conduct the Concerto Grosso in B flat major, Op. 3, No. 1 by Handel; the American composer William Sydeman's "Study of Orchestra No. 2" and the Suite from "Le Coq d'Or" by Rimsky-Korsakov.

WGBH-TV, Channel 2, will telecast the 1962 Berkshire Festival performance of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony on Thanksgiving evening at 8:30. This concert was Charles Munch's final program as Music Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

BOSTON 9

53

G[illegible] SEASON • NINETEEN HUNDRED SIXTY-THREE–SIXTY-FOUR

Ninth Pair of Concerts

[illegible]Y AFTERNOON, NOVEMBER 29, at 2:00 o'clock

[illegible]Brandenburg Concerto No. 4 in G major, for Violin, Two Flutes, and String Orchestra

[illegible]o
[illegible]inte
[illegible]o

Violin: JOSEPH SILVERSTEIN
Flutes: DORIOT ANTHONY DWYER
JAMES PAPPOUTSAKIS

[illegible]Prelude, Good Friday Spell, and Death March of Titurel, from "Parsifal," Act III

INTERMISSION

[illegible]"Don Quixote," Fantastic Variations on a Theme of Knightly Character, Op. 35
Introduction, Theme and Variations, and Finale
Violoncello Solo: SAMUEL MAYES
Viola Solo: JOSEPH DE PASQUALE

[illegible]URDAY EVENING, NOVEMBER 30, at 8:30 o'clock

SYDEMAN[illegible]Study for Orchestra No. 2
(First performance in this series)

[illegible]"Don Quixote," Fantastic Variations on a Theme of Knightly Character, Op. 35
Introduction, Theme and Variations, and Finale
Violoncello Solo: SAMUEL MAYES
Viola Solo: JOSEPH DE PASQUALE

INTERMISSION

RACHMANINOFF[illegible]Piano Concerto No. 3, in D minor
I. Allegro ma non tanto
II. Intermezzo: Adagio
III. Finale

SOLOIST
IDIL BIRET
Miss BIRET plays the Baldwin Piano

BALDWIN PIANO RCA VICTOR RECORDS

[521]

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Herald (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 178,553

27 [illegible]63

JOSEPH DE PASQUALE, principal violist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will appear as soloist in Bach's 4th Brandenburg Concerto at Symphony on Friday and Saturday.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 194,870

NOV 28 1963

Programs Changed

Several changes have been made by Erich Leinsdorf for this week-end's Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts. The programs of the past week-end were altered upon the death of President Kennedy.

Tomorrow afternoon Leinsdorf and the orchestra will play the Prelude, Good Friday Spell, and Death March of Titurel from Act III of Wagner's "Parsifal," in memoriam John F. Kennedy. This will be in place of the Schubert Symphony. The other works of the program will remain as previously announced, beginning with the Bach Brandenburg Concerto No. 4 and concluding with "Don Quixote" by Richard Strauss.

Soloists in the Bach Brandenburg Concerto No. 4 will be Joseph Silverstein, violin; and Doriot Anthony Dwyer and James Pappoutsakis, flutes. In Strauss' "Don Quixote" Samuel Mayes will be heard in the cello solo and Joseph de Pasquale in the viola solo.

Last Saturday evening's concert was changed completely in order to create a program in memoriam John F. Kennedy, which was telecast live over WGBH-TV and the ABC network. That program consisted of the Music of the Blessed Spirits in the Elysian Fields from "Orpheus and Eurydice" by Gluck; the Prelude, Good Friday Spell, and Death March of Titurel, from Act 3 of Wagner's "Parsifal"; and Beethoven's Symphony No. 3, "Eroica."

In order that the Saturday evening subscribers should not miss any part of last week's scheduled concert, the following program will be presented on Saturday evening: William Sydeman's Study for Orchestra No. 2, which received its world premiere last Friday afternoon; Richard Strauss' "Don Quixote," as originally announced for this week-end; and the Rachmaninoff Piano Concerto No. 3, in which Idil Biret, the young Turkish pianist, is making her first United States appearances.

The suite from "Le Coq d'Or" by Rimsky-Korsakov, announced for Nov. 22-23, and the Schubert Symphony No. 3, announced for Nov. 29-30, will be heard later in the season.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Herald (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 178,553

NOV 27 1963

Boston Symphony Progrems Change

Several changes have been made by Erich Leinsdorf for this week-end's Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts. On Friday afternoon the orchestra will play the Prelude, Good Friday Spell, and Death March of Titurel from Wagner's "Parsifal," in memory of John F. Kennedy, in place of the Shubert symphony. The other works of the program will be the Bach Brandenburg Concerto No. 4 and "Don Quixote" by Strauss.

In order that Saturday subscribers should not miss any part of last week's scheduled concert, the orchestra will present on Saturday evening William Sydeman's Study for Orchestra No. 2; Strauss' "Don Quixote," and the Rachmaninoff Piano Concerto No. 3, with soloist Idil Biret, the young Turkish pianist.

The Suite from "Le Coq d'Or" by Rimsky-Korsakov and the Schubert Symphony No. 3 will be heard later.

St. Paul Pioneer Press
First Newspaper In Minnesota
D. 98,378 S. 200,141

DEC 1 1963

Boston Orchestra Tribute To JFK to Be Broadcast

The regular Friday afternoon concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra are a tradition of long standing with proper Bostonians.

On Friday, Nov. 22d, news of the grim happenings in Dallas began to reach Symphony hall shortly before the concert began.

During the first two brief works, the news was amplified and its full impact felt. There was a brief pause while the librarians hurriedly distributed music; then conductor Erick Leinsdorf returned to the stage and announced to the shocked audience that the president was dead, and that the orchestra would play the funeral march from Beethoven's Eroica symphony.

As the somber strains began, the audience rose and stood in silence in tribute. At the conclusion, the orchestra, too, rose and stood in silence.

This concert, as transcribed that afternoon in Symphony hall, will be broadcast at 2:20 p. m. today in FM-stereo by KWFM.

BOSTON 9

53

EIGHTY-THIRD SEASON • NINETEEN HUNDRED SIXTY-THREE–SIXTY-FOUR

Ninth Pair of Concerts

FRIDAY AFTERNOON, NOVEMBER 29, at 2:00 o'clock

BACH ..... Brandenburg Concerto No. 4 in G major, for Violin, Two Flutes, and String Orchestra

I. Allegro
II. Andante
III. Presto

Violin: JOSEPH SILVERSTEIN
Flutes: DORIOT ANTHONY DWYER
JAMES PAPPOUTSAKIS

WAGNER ..... Prelude, Good Friday Spell, and Death March of Titurel, from "Parsifal," Act III

INTERMISSION

STRAUSS ..... "Don Quixote," Fantastic Variations on a Theme of Knightly Character, Op. 35

Introduction, Theme and Variations, and Finale
Violoncello Solo: SAMUEL MAYES
Viola Solo: JOSEPH DE PASQUALE

SATURDAY EVENING, NOVEMBER 30, at 8:30 o'clock

SYDEMAN ..... Study for Orchestra No. 2
(First performance in this series)

STRAUSS ..... "Don Quixote," Fantastic Variations on a Theme of Knightly Character, Op. 35

Introduction, Theme and Variations, and Finale
Violoncello Solo: SAMUEL MAYES
Viola Solo: JOSEPH DE PASQUALE

INTERMISSION

RACHMANINOFF ..... Piano Concerto No. 3, in D minor

I. Allegro ma non tanto
II. Intermezzo: Adagio
III. Finale

SOLOIST
IDIL BIRET
Miss BIRET plays the Baldwin Piano

BALDWIN PIANO — RCA VICTOR RECORDS

[521]

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Herald (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 178,553
NOV 27 1963

Boston Symphony Programs Change

Several changes have been made by Erich Leinsdorf for this week-end's Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts. On Friday afternoon the orchestra will play the Prelude, Good Friday Spell, and Death March of Titurel from Wagner's "Parsifal," in memory of John F. Kennedy, in place of the Shubert symphony. The other works of the program will be the Bach Brandenburg Concerto No. 4 and "Don Quixote" by Strauss.

In order that Saturday subscribers should not miss any part of last week's scheduled concert, the orchestra will present on Saturday evening William Sydeman's Study for Orchestra No. 2; Strauss' "Don Quixote," and the Rachmaninoff Piano Concerto No. 3, with soloist Idil Biret, the young Turkish pianist.

The Suite from "Le Coq d'Or" by Rimsky-Korsakov and the Schubert Symphony No. 3 will be heard later.

St. Paul Pioneer Press
First Newspaper In Minnesota
D. 98,378 S. 200,141
DEC 1 1963

Boston Orchestra Tribute To JFK to Be Broadcast

The regular Friday afternoon concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra are a tradition of long standing with proper Bostonians.

On Friday, Nov. 22d, news of the grim happenings in Dallas began to reach Symphony hall shortly before the concert began.

During the first two brief works, the news was amplified and its full impact felt. There was a brief pause while the librarians hurriedly distributed music; then conductor Erick Leinsdorf returned to the stage and announced to the shocked audience that the president was dead, and that the orchestra would play the funeral march from Beethoven's Eroica symphony.

As the somber strains began, the audience rose and stood in silence in tribute. At the conclusion, the orchestra, too, rose and stood in silence.

This concert, as transcribed that afternoon in Symphony hall, will be broadcast at 2:20 p. m. today in FM-stereo by KWFM.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Herald (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 178,553
NOV 27 1963

JOSEPH DE PASQUALE, principal violist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will appear as soloist in Bach's 4th Brandenburg Concerto at Symphony on Friday and Saturday.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 194,870
NOV 28 1963

Programs Changed

Several changes have been made by Erich Leinsdorf for this week-end's Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts. The programs of the past week-end were altered upon the death of President Kennedy.

Tomorrow afternoon Leinsdorf and the orchestra will play the Prelude, Good Friday Spell, and Death March of Titurel from Act III of Wagner's "Parsifal," in memoriam John F. Kennedy. This will be in place of the Schubert Symphony. The other works of the program will remain as previously announced, beginning with the Bach Brandenburg Concerto No. 4 and concluding with "Don Quixote" by Richard Strauss.

Soloists in the Bach Brandenburg Concerto No. 4 will be Joseph Silverstein, violin; and Doriot Anthony Dwyer and James Pappoutsakis, flutes. In Strauss' "Don Quixote" Samuel Mayes will be heard in the cello solo and Joseph de Pasquale in the viola solo.

Last Saturday evening's concert was changed completely in order to create a program in memoriam John F. Kennedy, which was telecast live over WGBH-TV and the ABC network. That program consisted of the Music of the Blessed Spirits in the Elysian Fields from "Orpheus and Eurydice" by Gluck; the Prelude, Good Friday Spell, and Death March of Titurel, from Act 3 of Wagner's "Parsifal"; and Beethoven's Symphony No. 3, "Eroica."

In order that the Saturday evening subscribers should not miss any part of last week's scheduled concert, the following program will be presented on Saturday evening: William Sydeman's Study for Orchestra No. 2, which received its world premiere last Friday afternoon; Richard Strauss' "Don Quixote," as originally announced for this week-end; and the Rachmaninoff Piano Concerto No. 3, in which Idil Biret, the young Turkish pianist, is making her first United States appearances.

The suite from "Le Coq d'Or" by Rimsky-Korsakov, announced for Nov. 22-23, and the Schubert Symphony No. 3, announced for Nov. 29-30, will be heard later in the season.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Jewish Advocate
BOSTON, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 35,304
DEC 5 1963

MUSIC IN REVIEW

By GERALD A. BERLIN

BSO: INSUFFICIENTLY MIXED BAG

The demands of program-making for an organization as complex and as tightly scheduled as the Boston Symphony Orchestra must be prodigious. Rehearsal time, soloists' contracts, program printing, press releases, recording dates, road trips and a multitude of comparable exigencies come swiftly to mind.

Even so, it is incredible to contemplate the extent of the scrambling in subsequent programs which is still following the last-minute change to the "Eroica" as a memorial to the late President Kennedy a week ago last Saturday. Apparently, every piece originally called for has to be played, and as a result, things won't again be on their regular course here until the holidays.

Thus it was that on the Friday afternoon series last weekend we had the Bach Fourth Brandenburg Concert and Strauss' "Don Quixote," as initially scheduled, but found Wagner's Parsifal music inserted in place of Schubert's Third Symphony. More is the pity, for it made for rather a lop-sided couple of hours.

The fault lay in the choice of the Wagner. I realize, of course, that Mr. Leinsdorf had to get up some commemorative music in a hurry, and that having played this piece only five months ago, the orchestra had it more or less in hand. But surely there are more appropriate and moving works than this one which he could have used. To me—and I dare say to the vast majority of the serious listeners of our day—Parsifal is a windy bore. Its saving grace is that, like egg-nog, one has ordinarily to put up with it only one season during the year and then is permitted surcease.

Whatever Parsifal's musical merits, in any case to bracket it in the same concert with the "Don Quixote" was in fact virtually to provide a diet of egg-nog. For awhile I found myself starving for just a few sparely scored, acerbly harmonized passages. In due course, though, the essential genius of this Strauss masterpiece began to gain ascendancy. The tricks, like the wind-machine, the bleating sheep or the attack on the windmills, may have long since become old hat. Not, however, the magic by which Strauss portrays the transformation of the knight's mind to sanity and thence to the serenity and resignation of a higher spirituality. When well performed "Don Quixote" is both gripping and touching and on this occasion it was done to a fine turn. The soloists were Samuel Mayes, 'cello, Joseph Pasquale, viola, and their collaboration with Mr. Leinsdorf and the orchestra left little to be desired.

Preceding the gigantic orchestral palette of the Wagner and Strauss works was the Brandenburg. These concertos are staples at Tanglewood but are performed only rarely in Symphony Hall. This, for example, was only the fifth performance of this particular one in a weekend series and the first one in almost eighteen years. Mr. Leinsdorf, playing on a tiny harpsichord, presided over an authentic chamber group of twenty strings and the soloists included Joseph Silverstein, violin, and Doriot Anthony Dwyer and James Pappoutsakis, flutes. Though occasionally subdued in the vast reaches of the hall, the whole group distinguished themselves with a performance that conferred ease, grace and elegance on what is certainly one of the more marvelously inventive and brilliantly constructed works in the concerto grosso form.

The orchestra is away this week. On its return next week it will feature Joseph Silverstein in a performance of Bartok's First Violin Concerto. Schubert's Third Symphony and Rimsky-Korsakov's suite from "Le Coq d'Or," both displaced from various previous programs, will finally have their day in court.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Christian Science Monitor (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 174,850
NOV 30 1963

Another Leinsdorf facet

Erich the cembalista

By Harold Rogers

Erich Leinsdorf displayed another facet of his jeweled musicianship Friday afternoon at Symphony Hall—that of cembalista. Seated at the harpsichord center stage—his back to the audience—he guided a small group of Boston Symphony musicians in Bach's Fourth Brandenburg Concerto.

It was a gracious performance, winsome on all counts, elegant as a baroque music room. Doriot Anthony Dwyer and James Pappoutsakis traced the entwining flute parts with delicacy and warmth; Joseph Silverstein, the concertmaster, was on hand with his suave violin to add its voice to those of the flutes. Though at several points an almost unnoticeable loss of unanimity occurred in the orchestral forces, the ensemble proceeded regally with only the slightest of directions from Mr. Leinsdorf.

* * *

The director then brought forth a radiantly moving performance of Wagner's Good Friday Spell and Death March of Titurel from "Parsifal." These excerpts from Act III he played in memoriam for President Kennedy. The death march was indeed appropriate in Wagner's legendary idealization, elevated as it is beyond an immediate earthly scene.

In 1964 the music world will celebrate the 100th anniversary of Richard Strauss's birth, and on Friday afternoon Mr. Leinsdorf jumped the gun only slightly to make his bow to the genius of this genial composer. With the music to "Don Quixote," Fantastic Variations on a Theme of Knightly Character, Mr. Leinsdorf brought this amiable concert to a close.

Thus we followed the trials and hallucinations of Cervantes' hero as Strauss developed themes representing Quixote, Dulcinea, and Sancho Panza. There was the jolly good humor of the tuba, paunchy as Panza must surely have been, and the bleating of the sheep was as much a marvel of orchestration as it was in execution.

* * *

Yet out of all the fun, of course, emerges the sweet nobility of Don Quixote. Strauss evoked a great sense of tenderness in the death scene.

Mr. Leinsdorf managed the whole thing beautifully, and the solos were flawlessly set forth by Samuel Mayes on his cello and by Joseph de Pasquale on his viola.

The program at Symphony Hall tonight will differ from that of Friday afternoon, owing to changes in programing last week-end which made way for a memorial concert for the late President. Tonight Mr. Leinsdorf will conduct Sydeman's Study for Orchestra No. 2 (given its world première on Nov. 22), Strauss's "Don Quixote," and the Rachmaninoff Piano Concerto No. 3, for which Idil Biret of Turkey will again be the soloist.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 194,870
NOV 30 1963

At Symphony

BSO at Very Best For Wagner, Strauss

By MARGO MILLER

The opulence of the Boston Symphony was put to divers use yesterday afternoon. In the service of Wagner's "Parsifal" was the massed orchestra, repeating excerpts from the Saturday program in memoriam John F. Kennedy. The musical equivalent of the "very best butter" was likewise applied to Strauss' hero "Don Quixote." If coupling the two late 19th century works proves anything, apart from the eternal quests of their protagonists, it is that national legend and international satire translated into notes require the finest playing. This the Boston Symphony provided in full measure.

Continuing his policy of drawing upon Boston Symphony principals for solo work, Erich Leinsdorf invited first cellist Samuel Mayes to limn the adventures of Cervantes' knight. The picture is a broad one. If Quixote lumbers into trouble, so must the instrument suggest his plight. If the old knight sings of his beloved Dulcinea, the cello is his voice. Does he tilt endlessly at the robbers of chivalry, at death itself, then his theme must observe him not such a fool. In Mayes' hands, the music says all this. It was a fine performance. The string tone was fully resonant, the comic effects nicely brought out, the ambiance entirely there. Principal viola of the orchestra, Joseph de Pasquale, and the concertmaster, Joseph Silverstein, contributed their share to the tone poem. And the other solo parts in which Strauss clowns were done in the best spirit—and playing—possible.

Leinsdorf closed his first Symphony Hall season last April with music from "Parsifal." This reviewer had noted the word "seamless" upon the program's margin. This week's excerpts comprised the Prelude, Good Friday Spell and the Death March of Titurel. Here at last was music with more emotional texture than was stressed then. One would not like to speculate overly on the cause. Artistically, it can be said that Leinsdorf allowed himself a pulse to the Prelude and a sweep to the Good Friday Spell heretofore missing, and was able to carry these qualities into the Death March. This satisfactory arrangement seemed to be accomplished by the conductor's concern with a broader outline, so that one had a sense of continuity. "Seamless" had implied little shape, lovely though the Wagner sonaural tapestry is. Leinsdorf has now found guiding threads.

The program opened with Bach's Fourth Brandenburg Concerto, marking the first time in the tenure of at least the last three Boston Symphony conductors that the maestro directed from the keyboard. From the harpsichord Leinsdorf cued with a free hand or a nod of the head and the ensemble of 23 beni to it. The violins, reduced to a dozen players, sounded very watery in the allegro; they managed, however, to boost their output in the remaining movements, as did Joseph Silverstein in the concertino. Praise only for the joyous sound from first flute, Doriot Anthony Dwyer, and her colleague, James Pappoutsakis.

Next week the Boston Symphony will be on tour. Upon their return, Leinsdorf will conduct music of Schubert, Rimsky-Korsakov and Bartok. Tonight's concert will introduce pianist Idil Biret to Saturday subscribers; she will play the Third Rachmaninoff Concerto. Also on the program are William Sydeman's Study for Orchestra No. 2, which had its premiere last Friday, and Strauss' "Don Quixote."

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 194,870
NOV 30 1963

JFK Memorial Concert Enthralls BSO Audience

By MARJORIE W. SHERMAN

In Symphony Hall Friday, the week that began with last Friday's tragic announcement from the stage, followed by the "Eroica," came to a close with a superb program of Bach, Wagner and Richard Strauss. Familiar, dedicated faces were lifted, row on row, to the sorrowful splendor of the Death March from Parsifal, and the big audience, which had gathered in unaccustomed quiet, forbore to interrupt the memorial concert with premature departures.

Symphony trustees and Harvard faculty, many of whom had worked with the late President in Cambridge or in Washington, slipped into family Symphony seats in time to share the unusual beauty of the Brandenberg Concerto for which Mr. Leinsdorf played the harpsichord.

Grave young faces looked down from the balconies round the hall, some for the first time, like six-year-old Leslie Essington-Jones, here from England to join her father who has a post at the U.N., others, like lovely Johanna Fiedler, daughter of Boston's eminent conductor Arthur Fiedler of Pops fame, who have watched and listened uncounted times.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Herald (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 178,553

NOV 30 1963

Parsifal Again

Concert Refreshing, Despite Memories

By ROBERT TAYLOR

Although the events of last week cast a shadow [illegible] Saturday's Symphony program, the concert itself proved refreshing.

The excerpts from "Parsifal" were played as they were last Saturday in memory of President Kennedy, for the score of course, is one of majestic sadness and radiant transfiguration. The dignity of the tribute was in accord with the moment, and yet the spirit of the afternoon was not entirely sable, since Bach's Fourth Brandenburg Concerto and the Strauss tone poem, "Don Quixote," pulsate vigorously and cheerfully.

Save for the homage, the program seemed designed for a Thanksgiving weekend—in short, as comfortable and familiar as the seasonal rituals. Its chief novelty was the emphasis on a number of excellent orchestral performers as soloists, a welcome emphasis indeed; and the conducting of Erich Leinsdrof from the harpsichord during the Bach.

Mr. Leinsdorf has conducted in the ostinato manner previously here, to the best of my knowledge, the last time, at a Metropolitan Opera performance of "Don Giovanni" when a piano was inappropriately substituted for harpsichord recitative. But his appearance thus at a Symphony Hall concert is yet another example of his range of striking talents. He moulded a wonderfully articulate performance.

The Bach strings were intimately scaled, employing only a single double bass; and the tuttis showed a splendid resilience and textural brilliance. James Pappoutsakis and Doriot Anthony Dwyer, sitting at the side of the harpsichord, supplied a concertino of infinite charm. Mr. Leinsdorf, whose continuo glittered through the concerto like a shower of gold, set tempi that gave the work mobility and animation.

The two flutes remain in the foreground, except for the final fugue, when they are joined by the violin in a gigantic burst of inventive ideas. Not only did Mr. Leinsdorff develop the Allegro at a lively pace, the elegant interlude of the Andante, and the Presto's miraculous complexities with a superbly balanced tone, but his insight into the Brandenburg seemed totally convincing. The graces of the small chamber orchestra and the power of great ideas met and mingled, and Mrs. Dwyer, Mr. Pappoutsakis and Joseph Silverstein declared once more their own virtuosity.

PARSIFAL'S GRAVITY

Similarly, Mr. Leinsdorf was in his element during the Parsifal, phrasing a long, romantic line of poignant gravity. The sense of calm tranquility pervaded it, the mounting Grail theme and the pianissimo contrasts treated with painstaking care. And how appropriate, too, were the Program's final comments on the concert version:

". . . a murmuring of the muted strings and sustaining harmonies of the horns and woodwind: music of ineffable tenderness, yet penetrated with a subtle recollection of remembered pain, as if the music were shadowed by the recollection of some assuaged but unforgettable grief. . ."

Samuel Mayes's solo work in "Don Quixote" revealed once more his admirable and triumphant skills in this score. From the highest harmonics of the fingerboard to the broad melodic bowings of the fantastic knight's theme, to pizzicati and spiccato, but most of all to a rare understanding of the tone poem right down to the dying glissade, Mr. Mayes can compare with any ranking artist today. He did not vary his standard of performance yesterday, nor did Joseph de Pasquale, whose viola discourse spoke nobly, too. The reading itself brought out the element of the bizarre perhaps more than in interpretations by Mr. Leinsdorf's predecessors, but he has lost none of the colors and the vibrance of the inner voices. The afternoon ended in a secular but heartening glow.

Owing to alterations last week-end, tonight's concerts brings forth Sydeman's Study for Orchestra, No. 2, the "Don Quixote" and Rachmaninoff's Piano Concerto No. 3, in D minor, with Idil Biret as soloist. The soloist will be Joseph Silverstein in Bartok's Concerto No. 2 for Violin and orchestra on Dec. 13-14, following next week's tour; and Mr. Leinsdorf has also scheduled Schubert's Symphony No. 3, in D, and the Rimsky-Korsakoff Suite from "Le Coq d'Or."

The Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf conducting presented the ninth concert of the 83rd season yesterday in Symphony Hall. Soloists were Joseph Silverstein, violin, Doriot Anthony Dwyer, James Pappoutsakis, flute, Samuel Mayes, 'cello, and Joseph de Pasquale, viola. Owing to alterations in last week's concert, Saturday night's program consists of William Sydeman's Study for Orchestra, the Strauss "Don Quixote," and Rachmaninoff's Piano Concerto No. 3, in D Minor, Idil Biret, soloist.

Brandenburg Concerto No. 4, in G Major, for Violin, Two Flutes and String Orchestra	Bach
Prelude, Good Friday Spell, and Death March of Titurel from 'Parsifal,' Act III	Wagner
"Don Quixote," Op. 35	Strauss

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Sunday Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 465,653

DEC 1 1963

Orchestra On Tour

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will be out of town this week on the second tour of its 83d season. The orchestra will appear at the University of Connecticut in Storrs on Monday, in New London on Tuesday, in Philharmonic Hall, New York city on Wednesday and Friday, at the Academy of Music in Brooklyn on Thursday, and at Carnegie Hall in New York on Saturday.

Erich Leinsdorf will conduct all the programs on this week's tour. He has invited Idil Biret, who made her United States debut with the orchestra at its concerts last week-end, to be soloist at Wednesday evening's concert in Philharmonic Hall. Mr. Leinsdorf has also asked George Zasofsky, violinist with the orchestra, to be soloist at the concerts in New London and Brooklyn. On Friday evening in Philharmonic Hall, Samuel Mayes, principal cello, and Joseph de Pasquale, principal viola, will be heard in Richard Strauss' "Don Quixote."

On Saturday evening, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will make the first of two appearances at Carniegie Hall as part of the International Festival of Visiting Orchestras. The second appearance will be on Saturday, Jan. 25.

The next concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall will take place on Monday, Dec. 9.

2c

TOUR No. 2

STORRS

The Hartford Times
D. 126,360
NOV 23 1963

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Times (e)
HARTFORD, Conn.
Circ. 126,360
NOV 23 1963

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Union (m)
SPRINGFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 83,691
NOV 22 1963

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Republican (m)
WATERBURY, Conn.
Circ. 23,414
NOV 21 1963

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Courant
HARTFORD, Conn.
Circ. 161,020
NOV 24 1963

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Bulletin (m)
NORWICH, Conn.
Circ. 28,975
NOV 21 1963

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Bulletin (m)
NORWICH, Conn.
Circ. 28,975
NOV 21 1963

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Chronicle (e)
WILLIMANTIC, Conn.
Circ. 7,249
NOV 20 1963

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Bee
NEWTOWN, Conn.
Weekly Circ. 6,248
NOV 29 1963

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Journal-Courier (m)
NEW HAVEN, Conn.
Circ. 28,971
NOV 30 1963

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
American (e)
WATERBURY, Conn.
Circ. 41,020
NOV 21 1963

UConn Plans 9th Concert By Orchestra

STORRS — The celebrated Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the baton of Erich Leinsdorf, will offer its ninth annual concert at the University of Connecticut's Jorgensen Auditorium Dec. 2 at 8:15 p. m.

Mr. Leinsdorf, who first led the Boston Symphony at Storrs as a guest conductor three seasons ago, will be making his second appearance as the orchestra's musical director. He replaced Charles Munch in 1962.

He is the 11th maestro to lead the Boston orchestra in its 83-year history, and only the third music director in the past 38 years. He came to Boston with a brilliant record in opera and has been conductor of the Metropolitan Opera, director of the New York City Opera, and music director and conductor of the Rochester Philharmonic.

In addition to serving as guest conductor with the Boston Symphony, he has led most of the important orchestras in the West.

Included in the evening's program will be Mozart's "Symphony in C Major," and Mahler's "Symphony No. 5 in C-Sharp Minor." Tickets may be obtained by mail order, telephone reservations or in person. Checks should be made payable to the university and sent to the Jorgensen box office.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Herald (e)
MANCHESTER, Conn.
Circ. 13,303
DEC 3 1963

Boston Group Plays with Superb Tone

By JOHN GRUBER

It was SRO at UConn's Jorgenson Auditorium last evening as people came from far and wide to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra with Erich Leinsdorf on the podium. They found their journey richly rewarding, for it was an evening of music that was well chosen and exceptionally well played.

Mr. Leinsdorf spent a long apprenticeship in the field of ballet, where he early learned the value of rhythmic precision. More recently he applied his talents to the field of opera, where lyricism is of utmost importance. He has managed to impress these qualities on the Boston Symphony in no uncertain fashion, with the result that it plays with almost unbelievable precision, and an effortless, singing tone production which is unequalled at the moment.

The orchestra plays with absolute unity and responds as one man to the conductor's direction, meanwhile producing an opulent sound that must be the despair of its rivals. Here is an example of what orchestral playing can be, and really should be, though it is all to seldom encountered.

While Mr. Leinsdorf is unexcelled in technical matters as a conductor, he is not on quite such firm ground as an interpreter, particularly of Mozart, whose music he offered here both last season and this. The sound was shimmering, the nuances were observed, and the turns and embellishments were carefully turned.

But there was a tendency to rush. Writing a preface to an edition of Mozart Sonatas, Saint-Saens advised: "It is necessary to shun in the case of Mozart, the tendency to hurry the movements, as too often happens." Saint-Saens was complaining in 1915 and his remarks are even more worthy of consideration today when the tempo of our daily living is greatly accelerated over the customs of his day just as his day was notably faster than the time of Mozart.

Saint-Saens advises: "His (Mozart's) Presto corresponds to our Allegro," and goes through the tempo marks accordingly; Mr. Leinsdorf's final Presto corresponded to a Presto vivace, last evening and his other tempi were in accordance, so that the extreme grace and charm of Mozart's composition were nearly obliterated.

The Mozart Symphony (Kochel No. 200) occupied the first half of the program, while the second was devoted to the Fifth Symphony of Gustave Mahler. Mahler's works are not unknown in the Greater Hartford area, for his kinsman Fritz Mahler has made us reasonably well-acquainted with them.

To tell the truth, I prefer Fritz Mahler's readings. Granted, Mahler, the composer, was uneven in his inspiration and his orchestral coloring and development, and this makes things difficult for the interpreter, particularly since some of the composer's effusion are in bad taste.

There is a tendency to try and remedy this bad taste, on the part of many conductors. Although this program did not mention it last night, the second section of the second movement is marked, "With utmost vehemence." Mr. Leinsdorf subordinated the wildest clamorings of the composer in the interests of ripe tone-color, but after hearing the frenzied outpourings that result from Fritz Mahler's interpretations, one is convinced that with all its bad taste it more nearly represents the character of the composer, who was (to all accounts) a frenzied and unhappy man.

Mr. Leinsdorf's interpretation is unquestionably more artistic, and the Boston Symphony is unquestionably more proficient than the Hartford group, yet somehow I had the feeling that Mahler the composer had been "prettied-up" somewhat in the manner in which Rimsky-Korsakow was wont to "improve" Moussorgsky.

The audience was thoroughly pleased and vocal in its appreciation of the concert at the close, and well they might have been, for the whole thing was an orchestral tour de force such as is seldom encountered.

NEW LONDON

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Day (e)
NEW LONDON, Conn.
Circ. 30,238
[illegible] 1963

Boston Symphony To Play Tuesday

Connecticut College will present the Boston Symphony Orchestra as the second performance in its Concert Series at 8:30 p.m. Tuesday in Palmer Auditorium.

The orchestra has been under the direction of the internationally known Erich Leinsdorf since 1962.

WILLIMANTIC, CONN.
CHRONICLE
D. 7 249

DEC 4 1963

Boston Symphony Wins Plaudits At UConn

Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony justly deserved the warm plaudits which they received at the University of Connecticut on Monday evening.

The first snowy evening of the season was in no way a deterrent to the crowd which was most enthusiastic to both works which were performed during the evening.

The concert opened with the Mozart Symphony in C major, K.200, a work of the teen-age Mozart. The prodigious output of the composer can be seen in the fact that this symphony was numbered as twenty-eight out of forty-one symphonies, and yet it came in the first one-third of his total list of compositions.

It is interesting to note that Mr. Leinsdorf is the only conductor of the current group who is listed as having recorded all of the Mozart Symphonies. It is fitting that he has done so, and he gave a fine example of his Mozart playing in a sensitive and thoughtful performance of this little C major Symphony.

The Andante was delicate, the Menuetto playful, and the final Presto lilting and spirited, although perhaps a bit literal in interpretation. All in all, it was a rewarding performance of Mozart, both elegant and sophisticated.

The early intermission was followed by a performance of the Symphony No. 5 in C-sharp minor by Gustav Mahler. For devoted Mahlerites a program of Mahler is an occasion for dedication, while for those who are indifferent to Mahler, an evening with Mahler is often a bore.

The performance by Mr. Leinsdorf and the Bostonians gave little opportunity for boredom, even for the non-believers. The work was given a virtuoso performance which drew repeated applause from many a non-Mahlerite.

Mahler, a native of Bohemia in the old Austrian Empire, was something of a mystic, often lonely, and one who frequently found himself out of step with his surroundings. Although he is usually associated with the musical life of Vienna, it was as leading conductor at the Hamburg Opera House that he first met the late Bruno Walter who had been engaged as coach and musical assistant.

A life long friendship began at that time, and Bruno Walter was to become one of the great champions and interpreters of the compositions of Mahler. Mahler was also to have a brief association with the United States; in the first decade of the century he conducted at the Metropolitan Opera House and led the New York Symphony on repeated occasions until 1911.

Prior to the Fifth Symphony, Mahler had used a good deal of folk materials, and two of the four symphonies had employed vocal soloists or chorus. In the Fifth Symphony Mahler shifted his emphasis to instrumental music and scoring that made use of exceptionally large orchestras.

The symphony is divided into three parts, and, in turn, two of these, the first and third, are again subdivided.

The first part opens with a measured and deliberate funeral march which is followed by an agitated and stormy section. Part two consists of a lengthy Scherzo, while part three is made up of a songful and meditative Adagietto and a Rondo Finale of optimistic spirits in which the melancholy and agitation with which the composition opened have disappeared.

As noted earlier, the whole performance was one of outstanding virtuosity and particularly to be commended was the fine playing of the solo horn part.

This was a most rewarding concert with the Bostonians sounding as their many devotees like to hear them sound, as one of the great orchestras of the world today.

NEW LONDON

NEW YORK 57

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2076, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Day (e)
NEW LONDON, Conn.
Circ. 30,238
NOV 30 1963

Boston Symphony To Play Tuesday

Connecticut College will present the Boston Symphony Orchestra as the second performance in its Concert Series at 8:30 p.m. Tuesday in Palmer Auditorium.

The orchestra has been under the direction of the internationally known Erich Leinsdorf since 1962.

WILLIMANTIC, CONN.
CHRONICLE
D. 7 249
DEC 4 1963

Boston Symphony Wins Plaudits At UConn

Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony justly deserved the warm plaudits which they received at the University of Connecticut on Monday evening.

The first snowy evening of the season was in no way a deterrent to the crowd which was most enthusiastic to both works which were performed during the evening.

The concert opened with the Mozart Symphony in C major, K.200, a work of the teen-age Mozart. The prodigious output of the composer can be seen in the fact that this symphony was numbered as twenty-eight out of forty-one symphonies, and yet it came in the first one-third of his total list of compositions.

It is interesting to note that Mr. Leinsdorf is the only conductor of the current group who is listed as having recorded all of the Mozart Symphonies. It is fitting that he has done so, and he gave a fine example of his Mozart playing in a sensitive and thoughtful performance of this little C major Symphony.

The Andante was delicate, the Menuetto playful, and the final Presto lilting and spirited, although perhaps a bit literal in interpretation. All in all, it was a rewarding performance of Mozart, both elegant and sophisticated.

The early intermission was followed by a performance of the Symphony No. 5 in C-sharp minor by Gustav Mahler. For devoted Mahlerites a program of Mahler is an occasion for dedication, while for those who are indifferent to Mahler, an evening with Mahler is often a bore.

The performance by Mr. Leinsdorf and the Bostonians gave little opportunity for boredom, even for the non-believers. The work was given a virtuoso performance which drew repeated applause from many a non-Mahlerite.

Mahler, a native of Bohemia in the old Austrian Empire, was something of a mystic, often lonely, and one who frequently found himself out of step with his surroundings. Although he is usually associated with the musical life of Vienna, it was as leading conductor at the Hamburg Opera House that he first met the late Bruno Walter who had been engaged as coach and musical assistant.

A life long friendship began at that time, and Bruno Walter was to become one of the great champions and interpreters of the compositions of Mahler. Mahler was also to have a brief association with the United States; in the first decade of the century he conducted at the Metropolitan Opera House and led the New York Symphony on repeated occasions until 1911.

Prior to the Fifth Symphony, Mahler had used a good deal of folk materials, and two of the four symphonies had employed vocal soloists or chorus. In the Fifth Symphony Mahler shifted his emphasis to instrumental music and scoring that made use of exceptionally large orchestras.

The symphony is divided into three parts, and, in turn, two of these, the first and third, are again subdivided.

The first part opens with a measured and deliberate funeral march which is followed by an agitated and stormy section. Part two consists of a lengthy Scherzo, while part three is made up of a songful and meditative Adagietto and a Rondo Finale of optimistic spirits in which the melancholy and agitation with which the composition opened have disappeared.

As noted earlier, the whole performance was one of outstanding virtuosity and particularly to be commended was the fine playing of the solo horn part.

This was a most rewarding concert with the Bostonians sounding as their many devotees like to hear them sound, as one of the great orchestras of the world today.

NEW YORK

The New York Times
D. 680,265 S. 1,306,418

DEC 1 1963

Lenscraft

A LONG VISIT—Erich Leinsdorf will lead the Boston Symphony in four concerts here this week, three in New York, one in Brooklyn. With him is Idil Biret, Turkish pianist, who makes her New York debut with the orchestra.

NEW YORKER
NEW YORK, N.Y.
W. 442,539

DEC 14 1963

Later the same evening, I hurried to Philharmonic Hall to hear the Boston Symphony, under Erich Leinsdorf, and got there just as it began to play a somewhat similar, though more elaborate, composition called "Study for Orchestra No. 2," by William Sydeman, a local composer. I found neither work very exciting, and I was amused to see my colleague, Miles Kastendieck, of the Journal-American, describe the Somers composition, next day, as "cereal" music—the sort of music piously referred to by composers as "serial," which, indeed, invariably appears to me to have the texture, contour, emotional impact, and power over the human spirit of oatmeal. Mr. Leinsdorf went on to present a young Turkish pianist (female and pretty) named Idil Biret as the soloist in Rachmaninoff's Third Piano Concerto. Miss Biret nearly knocked herself out in her efforts to encompass the formidable virtuosity that this work demands. She has a facile but not always accurate technique, frequently blurred by a too lavish use of the pedal, and the other night she often tried to magnify what is naturally a small tone by pounding unmercifully from curious-

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Times (m)
NEW YORK, N. Y.
Circ. 681,612
DEC 6 1963

Music: Leinsdorf Leads Dvorak 6th

Boston Symphony Plays in Philharmonic Hall

By HAROLD C. SCHONBERG

FINALLY we got the Dvorak Sixth (First) Symphony on a local program. Erich Leinsdorf brought it to Philharmonic Hall Wednesday night with the Boston Symphony, along with a young Turkish pianist named Idil Biret. She was heard in the Rachmaninoff Piano Concerto No. 3. And then there was the first New York performance of William Sydeman's "Essay for Orchestra" No. 2. A fine program.

Orchestral societies now seem to be using the new numbering of the Dvorak symphonies. There never was any secret that he composed nine, but the first four were in manuscript until well after the turn of the century. All by now have been published, the first two quite recently in Czechoslovakia. This has necessitated a renumbering. The "New World," his last, is no longer No. 5 but No. 9. The D major that Mr. Leinsdorf conducted last night is now No. 6. The old No. 3, in F, which was composed before the old No. 2, is now No. 5. And so on.

●

By any number, the D major is a cheerful, lyric and charming symphony, weak only in the last movement, where there is a little too much brass fanfare and not enough substance. It turns up very seldom, though at that it is not as unfamiliar as No. 5, which is never played.

The D major has a few Brahmsian spots, but for the most part it is a nationalistic work, full of the bracing melody and the rich harmony that Dvorak—in his way a romantic Haydn—could put into his music. In recent years we have been hearing only Nos. 7, 8 and 9. Now that No. 6 has been reintroduced, let us hope that it will not remain a stranger. And perhaps it may impel conductors to look into some of the earlier ones. No. 3 in E flat is a gorgeous work.

Mr. Leinsdorf conducted a sober performance of the Dvorak. It was clear and direct: a little too much so. Some rhythmic flexibility would have been welcome. Heard this way, Dvorak's athletic rhythms tend to move stiffly, as though they are bandaged.

The new Sydeman work, which Mr. Leinsdorf had thoroughly prepared (he always takes particular pains with new music), is a 12-minute one-movement work with some post-Webern touches. But Mr. Sydeman does not work in doctrinaire serialism. He makes a very personal use of some complicated modern textures, and his "Essay," which was finished this year, is an attractive bit of tone painting held together by a fine compositional technique. The composer was present to take a few bows.

Some perplexing piano playing occurred in the Rachmaninoff D minor. Miss Biret, born in Ankara, is 22 years old and has been trained in Paris. She is reputed to have been a remarkable prodigy, and at 12 had played the Brahms B flat Concerto in public as well as the entire "Well-Tempered Clavier."

●

She should not have made her entry with the Rachmaninoff, though. She has neither the tone nor the hand for it. Judging from some spots—the repeated-note section of the second movement, the running passages of the third—she can play certain kinds of music very well. But like so many French-trained pianists, she has a shallow tone and a rather percussive attack. In an effort to get more tone, she comes down so hard on the piano that the results often can be unpleasant. And this most decidedly is not the tonal attribute the D minor Rachmaninoff needs.

Is there such a thing as a man's concerto? If there is, the Rachmaninoff is one. Certainly no woman in our time, not even Gina Bachauer, has been able to do justice to this long, demanding, complicated work, a work that demands the utmost in technique, sonority and endurance.

●

Miss Biret seems to have all kinds of temperament. What she does not have, besides the tone for this concerto, is a really thorough command of the notes. Attempting to play everything as written, she had to resort to a desperate scramble (and the tempos, too, were very fast) in which passages were smudged and wrong notes abounded. She would have made a much better impression had she not been so ambitious. Next time we may hear her under better circumstances. In the meantime she left the impression of a big but undisciplined talent.

Idil Biret rehearsing as Erich Leinsdorf led orchestra

The Program

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Erich Leinsdorf, conductor, with Idil Biret, pianist. At Philharmonic Hall.

Symphony in D major (Op. 60).....Dvorak
Study for Orchestra No. 2 (first performance in New York).....Sydeman
Piano Concerto No. 3 in D minor.....Rachmanionff

New York World-Telegram and The Sun
D. 463,241 SAT. 175,139

DEC 5 1963

Idil Biret Turkish Delight at Philharmonic

A little lady from Turkey, all of 22 years of age—18 of them spent at the piano—was the heroine of the Boston Symphony concert, brilliantly led by Erich Leinsdorf, at Philharmonic Hall last night.

She was Idil Biret, a charming mite of a virtuosa, whose man-size job was the staggering Rachmaninoff Third. If the job was a little too big for her, that doesn't mean she wasn't a sensation.

Miss Biret has technique to spare, and a gift that will grow and flourish with the years. She has amazing musicianship and authority. She was playing Bach at 4 and won the Lili Boulanger prize at 12. Her speed is phenomenal.

Because of scope and weight the Rachmaninoff concerto wasn't quite for her last night. The sonorities dwarfed her, but the stamina was something to see and hear.

What a plucky little soul she was, bobbing up and down — with such a small way to go!—plunging headlong into giant runs, but just too light for the colossus.

How about some Bach, Mozart, even Beethoven from her, anything but Rachmaninoff? Splendid though it was, the orchestra couldn't help swamping her in places.

Also billed were William Sydeman's "Study For Orchestra No. 2" and Dvorak's Sixth Symphony, in D Major, formerly known as "No. 1."

A simultaneous Carnegie assignment cost me both numbers.

LOUIS BIANCOLLI

NEW YORK

The New York Times
D. 680,265 S. 1,308,418
DEC 1 1963

A LONG VISIT.—Erich Leinsdorf will lead the Boston Symphony in four concerts here this week, three in New York, one in Brooklyn. With him is Idil Biret, Turkish pianist, who makes her New York debut with the orchestra.

NEW YORKER
NEW YORK, N.Y.
W. 442,539
DEC 14 1963

Later the same evening, I hurried to Philharmonic Hall to hear the Boston Symphony, under Erich Leinsdorf, and got there just as it began to play a somewhat similar, though more elaborate, composition called "Study for Orchestra No. 2," by William Sydeman, a local composer. I found neither work very exciting, and I was amused to see my colleague, Miles Kastendieck, of the Journal-American, describe the Somers composition, next day, as "cereal" music—the sort of music piously referred to by composers as "serial," which, indeed, invariably appears to me to have the texture, contour, emotional impact, and power over the human spirit of oatmeal. Mr. Leinsdorf went on to present a young Turkish pianist (female and pretty), named Idil Biret as the soloist in Rachmaninoff's Third Piano Concerto. Miss Biret nearly knocked herself out in her efforts to encompass the formidable virtuosity that this work demands. She has a facile but not always accurate technique, frequently blurred by a too lavish use of the pedal, and the other night she often tried to magnify what is naturally a small tone by pounding unmercifully from curious-

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Times (m)
NEW YORK, N. Y.
Circ. 681,612
DEC 6 1963

Music: Leinsdorf Leads Dvorak 6th

Boston Symphony Plays in Philharmonic Hall

By HAROLD C. SCHONBERG

FINALLY we got the Dvorak Sixth (First) Symphony on a local program. Erich Leinsdorf brought it to Philharmonic Hall Wednesday night with the Boston Symphony, along with a young Turkish pianist named Idil Biret. She was heard in the Rachmaninoff Piano Concerto No. 3. And then there was the first New York performance of William Sydeman's "Essay for Orchestra" No. 2. A fine program.

Orchestral societies now seem to be using the new numbering of the Dvorak symphonies. There never was any secret that he composed nine, but the first four were in manuscript until well after the turn of the century. All by now have been published, the first two quite recently in Czechoslovakia. This has necessitated a renumbering. The "New World," his last, is no longer No. 5 but No. 9. The D major that Mr. Leinsdorf conducted last night is now No. 6. The old No. 3, in F, which was composed before the old No. 2, is now No. 5. And so on.

●

By any number, the D major is a cheerful, lyric and charming symphony, weak only in the last movement, where there is a little too much brass fanfare and not enough substance. It turns up very seldom, though at that it is not as unfamiliar as No. 5, which is never played.

The D major has a few Brahmsian spots, but for the most part it is a nationalistic work, full of the bracing melody and the rich harmony that Dvorak—in his way a romantic Haydn—could put into his music. In recent years we have been hearing only Nos. 7, 8 and 9. Now that No. 6 has been reintroduced, let us hope that it will not remain a stranger. And perhaps it may impel conductors to look into some of the earlier ones. No. 3 in E flat is a gorgeous work.

Mr. Leinsdorf conducted a sober performance of the Dvorak. It was clear and direct: a little too much so. Some rhythmic flexibility would have been welcome. Heard this way, Dvorak's athletic rhythms tend to move stiffly, as though they are bandaged.

The new Sydeman work, which Mr. Leinsdorf had thoroughly prepared (he always takes particular pains with new music), is a 12-minute one-movement work with some post-Webern touches. But Mr. Sydeman does not work in doctrinaire serialism. He makes a very personal use of some complicated modern textures, and his "Essay," which was finished this year, is an attractive bit of tone painting held together by a fine compositional technique. The composer was present to take a few bows.

Some perplexing piano playing occurred in the Rachmaninoff D minor. Miss Biret, born in Ankara, is 22 years old and has been trained in Paris. She is reputed to have been a remarkable prodigy, and at 12 had played the Brahms B flat Concerto in public as well as the entire "Well-Tempered Clavier."

●

She should not have made her entry with the Rachmaninoff, though. She has neither the tone nor the hand for it. Judging from some spots—the repeated-note section of the [illegible] the running passages of the third—she can play certain kinds of music very well. But like so many French-trained pianists, she has a shallow tone and a rather percussive attack. In an effort to get more tone, she comes down so hard on the piano that the results often can be unpleasant. And this most decidedly is not the tonal attribute the D minor Rachmaninoff needs.

Is there such a thing as a man's concerto? If there is, the Rachmaninoff is one. Certainly no woman in our time, not even Gina Bachauer, has been able to do justice to this long, demanding, complicated work, a work that demands the utmost in technique, sonority and endurance.

●

Miss Biret seems to have all kinds of temperament. What she does not have, besides the tone for this concerto, is a really thorough command of the notes. Attempting to play everything as written, she had to resort to a desperate scramble (and the tempos, too, were very fast) in which passages were smudged and wrong notes abounded. She would have made a much better impression had she not been so ambitious. Next time we may hear her under better circumstances. In the meantime she left the impression of a big but undisciplined talent.

Idil Biret rehearsing as Erich Leinsdorf led orchestra

The Program

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Erich Leinsdorf, conductor, with Idil Biret, pianist, At Philharmonic Hall.

Symphony in D major (Op. 60) ..... Dvorak
Study for Orchestra No. 2 (first performance in New York) ..... Sydeman
Piano Concerto No. 3 in D minor ..... Rachmaninoff

New York World-Telegram and The Sun
D. 463,241 SAT. 175,139
DEC 5 1963

Idil Biret Turkish Delight at Philharmonic

A little lady from Turkey, all of 22 years of age—18 of them spent at the piano—was the heroine of the Boston Symphony concert, brilliantly led by Erich Leinsdorf, at Philharmonic Hall last night.

She was Idil Biret, a charming mite of a virtuosa, whose man-size job was the staggering Rachmaninoff Third. If the job was a little too big for her, that doesn't mean she wasn't a sensation.

Miss Biret has technique to spare, and a gift that will grow and flourish with the years. She has amazing musicianship and authority. She was playing Bach at 4 and won the Lili Boulanger prize at 12. Her speed is phenomenal.

Because of scope and weight the Rachmaninoff concerto wasn't quite for her last night. The sonorities dwarfed her, but the stamina was something to see and hear.

What a plucky little soul she was, bobbing up and down — with such a small way to go!—plunging headlong into giant runs, but just too light for the colossus.

How about some Bach, Mozart, even Beethoven from her, anything but Rachmaninoff? Splendid though it was, the orchestra couldn't help swamping her in places."

Also billed were William Sydeman's "Study For Orchestra No. 2" and Dvorak's Sixth Symphony, in D Major, formerly known as "No. 1."

A simultaneous Carnegie assignment cost me both numbers.

LOUIS BIANCOLLI

NEW YORK
Herald Tribune
D. 355,898 S. 451,270

DEC 1963 Buffalo

Boston Symphony's Dvorak

PHILHARMONIC HALL

Lincoln Center
Boston Symphony conducted by Erich Leinsdorf, soloist Idil Biret, pianist (N. Y. debut). The program:
Symphony No. 6 ..... Dvorak
Study for Orchestra No. 2 ..... Sydeman
Piano Concerto No. ..... Rachmaninoff

By Alan Rich

Everybody has his own private list of special musical memories, concerts that linger in the mind through the years. One of mine, very close to the top of the list, concerns an evening in City Center many years ago, when a young man named Erich Leinsdorf conducted the old New York City Symphony in a glowing and vivid performance of a work then known as Dvorak's First Symphony.

Eighteen years have passed. Dvorak scholars have straightened out the numbering of the symphonies, so that No. 1 is now No. 6. Mr. Leinsdorf now has a somewhat more elegant orchestra, and works out of a much more elegant auditorium when he is in New York. But last night he did it again.

What a marvelous symphony it is! From the first phrase it takes off for the stratosphere. Simple, completely uncluttered by a single backward glance, awkward in its architecture perhaps, but totally enchanting in every scrap of its building material, it is a work that beguiles, cajoles and caresses. There are few works in the repertory, even among the great masterpieces, that exude the kind of euphoria that this one does. Leinsdorf caught every nuance, and communicated them all superbly to his orchestra.

By one of those strange coincidences that seems to be the life blood of the current music season, this was one of two Dvorak symphonies being played in the city last night: Mr. Salzman tells you about the other at right. Last week there was another symphony. None of them was the "New World."

The point is, Dvorak is making his inroads into the repertory these days, and that is all to the good. There isn't a single work of his that is without certain structural flaws, but so what? He was one of the great originals of the romantic era, and his music comes across today with no lessening of its vitality. Now, if only someone would take a look at that Ugly Duckling of the Big Five, the F major . . . (It's really a swan, you know.)

William Sydeman's Study No. 2 got its first local performance. Mr. Sydeman, a member of the Mannes School faculty, is well known in recital halls in New York, because he writes a good deal of chamber music and has many friends to play it. His orchestral work is less well-known, but this new piece is an extremely fine example of his style.

That style partakes largely of twelve-tone techniques, but of the rather conservative side of the school. The Study is full of Alban Berg. It seems constantly on the verge of dropping solidly into some key, but never quite gets there. Some of the orchestral writing has the open, delicate quality of Webern's music, but the resemblance is on the surface. Sydeman's atonality is a good deal more romantic than was Webern's, and a good deal more accessible.

The new work lasts about nine minutes, and has a fine sense of flow and direction. Its materials are extremely attractive, and so is the orchestral sound. Sandwiched in between Dvorak and Rachmaninoff, it did not make much of a hit with the audience, but that is the composer's cross. It is a good work, and ought to survive.

It was beautifully played, as near as anyone could tell. Do not understimate the significance of its appearance on a Boston Symphony program. That the conductor of our most elegant orchestra is willing to take on some of the flight for hard new music, even if only in nine-minute segments, is an event of major importance.

The evening's soloist was Idil Biret, a 22-year-old pianist from Turkey who comes here with a sheaf of impressive credientials from Paris and London. And well she might. Frail in appearance, and wonderously pretty, Miss Biret is an accomplished and exciting musician. Like a few other major pianists who have made their debuts here this season, she chose a work that did not answer everything about her musicianship. But what she did do in the Rachmaninoff Third Concerto gave full confirmation that he European admirers know their stuff.

She gave a big, impassioned performance, full of temperament and understanding. In the first movement some of her playing was excessively engulfed by the orchestra, which could be the fault of her rather toneless piano, or of the hall's acoustics. But what could be heard was magnificent. Her techniquee is flawless, and her command of the rhythm and the shape of a phrase bespeaks the highest musicianship. Lte's hope she returns soon to show more of her stuff.

New York
Journal American
NEW YORK, N.Y.
D. 501,625 S. 760,395

DEC 5 1963 Buffalo

ERICH LEINSDORF
Conducts Boston Symphony

MEANWHILE THE BOSTON Symphony had just finished playing Dvorak's Sixth Symphony up at Philharmonic Hall. Interest in this concert focused on the debut here of the Turkish pianist Idil Biret in Rachmaninoff's Piano Concerto No. 3.

This diminutive 22-year-old young lady has plenty of digital strength but not the brilliance to do justice to this massive work.

Pianistically agile and rhythmically alert, she overpedaled to attain volume and sacrificed clarity to get bigness. Nor was her lyric playing ingratiating enough to make the music "pull" as it can.

She is a highly gifted pianist, but her reach exceeded her grasp in this piece.

MUSICAL AMERICA
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 15,900

JAN 1964 Buffalo

Boston Symphony

Idel Biret, 22-year-old French-trained Turkish pianist, made her New York debut with Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony at Philharmonic Hall on December 4 in Rachmaninoff's Third Piano Concerto. The piece is a big piece and Miss Biret is a little girl. Even though she nearly set the piano on fire with her whirlwind technique, the sprawling, sensual lines and the poetry of the work escaped her. The piano she used had a harsh tone, and her desperate attempts to summon manly energy resulted in much banging of chords and violent (though accurate) passage work. It was simply a case of miscasting. One hopes to hear her again on a better piano and in a work more suited to her talents.

The orchestra began the evening with very fine playing in Dvorak's Symphony No. 6 in D, formerly known as No. 1. They took to its elevated lines and kept it soaring. A certain epic breadth was lost because Mr. Leinsdorf favored the folksy and exuberant elements too much, but its untroubled optimism was kept intact.

William Sydeman's "Study for Orchestra No. 2" had its New York premiere in a very nice performance. The work is beautifully scored and well worked out, though I noticed some of the piano writing didn't sound. The haunting closing section of little ostinato figures against a theme in the flute reduced the audience to rapt attention. They recovered themselves and gave the composer and orchestra deserved applause.

—C. S. S.

New York Herald Tribune
D. 355,898 S. 451,270
DEC 5 1963

Boston Symphony's Dvorak

PHILHARMONIC HALL
Lincoln Center
Boston Symphony conducted by Erich Leinsdorf; soloist: Idil Biret, pianist (N. Y. debut). The program:
Symphony No. 6.....Dvorak
Study for Orchestra No 2 (N. Y. premiere).....Sydeman
Piano Concerto No. 3....Rachmaninoff

By Alan Rich

Everybody has his own private list of special musical memories, concerts that linger in the mind through the years. One of mine, very close to the top of the list, concerns an evening in City Center many years ago,, when a young man named Erich Leinsdorf conducted the old New York City Symphony in a glowing and vivid performance of a work then known as Dvorak's First Symphony.

Eighteen years have passed. Dvorak scholars have straightened out the numbering of the symphonies, so that No. 1 is now No. 6. Mr. Leinsdorf now has a somewhat more elegant orchestra, and works out of a much more elegant auditorium when he is in New York. But last night he did it again.

What a marvelous symphony it is! From the first phrase it takes off for the stratosphere. Simple, completely uncluttered by a single backward glance, awkward in its architecture perhaps, but totally enchanting in every scrap of its building material, it is a work that beguiles, cajoles and caresses. There are few works in the repertory, even among the great masterpieces, that exude the kind of euphoria that this one does. Leinsdorf caught every nuance, and communicated them all superbly to his orchestra.

By one of those strange coincidences that seems to be the life blood of the current music season, this was one of two Dvorak symphonies being played in the city last night: Mr. Salzman tells you about the other at right. Last week there was another symphony. None of them was the "New World."

The point is, Dvorak is making his inroads into the repertory these days, and that is all to the good. There isn't a single work of his that is without certain structural flaws, but so what? He was one of the great originals of the romantic era, and his music comes across today with no lessening of its vitality. Now, if only someone would take a look at that Ugly Duckling of the Big Five, the F major . . . (It's really a swan, you know.)

William Sydeman's Study No. 2 got its first local performance. Mr. Sydeman, a member of the Mannes School faculty, is well known in recital halls in New York, because he writes a good deal of chamber music and has many friends to play it. His orchestral work is less well-known, but this new piece is an extremely fine example of his style.

That style partakes largely of twelve-tone techniques, but of the rather conservative side of the school. The Study is full of Alban Berg. It seems constantly on the verge of dropping solidly into some key, but never quite gets there. Some of the orchestral writing has the open, delicate quality of Webern's music, but the resemblance is on the surface. Sydeman's atonality is a good deal more romantic than was Webern's, and a good deal more accessible.

The new work lasts about nine minutes, and has a fine sense of flow and direction. Its materials are extremely attractive, and so is the orchestral sound. Sandwiched in between Dvorak and Rachmaninoff, it did not make much of a hit with the audience, but that is the composer's cross. It is a good work, and ought to survive.

It was beautifully played, as near as anyone could tell. Do not underestimate the significance of its appearance on a Boston Symphony program. That the conductor of our most elegant orchestra is willing to take on some of the flight for hard new music, even if only in nine-minute segments, is an event of major importance.

The evening's soloist was Idil Biret, a 22-year-old pianist from Turkey who comes here with a sheaf of impressive credientials from Paris and London. And well she might. Frail in appearance, and wonderously pretty, Miss Biret is an accomplished and exciting musician. Like a few other major pianists who have made their debuts here this season, she chose a work that did not answer everything about her musicianship. But what she did do in the Rachmaninoff Third Concerto gave full confirmation that his European admirers know their stuff.

She gave a big, impassioned performance, full of temperament and understanding. In the first movement some of her playing was excessively engulfed by the orchestra, which could be the fault of her rather toneless piano, or of the hall's acoustics. But what could be heard was magnificent. Her techniquee is flawless, and her command of the rhythm and the shape of a phrase bespeaks the highest musicianship. Lte's hope she returns soon to show more of her stuff.

New York
Journal American
NEW YORK, N.Y.
D. 501,625 S. 760,395
DEC 5 1963

ERICH LEINSDORF
Conducts Boston Symphony

MEANWHILE THE BOSTON Symphony had just finished playing Dvorak's Sixth Symphony up at Philharmonic Hall. Interest in this concert focused on the debut here of the Turkish pianist Idil Biret in Rachmaninoff's Piano Concerto No. 3.

This diminutive 22-year-old young lady has plenty of digital strength but not the brilliance to do justice to this massive work.

Pianistically agile and rhythmically alert, she overpedaled to attain volume and sacrificed clarity to get bigness. Nor was her lyric playing ingratiating enough to make the music "pull" as it can.

She is a highly gifted pianist, but her reach exceeded her grasp in this piece.

MUSICAL AMERICA
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 15,900
JAN 1964

Boston Symphony

Idel Biret, 22-year-old French-trained Turkish pianist, made her New York debut with Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony in Philharmonic Hall on December 4 in Rachmaninoff's Third Piano Concerto. The piece is a big piece and Miss Biret is a little girl. Even though she nearly set the piano on fire with her whirlwind technique, the sprawling, sensual lines and the poetry of the work escaped her. The piano she used had a harsh tone, and her desperate attempts to summon manly energy resulted in much banging of chords and violent (though accurate) passage work. It was simply a case of miscasting. One hopes to hear her again on a better piano and in a work more suited to her talents.

The orchestra began the evening with very fine playing in Dvorak's Symphony No. 6 in D, formerly known as No. 1. They took it to its elevated lines and kept it soaring. A certain epic breadth was lost because Mr. Leinsdorf favored the folksy and exuberant elements too much, but its untroubled optimism was kept intact.

William Sydeman's "Study for Orchestra No. 2" had its New York premiere in a very nice performance. The work is beautifully scored and well worked out, though I noticed some of the piano writing didn't sound. The haunting closing section of little ostinato figures against a theme in the flute reduced the audience to rapt attention. They recovered themselves and gave the composer and orchestra deserved applause.

—C. S. S.

60 BROOKLYN NEW YORK

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

BROOKLYN RECORD
Friday, November 29, 1963

New York World-Telegram and The Sun
D. 463,241 SAT. 175,139

DEC 5 1963

NEW YORK AND BROOKLYN DAILY
D. 40,130 S. 40,130

NOV 26 1963

BROOKLYN, N.Y.
BROOKLYN HEIGHTS PRESS
W. 4,226

NOV 28 1963

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
RECORD
BAY RIDGE RECORD
W. 12,100

NOV 29 1963

Symphony

Boston Concert At Boro Academy

Erich Leinsdorf, Music Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will conduct the second program of the five-oncert subbscription series at the Brooklyn Academy of Music, on Thursday evening, December 5th, at 8:30 p.m. Works of three major Central European masters—Richard Wagner, Alban Berg and Johannes Brahms—make up the program which follows:

A Siegfried Idyl, Wagner; Violin oncerto, Berg; Symphony No. 1, Brahms.

Mr. Leinsdorf has invited one of his Boston Symphony Orchestra colleagues — George Zazofsky — to execute the incredibly difficult and brillint solo part in the Berg concerto, which is considered one of the most important works composed during the twentieth century. Zazofsky is a leading member of the first violin section of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and has performed the Berg concerto with great success in Boston.

The pairing of Wagner and Brahms with Berg illustrates the skillful program-mking that has characterized Leinsdorf's work as Music Director of the Bostonins. His aim is to present the gret classics of the pst, along with signifincnt contemporary works which he believes have lasting value.

An enthusiastic udience that filled the Opera House of the Brooklyn Academy of Music greeted Leinsdorf and the Boston orchestra at their opening concert on October 25th.

The New York Times
D. 681,612 S. 1,304,447

DEC 7 1963

Music: Boston Symphony Program

Hindemith, Barber and Strauss Are Played

Leinsdorf Conducts at Philharmonic Hall

By THEODORE STRONGIN

BY a scant two years and two days, the Boston Symphony Concert, last night at Philharmonic Hall missed being an all-20th century concert. It was good comfortable programing, starting with Hindemith's Symphonic Metamorphosis of Themes by Carl Maria von Weber, written in 1943. Then Erich Leinsdorf, who conducted, offered the 1936 Barber First Symphony (in one movement).

It was the Strauss "Don Quixote" that reached into the 19th century. It was completed on Dec. 29, 1897. But it ventured into far more daring worlds of sound than either of the later works.

The Strauss, of course, uses sounds for pictorical purposes, to imitate the bleating of sheep, the turning of windmills and other episodes in the story. Whatever the composer's reason, the work is saturated with imaginative touches. At almost no point can anything be taken for granted. There is a constant freshening and renewing of pathos throughout.

The Barber is an easily reached work with broad planes of intensity, satisfyingly stacked. There is no pain in hearing it, and it takes no effort to understand. The Hindemith is trim and athletic and an attractive contrapuntal frame for the little-known themes borrowed from von Weber.

The Boston Symphony, completely at ease with its new Leisndorfian personality, was as flexible and sensitive an instrument last night as could be asked for. The Hindemith was rhythmically firm and forward-moving. In the Barber, the bands of tone were like collections of muscle fibers.

•

And in the Strauss, the orchestra showed another quality that has become natural to it since Mr. Leinsdorf took over. Its textures were miraculously light and transparent, though entirely secure. And the conductor, with the smallest understatement of nuance can achieve the warmest possible lilt. He has expanded the orchestra's expressive range to a high degree.

Conducting such as Mr. Leinsdorf's last night, allows a combination of pleasures, since he is an intellectual interpreter as well as a musical one. The mind enjoys his orderly and purposeful placing of every note. The emotions respo ndto the perfectly clear way he communicates the composer's intentions. It was a beautiful concert indeed, sensitively aided and abetted by Samuel Mayes, cellist, and Joseph de Pasquale, violist, in "Don Quixote."

New York World-Telegram and The Sun
D. 463,241 SAT. 175,139

DEC 7 1963

Music

Hindemith, Barber Scores Hum

By LOUIS BIANCOLLI

In town for three concerts this trip, Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony offered exceptionally vital and vibrant performances at Philharmonic Hall last night.

Louis Biancolli

For me the surprise was two-fold—the astonishing vitality of two scores, both written or rewritten in the early '40s by Hindemith and Samuel Barber.

Score Sparkles

Only a few days ago I was confessing my loss of interest in Hindemith's "Nobilissima Visione," and here was Hindemith's "Symphonic Metamorphosis," more bustling with life than ever.

You never know which work, or works, of a composer will hold up over the years. This score, fashioned from fragments by Weber, was once spurned by many of us. Last night, it sparkled and danced and breathed. What a master Hindemith is—often.

And what a young American master Samuel Barber was in 1935 when he wrote his First Symphony, and what a better one he was in 1944 when, older and wiser, he rewrote it.

Prize Winner

This is a one-movement web tingling with power that radiates from a restless core of feeling. One hears some Sibelius, even a hint of Puccini—and why not in the man who later wrote "Vanessa."

But mostly it is Barber's signature alone that is on the score, as it is on the Piano Concerto that won him the Pulitzer Prize this year. He is a good workman who always has good stuff to work with.

Leinsdorf was truly magnificent in both readings, bringing out the utmost in virtuosity from the famed orchestra, and adding a fixed purpose towards which every note and shift of rhythm was headed.

Also billed was Strauss' "Don Quixote," with the accomplished Samuel Mayes and Joseph De Pasquale as cello and viola soloists.

New York
Journal American
NEW YORK, N.Y.
D. 501,625 S. 760,395

DEC 7 1963

AT PHILHARMONIC HALL

The Bostonians and Three Masters

By MILES KASTENDIECK

ERICH LEINSDORF and the Boston Symphony played Twentieth-Century music in Philharmonic Hall last night. Hindemith, Barber, and Strauss contributed the works. The orchestra displayed a finesse in playing heard only from the great ones.

Whether Mr. Leinsdorf achieved the quality of interpretation worthy of the music becomes immediately debatable. What he has done for the orchestra elicits constant admiration as its performance reflects his discipline and his intellectual grasp of scores.

Where the music demanded emotional intensity in warmth or depth of feeling, the performances fell short of fulfillment.

Hindemith's "Symphonic Metamorphosis of Themes by Carl Maria Von Weber" received a perceptive, clean-cut exposition. Its contrapuntal texture was exemplary, perhaps too much so because the business of the music became too prominent.

★

NOT ALL THE FUN in Hindemith and in this piece came through either in the jaunty syncopation of the scherzo or the flavor of the march.

It was good to have Samuel Barber's Symphony No. 1 played again, for this music should be head more often. Not only is it important in the development of the American repertory but it heralds Barber as the representative composer he was become.

That is can sound more attractive other performances have already registered. More bite and warmer lyricism make it quite moving. Last night its compositional aspect received enlightening treatment, but this kept the music from taking flight. And it can soar.

Strauss' "Don Quixote" completed the program with Samuel Mayes playing the cello and Joseph De Pasquale the viola solos.

★

VICTORIA KOBAYASHI-BONTEMPO made her American-press debut in Carnegie Hall last night. When she first played last March, the Japanese pianist went unrecorded in the newspaper blackout though the audience gave her standing ovations.

Admirably equipped, she leaves a positive impression technically, musically, and temperamentally. With definite ideas of her own resound hymn-like and funereal, however, raises serious problems.

NEW YORK
Herald Tribune
D. 355,898 S. 451,270

DEC 7 1963

Unleashing the Bostonians

By Eric Salzman

Erich Leinsdorf put together one of his clever, mildly offbeat Leinsdorfian programs last night for the Boston Symphony's second Philharmonic program of the week.

At first glance there were three engaging, non-quite-rare works, strongly in contrasting character: the Hindemith Symphony Metamorphosis on Themes by Carl Maria von Weber, Samuel Barber's First Symphony, in one movement, and the Richard Strauss "Don Quixote." Then, at a hearing, the old Leinsdorf connecting train-of-thought — his find-a-relationship turn of mind—suddenly came through like an important inner voice in a seemingly simple score.

After all, what is the American composer's four-movements-rolled-up-into-one but a kind of Symphonic Metamorphosis on Themes by Samuel Barber? And Strauss' so-called Variations are really a series of dramatic metamorphoses rung in on his basic motives; to borrow Stokowski's old term, the piece could be almost described as a kind of symphonic sunthesis of the principal leit-motiv development from a great music drama on "Don Quixote" that Strauss, alas, never wrote.

Then too, both the Strauss and the Hindemith are showcase pieces, marvelously designed to exhibit the superlative musicians who make up this great ensemble. The jolly Hindemith, one of that composer's rare attempts to write a real showy color piece, is chock full of fancy flute solos, notable percussion strokes, big brass dabs and so on; afterward, Mr. Leinsdorf waved his triumphant executors to their to their feet, almost one at a time, to take their individual and well deserved bows.

The Strauss, of course, has a big solo cello part and an only slightly less important role for viola and on this occassion Samuel Mayes and Joseph de Pasquale, the Boston's excellent first-desk men, were the fine soloists. But let us not forget that this is a piece full of all sorts of other solo work; the concertmaster, for example, makes a big contribution and, it sometimes seems as though the bass clarinet hardly gets more than a few bars rest. In case anyone didn't know it before, last night's evidence ought to have been quite enough to demonstrate that there are some mighty fine solo musicians in the Boston Symphony.

And don't think Mr. Leinsdorf didn't plan it that way. He knows the value of his men and he knows what they can do. The work is hardly a regular visitor hereabouts although it was, in fact, played here just recently by another visiting orchestra. But it is one of Strauss' most convincing larger works and, if it can be something of triumph for the orchestra, it turns out to be equally so for the maestro.

In unleashing his men, Leinsdorf by no means lost control of the big shape. This was a beautifully articulated performance shaped for brilliance, continuity, musical sense and just the right kind of Straussian ironic poetry by a podium master at the peak of his style and craft. One can say that Leinsdorf has left a big impress on the Boston Symphony and so, for that matter, has the orchestra left a big impress on him.

The Barber, one must say, is quite a different kind of work and it had quite a different kind of performance. This is rather gray symphonic music in the old romantic style, achieved with a certain sincerity and even genuinely grand gesture. It is certainly a work that attempts to solve serious problems in a serious and expressive way and that was Leinsdorf's understanding of the music too; perhaps that helped it to be convincing.

Anyway, the Barber worked out all right and the Hindemith was fine but it was fine but it was Strauss in all his glorious trappings that carried the evening.

MUSICAL AMERICA
JAN. 1964

Boston Symphony

Erich Leinsdorf led the Boston Symphony at Philharmonic Hall on December 6 in a program that consisted of Hindemith's "Symphonic Metamorphoses of Themes by Carl Maria von Weber," Barber's Symphony No. 1 and Strauss' "Don Quixote."

The Hindemith piece has a title far more forbidding than its music, which is quite showy and tuneful. The orchestra romped through it with no trouble. Mr. Leinsdorf presided like a bemused lion tamer. One thing that has always disconcerted me about Leinsdorf's conducting has been his "floating" tempos —tempos that never seemed to settle down to any particular speed. Often the effect is of a work having no beginning or end, just a lot of middle. This was certainly not the case on this occasion.

Mr. Barber was on hand to accept the considerable applause given his symphony. The work is filled with plushy melodies but seemed duller than it probably really is because it followed the "Metamorphoses." Once again the orchestra rose to the occasion. The "Don Quixote" variations are far from being my favorite Strauss; I found my attention wandering. I did notice, however, that Samuel Mayes, cello, and Joseph de Pasquale, viola, gave the work their attention and best tone, playing their solos with the proper wit and whimsy.

—C. S. S.

New York
Journal American
NEW YORK, N.Y.
D. 501,625 S. 760,395

DEC 7 1963

AT PHILHARMONIC HALL

The Bostonians and Three Masters

By MILES KASTENDIECK

ERICH LEINSDORF and the Boston Symphony played Twentieth-Century music in Philharmonic Hall last night. Hindemith, Barber, and Strauss contributed the works. The orchestra displayed a finesse in playing heard only from the great ones.

Whether Mr. Leinsdorf achieved the quality of interpretation worthy of the music becomes immediately debatable. What he has done for the orchestra elicits constant admiration as its performance reflects his discipline and his intellectual grasp of scores.

Where the music demanded emotional intensity in warmth or depth of feeling, the performances fell short of fulfillment.

Hindemith's "Symphonic Metamorphosis of Themes by Carl Maria Von Weber" received a perceptive, clean-cut exposition. Its contrapuntal texture was exemplary, perhaps too much so because the business of the music became too prominent.

★

NOT ALL THE FUN in Hindemith and in this piece came through either in the jaunty syncopation of the scherzo or the flavor of the march.

It was good to have Samuel Barber's Symphony No. 1 played again, for this music should be head more often. Not only is it important in the development of the American repertory but it heralds Barber as the representative composer he was become.

That is can sound more attractive other performances have already registered. More bite and warmer lyricism make it quite moving. Last night its compositional aspect received enlightening treatment, but this kept the music from taking flight. And it can soar.

Strauss' "Don Quixote" completed the program with Samuel Mayes playing the cello and Joseph De Pasquale the viola solos.

★

VICTORIA KOBAYASHI-BONTEMPO made her American-press debut in Carnegie Hall last night. When she first played last March, the Japanese pianist went unrecorded in the newspaper blackout though the audience gave her standing ovations.

Admirably equipped, she leaves a positive impression technically, musically, and temperamentally. With definite ideas of her own resound hymn-like and funereal, however, raises serious problems.

New York Herald Tribune
D. 355,898 S. 451,270

DEC 7 1963

Unleashing the Bostonians

By Eric Salzman

Erich Leinsdorf put together one of his clever, mildly offbeat Leinsdorfian programs last night for the Boston Symphony's second Philharmonic program of the week.

At first glance there were three engaging, non-quite-rare works, strongly in contrasting character: the Hindemith Symphony Metamorphosis on Themes by Carl Maria von Weber, Samuel Barber's First Symphony, in one movement, and the Richard Strauss "Don Quixote." Then, at a hearing, the old Leinsdorf connecting train-of-thought — his find-a-relationship turn of mind—suddenly came through like an important inner voice in a seemingly simple score.

After all, what is the American composer's four-movements-rolled-up-into-one but a kind of Symphonic Metamorphosis on Themes by Samuel Barber? And Strauss' so-called Variations are really a series of dramatic metamorphoses rung in on his basic motives: to borrow Stokowski's old term, the piece could be almost described as a kind of symphonic sunthesis of the principal leit-motiv development from a great music drama on "Don Quixote" that Strauss, alas, never wrote.

Then too, both the Strauss and the Hindemith are showcase pieces, marvelously designed to exhibit the superlative musicians who make up this great ensemble. The jolly Hindemith, one of that composer's rare attempts to write a real showy color piece, is chock full of fancy flute solos, notable percussion strokes, big brass dabs and so on; afterward, Mr. Leinsdorf waved his triumphant executors to their feet, almost one at a time, to take their individual and well deserved bows.

The Strauss, of course, has a big solo cello part and an only slightly less important role for viola and on this occasion Samuel Mayes and Joseph de Pasquale, the Boston's excellent first-desk men, were the fine soloists. But let us not forget that this is a piece full of all sorts of other solo work; the concertmaster, for example, makes a big contribution and, it sometimes seems as though the bass clarinet hardly gets more than a few bars rest. In case anyone didn't know it before, last night's evidence ought to have been quite enough to demonstrate that there are some mighty fine solo musicians in the Boston Symphony.

And don't think Mr. Leinsdorf didn't plan it that way. He knows the value of his men and he knows what they can do. The work is hardly a regular visitor hereabouts although it was, in fact, played here just recently by another visiting orchestra. But it is one of Strauss' most convincing larger works and, if it can be something of triumph for the orchestra, it turns out to be equally so for the maestro.

In unleashing his men Leinsdorf by no means lost control of the big shape. This was a beautifully articulated performance shaped for brilliance, continuity, musical sense and just the right kind of Straussian ironic poetry by a podium master at the peak of his style and craft. One can say that Leinsdorf has left a big impress on the Boston Symphony and so, for that matter, has the orchestra left a big impress on him.

The Barber, one must say, is quite a different kind of work and it had quite a different kind of performance. This is rather gray symphonic music in the old romantic style, achieved with a certain sincerity and even genuinely grand gesture. It is certainly a work that attempts to solve serious problems in a serious and expressive way and that was Leinsdorf's understanding of the music too; perhaps that helped it to be convincing.

Anyway, the Barber worked out all right and the Hindemith was fine but it was fine but it was Strauss in all his glorious trappings that carried the evening.

MUSICAL AMERICA
JAN. 1964

Boston Symphony

Erich Leinsdorf led the Boston Symphony at Philharmonic Hall on December 6 in a program that consisted of Hindemith's "Symphonic Metamorphoses of Themes by Carl Maria von Weber," Barber's Symphony No. 1 and Strauss' "Don Quixote."

The Hindemith piece has a title far more forbidding than its music, which is quite showy and tuneful. The orchestra romped through it with no trouble. Mr. Leinsdorf presided like a bemused lion tamer. One thing that has always disconcerted me about Leinsdorf's conducting has been his "floating" tempos —tempos that never seemed to settle down to any particular speed. Often the effect is of a work having no beginning or end, just a lot of middle. This was certainly not the case on this occasion.

Mr. Barber was on hand to accept the considerable applause given his symphony. The work is filled with plushy melodies but seemed duller than it probably really is because it followed the "Metamorphoses." Once again the orchestra rose to the occasion. The "Don Quixote" variations are far from being my favorite Strauss; I found my attention wandering. I did notice, however, that Samuel Mayes, cello, and Joseph de Pasquale, viola, gave the work [illegible] their solos with the proper wit and whimsy.

—C. S. S.

62

CARNEGIE

MUSICAL AMERICA
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 15,900

JAN 1964

THE Boston Symphony, on December 7 at Carnegie Hall, brought ineffable joy to Mahlerites and froze non-Mahlerians into a state of rigidity. The occasion was a performance of Mahler's Symphony No. 5, with Erich Leinsdorf conducting a work that is rarely done because of the problems it poses. First, there is its inordinate length—the piece is seemingly endless—and then there is the matter of its instrumentation, which is highly complex and woefully difficult to manage even when it is in the hands of a virtuoso troupe. Mahler's inner ear directed his writing to a superhuman ensemble, one that could slide gracefully in and out of a maze of technical hazards. He spared no one, least of all the conductor, in concocting a huge aural tapestry which falls to shreds if one string of it is pulled out of place. Indeed, there has never been such a thing as an amateur performance of the work, for it is geared to the highest standards of execution.

But what of the symphony itself? On these pages I have previously gone on record of stating my position as a person who views Mahler coolly and with suspicion. Mostly, I find his stances and gestures intolerable and not a shade false of meaning. His utter lack of self-discipline, his habit of taking the long way round where the short way would do suffocates the sentiment that he is trying to evoke. His symphonies are like long speeches in which the content could be pared in half were the repetitions left out. The Fifth, for example, is so hostile to organizational logic, so bombastic and aggressive in display that it quite defeats whatever purpose the composer had in mind. Also, it is hysterical and grinds at the nerves precisely as all things that are overwrought are bound to do. Noisy it is and blatant, and it conveys nothing but emptiness, the emptiness of a master orchestrator with no other gift for expression. As such, it is a vexing piece, since it tries to do so much more than it accomplishes.

not sure how it would come off in an opera house, but given in concert it tears at the nerve ends with its power.

This fact could easily have been concealed in an offhand, mediocre performance, but the American Opera Society will have none of that. On this occasion it assembled a majestic cast, some of whose members were introduced to New York for the first time. The soprano lead, however, was not new to us, as Régine Crespin has built a very sound career away from France. As Salome she rattled the walls with her big and bulging voice, though loudness did not preclude some piano singing of the utmost delicacy and refinement. Every now and then she misjudged the acoustics of the hall and blasted a tone into the still air, but mainly she was forceful and forthright in a nonaggressive manner. It was a ripe interpretation and should long dwell in the ear.

Rita Gorr, as Hérodias, was in better voice than she has been throughout the season and spun out her lines with not a speck of effort. Surely she is not overtaxed with an excess of nuance—her phrases tend to lack resiliency—but her mezzo is a devilish fine instrument which was always firmly under control. She took no second place to Mme. Crespin, and that is saying a good deal.

As for the newcomers, it is said that Guy Chauvet, as John the Baptist, and Robert Massard, as Hérod, are, respectively, the finest tenor and baritone now operating in France. I can quickly understand why. Mr. Chauvet, though, in common with most French tenors,

Newark Sunday News
NEWARK, N. J.
S. 390,780

DEC 15 1963

Music

Symphonic Contrasts

By ALAN BRANIGAN

As the season goes along, it becomes apparent that in Erich Leinsdorf the musical world has a program maker of great talent, not to mention his tremendous conductorial ability. He has not been with the Boston Symphony very long, but already he is making a mark that will be hard to beat. Already his stimulating direction of Tanglewood last summer is taking on the proportion of a legend.

During a recent three-day visit to Manhattan, Leinsdorf and his splendid orchestra — which in the good old days used to visit Newark occasionally — played at least two programs that were uncommonly well put together. One featured only works that were sets of variations, one of them the wild and imaginative "Don Quixote" of Strauss. At the end the audience felt as if it had been treated to something unusual.

Even more striking was a Saturday evening program that offered, simply enough, two symphonies, the C Major of Mozart, K. 200, and the Mahler C Sharp Minor, No. 5, written in 1902. The idea was simplicity itself but the performance and the music it dealt with increased in complexity as the evening wore on and reached a towering climax.

Leinsdorf's theme obviously was to show the great contrast over the years. Mozart's was written in 1773 when he was 17, a vassal of Archbishop Colloredo at Salzburg, and it is a gem of its kind, simple, full of little mocking trills, sweetly singing its melodies. It is a perfect study of the gallant style in which it was written, and that's the way it was played. The Boston appeared on the Carnegie Hall stage about 40 strong, just about the size of the original Manneheim orchestra. The sound was small, clear and very elegant as the instruments — and to a certain extent, the suave Leinsdorf — danced through this happy, heavenly work, as delicious as a Fragonard.

Immense Work

Then, to show us what happened to the symphony as a form, Leinsdorf brought forth the full force of the Boston Symphony for the Mahler — an immense orchestra three times the size of the Mozart. It had everything in it —contrabasson, two harps, a barrage of percussion, including two bass drums; battalions of strings, and, we thought, more horns and trumpets than unusual. It was a gigantic ensemble, and, not surprisingly, the effect was gigantic, as well.

This is an astonishing piece of music, this Mahler Fifth, peculiarly appropriate to this period of our history. It opens with a funeral march, of grandeur and immense sorrow. The march is interrupted midway by a faster anguished passage that is almost a wild blues in its intensity, as if the composer were expressing unspeakable agony.

The greatness and versatility of the composer also are shown in the succeeding movements. First comes a stormy section, full of desperation at times but unfailingly tuneful. A catalogue of waltzes is the next movement, with horn solo (beautifully played by James Stagliano) alternating with strings, as if a series of pictures of romantic Vienna were being unreeled.

Yearning Themes

This long symphony then continues with the famous Adagietto, for strings and gentle harp arpeggios, its themes full of yearning. And a jolly, powerful Mendelssohnian rondo at the end brings us back to the world of the living. Altogether an amazing series of moods, typical of Mahler's unexpectedness.

To see Leinsdorf's slight figure and concise signals as he kept the symphony's innumerable musical threads strung together into a pattern was a remarkable experience. And the work itself, with its violent climaxes, trumpet calls, sadly reminiscent of the taps played so memorable at Arlington Cemetery, drum rolls and ominous stride held the audience in a grip. At the end there was an explosion of bravos. Truly, Gustav Mahler is having an unprecedented boom.

The concert was part of Carnegie Hall's provocative Festival of Visiting Orchestras. Future programs will present Philharmonica Hungarica, which will feature Bartok and Kodaly Jan. 12; the Boston once again Jan. 25, with Bruckner No. 7 as the big attraction, and the Vienna Symphony, under Wolfgang Sawallisch, Feb. 9, in a program that will pair Mozart's "Jupiter" and the Bruckner No. 3 in D Minor.

New York
Journal American
NEW YORK, N.Y.
D. 501,625 S. 760,395

DEC 9 1963

AT CARNEGIE HALL

Cheers are Rated By Bostonians

By MILES KASTENDIECK

IT WAS THE BOSTON SYMPHONY'S turn to play in Carnegie Hall's International Festival of Visiting Orchestras Saturday night. Erich Leinsdorf chose an alliterated program of Mozart and Mahler, by combining the former's Symphony K-200 with the latter's No. 5.

Bruno Walter said of Mahler's Fifth that "it is music, passionate, wild, patheic, buoyant, solemn, tender, full of all the sentiments of which the human heart is capable."

Most Mahlerites would agree, but Mr. Leinsdorf did not present the music in this light. He did, however, conduct it through a purely musical course with admirable precision.

With the musicians attuned to respond in virtuoso fashion to his decisive leadership, the playing had its moments of fascination and illumination. What was missing would best be described as the personal element inherent in all of Mahler's music. This is what Walter described as its essence.

★

CONSIDERED OBJECTIVELY, the performance was exciting; considered subjectively, like most Mahler, it was four-square and strangely impersonal.

Thus all the contrapuntal aspect, especially of the scherzo and the finale, came through remarkably; but the romantic outpouring became distilled. This performance cried out for heart.

In contrast, Mr. Leinsdorf conducted the Mozart beautifully. In this the clarity and polish he demanded of the orchestra paid rich dividends. The early work profited by his discerning treatment.

A large audience responded to the Mahler with spontaneous cheers, especially after the extraordinarily brilliant wind-up of the finale. In achieving this feat of virtuosity the Boston Symphony proved dazzling.

New York Herald Tribune
D. 355,898 S. 451,270

DEC 9 1963

On Saturday night at Carnegie Hall, Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony continue their contributions to New York musical life—with their fourth New York concert in a week—and to the current Bruckner-Mahler boom—with an excellent performance of the Mahler Symphony No. 5 "C sharp minor."

This large and remarkable work (which, by the way, in spite of the conventional designation, is surely in D major) received a large-scale and remarkable performance. The results were by no means higly polished nor, on the other hand, did they have much in the way of romantic chetoric, grand gesture or sweep; Leinsdorf simply isn't that kind of conductor. He does however have the instinct to clarify and to invest everything with maximum articulation and motion. That made for a classical kind of Mahler with its own kind of effective drive, careful subtlety and depth of thought. The emotional jags are inherent in this music anyway; Leinsdorf merely lets them stand by themselves while he works to bring out other things.

The presence of the Mozart Symphony (in C, K. 200) that opened the proceedings made it an all-Austrian affair and the reduced orchestra in this work made an effective contrast to the large Mahlerian forces that came later. Leinsdorf's Austrian heritage seems to stem from the great Austrian classical tradition rather than from latter-day Viennese gemuetlichkeit and it will be readily appreciated that his Mozart had firmness, style and most elegant vi-

62

CARNEGIE

MUSICAL AMERICA
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 15,900

JAN 1964

THE Boston Symphony, on December 7 at Carnegie Hall, brought ineffable joy to Mahlerites and froze non-Mahlerians into a state of rigidity. The occasion was a performance of Mahler's Symphony No. 5, with Erich Leinsdorf conducting a work that is rarely done because of the problems it poses. First, there is its inordinate length—the piece is seemingly endless—and then there is the matter of its instrumentation, which is highly complex and woefully difficult to manage even when it is in the hands of a virtuoso troupe. Mahler's inner ear directed his writing to a superhuman ensemble, one that could slide gracefully in and out of a maze of technical hazards. He spared no one, least of all the conductor, in concocting a huge aural tapestry which falls to shreds if one string of it is pulled out of place. Indeed, there has never been such a thing as an amateur performance of the work, for it is geared to the highest standards of execution.

But what of the symphony itself? On these pages I have previously gone on record of stating my position as a person who views Mahler coolly and with suspicion. Mostly, I find his stances and gestures intolerable and not a shade false of meaning. His utter lack of self-discipline, his habit of taking the long way round where the short way would do suffocates the sentiment that he is trying to evoke. His symphonies are like long speeches in which the content could be pared in half were the repetitions left out. The Fifth, for example, is so hostile to organizational logic, so bombastic and aggressive in display that it quite defeats whatever purpose the composer had in mind. Also, it is hysterical and grinds at the nerves precisely as all things that are overwrought are bound to do. Noisy it is and blatant, and it conveys nothing but emptiness, the emptiness of a master orchestrator with no other gift for expression. As such, it is a vexing piece, since it tries to do so much more than it accomplishes.

not sure how it would come off in an opera house, but given in concert it tears at the nerve ends with its power.

This fact could easily have been concealed in an offhand mediocre performance, but the American Opera Society will have none of that. On this occasion it assembled a majestic cast, some of whose members were introduced to New York for the first time. The soprano lead, however, was not new to us, as Régine Crespin has built a very sound career lately from France. As Salome she rattled the walls with her big and bulging voice, though loudness did not preclude some piano singing of the utmost delicacy and refinement. Every now and then she misjudged the acoustics of the hall and blasted a tone into the still air, but mainly she was forceful and forthright in a nonaggressive manner. It was a ripe interpretation and should long dwell in the ear.

Rita Gorr, as Hérodias, was in better voice than she has been throughout the season and spun out her lines with not a speck of effort. Surely she is not overtaxed with an excess of nuance—her phrases tend to lack resiliency—but her mezzo is a devilish fine instrument which was always firmly under control. She took no second place to Mme. Crespin, and that is saying a good deal.

As for the newcomers, it is said that Guy Chauvet, as John the Baptist, and Robert Massard, as Hérod, are, respectively, the finest tenor and baritone now operating in France. I can quickly understand why. Mr. Chauvet, though, in common with most French tenors,

Newark Sunday News
NEWARK, N. J.
S. 390,760

DEC 15 1963

Music

Symphonic Contrasts

By ALAN BRANIGAN

As the season goes along, it becomes apparent that in Erich Leinsdorf the musical world has a program maker of great talent, not to mention his tremendous conductorial ability. He has not been with the Boston Symphony very long, but already he is making a mark that will be hard to beat. Already his stimulating direction of Tanglewood last summer is taking on the proportion of a legend.

During a recent three-day visit to Manhattan, Leinsdorf and his splendid orchestra — which in the good old days used to visit Newark occasionally — played at least two programs that were uncommonly well put together. One featured only works that were sets of variations, one of them the wild and imaginative "Don Quixote" of Strauss. At the end the audience felt as if it had been treated to something unusual.

Even more striking was a Saturday evening program that offered, simply enough, two symphonies, the C Major of Mozart, K. 200, and the Mahler C Sharp Minor, No. 5, written in 1902. The idea was simplicity itself but the performance and the music it dealt with increased in complexity as the evening wore on and reached a towering climax.

Leinsdorf's theme obviously was to show the great contrast over the years. Mozart's was written in 1773 when he was 17, a vassal of Archbishop Colloredo at Salzburg, and it is a gem of its kind, simple, full of little mocking trills, sweetly singing its melodies. It is a perfect study of the gallant style in which it was written, and that's the way it was played. The Boston appeared on the Carnegie Hall stage about 40 strong, just about the size of the original Mannheim orchestra. The sound was small, clear and very elegant as the instruments — and to a certain extent, the suave Leinsdorf — danced through this happy, heavenly work, as delicious as a Fragonard.

Immense Work

Then, to show us what happened to the symphony as a form, Leinsdorf brought forth the full force of the Boston Symphony for the Mahler — an immense orchestra three times the size of the Mozart. It had everything in it — contrabasson, two harps, a barrage of percussion, including two bass drums; battalions of strings, and, we thought, more horns and trumpets than usual. It was a gigantic ensemble, and, not surprisingly, the effect was gigantic, as well.

This is an astonishing piece of music, this Mahler Fifth, peculiarly appropriate to this period of our history. It opens with a funeral march, of grandeur and immense sorrow. The march is interrupted midway by a faster anguished passage that is almost a wild blues in its intensity, as if the composer were expressing unspeakable agony.

The greatness and versatility of the composer also are shown in the succeeding movements. First comes a stormy section, full of desperation at times but unfailingly tuneful. A catalogue of waltzes is the next movement, with horn solo (beautifully played by James Stagliano) alternating with strings, as if a series of pictures of romantic Vienna were being unreeled.

Yearning Themes

This long symphony then continues with the famous Adagietto, for strings and gentle harp arpeggios, its themes full of yearning. And a jolly, powerful Mendelssohnian rondo at the end brings us back to the world of the living. Altogether an amazing series of moods, typical of Mahler's unexpectedness.

To see Leinsdorf's slight figure and concise signals as he kept the symphony's innumerable musical threads strung together into a pattern was a remarkable experience. And the work itself, with its violent climaxes, trumpet calls, sadly reminiscent of the taps played so memorable at Arlington Cemetery, drum rolls and ominous stride held the audience in a grip. At the end there was an explosion of bravos. Truly, Gustav Mahler is having an unprecedented boom.

The concert was part of Carnegie Hall's provocative Festival of Visiting Orchestras. Future programs will present Philharmonica Hungarica, which will feature Bartok and Kodaly Jan. 12; the Boston once again Jan. 25, with Bruckner No. 7 as the big attraction, and the Vienna Symphony, under Wolfgang Sawallisch, Feb. 9, in a program that will pair Mozart's "Jupiter" and the Bruckner No. 4 in D Minor.

New York
Journal American
NEW YORK, N.Y.
D. 501,625 S. 760,395

DEC 9 1963

AT CARNEGIE HALL

Cheers are Rated By Bostonians

By MILES KASTENDIECK

IT WAS THE BOSTON SYMPHONY'S turn to play in Carnegie Hall's International Festival of Visiting Orchestras Saturday night. Erich Leinsdorf chose an alliterated program of Mozart and Mahler, by combining the former's Symphony K-200 with the latter's No. 5.

Bruno Walter said of Mahler's Fifth that "it is music, passionate, wild, pathetic, buoyant, solemn, tender, full of all the sentiments of which the human heart is capable."

Most Mahlerites would agree, but Mr. Leinsdorf did not present the music in this light. He did, however, conduct it through a purely musical course with admirable precision.

With the musicians attuned to respond in virtuoso fashion to his decisive leadership, the playing had its moments of fascination and illumination. What was missing would best be described as the personal element inherent in all of Mahler's music. This is what Walter described as its essence.

★

CONSIDERED OBJECTIVELY, the performance was exciting; considered subjectively like most Mahler it was four-square and strangely impersonal.

Thus all the contrapuntal aspect, especially of the scherzo and the finale, came through remarkably; but the romantic outpouring became distilled. This performance cried out for heart.

In contrast, Mr. Leinsdorf conducted the Mozart beautifully. In this the clarity and polish he demanded of the orchestra paid rich dividends. The early work profited by his discerning treatment.

A large audience responded to the Mahler with spontaneous cheers, especially after the extraordinarily brilliant wind-up of the finale. In achieving this feat of virtuosity the Boston Symphony proved dazzling.

New York
Herald Tribune
D. 355,898 S. 451,270

DEC 9 1963

[illegible] night at Carnegie Hall, Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony continue their contributions to New York musical life—with their fourth New York concert in a week—and to the current Bruckner-Mahler boom—with an excellent performance of the Mahler Symphony No. 5 "C sharp minor."

This large and remarkable work (which, by the way, in spite of the conventional designation, is surely in D major) received a large-scale and remarkable performance. The results were by no means higly polished nor, on the other hand, did they have much in the way of romantic chetoric, grand gesture or sweep; Leinsdorf simply isn't that kind of conductor. He does however have the instinct to clarify and to invest everything with maximum articulation and motion. That made for a classical kind of Mahler with its own kind of effective drive, careful subtlety and depth of thought. The emotional jags are inherent in this music anyway; Leinsdorf merely lets them stand by themselves while he works to bring out other things.

The presence of the Mozart Symphony (in C, K. 200) that opened the proceedings made it an all-Austrian affair and the reduced orchestra in this work made an effective contrast to the large Mahlerian forces that came later. Leinsdorf's Austrian heritage seems to stem from the great Austrian classical tradition rather than from latter-day Viennese gemuetlichkeit and it will be readily appreciated that his Mozart had firmness, style and most elegant vi-

63 / 3

The New York Times
D. 681,612 S. 1,304,447

DEC 9 1963

Leinsdorf Demonstrates 2 Styles In Leading the Boston Symphony

Erich Leinsdorf, who has always been interesting visually, employed two styles of conducting at the Saturday night Boston Symphony Orchestra Carnegie Hall concert and each shed light on the conductor's musical profile.

Two works formed the program: Mozart's compact Symphony in C (K. 200), and Mahler's spacious Symphony No. 5 in C sharp minor. They were both well played, the Mahler exceptionally so. The accumulation of excitement in its last section was so intense the cheers of the capacity audience and the final chord of the work were simultaneous.

Mr. Leinsdorf's two styles were what might be called chorographic and functional. The first was used for the Mozart where the conductor did not beat time but rather sought to match each phrase nuance with its appropriate gesture: a flick of the wrist here, a shrug of the shoulders there. Several times he ceased all motion.

This mirroring of music in gesture was not always successful. When the movements did not correspond exactly to the phrase feeling, one got a confused idea, and the rhythmic framework lost its tension.

There were not these failings in the Mahler where the functional approach was used. Here the conductor simply beat time with his right hand while giving the thousands of complex cues with his left.

And because Mr. Leinsdorf was so immersed in the technical problems of leading the intricate score from memory, his intellectual concentration seemed sharper, his musical penetration deeper.

The orchestra reflected this with a generally brilliant performance. The exception was the playing of the brass choirs, especially that of Roger Voisin, the principal trumpeter. It is a wonder that Mr. Leinsdorf can tolerate the excessive, unattractive and inappropriate vibratos that come from the rear of the orchestra. Surely brass players can produce honest, straight tones as well as quavering dance hall sounds.

This was the third concert in the Visiting Orchestra Series "A" at Carnegie. Next, the Philharmonia Hungarica, Jan. 12, then the Boston Symphony again, this time with Bruckner's Seventh Symphony, on Jan. 25.

HOWARD KLEIN.

New York Post
D. 372,679 S. 255,557

DEC 9 1963

Leinsdorf Leads Mahler 'Fifth'

Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony ended theree concerts of three different programs here last week with a performance of Mahler's Fifth Synphony Saturday night in Carnegie Hall.

The admirable discipline, evident in the precision of attack and bowing, a beautiful warm string tone, and vigorous playing minus the wrong kind of tension, were all in strong evidence during the Mahler, testifying to Leinsdorf's accomplishments during his year's tenure as the Bostonians' music director.

But so far as a pentrating understanding of how to project Mahler's expanded symphonic panorama, the performance limped along its hour-long lenghth. Bruno Walter conducts it in a recording at least ten minutes shorter than Leinsdorf's interpretation. His sprawled and jerked too much, was square and disjointed instead of rounded in curves that would have etched Mahler's tragedy, his sumptuousness, his gaiety or whatever. Also, the instrumental texture aften was thick.

Mahler's expressiveness is inclusive but everything must dovetail in interpretation. Leinsdorf missed connections, and in being late, became ejected from the central depot and got lost. There were moments of beauty, especially in the Adagietto but, on the whole, the performance was self conscious, over-accented so that the big line was lost, and sectional instead of nobly architectural.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2076, Boston 6 • Richmond 2-4200
Sunday Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
Circ. 1,304,447
DEC 8 1963

Music: Boston Symphony Program

Hindemith, Barber and Strauss Are Played

By THEODORE STRONGIN

BY a scant two years and two days, the Boston Symphony Concert Friday night at Philharmonic Hall missed being an all-20th century concert. It was good comfortable programing, starting with Hindemith's Symphonic Metamorphosis of Themes by Carl Maria von Weber, written in 1943. Then Erich Leinsdorf, who conducted, offered the 1936 Barber First Symphony (in one movement).

It was the Strauss "Don Quixote" that reached into the 19th century. It was completed on Dec. 29, 1897. But it ventured into far more daring worlds of sound than either of the later works.

The Strauss, of course, uses sounds for pictorical purposes, to imitate the bleating of sheep, the turning of windmills and other episodes in the story. Whatever the composer's reason, the work is saturated with imaginative touches. At almost no point can anything be taken for granted. There is a constant freshening and renewing of pathos throughout.

The Barber is an easily reached work with broad planes of intensity, satisfyingly stacked. There is no pain in hearing it, and it takes no effort to understand. The Hindemith is trim and athletic and an attractive contrapuntal frame for the little-known themes borrowed from von Weber.

The Boston Symphony, completely at ease with its new Leinsdorfian personality, was as flexible and sensitive an instrument last night as could be asked for. The Hindemith was rhythmically firm and forward-moving. In the Barber, the bands of tone were like collections of muscle fibers.

•

And in the Strauss, the orchestra showed another quality that has become natural to it since Mr. Leinsdorf took over. Its textures were miraculously light and transparent, though entirely secure. And the conductor, with the smallest understatement of nuance, can achieve the warmest possible lilt. He has expanded the orchestra's expressive range to a high degree.

Conducting such as Mr. Leinsdorf's last night allows a combination of pleasures, since he is an intellectual interpreter as well as a musical one. The mind enjoys his orderly and purposeful placing of every note. The emotions respond to the perfectly clear way he communicates the composer's intentions. It was a beautiful concert indeed, sensitively aided and abetted by Samuel Mayes, cellist, and Joseph de Pasquale, violist, in "Don Quixote."

New York World-Telegram and The Sun
D. 463,241 SAT. 175,139

DEC 9 1963

Music

Leinsdorf Attains New Heights

By LOUIS BIANCOLLI

With his performance of Mahler's Fifth Symphony at the Boston Symphony's Carnegie Hall concert Saturday night, Erich Leinsdorf climbed to new heights of glory.

At the end the recognition that was his must have startled him. People jumped up and "bravoed" lustily; applause thundered from all parts of the house, and the crowd just would not let him go home.

Leinsdorf, a wholly dedicated artist, beamed happily, yet with a certain bewilderment, and shared the plaudits with the orchestra that, inspired to the last man, had given him such splendid cooperation.

Surely, this was one of the great events of the season, and as vigorous a boost to the Mahler cause as has happened since the lamented days of Walter and Mitropoulos. What a keen satisfaction for me to watch that jubilant throng!

One is inevitably involved emotionally in something like this fifth symphony. To surrender to Mahler is to accompany him, like Dante accompanying Virgil, on a journey to Hell and back. For Mahler does come back in the Fifth.

After the funeral march and bedevilled whirlwind that follows, there is the prospect of the Adagietto—a sky-blue vista of peace suffused with a beauty that hurts—and the final triple-fugue Rondo, a clamor of healthy bustle.

That finale built up to overpowering force Saturday night.

PROVIDENCE. 2

The Providence Journal
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
D. 61,299 S. 193,108

DEC 1 1 1963

Music Last Night

Leinsdorf Conducts Hub Symphony Concert Here

By RUTH TRIPP

Erich Leinsdorf conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening at Veterans Memorial Auditorium. A capacity audience enjoyed an unusually interesting program which featured the first appearance here of the young pianist, Idil Biret, a 22-year-old native of Ankara, Turkey. She played Rachmaninoff's Concerto No. 3.

It also featured the first appearance here of Erich Leinsdorf, conducting from the harpsichord in Bach's Brandenburg Concerto No. 4 in G major. His performance was excellent. Soloists in this delightful chamber work were Joseph Silverstein, violin, Doriot Anthony Dwyer and James Pappoutsakis, flutes.

The first performance in Providence of Strauss' "Don Quixote" featured Samuel Mayes, violoncello, and Joseph de Pasquale, viola, as soloists. This exotically assembled narrative in music is a masterpiece of imaginative writing. Strauss has made it easy to follow the hero in his travels. Samuel Mayes played a superb interpretation of this extraordinary character sketch. The thread of idealism was strong and shining throughout in the solo cello and soloist and orchestra combined to make Don Quixote's demise a dramatic moment. The viola was a wonderful contrast of earthy humor. The balance of the orchestra provided realistic sound effects for everything Strauss had taken from Cervantes' strange tale. Leinsdorf conducted from memory and his interpretation was a memorable one.

The charm of the opening Brandenburg would be hard to surpass. This is a masterpiece of its type and to have the conductor play, just as Bach would have done, as he conducted from the keyboard, was especially interesting. Only once before have I seen this done at a Boston Symphony Orchestra concert and this in Symphony Hall at a Pension Fund concert when Koussevitzky conducted Haydn's "Farewell" symphony. Then, all the players were in costumes of the period. Soloists and orchestra were heartily applauded.

Idil Biret's playing of the Rachmaninoff was technically brilliant. It showed well grounded musicianship. This concerto requires a lifetime of experience before its depths can be plumbed. We heard all we could have expected to hear from so young a pianist, no matter how proficient her delivery of the notes was. This is a colossal work. This is an age when we expect our young people to accomplish colossal things too soon. Matters seem to have become reversed and now, one plays Mozart at the close of a career.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Times (e)
PAWTUCKET-
CENTRAL FALLS, R. I.
Circ. 38,168

DEC 11 1963

Turkish Pianist Cheered With Boston Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra under the expert guidance of Erich Leinsdorf gave a full-house audience in Veterans Memorial Auditorium Tuesday night an evening of artists and ovations with one of the most enjoyable concerts they have ever played in Providence.

The star of the program was Idil Biret, young Turkish pianist, who gave a magnificent performance of Rachmaninoff's "Piano Concerto No. 3 in D-Minor" that merited a standing ovation and unending applause that included solid cheers. She played with an emotional communication, without mannerisms, that seemed to impart to the listeners that this work was created for her. It was communication not only with the audience but with the composer.

The opening movement, allegro ma non tanto, was bold, assertive and sometimes savagely arrogant, yet it returned ever and anon to a caressing gentleness. Mr. Leinsdorf controlled the orchestra in such a manner that they and the soloist enhanced each other. The intermezzo, which was adagio, had an embracing fondness, and her solos with the orchestra built and enlarged the glow of warm sound, while her cadenzas and solos unaccompanied gave the intermezzo an effulgence.

In the closing movement, there was a gathering up of all the previous glittering gems of musical phrases arranged in a dazzling array of flashing tonal lights and color. She commanded breathless attentiveness and unbridled applause.

The opening work on the program was Bach's "Brandenburg Concerto No. 4" with Joseph Silverstein, violin soloist; Doriot Anthony Dwyer and James Pappoutsakis, flute soloists, and Mr. Leinsdorf playing the harpsichord while directing the small ensemble of strings with whichever hand was free. They were given an ovation and three curtain calls.

Samuel Mayes, cellist, and Joseph DePasquale, violist, were soloists in Richard Strauss' "Don Quixote Fantastic Variations on a Theme of Knightly Character." This and the Brandenburg were played for the first time in Providence by the orchestra, and it was one of the most fascinating compositions this reviewer has heard. It contained two themes, alternating with each other, and separated by some weird noises and absurd passages. The brassy, heroic theme of the knight bespoke Quixote's "romantic eccentricity and his noble dreaming", and the dreamy sweetness of his sweetheart, Dulcinea. And there was a hint of Sancho Panza.

Mr. Leinsdorf blended fervor with fantasy and made of it a readable musical translation of the tale. All the ear-irritating sounds which depicted errant dreams meeting harsh reality, or brave deeds turned to madness, added up to sweet melody and harmony whenever the cacophony threatened to become grating to the spirit. The solos by Mayes and DePasquale were thrilling and they, too, were given an ovation and three curtain calls.

C.H.L.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Sunday Journal
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
Circ. 193,108

DEC 8 1963

IDEL BIRET is soloist with Boston Symphony Tuesday. Eric Leinsdorf will conduct.

TUESDAY

A WHOLE ARRAY of soloists will be heard with the Boston Symphony when Erich Leinsdorf conducts the orchestra at Veterans Memorial Auditorium at 8:15 p.m.

Of special interest will be 22-year-old Turkish piano soloist Idel Biret, who is making her first American concert tour with the Boston Symphony. Miss Biret will be heard in Rachmaninoff's Third Piano Concerto, which will conclude the program.

The evening will open with Bach's Brandenburg Concerto No. 4 in which Leinsdorf will conduct from a harpsichord, interspersing his playing with gestures from whichever hand may be free. Fellow soloists for this work will be Joseph Silverstein, violinist, and Doriot Anthony Dwyer and James Pappoutsakis on flutes.

Another featured work for the program will be Richard Strauss' "Don Quixote." Soloists for this work will be Samuel Mayes, cellist; Joseph de Pasquale, viola, and Silverstein.

MONDAY 2. FRI.-SAT. 10

65 1 3

SEASON • NINETEEN HUNDRED SIXTY-THREE–SIXTY-FOUR

Second Program

MONDAY EVENING, DECEMBER 9, at 8:30 o'clock

Brandenburg Concerto No. 4 in G major, for Violin, Two Flutes, and String Orchestra

I. Allegro
II. Andante
III. Presto

Violin: JOSEPH SILVERSTEIN
Flutes: DORIOT ANTHONY DWYER
JAMES PAPPOUTSAKIS

STRAUSS ..... "Don Quixote," Fantastic Variations on a Theme of Knightly Character, Op. 35

Introduction, Theme and Variations, and Finale
Violoncello Solo: SAMUEL MAYES
Viola Solo: JOSEPH DE PASQUALE

INTERMISSION

RACHMANINOFF ..... Piano Concerto No. 3, in D minor

I. Allegro ma non tanto
II. Intermezzo: Adagio
III. Finale

SOLOIST
IDIL BIRET
Miss BIRET plays the Baldwin Piano

BALDWIN PIANO

RCA VICTOR RECORDS

EIGHTY-THIRD SEASON • NINETEEN HUNDRED SIXTY-THREE–SIXTY-FOUR

Tenth Program

FRIDAY AFTERNOON, DECEMBER 13, at 2:00 o'clock

SATURDAY EVENING, DECEMBER 14, at 8:30 o'clock

SCHUBERT ..... Symphony No. 3, in D major

I. Adagio maestoso; Allegro con brio
II. Allegretto
III. Menuetto
IV. Presto: Vivace

RIMSKY-KORSAKOV ..... Suite from "Le Coq d'Or"

I. King Dodon in his palace
II. King Dodon in the country
III. King Dodon with the Queen of Shemakha
IV. Wedding March and the lamentable end of King Dodon

INTERMISSION

BARTÓK ..... Concerto No. 2 for Violin and Orchestra

I. Allegro non troppo
II. Andante tranquillo
III. Allegro molto

SOLOIST
JOSEPH SILVERSTEIN

These concerts will end about 3:50 o'clock on Friday Afternoon; 10:20 o'clock on Saturday Evening.

BALDWIN PIANO

RCA VICTOR RECORDS

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Evening Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 146,915
DEC 1963

Violin Soloist

Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster of the Boston Symphony, will play the Second Bartok Concerto at the orchestra's concerts Friday and Saturday. Erich Leinsdorf will conduct.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Record-American (m) (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 531,565
DEC 10 1963

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 465,653
DEC 8 196

wEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Herald
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 283,819
DEC 8 1963

Symphony This Week

Violinist to Play Bartok Concerto

Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has invited Joseph Silverstein, the orchestra's concertmaster, to be soloist at the concerts Friday and Saturday. Mr. Silverstein, who is serving his second season as concertmaster, will play the Violin Concerto No. 2 by Bela Bartok.

The Friday-Saturday concerts will open with the Symphony No. 3 of Schubert and will continue with the Suite from "Le Coq d'Or" by Rimsky-Korsakov.

Idil Biret, the young Turkish pianist who made her United States debut recently with Mr. Leinsdorf and the orchestra, will make her last Boston appearance of this season at the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert tomorrow evening.

She will be soloist in the Rachmaninoff Piano Concerto No. 3. Mr. Leinsdorf will begin the program with the Bach Brandenburg Concerto No. 4. Soloists in this work will be Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster; Doriot Anthony Swyer, principal flute; and James Pappoutsakis, flute. Mr. Leinsdorf will then conduct Richard Strauss' "Don Quixote," in which Joseph de Pasquale, principal viola, and Samuel Mayes, principal cello, will be soloists.

On Tuesday evening the Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its second visit of the season to Providence. Mr. Leinsdorf will conduct the concert in the Veterans Memorial Auditorium.

MONDAY 2. FRI.-SAT. 10

65 1 3

EIGHTY-THIRD SEASON • NINETEEN HUNDRED SIXTY-THREE–SIXTY-FOUR

Second Program

MONDAY EVENING, DECEMBER 9, at 8:30 o'clock

BACH ..... Brandenburg Concerto No. 4 in G major, for Violin, Two Flutes, and String Orchestra

I. Allegro
II. Andante
III. Presto

Violin: JOSEPH SILVERSTEIN
Flutes: DORIOT ANTHONY DWYER
JAMES PAPPOUTSAKIS

STRAUSS ..... "Don Quixote," Fantastic Variations on a Theme of Knightly Character, Op. 35

Introduction, Theme and Variations, and Finale
Violoncello Solo: SAMUEL MAYES
Viola Solo: JOSEPH DE PASQUALE

INTERMISSION

RACHMANINOFF ..... Piano Concerto No. 3, in D minor

I. Allegro ma non tanto
II. Intermezzo: Adagio
III. Finale

SOLOIST
IDIL BIRET
Miss BIRET plays the Baldwin Piano

BALDWIN PIANO

RCA VICTOR RECORDS

EIGHTY-THIRD SEASON • NINETEEN HUNDRED SIXTY-THREE–SIXTY-FOUR

Tenth Program

FRIDAY AFTERNOON, DECEMBER 13, at 2:00 o'clock

SATURDAY EVENING, DECEMBER 14, at 8:30 o'clock

SCHUBERT ..... Symphony No. 3, in D major

I. Adagio maestoso; Allegro con brio
II. Allegretto
III. Menuetto
IV. Presto: Vivace

RIMSKY-KORSAKOV ..... Suite from "Le Coq d'Or"

I. King Dodon in his palace
II. King Dodon in the country
III. King Dodon with the Queen of Shemakha
IV. Wedding March and the lamentable end of King Dodon

INTERMISSION

BARTÓK ..... Concerto No. 2 for Violin and Orchestra

I. Allegro non troppo
II. Andante tranquillo
III. Allegro molto

SOLOIST
JOSEPH SILVERSTEIN

These concerts will end about 3:50 o'clock on Friday Afternoon; 10:20 o'clock on Saturday Evening.

BALDWIN PIANO

RCA VICTOR RECORDS

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Evening Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 146,915
DEC 11 1963

Violin Soloist

Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster of the Boston Symphony, will play the Second Bartok Concerto at the orchestra's concerts Friday and Saturday. Erich Leinsdorf will conduct.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Record-American (m) (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 531,565
DEC 10 1963

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 465,653
DEC 8 1963

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Herald
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 283,819
DEC 8 1963

Symphony This Week

Violinist to Play Bartok Concerto

Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has invited Joseph Silverstein, the orchestra's concertmaster, to be soloist at the concerts Friday and Saturday. Mr. Silverstein, who is serving his second season as concertmaster, will play the Violin Concerto No. 2 by Bela Bartok.

The Friday-Saturday concerts will open with the Symphony No. 3 of Schubert and will continue with the Suite from "Le Coq d'Or" by Rimsky-Korsakov.

Idil Biret, the young Turkish pianist who made her United States debut recently with Mr. Leinsdorf and the orchestra, will make her last Boston appearance of this season at the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert tomorrow evening.

She will be soloist in the Rachmaninoff Piano Concerto No. 3. Mr. Leinsdorf will begin the program with the Bach Brandenburg Concerto No. 4. Soloists in this work will be Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster; Doriot Anthony Swyer, principal flute; and James Pappoutsakis, flute. Mr. Leinsdorf will then conduct Richard Strauss' "Don Quixote," in which Joseph de Pasquale, principal viola, and Samuel Mayes, principal cello, will be soloists.

On Tuesday evening the Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its second visit of the season in Providence. Mr. Leinsdorf will conduct the concert in the Veterans Memorial Auditorium.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Herald (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 178,553
DEC 14 1963

THE SYMPHONY

Silverstein Excellent In Bartok's Concerto

By ROBERT TAYLOR

Once again Erich Leinsdorf's policy of tapping soloists from the ample resources of The Boston Symphony Orchestra has paid handsome dividends. Yesterday it was Joseph Silverstein, the concertmaster, who gave a punctilious performance of Bartok's Second Violin Concerto.

The Concerto itself only recently is known as the Second, since a 1908 Concerto for Violin by the composer came to light but five years ago. The three movement score adapts traditional forms, the first a sonata-allegro, the second, theme with variations, the third a free rondo commenting on the themes of the opening section.

Cerebral Severity

While undoubtedly a valuable addition to the scant violin repertoire of this century, the work seems to me intermittently expressive, combining passages of fine-spun loveliness with a self-conscious and cerebral severity.

The mingled nature of the piece finds a kind of summation in the final rondo which combines a moodily romantic theme of intense lyricism and a 12-tone technique—the latter calling attention to itself in context. As a result, one is aware of the marriage of the subjective and the abstract to a degree that is occasionally unsettling.

Either one hears the concerto in terms of sound effects and vivid timbres; or else those broad and flowing rhapsodic measures; and the struggle between the heart and the head rather than the proper definition of its brilliant workmanship is the impression left at a single hearing.

To the Concerto, which offers few pronounced virtuosic opportunities, Mr. Silverstein brought a meticulous line. Employing a battery of delicate weights and pressures, he interpreted the work as a meditative and introspective statement. He did not strive for a big tone, but his tone was sufficiently eloquent for the conception.

Silken Quality

The silken quality of his bowing appeared as the chief technical component, and while the accurate, fleet fingerings of the formidable cadenza at the close of the allegro declared his dexterity, his musical approach to the work, tactfully accompanied by Mr. Leinsdorf, dominated throughout.

Schubert's Symphony No. 3, however, proved the unalloyed delight of this concert. I'm afraid Rimsky's Suite from "Le Coq d'Or," sounded jingling and superficial beside it: colorful, yes, jocund, yes, but blatantly coarse and obvious.

Perhaps this is the reaction of a curmudgeon. Music that is meant to entertain should not be judged harshly, and from a standpoint of performance, the jeweled Orientalia of Rimsky's orchestration glittered as though rhinestones passed for diamonds. But, coming after the freshet of Schubert's melodic invention, the suite was bombastic and hollow, too much diversion and too little substance. We may assume that Mr. Leinsdorf, who cancelled it because of the President's assassination, ha the score worked up, rehearsed a ready for a suitable opportunity.

Brisk and Aerial

The texture of the Schubert, o the other hand, was light, bris and aerial. Above all, the scor needs precision, a crisp style and Erich Leinsdorf's readin propelled the music with never break in the continuity of its logi Everything was in place, and th warm, bright sparkle that playe over the surface was never a lowed to become sedative.

In short, the urbanity of the performance endowed the cheer ful mood with an infectious lilt Mr. Leinsdorf chose tempi that did not inflate Schubert's charm, he emphasized control over grace.

The cla y of his beat and th wonderfully modulated forwar pace enabled one to hear the fe licities of the 18-year-old genius love. For such are the reward of discipline in the romanti school — one exerts crispness gain the sense of the transparen and the result, infinitely spontan ous, has the urgency of pure son

Next weekend Pierre Monteu returns as guest conductor wit Vaughan Williams's Fantasia o a Theme by Tallis; Beethoven Symphony No. 4, in B-flat Majo Op. 60; Sibelius's "The Swan Tuonela," and Elgar's "Eni ma" Variations, Op. 36.

The Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf conducting, presented the 10th program of the 83rd season yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Joseph Silverstein, violin, was the soloist. The program will be repeated tonight at 8:30.

Symphony No. 3 in D Major	Schubert
Suite from "Le Coq d'Or"	Rimsky-Korsakov
Concerto No. 2 for Violin and Orchestra	Bartok

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Christian Science
Monitor (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 174,850
DEC 14 1963

Silverstein and his violin

By Harold Rogers

The old adage that "nothing succeeds like success" indeed applies to Joseph Silverstein. When he was merely a member of the violin section of the Boston Symphony, he was a soloist of promise: beauty of tone and flawless technique were already his.

But passion was lacking; communicating power was dim.

Now, however, this young artist has been concertmaster of the Boston Symphony for a season and a half; and Friday afternoon when he appeared as soloist in the Bartók Concerto No. 2, there was no question that he is mining greater riches of musicianship.

* * *

He has more authority, more élan, more fire. There is still something to be gained, of course; a true artist never reaches a point where more growth is not possible. Yet Mr. Silverstein now finds himself in the first echelon; his playing is a credit both to himself and to the organization he so superbly represents.

This concerto — which must now be known as the second, an earlier one having been discovered after Bartók's passing—came forth in a superior performance under Erich Leinsdorf's direction. As with all of Bartók's masterworks, it is skilfully wrought, filled with inventions that please the ear and delight the mind. Never is the soloist covered by the orchestra; solo passages are balanced against orchestral tuttis. Yet credit for the sensitive relationship between the two in this performance must go to the conductor.

* * *

Mr. Silverstein leaned into the line of the opening Allegro non troppo, striking sparks from the brilliant cadenza. In the Andante tranquillo he evoked a sweet nostalgia from the melancholy melodies. The Allegro molto of the finale—in rollicking three-time — came forth with verve, spilling over with joy.

Mr. Leinsdorf opened the concert with an engaging reading of Schubert's ingenuous little D major Symphony, the No. 3. And sandwiched between the Schubert and the Bartók he gave us a winsome traversal of Rimsky-Korsakov's Suite from "Le Coq d'Or." Regaling us with the shimmering Orientalisms, Mr. Leinsdorf brought the final section to a rousing crescendo, exciting by virtue of the sheer impact of sound.

He can indeed let himself g[illegible]

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 194,870
DEC 14 1963

At Symphony

Silverstein Heard In Bartok Concerto

By MARGO MILLER

How many voices has Joseph Silverstein's violin? Whatever the Second Bartok Concerto calls for. The Boston Symphony's concertmaster was soloist yesterday afternoon with his orchestra. It was an impeccable performance.

The Concerto calls for many things. Early, the violinist plays broad strokes near the bottom of his instrument's register. Here Silverstein demonstrated riches in resonance. Then he must skip almost to the top in a passage of great sweetness. The soloist found this quality, too. The first movement cadenza is an exercise in double-stopping, among other things. Silverstein saw it properly as a dialogue between tones and presented it as such. An exquisitely spun line in the andante? Yes, and more, for it's not the rounded melodic way of earlier composers but a movement which asks for shaping in addition to beauty of tone. It is easy, one supposes, in a Concerto so devoted to the singing string to play it pretty and for the moment's sound. Silverstein knows also the work's vitality and gave us that, too.

Preceding the Bartok was a Suite from Rimsky-Korsakov's "LeCoq d'Or." Originally scheduled in this series the afternoon of Kennedy's assassination, it made its appearance to light up a snowy day. The orchestra, hardly needing Erich Leinsdorf's urging, bent to the shimmering colors in fine fashion. As the conductor's palette inclines toward pellucid tints, this was a bright Cockerel and one set in motion, moreover, by brighter tempos. The Wedding March went at a smart clip. Rarely does Leinsdorf uncork the orchestra in the loudest dynamics, but "the lamentable end of King Dodon" (the "Coq") was apparently too much to resist. The ending was gloriously noisy.

The concert began, as it will tonight at 8:30, with a seldom-heard Schubert symphony. This is the composer's No. 3 in D major, dating from his 18th year. It has two irritatingly simpleminded tunes in the first movement, and another in the andante. But nothing about the worth of this trifle bothered either conductor or orchestra: the performance was elegant.

Next week Pierre Monteux, conductor emeritus of the orchestra, returns. Louis Speyer, the English horn player who will retire at the end of the season, will be the soloist in Sibelius' "The Swan of Tuonela." The program will also include Vaughan Williams' Fantasia on a Theme by Thomas Tallis, Beethoven's Symphony No. 4 and Elgar's "Enigma" Variations.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Jewish Advocate
BOSTON, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 35,304

DEC 19 1963

MUSIC IN REVIEW

By GERALD A. BERLIN

DSO: SILVERSTEIN'S BARTOK

Once more Joseph Silverstein and Erich Leinsdorf have collaborated in music making of the highest order. Once more the work in question was uncompromising for performer and listener. But those among the latter who were willing to do something more than just sit back as passive receivers were abundantly rewarded.

The opus was Bartok's Concerto No. 2, known as the First until the discovery a few years ago of a 1908 work in the form. Although one of the few violin concertos of this century which can be said to constitute a major addition to what is a surprisingly impoverished literature, this piece turns up so seldom that a performance of it is practically an event. As a result audiences never really have gotten to apprehend adequately its quality of form, variety of textures and strength of rhythmic patterns, nor to appreciate, I think, the authentic lyricism which breaks out again and again amidst prolonged stretches of placidity.

If ever there was an occasion to hear this music under the most auspicious conditions it was last week-end. Mr. Silverstein brought forth a perfect union of head and heart. He built into the long lines of the work that exquisitely modeled, sensitive phrasing which is his hallmark, along with a moderately sized but quite beautiful tone, a broad palette of colors and dazzling left-hand technique. He and Mr. Leinsdorf, as always, worked together carefully throughout a triumphant and well applauded performance.

The concert commenced with a warm, delicately wrought reading of another comparative stranger to these environs — Schubert's Third Symphony. Schubert composed this work when he was only eighteen, but no teen-age werewolf was this fellow. He had already worked out much of the musical vocabulary which he was to use the rest of his life; and if his early symphonies are, as Gerald Abraham has written, "true children of the eighteenth century spirit which found such perfect expression in Hadyn's and Mozart's instrumental work," they nevertheless have an individuality and charm, as well as a sturdiness of structure peculiarly their own. Why they have always been shunned like lepers by American symphony conductors (this was only the second performance here for the Third) or patronized as juvenalia (a local reviewer last week-end, so help me, referred to "two irritatingly simple-minded tunes in the first movement, and another in the Andante") can only cause a person to meditate with sadness and no little irritation upon the mysterious thought processes that sometimes seem to go into symphony program making.

This was music made to order for Mr. Leinsdorf, who conferred great elegance of style upon its affecting and direct melodies, its subtle and characteristic blend of woodwinds, horns and strings, and recurrent echo effects. May its namely played sister symphonies, Schubert's First, Second, Sixth, and even the "Gastein," soon grace our board.

Sandwiched between the Schubert and the Bartok was quite some mouthful, Rimsky-Korsakov's Suite from "Le Coq d'Or." Why Mr. Fiedler ever relinquished squatter's rights on this specialtie for purposes of the regular season was anothe mystery of the concert. It may be that the thesis of Nicolas Slonimsky that was reprinted in the Entr'acte of the Program Bulletin is correct: perhaps Rimsky-Korsakov in all actuality was a Merlin whose extraordinarily rich and exotic orchestral hues in general and whose weaving of harmonic textures and serpentine scales into "Le Coq d'Or" in particular are no longer appreciated because of the attrition visited upon them by hordes of imitators and unintentional traducers in the realm of jazz and of sound tracks. If so, here is one more listener for whom the thrill is irretrievably lost.

The score sometimes sounds like a parody of itself. Not, it would seem, to Mr. Leinsdorf, who took it very seriously indeed. When he leaned into it, as he did for the demise of the ill fated King Dodon in the last section, it was hard to believe that so diminutive a man could call forth such sheer volume of sound. One who writes of music is often prone to express himself in terms of visual images. To me the performance was as gorgeous and superfluous as a strutting peacock.

This week-end the indestructible Pierre Monteux conducts a program consisting of Vaughn Williams' Thomas Tallis Fantasia, Beethoven's Fourth Symphony, Sibelius' "Swan of Tuonela," with Louis Speyer as English Horn soloist, and Elgar's Enigma Variations.

SUNDAY 3

Third Program

SUNDAY AFTERNOON, DECEMBER 15, at 3:00 o'clock

BACH ..... Brandenburg Concerto No. 4 in G major, for Violin, Two Flutes, and String Orchestra

I. Allegro
II. Andante
III. Presto

Violin: JOSEPH SILVERSTEIN
Flutes: DORIOT ANTHONY DWYER
JAMES PAPPOUTSAKIS

BARTÓK ..... Concerto No. 2 for Violin and Orchestra

I. Allegro non troppo
II. Andante tranquillo
III. Allegro molto

First performance in this series

INTERMISSION

STRAUSS ..... "Don Quixote," Fantastic Variations on a Theme of Knightly Character, Op. 35

Introduction, Theme and Variations, and Finale
Violoncello Solo: SAMUEL MAYES
Viola Solo: JOSEPH DE PASQUALE

SOLOIST
JOSEPH SILVERSTEIN

A new plan for ticket reservations is announced on page 60.

BALDWIN PIANO RCA VICTOR RECORDS

Standard-Times (e)
NEW BEDFORD, Mass.
Circ. 65,046

DEC 16 1963

Leinsdorf-Led Boston Symphony Never Better

By EARL J. DIAS
Standard-Times Music Critic

Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony, gave several of his first-rate musicians an opportunity to sparkle in the limelight in yesterday afternoon's program in Symphony Hall.

Joseph Silverstein, for example, brilliant young concert master of the orchestra, was soloist in Bartok's "Concerto No. 2 for Violin and Orchestra." And in Bach's "Brandenburg Concerto No. 4 in G Major," Mr. Silverstein again did laudable solo work along with the two capable flutists, Doriot Anthony Dwyer and James Pappoutsakis. The program concluded with Dvorak's immensely appealing "Symphony No. 6 in D Major."

Mr. Silverstein is, of course, a violent of solid technical equipment, laudable purity of tone, and musicianly understanding. The Bartok is a most difficult work — both for soloist and orchestra — somewhat astringent in idiom, filled with tricky rhythms, and notable for unusual instrumental combinations. The harp and kettle drums, for example, play an emphatic role in the concerto.

Achieving genuine delicacy (though of the appropriately cerebral type) in the brooding andante, Mr. Silverstein also played with proper drive and force in the concluding rondo (a remarkable example of Bartok's ability to recapitulate his themes with imagination and skill) and in the opening allegro. His playing evoked considerable audience enthusiasm, although we suspect that Bartok is still not everyone's particular cup of tea. However, his is superb music in the modern idiom. To take a parallel from the other arts, one cannot expect Bartok to sound like Brahms or Beethoven any more than one can expect T. S. Eliot or James Joyce to speak in the idiom of Sir Walter Scott or John Keats.

As for the Bach "Brandenburg Concerto No. 4," this is a superb piece of music, marvelous in its contrapuntal effects, in which two flutes aand a violin are set off beautifully against a string orchestra. As an added fillip, Mr. Leinsdorf conducted the score while seated at a harpsichord which he played surely and effectively. Flutists Dwyer and Pappoutsakis and violinist Silverstein performed their sole roles faultlessly, and the result was an intelligently conceived work of great charm.

However, the highlight of the program was the Dvorak "Symphony No. 6 in D Major." This is thoroughly delightful music, easily accessible and built appealing on Czech folk dance themes. It is graced by a contagiously lilting allegro, a melodious andante, a beautifully sprightly scherzo, and a finale guaranteed to lift the audience from their seats.

For sheer texture of sound, we have never heard the Boston Symphony do better. Mr. Leinsdorf obviously loves the work, and it is patent that he has prepared it with meticulous care. The response of the orchestra to his perceptive shading, his building to musical climaxes, his thorough understanding of the architecture of the work was nothing short of magnificent.

The performance was yet another demonstration of how Mr. Leinsdorf has been able to shape the orchestra to his own legitimate musical ends. The ensemble has a greater variety of sound, a more integrated texture than it has had in years. That the audience realized this happy fact was evident in the ovation given Mr. Leinsdorf and his musicians at the end of the program.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Jewish Advocate
BOSTON, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 35,304
DEC 19 1963

MUSIC IN REVIEW

By GERALD A. BERLIN

DSO: SILVERSTEIN'S BARTOK

Once more Joseph Silverstein and Erich Leinsdorf have collaborated in music making of the highest order. Once more the work in question was uncompromising for performer and listener. But those among the latter who were willing to do something more than just sit back as passive receivers were abundantly rewarded.

The opus was Bartok's Concerto No. 2, known as the First until the discovery a few years ago of a 1908 work in the form. Although one of the few violin concertos of this century which can be said to constitute a major addition to what is a surprisingly impoverished literature, this piece turns up so seldom that a performance of it is practically an event. As a result audiences never really have gotten to apprehend adequately its quality of form, variety of textures and strength of rhythmic patterns, nor to appreciate, I think, the authentic lyricism which breaks out again and again amidst prolonged stretches of placidity.

If ever there was an occasion to hear this music under the most auspicious conditions it was last week-end. Mr. Silverstein brought forth a perfect union of head and heart. He built into the long lines of the work that exquisitely modeled, sensitive phrasing which is his hallmark, along with a moderately sized but quite beautiful tone, a broad palette of colors and dazzling left-hand technique. He and Mr. Leinsdorf, as always, worked together carefully throughout a triumphant and well applauded performance.

The concert commenced with a warm, delicately wrought reading of another comparative stranger to these environs — Schubert's Third Symphony. Schubert composed this work when he was only eighteen, but no teen-age werewolf was this fellow. He had already worked out much of the musical vocabulary which he was to use the rest of his life; and if his early symphonies are, as Gerald Abraham has written, "true children of the eighteenth century spirit which found such perfect expression in Hadyn's and Mozart's instrumental work," they nevertheless have an individuality and charm, as well as a sturdiness of structure peculiarly their own. Why they have always been shunned like lepers by American symphony conductors (this was only the second performance here for the Third) or patronized as juvenalia (a local reviewer last week-end, so help me, referred to "two irritatingly simple-minded tunes in the first movement, and another in the Andante") can only cause a person to meditate with sadness and no little irritation upon the mysterious thought processes that sometimes seem to go into symphony program making.

This was music made to order for Mr. Leinsdorf, who conferred great elegance of style upon its affecting and direct melodies, its subtle and characteristic blend of woodwinds, horns and strings, and recurrent echo effects. May its namely played sister symphonies, Schubert's First, Second, Sixth, and even the "Gastein," soon grace our board.

Sandwiched between the Schubert and the Bartok was quite some mouthful, Rimsky-Korsakov's Suite from "Le Coq d'Or." Why Mr. Fiedler ever relinquished squatter's rights on this specialtie for purposes of the regular season was anothe mystery of the concert. It may be that the thesis of Nicolas Slonimsky that was reprinted in the Entr'acte of the Program Bulletin is correct; perhaps Rimsky-Korsakov in all actuality was a Merlin whose extraordinarily rich and exotic orchestral hues in general and whose weaving of harmonic textures and serpentine scales into "Le Coq d'Or" in particular are no longer appreciated because of the attrition visited upon them by hordes of imitators and unintentional traducers in the realm of jazz and of sound tracks. If so, here is one more listener for whom the thrill is irretrievably lost.

The score sometimes sounds like a parody of itself. Not, it would seem, to Mr. Leinsdorf, who took it very seriously indeed. When he leaned into it, as he did for the demise of the ill fated King Dodon in the last section, it was hard to believe that so diminutive a man could call forth such sheer volume of sound. One who writes of music is often prone to express himself in terms of visual images. To me the performance was as gorgeous and superfluous as a strutting peacock.

This week-end the indestructible Pierre Monteux conducts a program consisting of Vaughn Williams' Thomas Tallis Fantasia, Beethoven's Fourth Symphony, Sibelius' "Swan of Tuonela," with Louis Speyer as English Horn soloist, and Elgar's Enigma Variations.

SUNDAY 3

67

Third Program

SUNDAY AFTERNOON, DECEMBER 15, at 3:00 o'clock

BACH . . . . . Brandenburg Concerto No. 4 in G major, for Violin, Two Flutes, and String Orchestra

I. Allegro
II. Andante
III. Presto

Violin: JOSEPH SILVERSTEIN
Flutes: DORIOT ANTHONY DWYER
JAMES PAPPOUTSAKIS

BARTÓK . . . . . Concerto No. 2 for Violin and Orchestra

I. Allegro non troppo
II. Andante tranquillo
III. Allegro molto

First performance in this series

INTERMISSION

STRAUSS . . . . . "Don Quixote," Fantastic Variations on a Theme of Knightly Character, Op. 35

Introduction, Theme and Variations, and Finale
Violoncello Solo: SAMUEL MAYES
Viola Solo: JOSEPH DE PASQUALE

SOLOIST
JOSEPH SILVERSTEIN

A new plan for ticket reservations is announced on page 60.

BALDWIN PIANO RCA VICTOR RECORDS

Standard-Times (e)
NEW BEDFORD, Mass.
Circ. 65,046
DEC 16 1963

Leinsdorf-Led Boston Symphony Never Better

By EARL J. DIAS
Standard-Times Music Critic

Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony, gave several of his first-rate musicians an opportunity to sparkle in the limelight in yesterday afternoon's program in Symphony Hall.

Joseph Silverstein, for example, brilliant young concert master of the orchestra, was soloist in Bartok's "Concerto No. 2 for Violin and Orchestra." And in Bach's "Brandenburg Concerto No. 4 in G Major," Mr. Silverstein again did laudable solo work along with the two capable flutists, Doriot Anthony Dwyer and James Pappoutsakis. The program concluded with Dvorak's immensely appealing "Symphony No. 6 in D Major."

Mr. Silverstein is, of course, a violent of solid technical equipment, laudable purity of tone, and musicianly understanding. The Bartok is a most difficult work — both for soloist and orchestra — somewhat astringent in idiom, filled with tricky rhythms, and notable for unusual instrumental combinations. The harp and kettle drums, for example, play an emphatic role in the concerto.

Achieving genuine delicacy (though of the appropriately cerebral type) in the brooding andante, Mr. Silverstein also played with proper drive and force in the concluding rondo (a remarkable example of Bartok's ability to recapitulate his themes with imagination and skill) and in the opening allegro. His playing evoked considerable audience enthusiasm, although we suspect that Bartok is still not everyone's particular cup of tea. However, his is superb music in the modern idiom. To use a parallel from the other arts, one cannot expect Bartok to sound like Brahms or Beethoven any more than one can expect T. S. Eliot or James Joyce to speak in the idiom of Walter Scott or John Keats. As for the Bach "Brandenburg Concerto No. 4," this is a superb piece of music, marvelous in its contrapuntal effects in which two flutes aand a violin are set off beautifully against a string orchestra. As an added fillip, Mr. Leinsdorf conducted the score while seated at a harpsichord which he played surely and effectively. Flutists Dwyer and Pappoutsakis and violinist Silverstein performed their sole roles faultlessly, and the result was an intelligently conceived work of great charm.

However, the highlight of the program was the Dvorak "Symphony No. 6 in D Major." This is thoroughly delightful music, easily accessible and built appealing on Czech folk dance themes. It is graced by a contagiously lilting allegro, a melodious andante, a beautifully sprightly scherzo, and a finale guaranteed to lift the audience from their seats.

For sheer texture of sound we have never heard the Boston Symphony do better. Mr. Leinsdorf obviously loves the work, and it is patent that he has prepared it with meticulous care. The response of the orchestra to his perceptive shading, his building to musical climaxes, his thorough understanding of the architecture of the work was nothing short of magnificent.

The performance was yet another demonstration of how Mr. Leinsdorf has been able to shape the orchestra to his own legitimate musical ends. The ensemble has a greater variety of sound, a more integrated texture than it has had in years. That the audience realized this happy fact was evident in the ovation given Mr. Leinsdorf and his musicians at the end of the program.

68 — E TUESDAY 5. FRI.-SAT. 11.

Fifth Program

TUESDAY EVENING, DECEMBER 17, at 8:30 o'clock

RICHARD BURGIN, Conductor

HAYDN ..... Symphony in C major, No. 97

I. Adagio; Vivace
II. Adagio ma non troppo
III. Menuetto: Allegretto
IV. Finale: Presto assai

First performance in this series

SCHUMANN ..... Piano Concerto in A minor, Op. 54

I. Allegro affettuoso
II. Intermezzo: Andantino grazioso
III. Allegro vivace

INTERMISSION

SIBELIUS ..... Symphony No. 5 in E-flat major, Op. 82

I. Tempo molto moderato
II. Allegro moderato, ma poco a poco stretto
III. Andante mosso, quasi allegretto
IV. Allegro molto

SOLOIST
THEODORE LETTVIN
Mr. LETTVIN plays the Baldwin Piano

A new plan for ticket reservations is announced on page 60.

BALDWIN PIANO

RCA VICTOR RECORDS

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Journal (m)
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
Circ. 61,299
DEC 14 1963

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Record-American (m) (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 531,565
DEC 16 1963

Monteux Returns To BSO Podium

Pierre Monteux, now in his 89th year and music director of the London Symphony Orchestra, is to be guest conductor at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Friday and Saturday concerts, at Erich Leinsdorf's invitation. Mr. Monteux was conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra from 1919-1924.

Louis Speyer, the Orchestra's English horn player, who will retire at the end of the current season, will be soloist in "The Swan of Tuonela" by Jean Sibelius. Mr. Monteux will begin the program with Vaughan Williams' Fantasia on a Theme by Thomas Tallis and will follow this with the Symphony No. 4 of Beethoven. The concert will conclude with Elgar's "Enigma" Variations.

2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Christian Science Monitor (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 174,850
DEC 17 1963

By Lenscraft

Louis Speyer, English horn player of the Boston Symphony, will retire at the end of the current season. He will accordingly play his swan song when he plays the solos in Sibelius's 'Swan of Tuonela' Friday afternoon and Saturday evening.

Eleventh Program

FRIDAY AFTERNOON, DECEMBER 20, at 2:00 o'clock

SATURDAY EVENING, DECEMBER 21, at 8:30 o'clock

PIERRE MONTEUX, Guest Conductor

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS ..... Fantasia on a Theme by Thomas Tallis, for Double String Orchestra

BEETHOVEN ..... Symphony No. 4, in B-flat major, Op. 60

I. Adagio; Allegro vivace
II. Adagio
III. Allegro vivace
IV. Allegro, ma non troppo

INTERMISSION

SIBELIUS ..... "The Swan of Tuonela," Legend from the "Kalevala," Op. 22, No. 3

English Horn Solo: LOUIS SPEYER

ELGAR ..... Variations on an Original Theme, Op. 36

Enigma: Andante

Variations:

I. "C.A.E." L'istesso tempo
II. "H.D.S.-P" Allegro
III. "R.B.T." Allegretto
IV. "W.M.B." Allegro di molto
V. "R.P.A." Moderato
VI. "Ysobel" Andantino
VII. "Troyte" Presto
VIII. "W.N." Allegretto
IX. "Nimrod" Moderato
X. "Dorabella-Intermezzo" Allegretto
XI. "G.R.S." Allegro di molto
XII. "B.G.N." Andante
XIII. " — Romanza" Moderato
XIV. "E.D.U. — Finale"

These concerts will end about 4:00 o'clock on Friday Afternoon; 10:30 o'clock on Saturday Evening.

BALDWIN PIANO

RCA VICTOR RECORDS

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
News (e)
GARDNER, Mass.
Circ. 7,341
DEC 20 1963

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
News (e)
SPRINGFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 101,591
DEC 21 1963

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sun (e)
LOWELL, Mass.
Circ. 45,001
DEC 19 1963

Discussing Old Times

The world's Dean of Orchestra Conductors, 89-year-old Pierre Monteux (left) chats with Louis Speyer, virtuoso of the English horn at Symphony Hall in Boston. Monteux returned as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which he headed from 1919 to 1924. Speyer solos today and Saturday in the Sibelius tone poem, "The Swan of Tuonela." He is performing his "swan song" in that particular work, for he retires at the end of this season after 46 years in the Boston Symphony. (AP WIREPHOTO)

68 & Tuesday 3. Fri.-Sat. 11

Fifth Program

TUESDAY EVENING, DECEMBER 17, at 8:30 o'clock

RICHARD BURGIN, Conductor

HAYDN ..... Symphony in C major, No. 97

I. Adagio; Vivace
II. Adagio ma non troppo
III. Menuetto: Allegretto
IV. Finale: Presto assai

First performance in this series

SCHUMANN ..... Piano Concerto in A minor, Op. 54

I. Allegro affettuoso
II. Intermezzo: Andantino grazioso
III. Allegro vivace

INTERMISSION

SIBELIUS ..... Symphony No. 5 in E-flat major, Op. 82

I. Tempo molto moderato
II. Allegro moderato, ma poco a poco stretto
III. Andante mosso, quasi allegretto
IV. Allegro molto

SOLOIST
THEODORE LETTVIN
Mr. LETTVIN plays the Baldwin Piano

A new plan for ticket reservations is announced on page 60.

BALDWIN PIANO RCA VICTOR RECORDS

EIGHTY-THIRD SEASON • NINETEEN HUNDRED SIXTY-THREE–SIXTY-FOUR

Eleventh Program

FRIDAY AFTERNOON, DECEMBER 20, at 2:00 o'clock

SATURDAY EVENING, DECEMBER 21, at 8:30 o'clock

PIERRE MONTEUX, Guest Conductor

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS ..... Fantasia on a Theme by Thomas Tallis, for Double String Orchestra

BEETHOVEN ..... Symphony No. 4, in B-flat major, Op. 60

I. Adagio; Allegro vivace
II. Adagio
III. Allegro vivace
IV. Allegro, ma non troppo

INTERMISSION

SIBELIUS ..... "The Swan of Tuonela," Legend from the "Kalevala," Op. 22, No. 3

English Horn Solo: LOUIS SPEYER

ELGAR ..... Variations on an Original Theme, Op. 36

Enigma: Andante
Variations:

I. "C.A.E." L'istesso tempo
II. "H.D.S.-P" Allegro
III. "R.B.T." Allegretto
IV. "W.M.B." Allegro di molto
V. "R.P.A." Moderato
VI. "Ysobel" Andantino
VII. "Troyte" Presto
VIII. "W.N." Allegretto
IX. "Nimrod" Moderato
X. "Dorabella-Intermezzo" Allegretto
XI. "G.R.S." Allegro di molto
XII. "B.G.N." Andante
XIII. " — Romanza" Moderato
XIV. "E.D.U. — Finale"

These concerts will end about 4:00 o'clock on Friday Afternoon; 10:30 o'clock on Saturday Evening.

BALDWIN PIANO RCA VICTOR RECORDS

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Journal (m)
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
Circ. 61,299
DEC 14 1963

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Record-American (m) (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 531,565
DEC 16 1963

Monteux Returns To BSO Podium

Pierre Monteux, now in his 89th year and music director of the London Symphony Orchestra, is to be guest conductor at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Friday and Saturday concerts, at Erich Leinsdorf's invitation. Mr. Monteux was conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra from 1919-1924.

Louis Speyer, the Orchestra's English horn player, who will retire at the end of the current season, will be soloist in "The Swan of Tuonela" by Jean Sibelius. Mr. Monteux will begin the program with Vaughan Williams' Fantasia on a Theme by Thomas Tallis and will follow this with the Symphony No. 4 of Beethoven. The concert will conclude with [illegible] "Enigma" Variations

2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Christian Science Monitor (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 174,850
DEC 17 1963

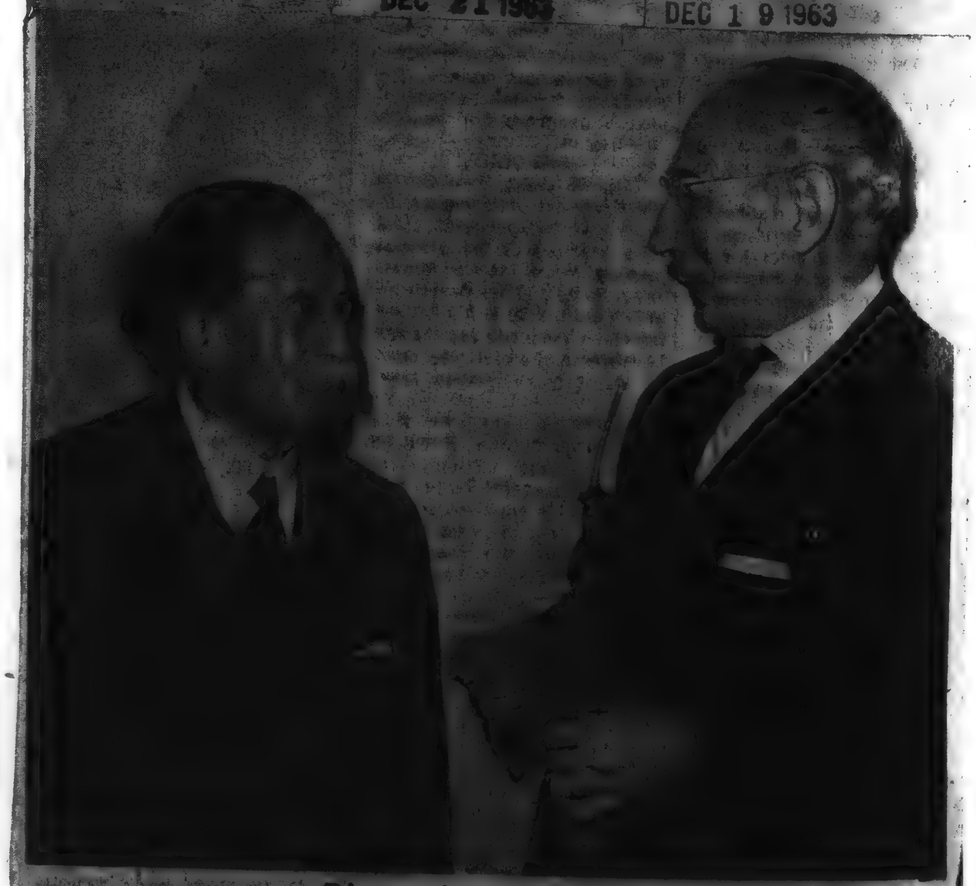
By Lenscraft

Louis Speyer, English horn player of the Boston Symphony, will retire at the end of the current season. He will accordingly play his swan song when he plays the solos in Sibelius's 'Swan of Tuonela' Friday afternoon and Saturday evening.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
News (e)
GARDNER, Mass.
Circ. 7,941
DEC 20 1963

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
News (e)
SPRINGFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 101,591
DEC 21 1963

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sun (e)
LOWELL, Mass.
Circ. 45,001
DEC 19 1963



Discussing Old Times

The world's Dean of Orchestra Conductors, 89-year-old Pierre Monteux (left) chats with Louis Speyer, virtuoso of the English horn at Symphony Hall in Boston. Monteux returned as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which he headed from 1919 to 1924. Speyer solos today and Saturday in the Sibelius tone poem, "The Swan of Tuonela." He is performing his "swan song" in that particular work, for he retires at the end of this season after 46 years in the Boston Symphony. (AP WIREPHOTO)

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Herald (m)
RUTLAND, Vt.
Circ. 20,275

DEC 23 1963

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Union (m)
SPRINGFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 83,691

DEC 19 1963

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Press-Herald (m)
PORTLAND, Me.
Circ. 54,400

DEC 19

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

News (m)
BANGOR, Me.
Circ. 76,086

DEC 19 1963

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Sun (m)
LEWISTON-AUBURN, Me.
Circ. 31,415

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Kennebec Journal (m)
AUGUSTA, Me.
Circ. 14,156

DEC 19 1963

Old Master Returns To The Podium

BOSTON (AP)—The 89-year-old honorary fire chief of Hancock, Maine, was in town Wednesday to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

At his first rehearsal which, an orchestra spokesman said, the visitor "conducted with incredible youthful zest," he was treated with a tumultuous welcome.

Which wasn't exactly unexpected, for he is now known as world dean of major orchestra conductors and, some 40-odd years ago, was himself the boss of the Boston Symphony.

He is French - born Pierre Monteux, now proud of being a registered voter in Hancock, but takes time out between elections to act as regular conductor of the London Symphony Orchestra.

Watching the old master from a balcony Wednesday was Boston Pops Conductor Arthur Fiedler, who served under Monteux in the long ago as a violinist.

The only other remaining Boston Symphony players of that era on stage Wednesday were violinist Samuel Diamond, double-bass Henri Girard, and Louis Speyer, virtuoso of the English horn.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Sunday Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 465,653

DEC 15 1963

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Sun (e)
LOWELL, Mass.
Circ. 45,001

DEC 14 1963

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Ledger-Times
BOSTON, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 12,500

DEC 19 1963

THE BOSTON HERALD
D. 178,553 S.283,819

DEC 15 1963

PIERRE MONTEUX . . . TO LEAD SYMPHONY

Pierre Monteux Guest Conductor

Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has invited Pierre Monteux to be guest conductor at the orchestra's concerts next Friday and Saturday. Monteux, conductor of symphony from 1919-1924, is now in his 89th year and is music director of the London Symphony Orchestra.

Louis Speyer, the orchestra's English horn player who will retire at the end of the current season, will be soloist in "The Swan of Tuonela" by Jean Sibelius. Monteux will begin the program with Vaughan Williams' Fantasia on a Theme by Thomas Tallis, following with the Symphony No. 4 of Beethoven and concluding with Elgar's "Enigma" Variations.

The third open rehearsal of the season will take place on Thursday evening when Monteux will take place on Thursday evening when Monteux will make his final preparations for the weekend concerts.

Richard Burgin, associate conductor of the orchestra, will conduct the fifth concert of the Tuesday evening series this Tuesday at 8:30. Theodore Lettvin will be soloist in the Schumann Piano Concerto in A minor. The program will begin with Haydn's Symphony No. 97, and the final work will be the Symphony No. 5 of Sibelius.

Today's Program

Today at 3 p.m. Leinsdorf will conduct the third concert of the Sunday Afternoon Series. Leinsdorf will begin the program with Bach's Brandenburg Concerto No. 4, with Joseph Silverstein, violin; Doriot Anthony Dwyer and James Pappoutsakis, flutes.

Silverstein will be soloist in the Bartok Violin Concerto No. 2. The program will conclude with Richard Strauss' "Don Quixote," in which Samuel Mayes will play the cello solo and Joseph de Pasquale the viola solo.

There will be no Symphony concerts the weekend of Dec. 20-29 as the orchestra will be on its mid-winter vacation.

LOUIS SPEYER

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Sunday Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 465,653

DEC 15 1963

As Swan Song, Louis Speyer Chooses Sibelius Tone Poem

One of the special inner qualitities that identifies the Boston Symphony Orchestra is the haunting tone of its English horn. It is played by Louis Speyer, who has been breathing magical effects into and out of that peculiar instrument, with the same orchestra, for 45 years. Now, having reached the rank of the orchestra's senior member, and during his long career having become known as one of the world's greatest English horn soloists, he has chosen to retire.

With the characteristic droll humor which Speyer combines with his musical seriousness, he has arranged with Pierre Monteux (who will be guest conductor on Dec. 20 and 21) to play as his "swan song" the solo in Sibelius's tone poem, "The Swan of Tuonela." On the surface this is a play on words. But the music itself is drenched with melancholy. The solo part — above all, as played by Louis Speyer — bears out the tribute of Berlioz to the English horn. "It has no equal among the instruments," he wrote, "for reviving images and sentiments of the past."

As for just what an English horn is, Speyer once gave this alleged explanation to a lay inquirer: "It is so called because neither is it English, nor a horn. In reality it is an alto oboe." One theory is that the French words for "English" and "angled" were confused. At any rate, early examples of the instrument were bent at a sharp angle. As for the last part of the name, many types of wind instruments have been loosely called "horns."

The English horn of today is straight, except for the slightly curved mouthpiece. Like the oboe, the sound starts with two thin slips of cane called reeds. The player grips these between his lips, which he draws over his teeth. Longer than an oboe, and ending in a "bell" shaped like an electric light bulb with the lower part cut off, the English horn produces a deeper, rounder tone than that of the oboe. These qualities are given infinite expressiveness by remarkable feats of lip and breath control by such master players as Speyer.

Besides "The Swan of Tuonela," other Speyer performances have been in the Cesar Franck Symphony, the Largo in Dvorak's Symphony "From the New World," and Berlioz' "Roman Carnival," to speak at random. Such artistry has inspired composers to create works especially for him. They include names which Speyer refers to as "The Three H's" — Edward Burlingame Hill, Arthur Honegger, and Paul Hindemith. Also on the list are Leo Sowerby, Mabel Daniels, Hugo Kauder, Isadore Freed, and Walter Piston.

Louis Speyer joined the orchestra under Henri Rabaud in 1918. He came to the United States in May of 1918, with a French military band, invited by the United States government for a three weeks Liberty Loan tour. The band was then kept here and sent to military camps, hospitals and factories.

After playing an oboe concerto in Symphony Hall, he was offered a position with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This he could accept, as the French government had given musicians of the band an honorable discharge in order to have French artists represent the French school in the United States.

He was graduated from the Paris Conservatory with first prize. The French government decorated him twice — first with the medal of "Reconnaissance Francaise" for services rendered during World War II; and then with the Cross of Chevalier of the Legion of Honor, in recognition of his services in the cultural field.

He was also awarded the medal of the Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge Foundation of the Library of Congress in 1947 for eminent services to Chamber Music.

He is the founder of the Berkshire Woodwind Ensemble. Also, he has been active as a conductor, having had a youth orchestra for over ten years in Quincy, and having been guest conductor at the Pops. In addition, he has conducted ensembles in Englewood and Cambridge.

He married a native of Boston, Camille Torno, an artist in her own right — a painter and sculptor — whose works have been in various exhibitions. They have a daughter, Jacqueline, a good amateur pianist, and a son, André, professional French horn player.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 194,870
DEC 19 1963

VETERAN CONDUCTOR, Pierre Monteux, 89, and his soloist, Louis Speyer before Boston Symphony performance. (AP Photo)

Monteux Conducts Hub Symphony

'Fire Chief' Wields Hot Baton

All who heard him conduct the Boston Symphony Wednesday agreed that they had never seen such a musically talented fire chief. Speaking figuratively, he set the house afire.

It wasn't unexpected though, because 89-year-old Pierre Monteux is world famed as a conductor and is recognized as world dean of major orchestra conductors.

What isn't so widely known is that French-born Monteux is now a proud registered voter in Hancock, Me. where he is also honorary fire chief.

Monteux takes time out between elections in Hancock to act as regular conductor of the London Symphony Orchestra. He often comes to Boston as guest conductor as he will be this week-end.

About 40 years ago, Monteux was regular conductor of the Boston Symphony.

Since he had been scheduled to direct it Wednesday, orchestra officials thought it appropriate to feature Louis Speyer, virtuoso of the English horn, who is retiring at the end of this season after 46 years in the Boston Symphony. As such, Speyer is senior member in the orchestra.

Since his original performance of Sibelius' tone poem, "The Swan of Tuonela" was under Monteux, that composition was played Wednesday with Speyer featured.

Speyer will play his performing swan song this week-end, Monteux again conducting.

Watching Monteux from the balcony Wednesday was Boston Pops Conductor Arthur Fiedler, who served under Monteux as a violinist.

Other remaining Boston Symphony players of that era on stage Wednesday were Speyer, Violinist Samuel Diamond, and double-bass player Henri Girard.

Monteux, Girard and Speyer were together in Paris in 1913 playing with an orchestra when Stravinsky's revolutionary "Rite of Spring" was given its world premiere performance. The historic event was attended by a jeering and rioting audience which thought the composition too radical.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 194,870
DEC 21 1963

At Symphony

The Golden Age Of Pierre Monteux

By MARGO MILLER

Pierre Monteux returned yesterday afternoon to conduct the Boston Symphony. Said a befurred lady to her companion, "Isn't he amazing! And his lovely mustache. And his active Summers up in Maine. Imagine at 89 years old." Then as the audience stood to greet the conductor, and as ladies are wont, this one had her question about the ever-raven Monteux curls. Did he or didn't he? We wouldn't reveal the answer if we knew. We wish we did know Monteux's secrets about music.

His program, to be repeated tonight at 8:30, was broadly constructed. There was a symphony, Beethoven's sunny Fourth; a tone poem by Sibelius to serve as solo farewell for a member of the orchestra; a Vaughan Williams piece for strings; and Elgar's musical portraits.

This was a serene concert. To concentrate overly on that aspect of the afternoon would be to overlook certain muscle which Monteux puts into the music. All the program's works have the grand line of melody. In the Beethoven, however, is marvelous drama. How rightly Monteux set the suspense in the opening adagio; how supply he then set in motion the subsequent allegro; how taut were the final moments of the adagio; how surefooted the final allegro. And all this accomplished by economic gesture; Monteux's stick inscribing its tidy patterns, his left hand adjusting. The Beethoven glowed.

In a pun unworthy of his performance, Louis Speyer has described the Sibelius "Swan of Tuonela" as his swan song. Since 1918, he has been the orchestra's English horn and a member of the oboe section. Tall and courtly, Speyer escorted Monteux on stage, stood then to play the long black onion-belled instrument which lends its melancholic air to the dark Finnish saga. The musical line was persuasive above the brooding orchestra. The horn sound was equally evocative, being rich in the lowest register without damping the characteristic timbre and singing up through the few high notes. The orchestra was its usual vibrant self.

The program had opened with full strings in Vaughan Williams' Fantasia on a Theme by Thomas Tallis. As in the Beethoven, Monteux drew a sweep from the music. So it was no surprise to find the same later in Elgar's "Enigma" Variations. The theme with its contour of delayed stress and falling sevenths, as the program notes well describe it slips in and out of the composer's sketches of his friends Monteux gave them each their due, now playful, now broad or sweet or graceful or argumentive, as Elgar fitted the music to them. Variation No 9 is an anthem to Beethoven It is Elgar's recreation of what one of his friends thought of the master. Monteux's whole performance of the Variations was in this guise: a musically sustained recreation of another's creation. Near the summit of great age there is still youth.

Next week the Boston Symphony takes a Winter holiday. The next Friday-Saturday concerts come on Jan. 3-4 when Erich Leinsdorf will conduct Mozart's Divertimento, K. 247, Strauss' music for "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme" and Lanner's "Die Mozartisten," Waltzes.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Christian Science
Monitor (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 174,850
DEC 21 1963

Turning back the clock

Pierre's golden age

By Harold Rogers

At 89 Pierre Monteux is not only timeless, he turns back the clock.

He can make the Boston Symphony Orchestra sound as it used to sound. Friday afternoon he barely waved his magic baton—as he has always barely waved it—and his players began breathing fire. Completely enchanted by their former maestro (from 1919 to 1924), they turned out music that was completely enchanting.

How easily he conjured the essences of Vaughan Williams (the Fantasia on a Theme by Thomas Tallis), of Beethoven (his Fourth Symphony), of Sibelius ("The Swan of Tuonela"), and of Elgar (the "Enigma" Variations)! And yet no shades were these; the music throbbed with a vital pulse; there were bones, muscles, sinews. And heart, wonderful heart. . . .

♪ ♪ ♪

The Vaughan Williams? The players leaned into their bows; the strings sang a glorious song.

The Beethoven? Clean and strong, yet with proper pastel touches as are appropriate to his even-numbered symphonies.

The Sibelius? How magnificent these Nordic moods! How profound in performance! And Louis Speyer eloquently sang his swan song in the English horn solo (retiring, as he is, at the end of this season). Both he and Monteux, hand in hand, shared the glory—an accolade without kisses from their enthusiastic listeners. Two timeless Frenchmen, much beloved. . . .

♪ ♪ ♪

And the Elgar? Again we were convinced—if we ever needed convincing — that here is Sir Edward's masterpiece. And Maitre Pierre—who also keeps himself occupied with the regular directorship' of the London Symphony Orchestra — infused the variations with a true and stirring British spirit.

When Monteux comes to Symphony Hall the clocks turn back. The persistent illusion—that times that were are somehow better than times that are—is dispelled. When Monteux is on the podium we are convinced of the golden age.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Jewish Advocate
BOSTON, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 35,304
DEC 26 1963

BSO's Eleventh Program

Monteux Is Guest Conductor

By ALLAN SLY

If you read Marston Bates you are familiar with the concept of the ocean being a thick soup, teeming with life; the seasoned concertgoer's experience in Symphony Hall can take on a similar environmental continuity. Listening to the BSO's eleventh program last week, Monteux conducting, the atmosphere fairly teemed with revealed meanings, remembered impressions, renewed affirmations, half-forgotten sorrows, puzzlements, mystifications — present joys, clarifications, insights. One's listening experience came to a new focus, lending the occasion radiance and a secure kind of triumph.

Since Monteux's movements seem to be largely functional from the rear view, the explanation of his immediate intimacy with the orchestral players must be in the sensitivity of his countenance. Would one could witness this marvel of subjective communication! It comes right out to the auditors, though in fine balance with the stylistic rectitude one expects from a Frenchman.

Boston could claim Monteux as its really "permanent" conductor were London's present claims less precise. At any rate, his English players seem to have brought him much closer to Vaughan Williams and Elgar. Their kinds of "in-group" esotericisms never resounded in Symphony Hall half so convincingly. Which leads to a resume of the finest Enigma performance one can reasonably expect to hear.

Here was the epitome of an age of splendid ripeness not unaware of its transience, but not too troubled by it. Not yet. That came a decade later, in Elgar's second symphony, played recently in Boston by the visitors from Pittsburgh (and dismissed by one commentator whose body chemistry, or cultural responses, must have failed him—as though he were a fresh-water animal suddenly introduced into the oceanic soup). Vaughan Williams' London Symphony is similarly troubled. But not so the Enigma and perhaps that is why its place in the American repertoire seems secure — its concerns are personal, not sociological. Ernest Newman found Toscanini's reading of it too shiny, too clear; I think he would have found some of Monteux's a bit ultra-refined, a bit too tidy, a bit hurried; but he would have found his "nest of singing birds" where he needed it; he never could have heard a cello section so poignantly eloquent, wood-winds so gently balanced, trombones so nobly warm, percussion so precise but so articulative. Nor could the final "essay" ever have carried such a wealth of romantic summing-up — the insights of a lifetime (Monteux's) infusing the craftsmanship of master performers — his and the orchestra's; the passage itself, of course, being a miracle of compositional inspiration, written at white heat, the heart aglow—which is how the listeners received it last week.

This conclusion had followed the Sibelius Swan of Tuonela, in which Louis Speyer—closely associated with this piece for half a century — came downdownstage, where he and Samuel Mayes and Mr. Monteux could together bring this unique piece to life. We shall miss Mr. Speyer after this season, but we shall not forget him, nor the many Swans he has conjured for us with conductors from Monteux to Monteux.

Before intermission we had hold our breath with excitement at the most felicitous Beethoven Fourth one ever heard, the concert having opened with the Vaughan Williams Tallis Fantasia. Had the composer ever heard it played like that he would have re-vised it to give Mr. de Pasquale a few more notes. What a tone! In fact the strings generally surpassed themselves. The only thing lacking was the curious ethos of Gloucester Cathedral; a concert hall is not quite the equivalent—not quite the right soup. And the Beethoven was under a bit of a strain in this respect; but the Sibelius and the Enigma were in their very element.

We shall welcome Mr. Leinsdorf on his return; everything will be in good order for him.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Herald (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 178,553
DEC 21 1963

SYMPHONY

Pierre Monteux Returns to Boston

By McLAREN HARRIS

Last season when Pierre Monteux stood before the Boston Symphony Orchestra, a springtime optimism was in the offing. Appearing as guest conductor of this weekend's concerts, he closely precedes Christmas.

One can almost find more than coincidence in these occasions, for just as spring affirms the phenomenon of his ever-renewing personality, the present season strengthens belief in Mr. Monteux's personification of Pere Noel, spreading his artistic benevolence and bearing his musical gifts to an adoring populace.

In this week's program of Vaughan Williams, Elgar, Beethoven and Sibelius, lies not a single work of French origin.

Remembering Dr. Munch's final weeks, we may wonder if Mr. Monteux's motives are similar to those of Winston Churchill, who quipped as he took a sip of water at the rostrum, "I only do it to show you that I can." But I cannot conceive that the conductor's reasons are either mysterious or requiring of explanation.

It is better to remain in touch with the esthetic results, for such a cosmopolitan career as his has inspired a secure command of the most diverse languages of Western musical tradition.

Thus, in the "Enigma" Variations of Sir Edward Elgar, we find him congenial to the English outlook. The 14 "Variations on an Original Theme" refer in tonal terms to several acquaintances of Sir Edward, including the composer himself; while the sections indicate everything from orthodoxy to eccentricity, they are not parodies of personality but an attempt at honest, though subjective, transmutation of personal traits to orchestral sound.

Within Bounds

Likewise, Mr. Monteux regarded the variations as more than objects for mere caprice, keeping the score's cleverness alive but within bounds, putting gravity behind eloquent strings, disciplining the energy of the final section and in general setting forth majestic elements in full flower.

Beethoven's 4th Symphony in B flat, the "Greek maiden between two Norse giants," as the program notes quote Schumann, revealed the conductor's devotion to the beauties of line and phrase. He propels the music of the faster movements at a pace bright and nimble, yet not so hurried as to obscure the lyric fragments interspersed in transitions and developments.

The textures bespoke vigor, mindful of its relation to melody; the Adagio, in anticipation of the "Pastoral" Symphony's final movement, sang with the idyllic verdure of contentment, as if blessed with the essence of delicacy and design.

English hornist Louis Speyer, retiring at seasons end from service with the orchestra dating from 1918, performed the solo passages for Sibelius' "The Swan of Tuonela," song of the legendary bird that floats on the Finnish River Styx, so to speak. Seen as a beautiful and lonely figure, the swan sings through the English horn's melancholy timbres, and amid a woodwind and string background of late romantic mystery, Mr. Speyer wove his lyricism, picking up and releasing the notes as smoothly as on glass.

The Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux guest conductor, presented the 12th program of the 83rd season yesterday at Symphony Hall. The program will be repeated tonight at 8:30.

Fantasia on a Theme by Thomas Tallis — Vaughan Williams
Symphony No. 4 in B flat, Op. 60 — Beethoven
The Swan of Tuonela, Op. 22, No. 3 — Sibelius
Variations on an Original Theme Op. 36 — Elgar

Williams Fantasy

In the opening work, Vaughan Williams' "Fantasia on a Theme by Tallis," Mr. Monteux gave his love to the strings, forming contrasts in tone and dynamics between the smaller subdivisions of the string choir, then gathering them into total context as in a grand consort of modern viols.

From the beginning it expressed his harmony with each idiom, his tireless pursuit of art and the timelessness of his musical spirit, as enduring as the legend of St. Nicholas.

The orchestra goes on vacation next week. For the program beginning the following Tuesday, Erich Leinsdorf has scheduled Mozart's Divertimento in F major for strings and 2 horns, K. 247, the suite from "Der Burger als Edelmann' of Strauss, and Joseph Lanner's "Mozartisten," a waltz arrangement of favorite Mozart airs.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Herald
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 283,819
DEC 22 1963

vEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 465,653
DEC 22 1963

On Vacation

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin a mid-Winter vacation of one week today. There will be no week-end concerts in Symphony Hall on Friday and Saturday.

The sixth concert of the Tuesday Evening Series will take place in Symphony Hall on Dec. 31, and the 12th pair of Friday-Saturday concerts will be given in Symphony Hall on Jan. 3 and 4. Leinsdorf will conduct all three programs.

TUESDAY 6. FRI.-SAT 12

Sixth Program

TUESDAY EVENING, DECEMBER 31, at 8:30 o'clock

HINDEMITH . . . . . Trauermusik for Solo Viola and Strings
Soloist: JOSEPH DE PASQUALE

IN MEMORIAM
PAUL HINDEMITH
November 16, 1895 — December 28, 1963

MOZART . . . . . Divertimento in F major, for Strings and Two Horns, K. 247

March (K. 248)
Allegro
Andante grazioso
Menuetto
Adagio
Menuetto
Andante; Allegro assai

(First performance at these concerts)

INTERMISSION

STRAUSS . . . . . Orchestral Suite from "Der Bürger als Edelmann," based on Molière's Play, "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme"

Overture to Act I — Jourdain the Bourgeois
Minuet
The Fencing Master
Entrance and Dance of the Tailors
The Minuet of Lully
Courante
Entrance of Cleonte
Introduction to Act II (Intermezzo);
Dorantes and Dorimène — The Count and Countess
The Dinner (Music at Table and Dance of the Young Kitchen Servants)

(First performance in this series)

Happy New Year

LANNER . . . . . Die Mozartisten, Waltzes, Op. 196

(First performance at these concerts)

A new plan for ticket reservations is announced on page 60.

BALDWIN PIANO RCA VICTOR RECORDS

EIGHTY-THIRD SEASON • NINETEEN HUNDRED SIXTY-THREE–SIXTY-FOUR

Twelfth Program

FRIDAY AFTERNOON, JANUARY 3, at 2:00 o'clock

SATURDAY EVENING, JANUARY 4, at 8:30 o'clock

MOZART . . . . . Divertimento in F major, for Strings and Two Horns, K. 247

March (K. 248)
Allegro
Andante grazioso
Menuetto
Adagio
Menuetto
Andante; Allegro assai

(First performance in this series)

INTERMISSION

STRAUSS . . . . . Orchestral Suite from "Der Bürger als Edelmann," based on Molière's Play, "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme"

Overture to Act I — Jourdain the Bourgeois
Minuet
The Fencing Master
Entrance and Dance of the Tailors
The Minuet of Lully
Courante
Entrance of Cleonte
Introduction to Act II (Intermezzo);
Dorantes and Dorimène — The Count and Countess
The Dinner (Music at Table and Dance of the Young Kitchen Servants)

Happy New Year?

LANNER . . . . . Die Mozartisten, Waltzes, Op. 196

(First performance in this series)

BALDWIN PIANO RCA VICTOR RECORDS

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Call (e)
WOONSOCKET, R. I.
DEC 3 c 128 30

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Standard-Times (e)
NEW BEDFORD, Mass.
Circ. 65,046
JAN 1 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Courant (m)
HARTFORD, Conn.
Circ. 119,274
DEC 31 1963

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Telegram (m)
WORCESTER, Mass.
Circ. 59,451
DEC 31 1963

Symphony Plans Memorial To Hindemith

BOSTON (UPI)— The Boston Symphony Orchestra will perform a tribute to the memory of composer Paul Hindemith at its concert Tuesday night.

Conductor Erich Leinsdorf has added to the previously announced program Hindemith's "Trauer Musik" (mourning music). This was composed on Jan. 21, 1936 on the death of King George V.

Although Hindemith is now accepted as a great master of this century, at one time he was considered an extremist among composers. Despite this, 13 of his works have been performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra through the years, some of them for the first time anywhere, with numerous repetitions of various works.

Hindemith, who died Saturday in a Frankfurt, Germany hospital, was guest teacher of composition at the orchestra's summer training school, the Berkshire Music Center, in 1940 and 1941, its first two seasons.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Herald
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 283,819
DEC 29 1963

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 465,653
DEC 29 1963

Symphony This Week

Orchestra Offers Chamber Works

Erich Leindorf, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will return from a mid-winter vacation to conduct three concerts this week.

He has chosen a program of works for chamber orchestra, which will be heard at each of the three concerts. Members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will comprise the chamber orchestra.

The sixth concert of the Tuesday evening series will take place at Symphony Hall on Tuesday at 8:30. The twelfth pair of weekend concerts of the current season will be held on Friday and Saturday.

Mr. Leinsdorf will open the program at each of these concerts with Mozart's Divertimento No. 10, in F major, for Strings and Two Horns, K. 247, the first movement of which, a March, was subsequently designated K. 248. After the intermission Mr. Leinsdorf will conduct the Orchestra in Richard Strauss' Orchestral Suite for the German adaptation of "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme," a play by Moliere; this Suite has not been heard at these concerts since 1934.

The concert will close with "Die Mozartisten," by Joseph Lanner, an arrangement of favorite airs of Mozart in waltz rhythm. Both the Divertimento No. 10 and "Die Mozartisten" will be heard for the first time at these concerts.

12

TUESDAY 6. FRI.-SAT 12.

Sixth Program

TUESDAY EVENING, DECEMBER 31, at 8:30 o'clock

HINDEMITH . . . . . Trauermusik for Solo Viola and Strings
Soloist: JOSEPH DE PASQUALE

IN MEMORIAM
PAUL HINDEMITH
November 16, 1895 — December 28, 1963

MOZART . . . . . Divertimento in F major, for Strings and Two Horns, K. 247

March (K. 248)
Allegro
Andante grazioso
Menuetto
Adagio
Menuetto
Andante; Allegro assai

(First performance at these concerts)

INTERMISSION

STRAUSS . . . . . Orchestral Suite from "Der Bürger als Edelmann," based on Molière's Play, "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme"

Overture to Act I — Jourdain the Bourgeois
Minuet
The Fencing Master
Entrance and Dance of the Tailors
The Minuet of Lully
Courante
Entrance of Cleonte
Introduction to Act II (Intermezzo);
Dorantes and Dorimène — The Count and Countess
The Dinner (Music at Table and Dance of the Young Kitchen Servants)

(First performance in this series)

Happy New Year

LANNER . . . . . Die Mozartisten, Waltzes, Op. 196

(First performance at these concerts)

A new plan for ticket reservations is announced on page 60.

BALDWIN PIANO RCA VICTOR RECORDS

EIGHTY-THIRD SEASON • NINETEEN HUNDRED SIXTY-THREE–SIXTY-FOUR

Twelfth Program

FRIDAY AFTERNOON, JANUARY 3, at 2:00 o'clock

SATURDAY EVENING, JANUARY 4, at 8:30 o'clock

MOZART . . . . . Divertimento in F major, for Strings and Two Horns, K. 247

March (K. 248)
Allegro
Andante grazioso
Menuetto
Adagio
Menuetto
Andante; Allegro assai

(First performance in this series)

INTERMISSION

STRAUSS . . . . . Orchestral Suite from "Der Bürger als Edelmann," based on Molière's Play, "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme"

Overture to Act I — Jourdain the Bourgeois
Minuet
The Fencing Master
Entrance and Dance of the Tailors
The Minuet of Lully
Courante
Entrance of Cleonte
Introduction to Act II (Intermezzo);
Dorantes and Dorimène — The Count and Countess
The Dinner (Music at Table and Dance of the Young Kitchen Servants)

Happy New Year?

LANNER . . . . . Die Mozartisten, Waltzes, Op. 196

(First performance in this series)

BALDWIN PIANO RCA VICTOR RECORDS

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Call (e)
WOONSOCKET, R. I.
DEC 28 1963

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Standard-Times (e)
NEW BEDFORD, Mass.
Circ. 65,046
JAN 1 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Courant (m)
HARTFORD, Conn.
Circ. 119,274
DEC 31 1963

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Telegram (m)
WORCESTER, Mass.
Circ. 59,451
DEC 31 1963

Symphony Plans Memorial To Hindemith

BOSTON (UPI)— The Boston Symphony Orchestra will perform a tribute to the memory of composer Paul Hindemith at its concert Tuesday night.

Conductor Erich Leinsdorf has added to the previously announced program Hindemith's "Trauer Musik" (mourning music). This was composed on Jan. 21, 1936 on the death of King George V.

Although Hindemith is now accepted as a great master of this century, at one time he was considered an extremist among composers. Despite this 13 of his works have been performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra through the years, some of them for the first time anywhere, with numerous repetitions of various works.

Hindemith, who died Saturday in a Frankfurt, Germany hospital, was guest teacher of composition at the orchestra's summer training school, the Berkshire Music Center, in 1940 and 1941, its first two seasons.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Herald
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 283,819
DEC 29 1963

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 465,653
DEC 29 1963

Symphony This Week

Orchestra Offers Chamber Works

Erich Leindorf, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will return from a mid-winter vacation to conduct three concerts this week.

He has chosen a program of works for chamber orchestra which will be heard at each of the three concerts. Members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will comprise the chamber orchestra.

The sixth concert of the Tuesday evening series will take place at Symphony Hall on Tuesday at 8:30. The twelfth pair of weekend concerts of the current season will be held on Friday and Saturday.

Mr. Leinsdorf will open the program at each of these concerts with Mozart's Divertimento No. 10, in F major, for Strings and Two Horns, K. 247, the first movement of which, a March, was subsequently designated K. 248. After the intermission Mr. Leinsdorf will conduct the Orchestra in Richard Strauss' Orchestral Suite for the German adaptation of "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme," a play by Moliere; this Suite has not been heard at these concerts since 1934.

The concert will close with "Die Mozartisten" by Lanner, an arrangement of favorite airs of Mozart in waltz rhythm. Both the Divertimento No. 10 and "Die Mozartisten" will be heard for the first time at these concerts.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Patriot-Ledger (e)
QUINCY, Mass.
Circ. 44,419
JAN 2 1964

Leinsdorf Distributes New Year's Bon Bons

By Peter M. Knapp

Not all the holiday goodies were on the Christmas tree. The Boston Symphony Orchestra had some extra musical sugar plums to distribute on New Year's Eve.

There were bon bons marked Mozart and Lanner but the choicest sweetmeat in this year's end concert at Symphony Hall under the direction of Erich Leinsdorf was Richard Strauss' Orchestral Suite from "Der Buerger als Edelmann."

"Der Buerger" was the title given by Strauss and Hugo von Hofmannsthal to their play-opera concocted from Moliere's "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme." The opera part was later separated from the play and we know it today as "Ariadne auf Naxos."

The play relates the efforts of a "would-be gentleman," M. Jourdain, a nouveau riche who attempts to become a true nobleman by acquiring an aristocrat's elegance and manners. In succession, a tailor, a dancing master, a fencing master and a literary philosopher try to transform the well-meaning but clumsy Jourdain, with the expected comic results.

Moliere's play survives as a classic. Hofmannsthal's version has become relatively obscure, but Strauss' incidental music is one of the composer's finest efforts and deserves more than the occasional performance it gets today.

The suite is a big musical spoof, an elaborate and fluffy bit of pastry like those many-tiered, whipped cream-topped fantasies that emerge from the finest Austrian confectionaries. Strauss has a huge orchestra on stage to perform it but usually the music is of chamber proportions, with strings and winds taking separate turns. The sound is worthy of the great Straussian tone poems, although in a more miniature scale, and demonstrates the composer's enormous grasp of instrumental colors.

Tuesday night's performance of this many-hued score by Mr. Leinsdorf and the Symphony was absolutely superb, and leads one to hope they will soon record it—especially since only one recorded version of the work is now available. From the brilliant, dancing woodwinds to the gracious and lush strings, the Symphony produced glorious tones, notable precision and witty turns of phrase.

Of particular excellence was the final section of the suite, titled "The Dinner," which contains both sly and obvious musical jokes. The lamb course is introduced to the bleating of sheep; the winds warble bird calls for what one assumes is a delicacy of thrushes and larks. There is a vigorous opening march as the servants leap out of the kitchen.

Standouts were Samuel Mayes' cello in the final section, Concertmaster Joseph Silverstein's violin in the "Dance of the Tailors" and Bernard Zighera's piano in the overture and "Fencing Master" parts.

The other major work on the program, Mozart's Divertimento in F for Strings and Two Horns, K. 247, showed Mr. Leinsdorf's skill as an interpreter of Mozart. This divertimento is a relatively early work, composed in Salzburg when Mozart was 20. It is solid and gracious, but not the best example of Mozart's "party music."

Mr. Leinsdorf gave infinite attention to the smallest of details in this careful reading, its first performance by the Symphony. The response the conductor received, however, gave evidence that the Boston Symphony is not yet a top-notch Mozart orchestra, even though it has made much progress under Mr. Leinsdorf.

The strings are somewhat unbending and inflexible in their flights along the Mozartean lines. Where the phrases should flow naturally and elegantly, there is still some stiffness. And in spots Tuesday night there was a notable lack of precision in the strings and a shrillness in the upper register.

Part of the trouble may be the large string section Mr. Leinsdorf used — 35 or so string players. While recognizing Mr. Leinsdorf's authority as a master of Mozart, one can question the presence of so large a string ensemble in a small-scaled work.

Mr. Leinsdorf concluded the concert with a performance of Josef Lanner's "Die Mozartisten" waltzes, Op. 196. These are settings by the Viennese composer, a contemporary of Johann Strauss senior, of music from Mozart's "The Magic Flute" and "Don Giovanni."

Lanner evidently believed he could stuff any music into three-quarter time — even the overture to the "Magic Flute," or a minuet in which the composer had to change the accents to make it fit the waltz rhythm. The results are hilarious.

Opening the concert was a piece of far more somber note — Paul Hindemith's "Trauermusik" for solo viola and strings, the Symphony's tribute to the late German composer. The brief, richly harmonic, funereal composition was a moving memorial to one of our most distinguished contemporary musicians. Principal viola Joseph De Pasquale spun out the solo part with skill and a dark, lustrous tone. The audience, however, violated the mood by applauding after the work's conclusion.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Jewish Advocate
BOSTON, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 35,304
JAN 9 1964

MUSIC IN REVIEW

By GERALD A. BERLIN

OLD VIENNA FOR NEW YEAR

Before long there will be a tradition, but for the moment few realize that the logistical imperatives of the new Christmas season interstice at Symphony produce sharp programmatic restrictions.

Under the new system the entire orchestra is on vacation Christmas week, while one half of the players, selected on a rotating basis, ar away for the ensuing New Year's week. This means that the performance for the latter period must perforce consist essentially of chamber orchestra works. To meet the demands thus imposed Mr. Leinsdorf, Anteus-like, once mo. invigorated himself by returning to the soil of his native Vienna. He came up with a clutch of three amiable enough compositions, any of which one hears performed live perhaps once or so in a generation. They included the first performance in the week-end series of Mozart's F major Diventimento for Strings and Two Horns, K 247; Richard Strauss' Orchestral Suite, for "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme"; and the first performance in this series of Joseph Lanner's Die Mozartisten, Waltzes, Op. 196.

The Mozart Divertimentos were unabashedly composed for popular purposes. As such they neither probe great depths nor reveal vast splendors. Yet this one, like all the others, purls along in a highly agreeable fashion and does so with a wealth of finely wrought detail and with an inventiveness which consistently if unobtrusitely reveals the genius of the master. The score, open as a window, is as merciless as a Mozart string quartet in revealing imperfections of execution. I am sorry to report that, on Friday afternoon at least, the victims of this transparency were the first violins of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who in the Allegro and Adagio movements were caught straggling around on their attacks and intonation in a way rarely associated with this musical organization. Maybe the fault was something more than the score. Maybe it was the shortened practice week or a certain reduction in the quality of players inherent in the rotation system. Or maybe the violins were startled by the blasts of the two hornists, who sometimes leaned into their entrances as if they were blowing on auto horns rather than a musical instrument. A few concerts hence, things would no doubt be different.

The Strauss performance was another matter. Although the music texture of the score is, in Straussian terms, relatively uncomplicated, it is sufficiently busy in general and sufficiently full of solo perorations to show a thoroughbred orchestra off rather than show it up. Indeed, it is really quire remarkable, when you come to think of it, how Strauss in this piece has managed to retain in the strongest way the stamp of his own individuality while reverting to the manner of the baroque opera of the seventeenth century. The performance, highlighted by the exquisite solo work of Joseph Silverstein, was brought off so beautifully that the Mozart could be forgiven.

And then there was the Lanner work. What the composer did here was to weave together a succession of four waltzes derived from Mozart operatic themes and encase them in an introduction and finale in common time. Some of the themes come from "The Magic Flute", others from "Don Giovanni." Lanner was every wit as incomparable a stylist of the waltz medium as Johann Strauss himself and this particular pastische is exceedingly solidly contrived. (The orchestral transcription by Julius Burger was made especially for performance at these concerts and, so the program notes informed us, was probably being heard for the first time outside of Austria.) Lanner's point, however, is swiftly and completely made and one hearing in a generation, preferably at holiday time, about renders justice to the concoction.

This week the orchestra once more gets on to weightier projects and Mr. Leinsdorf will conduct a program consisting of Prokofieff's Piano Conerto No. 5 in G major and Bruckner's Seventh Symphony. The soloist will be Lorin Hollander.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 194,870
JAN 4 1964

At Symphony

Leinsdorf Conducts A Festive Program

By MARGO MILLER

The Boston Symphony Orchestra played for dancing this holiday week. Or so it seemed, with Symphony Hall awash in Mozart party music, fully minuets (via Richard Strauss) and, as Erich Leinsdorf's New Year's present, a charming package of waltzes arranged by Lanner from Mozart airs. This confection will be presented again this evening at 8:30.

This reviewer heard the program New Year's Eve in the Tuesday series. That evening began, however, with a sad task, the observance of Paul Hindemith's death at 68. His Trauermusik was played in memoriam. Against a string orchestra, the solo viola, here nobly played by Joseph de Pasquale, spoke its elegy for another violist, the composer.

One of Hindemith's great interests was the writing of "music for use," pieces for specific instruments or occasions. He probably would have enjoyed the rest of the program, devoted as it was to a festive season, the music festively written and played. Mozart's Divertimento in F major for Strings and Two Horns, for example, comes under the general heading of party music. It is akin to those cassations and serenades which adorned pleasant gatherings.

This Divertimento begins with a sprightly march, alternates lovely slow movements with two elegant minuets and concludes with a bright allegro. Leinsdorf trimmed the orchestra to a chamber ensemble. The string tone was silk itself. The horns lent mellow support. It was a finely-drawn reading, characteristic of the conductor, though here and there one longed for more elan.

This deficiency had disappeared long before Lanner's "Die Mozartisten" Waltzes triple-stepped through Symphony Hall. The airs had their origins in "The Magic Flute" and "Don Giovanni." (Mozart had found Prague dancing his "Figaro" in quadrilles and waltzes).

Lanner meant his adaptations not for dancing, but Leinsdorf was borne away by the beat and the orchestra responded gaily. The Lanner novelty should become a local tradition.

Still more dancing in Richard Strauss. Here, the work was the orchestral suite, based on his incidental music for Moliere's "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme." The early movements depict this crude fellow with the composer's customary ability to caricature. The Boston Symphony led the fun cheerfully. Notable were the cross dialogues of violins and flutes, as Gentleman Joudain demonstrates the art of Terpsichore to his dancing master; the brilliant piano work in the fencing scene; the concertmaster's solo in the Tailor's Dance; and the cello passages for the hilarious feast. The purely ballet music was pleasant. And, throughout, the Strauss orchestral sonorities were amply projected by the Boston Symphony.

Next week's Friday and Saturday concerts will have Lorin Hollander as soloist in the Fifth Prokofiev Piano Concerto. Leinsdorf will also conduct Bruckner's Symphony No. 7.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Herald (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 178,553
JAN 1 1964

Symphony Hall Filled With Holiday Spirit

By McLAREN HARRIS

Holiday spirit was probably no more evident elsewhere than at last night's Symphony, as Erich Leinsdorf and the orchestra performed a program of musical levity consisting of a Mozart divertimento, some waltz versions of Mozart arias and the suite from Strauss' burlesque, "Der Buerger als Edelmann."

The opening work, however, served as a reminder that the year 1963 had served one of its parting blows to the musical world. The orchestra's and Mr. Leinsdorf's tribute to the passing of Paul Hindemith on Saturday was the late composer's own "Trauermusik for Solo Viola and Strings," and in its selection propriety surpasses coincidence.

Given entirely to a silken, though firm, strong texture, the "Trauermusik" is less a testament of grief than a gentle statement of completion. The viola timbre and melodic passages are mournful to the extent of depicting the gravity of such an event, but carry no burden of despair or pessimism. The work sounds instead a note of ultimate peace, and perhaps in Mr. Hindemith's case, a reflection of his artistic legacy; composition was his joy of existence, and in attempting to narrow the gap between the avant-garde composer and the more conservative listener, he sought to make available his talent to all. In Hindemith's nature almost as in Bach's, the mood of uplifting and optimism is characteristic.

Strauss' suite from the "Buerger" is a concert condensation of the opera based on Moliere's "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme," from which "Ariadne auf Naxos" also arose. In nine excepts winking at the newly-rich Jourdain in various aristocratic poses, Strauss produces an enigma of chamber music combinations from an orchestra of reduced forces.

With Mr. Leinsdorf supplying metric certainty in marked motions, the orchestra proved itself an aggregation of true virtuosos from concertmaster Joseph Silverstein on, giving energy and polish to the separate dance structures.

First on the regular program as Mozart's Divertimento in F major, K. 247. With a March (numbered K. 248) attached at the head, this six-movement work made not for depth but breadth in its tastes. Mr. Leinsdorf emphasized the tenderness of the Adagio and the bright surface of the minuets and faster sections, bringing to light the work's "occasional" nature—appropriately, for New Year's Eve is an occasion.

Finally, levity rose close to mirth with Joseph Lanner's "Mozartisten," Op. 196; this is a collection of four waltzes on arias from "The Magic Flue" and "Don Giovanni," arranged from the piano version by Julius Burger. Again, profundity is lacking, but hearing some familiar themes in waltz disguise, usually thin, can be worth remembering, either with enjoyment or indignation. Keep in mind, though, that Mozart would have been proud.

The Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf conducting, gave the sixth program of the Tuesday Evening Series in the 83rd season last night at Symphony Hall. The program will be repeated Friday at 2 and Saturday at 8:30.

Trauermusik for Viola and Strings ..... Hindemith
Divertimento in M major, K. 247 ..... Mozart
Suite from "Der Buerger als Edelmann" ..... Strauss
Die Mozartisten, Op. 196, Waltzes ..... Lanner

C.S.M.

Symphonic tribute to Hindemith

By Harold Rogers

If we could have rolled up the Symphony Hall seats and have grabbed ourselves a partner for a waltz, we would have celebrated the coming of the New Year last Tuesday night in an appropriate Viennese style. Erich Leinsdorf provided us with all the elements of a ball save the possibility of physical participation when he concluded the evening with "Die Mozartisten" Waltzes by Joseph Lanner, a contemporary of the senior Johann Strauss.

But Mr. Leinsdorf began the concert in quite a contrasting mood—with Paul Hindemith's Trauermusik for solo viola and strings. It was an appropriate addition to the program, dedicated as it was to the composer's memory. Joseph de Pasquale, the Boston Symphony's first viola, was the soloist and discharged his duties with the same buoyant grace that has characterized his playing during his years at the first desk.

A prevailing tone of sadness was threefold present—in the lamenting music, of course, which Hindemith composed for the passing of King George V; in our loss of Hindemith himself, one of the great composers of our time; and in what may prove to be Mr. de Pasquale's final solo appearance with the Boston Symphony, since he will assume similar duties with the Philadelphia Orchestra next season.

The Trauermusik had a deeper overtone of sympathy: the viola was the instrument that Hindemith loved and played.

* * *

From this point on, however, Mr. Leinsdorf exchanged the tragic mask for the comedic one, and we sailed serenely toward 1964 on the songful wings of Mozart's Divertimento in F major, K. 247; Richard Strauss's Orchestral Suite from "Der Bürger als Edelmann," and the Lanner waltzes based on Mozart melodies.

The Divertimento passed pleasantly enough, recalling the fine Mozart playing heard under Mr. Leinsdorf's guidance last summer at Tanglewood. The Strauss, filled with joviality, sounded more as if it were being rehearsed on the spot, yet no one much cared: its esprit was in keeping with the holiday mood; the players doubtless felt a togetherness of heart if not of instrument.

* * *

"Die Mozartisten" Waltzes came quite as a surprise. This was their first Boston performance and quite possibly their first outside the country of their origin. The arrangement heard Tuesday night—and to be heard this Friday afternoon and Saturday evening when the program will be repeated—was made especially for Mr. Leinsdorf by Julius Burger.

Drawing from "The Magic Flute" and "Don Giovanni," the pasticcio has the humor of a hybrid—exuding both the elegance of Mozart and the popular swing of the Viennese waltz. Perhaps Mr. Burger's arrangement lacked the ultimate of Mozartean clarity or even the ultimate of Johann Straussian verve, yet it made its point engagingly.

It is good music for welcoming a New Year.

MONDAY 3. CAMBRIDGE 3. SUNDAY 4

SEASON • NINETEEN HUNDRED SIXTY-THREE–SIXTY-FOUR

Third Program

ONDAY EVENING, JANUARY 6, at 8:30 o'clock

Orchestral Suite from "Der Bürger als Edelmann," after Molière's "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme" (Excerpts)

Overture to Act I — Jourdain the Bourgeois
Entrance and Dance of the Tailors
Introduction to Act II (Intermezzo);
Dorantes and Dorimène — The Count and Countess
The Dinner (Music at Table and Dance of the Young Kitchen Servants)
(First performance in this series)

INTERMISSION

MAHLER ..... Symphony No. 5 in C-sharp minor

Part I (1) Trauermarsch
(2) Stürmisch bewegt
Part II (3) Scherzo
Part III (4) Adagietto
(5) Rondo — Finale
(First performance in this series)

A new plan for ticket reservations is announced on page 60.

BALDWIN PIANO RCA VICTOR RECORDS

EIGHTY-THIRD SEASON • NINETEEN HUNDRED SIXTY-THREE–SIXTY-FOUR

Fourth Program

SUNDAY AFTERNOON, JANUARY 12, at 3:00 o'clock

STRAUSS ..... Orchestral Suite from "Der Bürger als Edelmann," based on Molière's Play, "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme"

Overture to Act I — Jourdain the Bourgeois
Minuet
The Fencing Master
Entrance and Dance of the Tailors
The Minuet of Lully
Courante
Entrance of Cleonte
Introduction to Act II (Intermezzo);
Dorantes and Dorimène — The Count and Countess
The Dinner (Music at Table and Dance of the Young Kitchen Servants)
(First performance in this series)

IEV ..... Piano Concerto No. 5, in G major, Op. 55

I. Allegro con brio; Tempo meno mosso
I. Moderato ben accentuato
II. Toccata: allegro con fuoco
V. Larghetto
V. Vivo; poco meno mosso; coda
(First performance in this series)

INTERMISSION

-KORSAKOV ..... Suite from "Le Coq d'Or"

I. King Dodon in his palace
II. King Dodon in the country
II. King Dodon with the Queen of Shemakha
V. Wedding March and the lamentable end of King Dodon

SOLOIST
LORIN HOLLANDER
MR. HOLLANDER plays the Baldwin Piano

A new plan for ticket reservations is announced on page 60.

BALDWIN PIANO RCA VICTOR RECORDS

EIGHTY-THIRD SEASON • NINETEEN HUNDRED SIXTY-THREE–SIXTY-FOUR

Third Program

TUESDAY EVENING, JANUARY 7, at 8:30 o'clock

BACH ..... Brandenburg Concerto No. 4 in G major, for Violin, Two Flutes, and String Orchestra

I. Allegro
II. Andante
III. Presto

Violin: JOSEPH SILVERSTEIN
Flutes: DORIOT ANTHONY DWYER
JAMES PAPPOUTSAKIS

BARTÓK ..... Concerto No. 2 for Violin and Orchestra

I. Allegro non troppo
II. Andante tranquillo
III. Allegro molto

WAGNER ..... Good Friday Spell from "Parsifal"

INTERMISSION

STRAUSS ..... "Don Quixote," Fantastic Variations on a Theme of Knightly Character, Op. 35

Introduction, Theme and Variations, and Finale
Violoncello Solo: SAMUEL MAYES
Viola Solo: JOSEPH DE PASQUALE

SOLOIST
JOSEPH SILVERSTEIN

A new plan for ticket reservations is announced on page 60.

BALDWIN PIANO RCA VICTOR RECORDS

Sunday Herald
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 283,819
JAN 5 1964

Sunday Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 465,653
JAN 5 1964

Boston Symphony: 5 Concerts

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Erich Leinsdorf, will give five concerts in Symphony Hall this week. The third program of the Monday Evening Series will be held tomorrow evening at 8:30 p.m. Leinsdorf will open the concert with Excerpts from the Suite to "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme" by Richard Strauss, and conclude with Mahler's Symphony No. 5.

On Tuesday evening at 8:30 Leinsdorf will conduct the Bach Brandenburg Concerto No. 4 with Joseph Silverstein, violin, Doriot Anthony Dwyer and James Pappoutsakis, flutes; the Bartok Violin Concerto No. 2 with Silverstein, soloist; the Good Friday Spell from Wagner's "Parsifal"; and "Don Quixote" by Richard Strauss, with Samuel Mayes playing the cello solo and Joseph de Pasquale the viola solo.

At the Friday-Saturday concerts (Jan. 10, 2:00; Jan. 11, 8:30) Leinsdorf will begin the program with Prokofiev's Piano Concerto No. 5. Lorin Hollander, the young pianist introduced to Symphony audiences last season, will be soloist. The concert will close with the Symphony No. 7 by Anton Bruckner. The program will be repeated Sunday, Jan. 12, at 3 p.m.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Herald (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 178,553
JAN 8 1964

..., Symphony Program Changed

Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, announces a change in the program at Symphony Hall for this Sunday afternoon. Instead of the Prokofiev-Bruckner program, the orchestra will begin with Strauss' suite from "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme," following with Prokofiev's 5th Piano Concerto with soloist Lorin Hollander, and concluding with Rimsky-Korsakov's suite from "Le Coq d'Or."

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 194,870
JAN 8 1964

Program Change

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's program Sunday will now consist of Richard Strauss' Orchestral Suite from his music for Moliere's "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme," the Fifth Prokofiev Piano Concerto with Lorin Hollander as soloist, and Rimsky-Korsakov's Suite from "Le Coq d'Or." Erich Leinsdorf will conduct the program, which begins at 3 p.m.

MONDAY 3. CAMBRIDGE 3. SUNDAY 4

Third Program

MONDAY EVENING, JANUARY 6, at 8:30 o'clock

.....Orchestral Suite from "Der Bürger als Edelmann," after Molière's "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme" (Excerpts)

Overture to Act I — Jourdain the Bourgeois
Entrance and Dance of the Tailors
Introduction to Act II (Intermezzo);
Dorantes and Dorimène — The Count and Countess
The Dinner (Music at Table and Dance of the Young Kitchen Servants)
(First performance in this series)

INTERMISSION

MAHLER.....Symphony No. 5 in C-sharp minor

Part I (1) Trauermarsch
(2) Stürmisch bewegt
Part II (3) Scherzo
Part III (4) Adagietto
(5) Rondo — Finale
(First performance in this series)

A new plan for ticket reservations is announced on page 60.

BALDWIN PIANO RCA VICTOR RECORDS

Fourth Program

SUNDAY AFTERNOON, JANUARY 12, at 3:00 o'clock

STRAUSS.....Orchestral Suite from "Der Bürger als Edelmann," based on Molière's Play, "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme"

Overture to Act I — Jourdain the Bourgeois
Minuet
The Fencing Master
Entrance and Dance of the Tailors
The Minuet of Lully
Courante
Entrance of Cleonte
Introduction to Act II (Intermezzo);
Dorantes and Dorimène — The Count and Countess
The Dinner (Music at Table and Dance of the Young Kitchen Servants)
(First performance in this series)

PROKOFIEV.....Piano Concerto No. 5, in G major, Op. 55

I. Allegro con brio; Tempo meno mosso
II. Moderato ben accentuato
III. Toccata: allegro con fuoco
IV. Larghetto
V. Vivo; poco meno mosso; coda
(First performance in this series)

INTERMISSION

RIMSKY-KORSAKOV.....Suite from "Le Coq d'Or"

I. King Dodon in his palace
II. King Dodon in the country
III. King Dodon with the Queen of Shemakha
IV. Wedding March and the lamentable end of King Dodon

SOLOIST
LORIN HOLLANDER
Mr. HOLLANDER plays the Baldwin Piano

A new plan for ticket reservations is announced on page 60.

BALDWIN PIANO RCA VICTOR RECORDS

Third Program

TUESDAY EVENING, JANUARY 7, at 8:30 o'clock

BACH.....Brandenburg Concerto No. 4 in G major, for Violin, Two Flutes, and String Orchestra

I. Allegro
II. Andante
III. Presto

Violin: JOSEPH SILVERSTEIN
Flutes: DORIOT ANTHONY DWYER
JAMES PAPPOUTSAKIS

BARTÓK.....Concerto No. 2 for Violin and Orchestra

I. Allegro non troppo
II. Andante tranquillo
III. Allegro molto

WAGNER.....Good Friday Spell from "Parsifal"

INTERMISSION

STRAUSS......"Don Quixote," Fantastic Variations on a Theme of Knightly Character, Op. 35

Introduction, Theme and Variations, and Finale
Violoncello Solo: SAMUEL MAYES
Viola Solo: JOSEPH DE PASQUALE

SOLOIST
JOSEPH SILVERSTEIN

A new plan for ticket reservations is announced on page 60.

BALDWIN PIANO RCA VICTOR RECORDS

Sunday Herald
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 283,819
JAN 5 1964
Sunday Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 465,653
JAN 5 1964

Boston Symphony: 5 Concerts

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Erich Leinsdorf, will give five concerts in Symphony Hall this week. The third program of the Monday Evening Series will be held tomorrow evening at 8:30 p.m. Leinsdorf will open the concert with Excerpts from the Suite to "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme" by Richard Strauss, and conclude with Mahler's Symphony No. 5.

On Tuesday evening at 8:30 Leinsdorf will conduct the Bach Brandenburg Concerto No. 4 with Joseph Silverstein, violin, Doriot Anthony Dwyer and James Pappoutsakis, flutes; the Bartok Violin Concerto No. 2 with Silverstein, soloist; the Good Friday Spell from Wagner's "Parsifal"; and "Don Quixote" by Richard Strauss, with Samuel Mayes playing the cello solo and Joseph de Pasquale the viola solo.

At the Friday-Saturday concerts (Jan. 10, 2:00; Jan. 11, 8:30) Leinsdorf will begin the program with Prokofiev's Piano Concerto No. 5. Lorin Hollander, the young pianist introduced to Symphony audiences last season, will be soloist. The concert will close with the Symphony No. 7 by Anton Bruckner. The program will be repeated Sunday, Jan. 12, at 3 p.m.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Herald (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 178,553
JAN 8 1964

Program Changed

Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, announces a change in the program at Symphony Hall for this Sunday afternoon. Instead of the Prokofiev-Bruckner program, the orchestra will begin with Strauss' suite from "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme," following with Prokofiev's 5th Piano Concerto with soloist Lorin Hollander, and concluding with Rimsky-Korsikov's suite from "Le Coq d'Or."

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 194,870
JAN 8 1964

Program Change

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's program Sunday will now consist of Richard Strauss' Orchestral Suite from his music for Moliere's "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme," the Fifth Prokofiev Piano Concerto with Lorin Hollander as soloist, and Rimsky-Korsakov's Suite from "Le Coq d'Or." Erich Leinsdorf will conduct the program, which begins at

FRI. SAT. 1.3. 1964

EIGHTY-THIRD SEASON • NINETEEN HUNDRED SIXTY-THREE–SIXTY-FOUR

Thirteenth Program

FRIDAY AFTERNOON, JANUARY 10, at 2:00 o'clock

SATURDAY EVENING, JANUARY 11, at 8:30 o'clock

PROKOFIEV ..... Piano Concerto No. 5, in G major, Op. 55

I. Allegro con brio; Tempo meno mosso
II. Moderato ben accentuato
III. Toccata: allegro con fuoco
IV. Larghetto
V. Vivo; poco meno mosso; coda

INTERMISSION

BRUCKNER ..... Symphony No. 7, in E major

I. Allegro moderato
II. Adagio: Sehr feierlich und langsam
III. Scherzo: Allegro; Trio: Etwas langsamer
IV. Finale: Bewegt, doch nicht schnell

SOLOIST
LORIN HOLLANDER
Mr. HOLLANDER plays the Baldwin Piano

These concerts will end about 3:50 o'clock on Friday Afternoon; 10:20 o'clock on Saturday Evening.

BALDWIN PIANO

RCA VICTOR RECORDS

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Evening Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 146,915
JAN 9 1964

Soloist
Lorin Hollander will play the Fifth Prokofiev Piano Concerto Friday and Saturday with the Boston Symphony Orchestra with Erich Leinsdorf conducting.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Jewish Advocate
BOSTON, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 35,304
JAN 17 1964

MUSIC IN REVIEW

By GERALD A. BERLIN

BSO: PROKOFIEV AND BRUCKNER

During several concerts since he has come here, Mr. Leinsdorf has achieved peaks of quality of performance that can be matched by very few conductors today.

A listener can readily apprehend when one of these remarkable occasions is at hand. There is a certain tension around, a kind of rededication that is almost tangible. It is not present at the ordinary performance of even a thoroughbred orchestra. Whatever it is, it is unmistakable from virtually the first bar. Such was the situation last year with Mahler's First Symphony and the Bartok Concerto for Orchestra and earlier this year with the Britten "War Requiem". And such was it again last week-end with Bruckner's Seventh Symphony.

This is a long work, lasting more than an hour. In hands something less than adequate it can prove more exhausting than exhaustive. The insistent thematic reiteration can become sheer repetition, and when this is the case the pauses before the introduction of clusters of new thematic material serve only as so many reminders of Bruckner's utter technical incapacity to put a symphony together.

But let loose upon the Seventh a master of his subject with a full measure of inspiration upon him, and it unfolds into one of the noblest affirmations of the entire romantic symphonic tradition. Mr. Leinsdorf's reading had just about everything. He paced the gigantic work magnificently, to the point where it moved along in a sort of inexorable propulsiveness of its own to the shattering brass climax at the end. At the same time the vast detail work was handled impeccably. The whole symphony held together beautifully and one could sense the profound knowledge, the deep commitment and the iron discipline that must lay behind that circumstance. Here was, to one listener at least, an ennobling and exhilarating experience.

The one other work on the program was Prokofiev's Fifth Piano Concerto, the soloist for which was Lorin Hollander. The only previous reading of this concerto here was back in 1932 by Prokofiev himself, two months after he composed it. It is set out in five short movements. Except for a songful sort of intermezzo in the middle of the opening Allegro and a really quite affecting and lyrical Larghetto, which is almost disconcertingly anticipatory of the slow movement of Prokofiev's Fifth Symphony of more than a decade to come, the piece is the typically percussive, harmonically acerb and technically acrobatic archetype of the Prokofiev of that period. Granted an initial interest it soon begins to suffer badly, indeed almost fatally, from narrowness of scope of ideas.

Whatever this Concerto's shortcomings, young Mr. Hollander gave it a spectacular traversal. He has prodigious digital dexterity and possesses an enormous and beautiful tone and strong rhythm. More than that he endows his playing with a verve and a sweep one seldom encounters among the younger crop of present day pianists. It was the same last year when, as a nineteen-year-old, he made his debut locally with Dello Joio's Fantasy and Variations, a piece as dazzling and as inconsequential as this Prokofiev Concerto.

Lorin Hollander is plainly more than a comer. He has arrived and now somebody ought to give him a chance to demonstrate that fact with something worthy of his genius.

This week's offerings include the first BSO performance of Haydn's Symphony No. 39 in G minor, Walter Piston's Symphony No. 4 and the Tchaikowsky Suite No. 3 in G major. Mr. Leinsdorf will again conduct.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Standard-Times (e)
NEW BEDFORD, Mass.
Circ. 65,046
JAN 13 1964

Young Pianist Shines With Boston Symphony

By EARL J. DIAS
Standard-Times Music Critic

The rousing feature of yesterday afternoon's concert by Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony in Symphony Hall was the appearance of the 20-year-old pianist, Loren Hollander, as soloist in Prokofiev's "Concerto No. 5 in D Major."

An interestingly orchestrated and soundly constructed work in the modern idiom, the concerto is characterized by its percussive, frequently staccato, driving quality. In fact, only the Larghetto offers any warm, lyrical relief, and even this movement is somewhat restless and intense in conception.

The particular facets of young Mr. Hollander's pianism, however, seem just right for this somewhat showy work. He obviously has the technique, temperment, and understanding to bring the proper amount of excitement to his role as soloist. With a formidable command of the demanding pyrotechnics of this concerto and a good understanding of what Prokofiev is attempting to convey, Mr. Hollander played the piece as though he owned it. That he is a pianist of power and immense technical ability was patent in his performance—and the audience showed its appreciation.

The remainder of the program was not an example of Mr. Leinsdorf's usually impeccable taste in programming. There is nothing wrong, individually, with either the Strauss orchestral suite from "Der Burger als Edelmann" or Rimsky-Korsakov's suite from "Le Coq d'Or." However, to present them on the same program is almost like having two deserts at diner—really too much of a good thing—since both are pure program music, similar in intent though not in style.

The nine movements of the Strauss are musical settings for certain episodes in Moliere's comedy, "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme." In the work, Strauss reveals surprising skill as a miniaturist. Especially charming are the two minuets, the lively fencing episode, and the masterful finale, which features "Music at Table" and "Dance of the Servants." Mr. Leinsdorf and the orchestra performed the work with the requisite verve, with a lilting and melodious quality when required, and with splendid solo work in a number of sections of the orchestra.

As for Rimsky-Korsakov's "Le Coq d'Or," with its Oriental overtones, it is colorful and appealing music of no particular depth but of masterly instrumental combinations. For sheer lushness of sound, the orchestra was tremendously effective in the spine-tingling last movement, the famous "Wedding March and the Lamentable End of King Dodon." Mr. Leinsdorf and his superlative musicians virtually shook the rafters of staid Symphony Hall in this movement that concluded the concert with the sort of beautifully-wrought texture that has become a hallmark of the ensemble under Mr. Leinsdorf.

EIGHTY-THIRD SEASON • NINETEEN HUNDRED SIXTY-THREE–SIXTY-FOUR

Thirteenth Program

FRIDAY AFTERNOON, JANUARY 10, at 2:00 o'clock

SATURDAY EVENING, JANUARY 11, at 8:30 o'clock

PROKOFIEV ..... Piano Concerto No. 5, in G major, Op. 55

I. Allegro con brio; Tempo meno mosso
II. Moderato ben accentuato
III. Toccata: allegro con fuoco
IV. Larghetto
V. Vivo; poco meno mosso; coda

INTERMISSION

BRUCKNER ..... Symphony No. 7, in E major

I. Allegro moderato
II. Adagio: Sehr feierlich und langsam
III. Scherzo: Allegro; Trio: Etwas langsamer
IV. Finale: Bewegt, doch nicht schnell

SOLOIST
LORIN HOLLANDER
Mr. HOLLANDER plays the Baldwin Piano

These concerts will end about 3:50 o'clock on Friday Afternoon; 10:20 o'clock on Saturday Evening.

BALDWIN PIANO

RCA VICTOR RECORDS

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Jewish Advocate
BOSTON, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 35,304
JAN 17 1964

MUSIC IN REVIEW

By GERALD A. BERLIN

BSO: PROKOFIEV AND BRUCKNER

During several concerts since he has come here, Mr. Leinsdorf has achieved peaks of quality of performance that can be matched by very few conductors today.

A listener can readily apprehend when one of these remarkable occasions is at hand. There is a certain tension around, a kind of rededication that is almost tangible. It is not present at the ordinary performance of even a thoroughbred orchestra. Whatever it is, it is unmistakable from virtually the first bar. Such was the situation last year with Mahler's First Symphony and the Bartok Concerto for Orchestra and earlier this year with the Britten "War Requiem". And such was it again last week-end with Bruckner's Seventh Symphony.

This is a long work, lasting more than an hour. In hands something less than adequate it can prove more exhausting than exhaustive. The insistent thematic reiteration can become sheer repetition, and when this is the case the pauses before the introduction of clusters of new thematic material serve only as so many reminders of Bruckner's utter technical incapacity to put a symphony together.

But let loose upon the Seventh a master of his subject with a full measure of inspiration upon him, and it unfolds into one of the noblest affirmations of the entire romantic symphonic tradition. Mr. Leinsdorf's reading had just about everything. He paced the gigantic work magnificently, to the point where it moved along in a sort of inexorable propulsiveness of its own to the shattering brass climax at the end. At the same time the vast detail work was handled impeccably. The whole symphony held together beautifully and one could sense the profound knowledge, the deep commitment and the iron discipline that must lay behind that circumstance. Here was, to one listener at least, an ennobling and exhilarating experience.

The one other work on the program was Prokofiev's Fifth Piano Concerto, the soloist for which was Lorin Hollander. The only previous reading of this concerto here was back in 1932 by Prokofiev himself, two months after he composed it. It is set out in five short movements. Except for a songful sort of intermezzo in the middle of the opening Allegro and a really quite affecting and lyrical Larghetto, which is almost disconcertingly anticipatory of the slow movement of Prokofiev's Fifth Symphony of more than a decade to come, the piece is the typically percussive, harmonically acerb and technically acrobatic archetype of the Prokofiev of that period. Granted an initial interest it soon begins to suffer badly, indeed almost fatally, from narrowness of scope of ideas.

Whatever this Concerto's shortcomings, young Mr. Hollander gave it a spectacular traversal. He has prodigious digital dexterity and possesses an enormous and beautiful tone and strong rhythm. More than that he endows his playing with a verve and a sweep one seldom encounters among the younger crop of present day pianists. It was the same last year when, as a nineteen-year-old, he made his debut locally with Dello Joio's Fantasy and Variations, a piece as dazzling and as inconsequential as this Prokofiev Concerto.

Lorin Hollander is plainly more than a comer. He has arrived and now somebody ought to give him a chance to demonstrate that fact with something worthy of his genius.

This week's offerings include the first BSO performance of Haydn's Symphony No. 39 in G minor, Walter Piston's Symphony No. 4 and the Tchaikowsky Suite No. 3 in G major. Mr. Leinsdorf will again conduct.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Evening Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 146,915
JAN 9 1964

Soloist

Lorin Hollander will play the Fifth Prokofiev Piano Concerto Friday and Saturday with the Boston Symphony Orchestra with Erich Leinsdorf conducting.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Standard-Times (e)
NEW BEDFORD, Mass.
Circ. 65,046
JAN 18 1964

Young Pianist Shines With Boston Symphony

By EARL J. DIAS
Standard-Times Music Critic

The rousing feature of yesterday afternoon's concert by Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony in Symphony Hall was the appearance of the 20-year-old pianist, Loren Hollander, as soloist in Prokofiev's "Concerto No. 5 in D Major."

An interestingly orchestrated and soundly constructed work in the modern idiom, the concerto is characterized by its percussive, frequently staccato, driving quality. In fact, only the Larghetto offers any warm, lyrical relief, and even this movement is somewhat restless and intense in conception.

The particular facets of young Mr. Hollander's pianism, however, seem just right for this somewhat showy work. He obviously has the technique, temperament, and understanding to bring the proper amount of excitement to his role as soloist. With a formidable command of the demanding pyrotechnics of this concerto and a good understanding of what Prokofiev is attempting to convey, Mr. Hollander played the piece as though he owned it. That he is a pianist of power and immense technical ability was patent in his performance—and the audience showed its appreciation.

The remainder of the program was not an example of Mr. Leinsdorf's usually impeccable taste in programming. There is nothing wrong, individually, with either the Strauss orchestral suite from "Der Burger als Edelmann" or Rimsky-Korsakov's suite from "Le Coq d'Or." However, to present them on the same program is almost like having two deserts at dinner—really too much of a good thing—since both are pure program music, similar in intent though not in style.

The nine movements of the Strauss are musical settings for certain episodes in Moliere's comedy, "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme." In the work, Strauss reveals surprising skill as a miniaturist. Especially charming are the two minuets, the lively fencing episode, and the masterful finale, which features "Music at Table" and "Dance of the Servants." Mr. Leinsdorf and the orchestra performed the work with the requisite verve, with a lilting and melodious quality when required, and with splendid solo work in a number of sections of the orchestra.

As for Rimsky-Korsakov's "Le Coq d'Or," with its Oriental overtones, it is colorful and appealing music of no particular depth but of masterly instrumental combinations. For sheer lushness of sound, the orchestra was tremendously effective in the spine-tingling last movement, the famous "Wedding March and the Lamentable End of King Dodon." Mr. Leinsdorf and his superlative musicians virtually shook the rafters of staid Symphony Hall in this movement that concluded the concert with the sort of beautifully-wrought texture that has become a hallmark of the ensemble under Mr. Leinsdorf.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Herald (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 178,553
JAN 11 1964

MUSIC

Bruckner Seventh Inspiring

BY ROBERT TAYLOR

Erich Leinsdorf gave a reading of the Bruckner ... yesterday that deserves immortality. It was ... the finest performances in the annals of the ... n Symphony Orchestra.

... e are strong words. But ... do not express a value judg... motivated purely by enthu... Granted, such a statement ... of Mr. Liensdorf yesterday ... the element of euphoria ... near-perfection in a master... piece always seizes one with astonishment. So nearly as one can ascertain on a comparative basis, in respect to tempo, nuance, tone, structure and insight, however, the glories of this music have not been revealed more perceptively in Symphony Hall in our generation.

Bizarre Program

Enterprise is further enhanced by the fact that the Bruckner formed the second half of a bizarre program. The Prokofiev Piano Concerto is essentially a monumental display piece, and if Lorin Hollander, the young soloist, possesses the digital dexterity capable of the needed blazing sweep, the music itself is uneven.

It demands an artist like Mr. Hollander who stresses massive percussive sonorities. While certain episodes such as the larghetto exhibit a pensive lyricism —which was also realized by the soloist—I'm afraid that for once I agree with Prokofiev's contemporary Russian critics who found the concerto an exercise in acrobatics.

Placing this at the head of a program has an unsettling psychological effect. The break after the toccata to admit latecomers in the audience, for instance, interrupts the score's continuity to a degree seldom encountered in a symphony where, between movements, a pause may be held. Furthermore Mr. Hollander's instrument sounded exceedingly harsh-voiced. The texture of the Fifth Concerto is astringent and our conception of pitch grows more brilliant with each passing decade; still in this instance the piano was tuned so brightly that at times it proved excruciating.

The Bruckner Seventh Symphony virtually erased any misgivings by all but obliterating the presence of the Prokofieev on the program. I note, looking back, that Rudolph Eliee called the last performance in this series, in 1958, "one of the most technically insecure the orchestra ever gave," but yesterday's was entirely the opposite.

The Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf conducting, presented the 13th program of its 83rd season yesterday in Symphony Hall. Lorin Hollander, piano, was the soloist. The program will be repeated tonight at 8:30.

Piano Concerto No. 5, in G major, Op. 55 ..... Prokofiev
Symphony No. 7, in E major .... Bruckner

Flowing Design

The technique of slowly evolving the complete theme is characteristic both of Bruckner's composition and Bruckner conducting. The Seventh indeed translates the various motifs into a fabric of almost pure tone; during the first nine measures there is not a single pause; the spacing of calm and climax illustrates a broadly flowing design.

Now, it is a mistake, I think, to view this symphony in terms of 19th century procedure, and this Mr. Leinsdorf avoided. His tempi were leisurely, his lines long and subtle. The classicist prboably sees in the work Bruckner's parlous ignorance of the codes of technique, and all too often it is offered as though it confermed to the sonata principles of Brahms. But it was one of the grandeurs of Mr. Leinsdorf's interpretation that he recognized the identity of Bruckner's form, the delicate evolutions of theme; and the symphony overall acquired a character of exalted meditation.

The ethereal and floating adagio stood in close relation to the resplendence of the orotund trumpets of the opening; the scherzo was powerful and melodic, and the finale seared into a realm beyond speech. Bruckner employs a huge orchestra in the Seventh, and it is necessary.

Terrace on terrace of tone soars upward like the counterpoint of cathedral architecture. Mr. Leinsdorf's cathedral-like spacing of the score held a vast and majestic drama in which the gigantic tutti vanished into the radiance of an otherworldly vision, and music turned akin to prayer. The clear articulation of the Seventh could be discerned, then it became evident that we were hearing more than logical phrasing, is fact, an inspired and overwhelming, a miraculous utterance, the Bruckner Seventh of a lifetime.

Next weekend finds Walter Piston's Symphony No. 4 and Haydn's Symphony No. 39, in G minor, on the program. Mr. Leinsdorf has also scheduled Tchaikovsky's Suite No. 3, in G.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 194,870
JAN 11 1964

At Symphony

A Vital Bruckner 7th From Erich Leinsdorf

By MARGO MILLER

It was Erich Leinsdorf's day Friday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The second half of the concert was devoted to Bruckner's Symphony No. 7 in E major. What the Boston Symphony conductor so often promises was entirely accomplished. We have come to know and respect, in Leinsdorf's two seasons here, musicianly performances whatever the work. On occasion, however, one has longed for the kind of extra-musical passion which elevates a competant reading to an emotional experience. Leinsdorf did not merely go along with Bruckner, he led.

Omitting discussion of the scherzo for the moment, the pattern of the other three movements were satisfying in one most important aspect. Each led the listener to expect something greater than had gone before. And expectations were not blunted.

The opening allegro is such a case. Leinsdorf sometimes loses this listener during the development sections. One should feel teased: fragments coming back in new guise, but one should not sense abandonment of the general line. Bruckner's excursions are grand, they tease grandly. But always Leinsdorf was pushing forward, surely building by lopping short one swell immediately to urge another.

The Boston Symphony responded mightily. There were the resonant cellos and violas, against shimmering violins, to introduce the Bruckner. In the adagio, wind choirs produced a remarkable organ sonority which flanked a middle section of buoyant string tone. Later on the brass sound was bright and in focus, the fortes vibrant rather than frenetic. The rhythmic persuasion of the scherzo was as pleasingly done as the melodic contour of the trio. The finale had breadth. And always present was the vital pulse.

The soloist of the afternoon was Lorin Hollander. His vehicle was the Fifth Prokofiev Piano Concerto.

Hollander has all the energy his 20 years imply. The way he addresses the percussive piano parts of the first three movements is exhuberance itself. His sounds are bold and, fortunately, they do not thud upon the ear. The fireworks are so much child's play for him. Indeed, he makes of this music a happy romp; wit it not yet within his ken. Nor does he quite succeed in the few lyric vistas the concerto offers. Few listeners, however, could deny Hollander's presence in the music. And some pianists might be better with his vitality.

Leinsdorf will conduct again next week. The Friday and Saturday concerts will begin with Haydn's Symphony No. 39, and continue with Walter Piston's Fourth Symphony and the Suite No. 3 in G major of Tchaikovsky.

78

SUNDAY 4. FRI.-SAT. 14.

Fourth Program

SUNDAY AFTERNOON, JANUARY 12, at 3:00 o'clock

STRAUSS ..... Orchestral Suite from "Der Bürger als Edelmann," based on Molière's Play, "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme"

Overture to Act I — Jourdain the Bourgeois
Minuet
The Fencing Master
Entrance and Dance of the Tailors
The Minuet of Lully
Courante
Entrance of Cleonte
Introduction to Act II (Intermezzo):
Dorantes and Dorimène — The Count and Countess
The Dinner (Music at Table and Dance of the Young Kitchen Servants)
(First performance in this series)

INTERMISSION

PROKOFIEV ..... Piano Concerto No. 5, in G major, Op. 55

I. Allegro con brio; Tempo meno mosso
II. Moderato ben accentuato
III. Toccata: allegro con fuoco
IV. Larghetto
V. Vivo; poco meno mosso; coda
(First performance in this series)

RIMSKY-KORSAKOV ..... Suite from "Le Coq d'Or"

I. King Dodon in his palace
II. King Dodon in the country
III. King Dodon with the Queen of Shemakha
IV. Wedding March and the lamentable end of King Dodon

SOLOIST
LORIN HOLLANDER
Mr. HOLLANDER plays the Baldwin Piano

A new plan for ticket reservations is announced on page 60.

BALDWIN PIANO RCA VICTOR RECORDS

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Herald
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 283,819
JAN 12 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Record-American (m) (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 531,565
JAN 11 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 465,653
JAN 12 1964

Boston Symphony's Concerts This Week

Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony, will conduct works by Haydn, Piston and Tchaikovsky at the orchestra's concerts Friday at 2 and Saturday at 8:30 p.m.

He will open the program with Haydn's Symphony No. 39, in G minor, which will be heard for the first time at these concerts. The program will continue with the Symphony No. 4 by Walter Piston, and after the intermission Leinsdorf will conduct Tchaikovsky's Suite No. 3, in G major.

Thursday evening at 7:30 the orchestra will hold its fourth Open Rehearsal, at which time the weekend program will receive its final preparations. The Open Rehearsals, which are given for the benefit of the orchestra's pension fund, have been sold out for the current season.

The orchestra will present its third concert of the season at the Veterans Memorial Auditorium in Providence on Tuesday evening. Leinsdorf will conduct the program.

Today at 3 p.m. Leinsdorf will conduct the fourth concert of the Sunday Afternoon Series. The program will consist of Richard Strauss' Suite from the German adaptation of "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme," the Prokofiev Piano Concerto No. 5 with Lorin Hollander as soloist, and Rimsky-Korsakov's Suite from "Le Coq d' Or," rather than the Prokofiev Concerto and the Bruckner Symphony No. 7 as announced last week.

Visitors to Symphony Hall will note the absence of a majority of the instruments normally on display in the Ancient Instrument Room. A selection of instruments from the Casadesus Collection, which was presented to the Boston Symphony Orchestra for permanent view in Symphony Hall, has been loaned for exhibition in New York at the IBM Gallery of Arts and Sciences at 16 East 57th Street. The instruments will be shown from January 13 through February 7.

Fourteenth Program

FRIDAY AFTERNOON, JANUARY 17, at 2:00 o'clock

SATURDAY EVENING, JANUARY 18, at 8:30 o'clock

HAYDN ..... Symphony No. 39, in G minor

I. Allegro assai
II. Andante
III. Menuetto
IV. Finale: Allegro molto
(First performance at these concerts)

PISTON ..... Symphony No. 4

I. Piacevole
II. Ballando
III. Contemplativo
IV. Energico

INTERMISSION

TCHAIKOVSKY ..... Suite No. 3, in G major

I. Elégie: Andante molto cantabile
II. Valse mélancolique: Allegro moderato
III. Scherzo: Presto
IV. Tema con variazioni: Andante con moto

These concerts will end about 3:45 o'clock on Friday Afternoon; 10:15 o'clock on Saturday Evening.

BALDWIN PIANO RCA VICTOR RECORDS

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Christian Science
Monitor (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 174,850
JAN 18 1964

Piston and his fourth

By Godfrey John

This week's Friday concert afforded further confirmation of the stature of Boston's Symphony Orchestra. It was also another tribute to the mastery of Walter Piston.

Enclosed on one side by the innate release of Haydn's 39th Symphony in G minor, and on the other by Tchaikovsky's catalytic Suite No. 3 in G major—Mr. Piston's Symphony No. 4 emerged with no degree of indecorous contrast to shape its own 20th-century metaphor.

He could not have wished for a better instrument: the orchestra bore his Fourth in all its serene assurance through the percussives, shifts, and glides to the broad color and bold emphases of his final Energico.

* * *

Speaking of his symphony in an interview given to this newspaper at the time of its first performance, the composer said: "I feel a greater sense of ease in the Fourth Symphony than I have ever felt before." In the arch and abandoned way in which his work drew upon the voices of the whole orchestra was felt both the freedom and command contained in his craftsmanship.

Everyone participated. His impassioned yet controlled search in orchestral sound was recognizable from the single, peeping shapes of his piccolo and triangle to the thrust and dives of the brass and percussion. At the same time an equally characteristic delicacy of phrasing was noticeable in his strings and woodwinds along the lyrical drift of his Contemplativo.

* * *

Here Erich Leinsdorf was at his best, allowing the latitude of Mr. Piston's music to expand into its full statement. Yet he seemed strangely diffident about exploring the orchestra's full capacity in the dissonant leaps and chordal shouts of the second and fourth movements.

Haydn's work was thoughtfully placed on the program as an appropriate foreshadowing of Mr. Piston's own combined impetus and neo-classical containment. But Mr. Leinsdorf was more inclined to accent the composer's characteristic restraint than this symphony's noteworthy departure in style. The Allegro assai never quite escaped from a certain pedestrianism, and the finale needed so much the release of fervor present in the "sturm und drang" of this uncharacteristic work.

78

SUNDAY 4. FRI.-SAT. 14.

Fourth Program

SUNDAY AFTERNOON, JANUARY 12, at 3:00 o'clock

STRAUSS ..... Orchestral Suite from "Der Bürger als Edelmann," based on Molière's Play, "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme"

Overture to Act I — Jourdain the Bourgeois
Minuet
The Fencing Master
Entrance and Dance of the Tailors
The Minuet of Lully
Courante
Entrance of Cleonte
Introduction to Act II (Intermezzo):
Dorantes and Dorimène — The Count and Countess
The Dinner (Music at Table and Dance of the Young Kitchen Servants)
(First performance in this series)

INTERMISSION

PROKOFIEV ..... Piano Concerto No. 5, in G major, Op. 55

I. Allegro con brio; Tempo meno mosso
II. Moderato ben accentuato
III. Toccata: allegro con fuoco
IV. Larghetto
V. Vivo; poco meno mosso; coda
(First performance in this series)

RIMSKY-KORSAKOV ..... Suite from "Le Coq d'Or"

I. King Dodon in his palace
II. King Dodon in the country
III. King Dodon with the Queen of Shemakha
IV. Wedding March and the lamentable end of King Dodon

SOLOIST
LORIN HOLLANDER
Mr. HOLLANDER plays the Baldwin Piano

A new plan for ticket reservations is announced on page 60.

BALDWIN PIANO RCA VICTOR RECORDS

EIGHTY-THIRD SEASON • NINETEEN HUNDRED SIXTY-THREE–SIXTY-FOUR

Fourteenth Program

FRIDAY AFTERNOON, JANUARY 17, at 2:00 o'clock

SATURDAY EVENING, JANUARY 18, at 8:30 o'clock

HAYDN ..... Symphony No. 39, in G minor

I. Allegro assai
II. Andante
III. Menuetto
IV. Finale: Allegro molto
(First performance at these concerts)

PISTON ..... Symphony No. 4

I. Piacevole
II. Ballando
III. Contemplativo
IV. Energico

INTERMISSION

TCHAIKOVSKY ..... Suite No. 3, in G major

I. Elégie: Andante molto cantabile
II. Valse mélancolique: Allegro moderato
III. Scherzo: Presto
IV. Tema con variazioni: Andante con moto

These concerts will end about 3:45 o'clock on Friday Afternoon; 10:15 o'clock on Saturday Evening.

BALDWIN PIANO RCA VICTOR RECORDS

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Herald
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 283,819
JAN 12 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 465,653
JAN 12 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Record-American (m) (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 531,565
JAN 11 1964

Boston Symphony's Concerts This Week

Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony, will conduct works by Haydn, Piston and Tchaikovsky at the orchestra's concerts Friday at 2 and Saturday at 8:30 p.m.

He will open the program with Haydn's Symphony No. 39, in G minor, which will be heard for the first time at these concerts. The program will continue with the Symphony No. 4 by Walter Piston, and after the intermission Leinsdorf will conduct Tchaikovsky's Suite No. 3, in G major.

Thursday evening at 7:30 the orchestra will hold its fourth Open Rehearsal, at which time the weekend program will receive its final preparations. The Open Rehearsals, which are given for the benefit of the orchestra's pension fund, have been sold out for the current season.

The orchestra will present its third concert of the season at the Veterans Memorial Auditorium in Providence on Tuesday evening. Leinsdorf will conduct the program.

Today at 3 p.m. Leinsdorf will conduct the fourth concert of the Sunday Afternoon Series. The program will consist of Richard Strauss' Suite from the German adaptation of "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme," the Prokofiev Piano Concerto No. 5 with Lorin Hollander as soloist, and Rimsky-Korsakov's Suite from "Le Coq d' Or," rather than the Prokofiev Concerto and the Bruckner Symphony No. 7 as announced last week.

Visitors to Symphony Hall will note the absence of a majority of the instruments normally on display in the Ancient Instrument Room. A selection of instruments from the Casadesus Collection, which was presented to the Boston Symphony Orchestra for permanent view in Symphony Hall, has been loaned for exhibition in New York at the IBM Gallery of Arts and Sciences at 16 East 57th Street. The instruments will be shown from January 13 through February 7.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Christian Science Monitor (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 174,850
JAN 18 1964

Piston and his fourth

By Godfrey John

This week's Friday concert afforded further confirmation of the stature of Boston's Symphony Orchestra. It was also another tribute to the mastery of Walter Piston.

Enclosed on one side by the innate release of Haydn's 39th Symphony in G minor, and on the other by Tchaikovsky's catalytic Suite No. 3 in G major—Mr. Piston's Symphony No. 4 emerged with no degree of indecorous contrast to shape its own 20th-century metaphor.

He could not have wished for a better instrument: the orchestra bore his Fourth in all its serene assurance through the percussives, shifts, and glides to the broad color and bold emphases of his final Energico.

Speaking of his symphony in an interview given to this newspaper at the time of its first performance, the composer said: "I feel a greater sense of ease in the Fourth Symphony than I have ever felt before." In the arch and abandoned way in which his work drew upon the voices of the whole orchestra was felt both the freedom and command contained in his craftsmanship.

Everyone participated. His impassioned yet controlled search in orchestral sound was recognizable from the single, peeping shapes of his thrust and dives of the brass and percussion. At the same time an equally characteristic delicacy of phrasing was noticeable in his strings and woodwinds along the lyrical drift of his Contemplativo.

Here Erich Leinsdorf was at his best, allowing the latitude of Mr. Piston's music to expand into its full statement. Yet he seemed strangely diffident about exploring the orchestra's full capacity in the dissonant leaps and chordal shouts of the second and fourth movements.

Haydn's work was thoughtfully placed on the program as an appropriate foreshadowing of Mr. Piston's own combined impetus and neo-classical containment. But Mr. Leinsdorf was more inclined to accent the composer's characteristic restraint than this symphony's noteworthy departure in style. The Allegro assai never quite escaped from a certain pedestrianism, and the finale needed so much the release of fervor present in the "sturm und drang" of

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Herald (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 178,553

JAN 18 1964

Music

Piston Composition Is a Major Work

By ROBERT TAYLOR

In their clarity, sturdy workmanship and fine-grained understatement, the scores of Walter Piston represent the integrity of well-made things. The quiet eloquence of his Symphony No. 4 yesterday spoke more forcefully than either the minor Haydn or Tchaikovsky of the Boston Symphony's weekend program.

Mr. Leinsdorf had the notion of reviving Haydn's Symphony No. 39, the first bearing a minor key among the master's prodigious output, and a premiere in the Friday-Saturday series. Opposite was another novelty, the G. Major Suite No. 3 of Tchaikowsky which has not been heard complete (the final movement), Theme with Variations, is frequently presented as a unit) since Max Fiedler did it in 1910.

With Cause

The idea is praiseworthy enough, and hearing these two works is fairly rewarding—once. Alas, there is usually a reason for the neglect of obscure compositions.

No doubt the historical significance of Haydn's Symphony No. 39 warrants attention, marking, as it does, his so-called 'Storm and Stress' period. Intrinsically, however, the music is relatively undistinguished, polite, purling and employing simple early sonata form to present a fluent yet restricted statement.

To an 18th century listener it must have sounded stormy; but our conceptions of storm have been considerably altered since Beethoven, and indeed, since the later Haydn.

Moreover, there seem to me many Haydn scores more pertinent both as history and as art, for he is his own competitor in the scope of his genius, that prolific array of masterpieces overshadowing each other. The Symphony No. 31, with the horn signal, hasn't been done often, nor 82, 'The Bear,' nor 85, 'La Reine de France,' nor 73, 'La Chasse,' to take a few at random, and, if memory serves No. 39 can be characterized as genial and innocuous.

Lush Line

Similarly, the Tchaikowsky Suite has its felicities, but these lie chiefly within the final movement; the elegy, valse melancolique and scherzo reveal the composer's sentimental and lush line and mannerisms embarrassingly. Omitting the fifth variation, Mr. Leinsdorf offered the Suite with a tempered sense of its contrasts and flow. He did not accentuate subjective drama and his classical approach gently disclosed the melodic contours.

One, fortunately, did not have to reach for one's handkerchief; all the same, though, the Third Suite's emotional rhetoric has more in common with accompaniment to a silent film than it does to the threnodies of a discerning romanticism. Only at the end, in the technical ordering of the variations, does Tchaikowsky control himself, lapsing into the bombast of the ultimate polonaise.

Between, however, came the Piston, a score of idyllic and fastidious construction. Easily assimilated, the architecture of the four sections is admirably conceived, the music based on tone and the influence of key centers.

Superb Blend

The composer does not have to resort to bizarre orchestration for his effects. His melodic themes and interplay between various emotional contrasts—for example, the rondo with its evocation of the American dance, the waltz, the country reel—discloses a superbly blended coloration and vigor that captures the listener by the mellowness and wisdom of an individual spirit.

Many a younger composer might dismiss such writing as too conservative, but it is actually more avant-garde than the latest electronic vibration. Mr. Piston dares to be himself.

Mr. Leinsdorf's talent for poise, proportion and point made The Symphony No. 4 sound like the major study it is, and the composer was on hand a slightly stooped, gray and benign figure, to accept the deserved plaudits of the audience.

Next week the orchestra goes on tour, and returns Jan. 31-Feb. 1, with Charles Munch as guest conductor and the American premiere of Leonard Bernstein's Symphony No. 3, (Kaddish). Handel's Concerto Grosso, Op. 6, No. 4, and Bizet's Symphony in C are also scheduled.

The Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf conducting presented the 14th program of the 83rd season yesterday in Symphony Hall. The program will be repeated tonight at 8:30.

Symphony No. 39, in G minor Haydn
Symphony No. 4. Piston
Suite No. 3, in G Major. Tchaikovsky

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 194,870

JAN 18 1964

At Symphony

In Honoring Piston, Leinsdorf Instructs

By MARGO MILLER

Walter Piston, 70 on Monday, is this country's foremost symphonist. He is one of the few composers who make the broad statements necessary to the form and see them through to the final note, "His" orchestra, the Boston Symphony, honored him Friday afternoon, the audience applauded mightily as he came out, blue-suited, bowtied, to take his bows and thank the players.

A Harvard professor until 1960, Piston discovered he could teach and compose at the same time. Most of the major orchestra have one of his symphonies among their commissions. Serge Koussevitzky gave the premiere performance to the First, and commissioned the Third, which won Piston a Pulitzer Prize, as did his Seventh for the Philadelphia Orchestra. Charles Munch's Piston was the Sixth. Erich Leinsdorf turned to the Fourth, which began its concert life in Minneapolis under Anatol Dorati's direction.

The Fourth is an agreeable work, one probably as instructive to budding symphonists for its craft as it is pleasing to hear. Piston gives ear to broad, tonal melodic statements throughout the four movements. The orchestral instruments move smoothly in their lines. The massed sounds are temperate, individual colors are as idiomatic accents.

White the hoedown in the dance movement may have titillated Minneapolis, it never strays into the corn belt. One thinks more characteristic language Piston's sure involvement of the third movement strings, as they enter in the cellos, surge upward through the first violins, and work in concentration.

Leinsdorf composed an instructive program to frame the Piston. Orchestras with commission money are to contemporary writers what the princes and prelates were to earlier composers. Haydn, represented by his Symphony No. 39, was such a case, writing for Eisenstadt performance. Piston has been called a Neo-Classicist; Haydn was of course in the main stream of the Classic.

Nothing could be more balanced than a work like No. 39. It has a limpid andante, a round minuet, highly artificial storm music for the finale, in which the violins rush around but curtsy at all the cadences, as though the whole had been staged by the Comedie Francaise. And the first movement is brilliant in the use of whole-bar rests which seem to thunder in their very silence. Leinsdorf, facing his violins, molded the whole in great style, applying elegance touches with a fine hand. His chamber-sized orchestra, with harpsichord continuo, responded in like manner.

Following the Piston was Tchaikovsky's Suite No. 3 in G major. The Haydn, incidently, was in G minor and that composer's first excursion into a minor mode for a symphony. It would be as misplaced to find the somber in the Haydn as it would in the opening passages of the Tchaikovsky (marked Elegie). But shortly, the Tchaikovsky lays on that orchestral impasto which, in resonance and melody, indentifies the composer so strongly with the Romantic.

Being an orchestral suite, the material is distributed around the band, here urging on cellos, there trouping massed winds, or lingering over an English horn song (more extended than Piston's) or sending the concertmaster into violin cadenzas, or ruffling a drum under dry, soft trumpets, or simply gathering everything together in glorious sound.

The Tchaikovsky, as had everything else on the program, called for a virtuosic orchestra, and the Boston Symphony and its conductor were matched to the music.

Next week Leinsdorf takes the orchestra on tour. The concerts of Jan. 31-Feb. 1, bring Charles Munch as guest conductor in the American premiere of Leonard Bernstein's Symphony No. 3, "Kaddish." The program will open with Handel's Concerto Grosso for Strings, Op. 6, No. 4, and the Bizet Symphony in C major.

80

PROVIDENCE 3

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Journal (m)
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
Circ. 61,299

JAN 15 1964

Music Last Night

Silverstein Is Featured With Boston Symphony

By RUTH TRIPP

The Boston Symphony Orchestra played the third concert of its Providence series last evening at Veterans Memorial Auditorium. Erich Leinsdorf conducted.

Featured as violin soloist in the Bartok Concerto No. 2 was Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster of the orchestra.

The program also included Schubert's Symphony No. 3 in D and the Suite from Rimsky-Korsakov's "Le Coq d'Or."

The Bartok Concerto is a work which seems much more grateful to the ear than his string quartets. There is much to commend in the skill of the writing. Bartok was blessed with an ear which heard much more in a single tone than the average listener. He set themes against themes with extraordinarily striking effects. At times he subtracted almost all of the orchestra from the solo instrument to make a delicate contrast. His use of the tympani with a theme of two notes is a case in point. It was very effective.

Joseph Silverstein played with complete assurance and his tone quality was beautiful. His technique was always equal to his difficult assignment and his fellow musicians gave him a high degree of musical collaboration. The audience was enthusiastic about the performance and recalled the soloist several times.

The "Coq d'Or" Suite provided plenty of orchestral color and excitement. It is not great music, yet its familiar themes and obvious orchestral effects were given such a skillful presentation that it almost seemed like great music.

The gem of the evening was the Schubert Symphony. Erich Leinsdorf used a smaller orchestra for this work and played it with such grace and refinement that its texture was almost fragile.

We heard unusually beautiful playing from the reed section. The rhythmic structure was absolute perfection and I, for one, was grateful for every set of the Schubert repeat dots. Control of dynamics and simplicity of style made this playing a memorable performance.

Dr. Leinsdorf is always generous in sharing the applause with the musicians and last evening he singled out almost every player of a bit part. The musicians played exceptionally well and once more the Boston Symphony Orchestra has given the music lovers of Providence an evening to remember.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Times (e)
PAWTUCKET-
CENTRAL FALLS, R. I.
Circ. 38,168

JAN 15 1964

Music In Review

Concert Rewards Patrons Who Braved Cold Night

Those who endured the zero temperature, and there were many who did, were rewarded by another superior concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Joseph Silverstein, violin soloist, Tuesday evening in Veterans Memorial Auditorium, Providence.

Erich Leinsdorf with his active, and often contorted but always understandable directing, brought out, as usual, the best in his musicians and expressed every nuance of the composer eloquently. A new format of seating the orchestra was noticeable — the cellos were down stage right, and the violas were center stage right.

But this changed in no way the exquisite sound of the orchestra in Schubert's "Symphony No. 3 in D-Major" which opened the program. The first movement began with adagio maestoso then climbed to a sparkling and dancing allegro con brio. The allegretto, second movement, was a gentle and merry children's playtime rhythm, while the following menuetto was more spritely than courtly. It led into the racing, laughing, tantalizing finale, presto: vivace.

Then there was a glorious performance of Rimsky-Korsakov's "Le Coq d'Or" excerpts, the music that described King Dodon in the palace (more glitter than elegance) in the country (more rustic than pastoral), with the Queen of Shemakha (more buffoonery than romance) and the exciting and glamorous wedding march and the lamentable end of King Dodon. The opera, of course, is a lampooning of monarchy and the satire was beautifully expressed.

Joseph Silverstein is principal first violinist and concertmaster of the orchestra, and his virtuosity is unquestionable. But why musicians take such pains to adjust the pitch to play Bartok puzzles me, when most of his compositions sound as though each instrument plays out of tune. The opening movement of Bartok's "Concerto No. 2 for Violin and Orchestra" (and the title doesn't name the key) didn't make sense and the accompaniment was senseless noise. It certainly added no beauty to the world, and the only thing admirable about it was Silverstein's amazing ability to memorize such an irritating assortment of squeaks, scrapes, drawls, moans and howls, and his faultless artistry to play it so well.

The second movement, andante tranquillo, was melodious and soothing, but even Yankee Doodle would be a tranquilizer after that first movement. The final movement was much like the first — a musical jigsaw puzzle that is still a puzzle when you put it together;—some of it just plain whining and much of it just Old Country fiddlin'. But it proved that Joseph Silverstein is a first rate artist, and the Boston Symphony can play bad music well.

C.H.L.

TOUR #3

HARTFORD

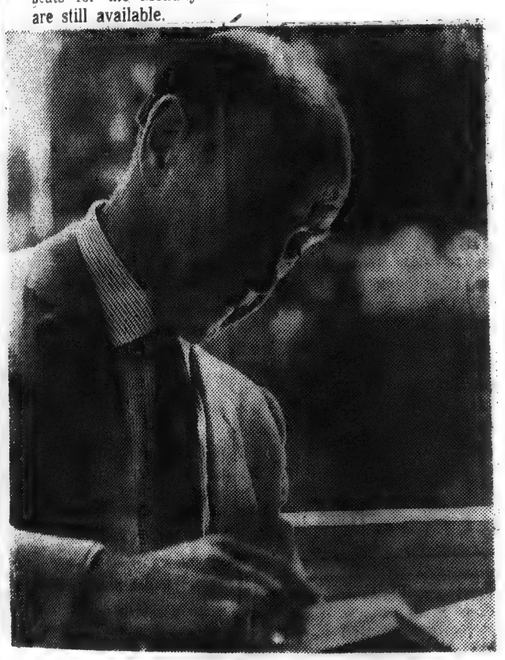
New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Sunday Courant
HARTFORD, Conn.
Circ. 151,020

Erich Leinsdorf has selected an unusual program for a concert at 8:15 p.m. Monday by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. New England's foremost musical organization will be presented on the Bushnell stage in its sole Hartford concert this season.

Two major works make up the Leinsdorf concert, both of them played on only a few occasions in this area in the past score of years. The concert will open with four movements from Richard Strauss' orchestral suite written as incidental music to "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme."

The second part of the program is the hour-long Seventh Symphony of Anton Bruckner. Both of these works are being introduced by the Boston Symphony in its home concerts this season. A limited number of seats for the Monday concert are still available.



ERICH LEINSDORF

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Courant (m)
HARTFORD, Conn.
Circ. 119,274

JAN 20 1964

Boston Symphony Plays Here Tonight

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf conducting, will be presented in a Bushnell Symphony Series concert today at 8:15 p.m. at Bushnell Memorial.

Leinsdorf has elected to perform four movements from the orchestral suite of Richard Strauss' "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme" and Bruckner's Seventh Symphony.

Tonight's concert is the Boston Symphony's only performance in Hartford this season. Some tickets are available at the box office, opening at 10 a.m.

Courant (m)
HARTFORD, Conn.
Circ. 119,274
JAN 21 1964

Leinsdorf, Symphony At Bushnell

The Boston Symphony, conducted by Erich Leinsdorf, was presented in the Bushnell Symphony Series at the Memorial auditorium, Monday night. The program.

Suite, "Der Burger als Edelmann". R. Strauss
Seventh Symphony Bruckner

At 8:15 last evening the lookout in the crow's nest still had not sighted Ararat. But for all that, a brave band of music-lovers had made their way through the deluge and the Bushnell Memorial was as crowded as the Ark for Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony.

Everyone who likes Richard Strauss and/or Anton Bruckner was well rewarded for having ventured out. I personally find Strauss extremely depressing when he is being comic, and all that was coy and precocious in the Suite from "Der Burger als Edelmann" was as wasted on me as when old Till Eulenspiegel is capering about. Nor could I feel that on this occasion Mr. Leinsdorf and the orchestra were exactly being caried away by the score and antics to hand. All except the concertmaster pro tem, that is, who played the numerous violin solos with great gusto and conviction. Otherwise, the real humor of the moment was the bemused way in which Mr. Leinsdorf picked out one player after the other for special bows, making up his mind whom to choose with the care of a beldame sampling a new box of chocolates.

Visions and Glories

But the Bruckner Seventh Symphony was all compact of visions and glories. Mr. Leinsdorf in reading it easily matched the heroic dimensions and apocalyptic moods that assailed the composer in writing it. It was big, big, big all the way—perhaps at the climactic moments even a little too big to assimilate comfortably by ear or heart. Religious sentiments and presentiments are somewhat awkard when presented in the giant, economy size.

Not that Bruckner or Mr. Leinsdorf practised any great economy. The composer set himself a mammoth task in attempting to pump up a baically Shubertian tradition into a Wagnerian mould. Yet it was Mr. Leinsdorf's triumph that he was able to take the fundamental musical ideas and emotions of the Seventh Symphony across the four movements without ever losing them in the maze of massive ornament that the composer felt necessary for his great structures. Everything in the reading was absolutely lucid, yet the embellishments were never slighted.

I think the wonderful focus into which Mr. Leinsdorf drew the Seventh Symphony last night was primarily musico-architectural, sometimes at the expense of the work's deeper, mystical aspirations. But as a huge Baroque structure, it was nevertheless thoroughly impressive as Mr. Leinsdorf recreated it — a kind of sight to hear, as it were, if not to behold.

Flamboyant Performance

The fabled virtuosity of the Boston Symphony appeared in every bar of the performance. It was not completely impeccable playing but it was brilliant to the point of a burly flamboyance. The sound flung out through the auditorium like the Last Trump, creating its own kind of emotion whether it was exactly what Bruckner had in mind or not. Actually, it probably was. In Bruckner, this is sometimes just a little unfortunate.

—T.H.P.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Times (e)
HARTFORD, Conn.
Circ. 126,360

JAN 21 1964

Leinsdorf Conducts Boston In Bushnell Symphony Series

By GEORGE W. STOWE

Richard Strauss and Bruckner provided a stunning tour de force for the Boston Symphony under Erich Leinsdorf in its annual visit to the Bushnell last night.

If the program seemed rather heavily Teutonic, it was nevertheless invigorating because of its unhackneyed nature and because of the highly burnished performance that Leinsdorf drew from his players. Under its new conductor this orchestra has recaptured much of the technical polish that it displayed under Koussevitsky.

* * *

STRAUSS' Suite from "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme" has none of the grandiose pomposity or rich-textured orchestration of his more celebrated tone poems. It has an old-world elegance, a rococo atmosphere that will recall "Der Rosenkavalier." And it was in this spirit that it was set forth last night.

Perhaps in deference to the heavy downpour that delayed some of the audience Mr. Leinsdorf chose to perform only four numbers from the suite — including the so-called "Table Music" that included quotations from Wagner's "Rheingold" and his own "Don Quixote."

* * *

THE FIRST DESK men of the Boston orchestra were in prime form for this delectable music, giving a chamber music clarity to the orchestral texture. And Joseph Silverstein, the concertmaster, brought a caressing tone and technical solidity to his solos.

If Bruckner has not attracted the solid core of admirers than Mahler has, it is amazing how much more often he is heard these days. Fifteen years ago he would not have been heard in a Bushnell program, at least not from our visiting orchestras.

* * *

THE SEVENTH Symphony, the work that made the composer famous, is an attentuated study in the symphonic form but it has a Schubertian wealth of melody, which is its redeeming feature. However, it is over an hour long, long enough for some concertgoers to peer at their watches apprehensively from time to time.

Last night Mr. Leinsdorf kept everything under tight rein but I missed the poignance of Bruno Walter in the Adagio and the impact of Otto Klemperer in the long opening movement. The Adagio, which uses the "Wagnerian" tubas so prominently, is the cornerstone and artistic culmination of this symphony and it was heard to good advantage last night but it was not unforgettable.

* * *

MR. LEINSDORF achieved his most telling effects in the Scherzo and Finale, where he allowed the momentum of the music to build each movement to a sonorous and ringing climax. This, then, was the highlight of the evening.

Despite the precipitation outside, the Bushnell was filled to capacity for this third concert in the visiting orchestra series.

82 NEW HAVEN 2

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Journal-Courier (m)
NEW HAVEN, Conn.
Circ. 28,971
JAN 21 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Register (e)
NEW HAVEN, Conn.
Circ. 97,672

Leinsdorf To Lead Boston Symphony At Concert Tonight

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its second appearance of the season here tonight in Woolsey Hall as the fifth offering of the current Woolsey Hall Series under the auspices of the Yale School of Music.

The 104-piece symphonic ensemble will be under the direction of Erich Leinsdorf.

The opening work will be Haydn's Symphony No. 39 in G minor, which will be followed by Bartok's Concerto No. 2 for Violin and Orchestra. The last half of the program will be given over to Strauss' "Don Quixote," so-called Fantastic Variations on a Theme of Knightly Character, Op. 35.

The Bartok selection will have as soloist, Joseph Silverstein, the Boston Symphony's new concert master, who succeeded Richard Burgin at the start of this season. In the Strauss composition the leading artists will be Samuel Mayes, violoncello, and Joseph de Pasquale, viola.

Only two more concerts of the regular Woolsey Hall Series remain—Rudolf Serkin, pianist, on Feb. 25, and Roberta Peters, Metropolitan Opera soprano, on April 7. There will be one additional concert on the season's schedule, however, this being the famed Cleveland Orchestra under the baton of George Szell, on Tuesday, Feb. 4, for which tickets are still available.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Sunday Register
NEW HAVEN, Conn.
Circ. 105,605

JAN 26 1964

To the Editor of The Register:

I noted with some amusement your music critic's protests (Jan. 22), at having missed one of the major cultural events of the year —the appearance in New Haven of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

It would seem that he thought he could arrive late, after the program had begun, and subsequently fool his readers and his editors into believing he had been present for, and was reporting on, the entire performance.

Poor man, he got caught.

BARBARA GRAHAM

New Haven

NEW YORK.

83

Journal American
N.Y.
JAN 23 1964

AT PHILHARMONIC HALL

Rich Work by Bostonians

By MILES KASTENDIECK

SUCH A PROGRAM as Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony offered should have satisfied everybody in crowded Philharmonic Hall last night.

With Haydn the classicist, Bartok the modernist, and Tchaikovsky the romanticist, what more could one ask in differentiation or variety? And with the Bostonians in top form, all one needed to do was luxuriate in their performance.

Once again Mr. Leinsdorf has shown himself a shrewd program builder. Haydn's Symphony No. 39 had novelty about it because it is quite different from more noted ones and quite worth hearing. Bartok's Violin Concerto No. 2 has yet to become a familiar item in the repertory.

Tchaikovsky's Suite No. 3 complete does not turn up too frequently although its last movement has served the ballet well for years, and it is a wondrous work.

★

THE CLASSICIST in Mr. Leinsdorf made Haydn all the more refreshing. Between the reduced orchestra (2 doubles basses) and his meticulous guidance, the work emerged beautifully groomed.

In his businesslike way, he missed capitalizing on the storm element in the finale, but then he has yet to grow in showmanship.

However uneven the Bartok, it has much to offer. While it may not sustain interest throughout, the orchestration has its share of new sounds, the music its novel quirks, and the themes an invitating character.

As soloist, Joseph Silverstein mounted its difficulties fearlessly and acquitted himself admirably.

His tone may be too sweet in general and too small to impart the bite and the brilliance of the work, but he presented the music knowingly, deserving the appreciative applause he received.

★

AFTER THE LEAN Bartok, the Tchaikovsky sounded quite lush. Citations go to Mozart and Schubert as the greatest writers of melody, but Tchaikovsky qualifies as no mean third.

This suite supplies plenty of evidence, to say nothing of the theme that sets off the lovely variations at the end.

Just to let the Boston Symphony play this piece will do it justice. Mr. Leinsdorf guided them with scrupulous care.

Though his body movements indicated that he felt the waltz rhythm and caught the brightness of the scherzo, more lilt to the former and more truly good spirits in the latter would make the music radiate still more. There was a literal rather than an emotional intensity to his direction.

Tchaikovsky, however, took over in the end with the orchestra collaborating to secure the composer's reputation for some time to come whatever the direction music takes.

New York World-Telegram and The Sun
D. 463,241 SAT. 175,139
JAN 23 1964

Music

Leinsdorf Brings Off A Brilliant Evening

By LOUIS BIANCOLLI

Three composers as different from one another as red, white and blue were given brilliant consideration by Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony at Philharmonic Hall last night.

Louis Biancolli

For, whatever their differences, Haydn, Tchaikovsky, and Bartok shared that borrowed kinship of opulent tone, faultless technic and stylistic grasp that only a great conductor and orchestra can give them.

It was, in fact, an evening of exceptional virtuosity — the conductor's, the orchestra's and the concertmaster's.

Last night's concert gave Joseph Silverstein the spotlight as solo violinist. And he used it superbly—both in his big assignment, Bartok's violin concerto, and in Tchaikovsky's G major suite. At all times silken tone and breathtaking ease were at his command.

The Bartok score would have defeated a lesser technician and artist. It is fiendish in its demands and uneven in its merits. Which made it all the more challenging to Silverstein.

In the beauty and skill of his playing one forgot how difficult this music is and very nearly forgot how unsatisfactory it is as a concerto. Effective, corruscating, flashing sparks of magic, but strangely prolix.

* * *

Silverstein, however, gloried in every moment of it, as he did in those solo passages of the Tchaikovsky Suite where the Russian master writes music for strings that sing like voices.

As for Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony, they never seemed so predestined for one another as they did last night, whether in the Tchaikovsky and Bartok music, or in Haydn's G minor symphony.

That was quite a little miracle last night, both the music and the playing. Seldom played, composed before Mozart darted across the sky, this early symphony in many ways prefigures the entire romantic movement.

* * *

Its strength is in its rhythmic and emotional impetus. It sweeps forward in a headlong surge of feeling, brushing aside rigid and courtly fetishes. It almost lands on Beethoven's desk.

That old tag "Papa Haydn" for this master innovator gives us quite a laugh these days. But how it stuck! This is Haydn's first symphony in a minor key, and it is a major landmark.

The performance was matchless, both on the surface, where all was supreme polish and momentum, and within, where all was that secret power of music that is without parallel and without explanation.

New York Post
D. 555,557

Words and Music

By Harriett Johnson

Silverstein Plays Bartok Concerto

In an era of whirlwind upheaval and fast travel, music rides along on the ionosphere band wagon. As late as 1958, critics considered the Bela Bartok Concerto No. 2 for Violin and Orchestra, difficult listening. One of my colleagues, for instance, wrote: "If the concerto poses problems for the listener not used to it, it is a back-breaker for the soloist."

In six years, however, ear- attitudes have changed radically for many a concert-goer. With Boston Symphony concertmaster Joseph Silverstein as soloist in the fascinating 40-minute work last night at Lincoln Center, the concerto's difficulties remained on paper, but Silverstein made light of them. And the composition's Hungarian gypsy character sounded outright romantic in comparison with the avalanche of local hardtack premieres we have had since Philharmonic Hall opened in the fall of 1962.

Music director Erich Leinsdorf conducted the Bostonians in the long work which Silverstein played from memory with a silken tone, a bow arm that accepted all the challenges with pleasure and profit, and with finger-wizardry in the fiendishly difficult cadenza during the initial movement.

Though he is not a dynamic personality—that is, he doesn't project himself across to the audience as the usual concert virtuoso does—Silverstein performed with overall impressive command of his resources and re-created the concerto's free-wheeling form with conviction and a virile expressiveness.

Is Work of Genius

As heard last night, the concerto skyrockets in creative stature as a work of genius by comparison with skilled techniques and with little to communicate.

Many scores we have heard recently are in the jerky-start-and-stop class. They ping-pong their way with crash, collision and even artistic crime as the performer shoots his musical gun, then runs; or becomes the hit-and-run driver who plows through the crush, seeming oblivious of what goes on along the circuit.

Bartok, on the other hand, may be wild, cacophonous, lyrically abandoned, bristling with dissonance, but always there is an inevitability, original and answerable to its own laws, though it may be. Bartok became a master at composing music in which the give and take between tension and relaxation amalgamated into great art. And at the base, was a consummate craftsmanship which expanded and deepened at is core, as long as he lived. He completed this violin concerto in 1938, seven years before he died at the age of 64.

Last night's event was the first of four concerts the Bostonians will present here this week, in anhattan and Brooklyn, all with Leinsdorf conducting. The virtuosity and velvet of the orchestra was exciting, both in the opening Haydn Symphony in G inor, No. 39, and in the melancholy, nostalgic and brilliance which exchanged to produce beauty in the Suite No. 3 in G Major, O. 55 by Tchaikovsky. Silverstein also shone in his solo in the waltz during the closing movement which is a Tema con variazioni: Andante con

84

The New York Times
D. 681,612 S. 1,304,447

JAN 23 1964

Music: Boston Symphony

Whitestone

Erich Leinsdorf, left, conferring with Joseph Silverstein

Leinsdorf Conducts at Philharmonic Hall

By HAROLD C. SCHONBERG

LAST night's Boston Symphony program, arranged and conducted by Erich Leinsdorf in Philharmonic Hall, contained the music of three well-known composers. But for once the well-known composers were represented by music that demonstrated their ability in ways the public does not often get a chance to test. Instead of one of Haydn's "London" Symphonies, we got No. 39 in G minor. Instead of Bartók's Concerto for Orchestra, there was the Violin Concerto No. 2. And instead of Tchaikovsky's "Pathétique," the Third Orchestral Suite was performed.

Of special interest in this absorbing program was the Tchaikovsky suite. It is a four-movement work that is as long as a symphony. When was it last played by a local orchestra? The only movement that is relatively well-known is the finale, a long and brilliant theme and variations. Some years back, George Balanchine choreographed this movement for Ballet Theatre, giving his work the title of the movement—"Theme and Variations."

●

Balletic as the last movement is, the three other movements of the G major Suite are equally so (the second, indeed, is a waltz). It is a lovely work, full of melodies in the best Tchaikovsky vein, gorgeously orchestrated, harmonically inventive. Top-notch Tchaikovsky, in fact; and the score should be heard much more often than has been its fate. The same applies to the two other Tchaikovsky suites, especially No. 1, a real beauty.

Mr. Leinsdorf for some reason omitted the fifth variation of the last movement; otherwise the suite was played complete. It received a sharp, clear performance, but this really is not Mr. Leinsdorf's kind of music. He does not feel it. The Waltz was heavy and ungraceful, and the last movement merely noisy despite the clarity. For this music a conductor needs nuance, flexibility, color; he should use a good deal of rubato and give his orchestra its head when necessary. Instead Mr. Leinsdorf tried for control and ended up achieving mostly a metronomic beat and a tightness of rhythm.

The other music was more in Mr. Leinsdorf's emotional reference. Haydn's G minor Symphony is a masterpiece that almost never turns up—not because of any lack of musical worth but because of the reluctance of most conductors to investigate any but a handful of Haydn's 104 symphonies. Mr. Leinsdorf, of course, has many times in the past shown that he is a musician of intellectual curiosity. By bringing in this kind of score, he is doing more for music than any number of repetitions of No. 88 or No. 94.

●

He conducted it with style: reduced orchestra, of course, a good deal of rhythmic thrust and a careful molding of phrase. Nor did he let the passion of this passionate little symphony become romanticized. All of Haydn's strength was there, in Mr. Leinsdorf's reading, and it was a strength undiluted by conductorial mannerism or stylistic misapprehension.

Bartók's Second Violin Concerto is a late work, dating from 1938. Like most of this composer's music, it is difficult to play, and the solo part bristles with near-impossibilities. But what a beautiful score! There was a time when it was judged dissonant, incomprehensible, ungrateful. But those were in pre-serial days—or, rather, the days before serial music became popular. Today the Bartók concerto sounds tonal, almost conservative; and its nationalistic elements stand out in sharp relief, where previously they had a tendency to be hidden.

●

Joseph Silverstein, the concertmaster of the Boston Symphony, was the soloist. Needless to say, he gave the concerto a musicianly, lyrical reading. He has a very suave tone: not a big one, but one of unusual sweetness and what singers would call "placement." He also was enough of a technician to meet the bow and finger work head on. After intermission he returned to his regular chair to play the solos in the Tchaikovsky suite. The playing here was equally beautiful, and it sounded especially so in light of what has happened in the past when ballet orchestras have given the work. Many of us could really say that we heard the solos for the first time last night.

The Program

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Erich Leinsdorf, conductor; Joseph Silverstein, violinist At Philharmonic Hall.

Symphony No. 39 in G minor ..... Haydn
Violin Concerto No. 2 ..... Bartok
Suite No. 3 in G ..... Tchaikovsky

Herald Tribune
D. 355,898 S. 451,270

JAN 24 1964

Erich Leinsdorf, conductor.

Leinsdorf With The Bostonians: Luminous Deeds

PHILHARMONIC HALL
Lincoln Center

Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Erich Leinsdorf. Soloist: Joseph Silverstein, violinist. The program:

Symphony No. 39.....Haydn
Violin Concerto No. 2.....Bartok
Suite No. 3.....Tchaikovsky

By Alan Rich

When a great conductor leads a superb orchestra through an imaginative program, there's still plenty of life in the institution of the symphony concert. That was the topic of Erich Leinsdorf's sermon with the Boston Symphony at Philharmonic Hall Wednesday night, and he preached it beautifully.

Haydn, Bartok and Tchaikovsky. There's nothing very special about that, as programs go. But look again. The Haydn and Tchaikovsky on this occasion were pieces well outside the common run, and Bartok's Violin Concerto isn't exactly overplayed, either. That's where the imagination comes in: casting new light on old friends.

Haydn's 39th Symphony is a top-drawer example of the composer's youthful experimentation. It is a work of passion and surprise, of extraordinary inventiveness applied to the ordinary materials of the composer's day. Just the insertion of a sudden bar of silence to interrupt the initial statement of the first theme is a stroke of genius. Just the idea of overlapping phrases in the minuet to give a rhythmic irregularity within a straightforward context is what separates a master like Haydn from the thousand scribblers contemporary to him.

Leinsdorf is a superb Haydn conductor, and he has been reviving just this kind of rarely heard music up in Boston and at Tanglewood. His performance of this symphony was beautifully proportioned and full of robust energy. He reduced the size of the string section and restored the harpsichord to its rightful place in the ensemble. His conception of the work was a triumph of incandescent musicianship. Let's hope his Haydn project continues forever; there is much to be done.

Bartok's Violin Concerto is a strange work. Much of it is extremely fine, but not all. The outer movements ramble; the first, especially, starts chasing its tail somewhere around the middle. But the beginning is seraphic, and so is the slow movement. The orchestral scoring is somewhat incredible.

The work was beautifully played. Joseph Silverstein, the orchestra's concertmaster, did not project the solo line with quite the power and the bedazzlement that others have done. But he did something else that was even more interesting. He brought the solo part closer to the surrounding orchestration, and gave the work somewhat more unity than it sometimes has had. One heard the piece as a whole. Mr. Silverstein's playing was flawless in its understated way, and the sounds made by the orchestra were magnificent.

Tchaikovsky's Third Suite is not one of the composer's strongest works, but it has moments of great beauty. The subsidiary section of the first movement may wear its heart on its sleeve, but it is lovely music nevertheless. The scherzo is delightful: it sound at times as if it ought to be played by an orchestra of toys. Actually, the most familiar section, the final set of variations, which is sometimes played by itself, is the weakest of the four sections. It goes on and on.

But a revival of a lesser work by a major composer is illuminating. This year we have had two such illuminations cast on Tchaikovsky, the "Manfred" and now the suite. One needn't be afraid to think at a concert. Mr. Leinsdorf and his orchestra are masters of illumination.

FEB. 1964
MUSICAL AMERICA

Boston Symphony

For the first of the January brace of Boston Symphony concerts at Philharmonic Hall, Erich Leinsdorf presented on the 22nd Haydn's Symphony No. 39, the Bartok Second Violin Concerto (with concertmaster Joseph Silverstein as soloist) and the Tchaikovsky Third Suite. For me, the standout was the Tchaikovsky. This breezy piece is rarely heard and isn't even available complete on records (I wish Leinsdorf would exhume the charming Fourth "Mozartiana" Suite also; the third and fourth suites would also make a beautiful disc.) The Boston Symphony's stirring performance showed how attractive and unfairly neglected a work the Third Suite is.

The sweep and sureness that made the Tchaikovsky performance so satisfying were the very elements missing in the Bartok Concerto. There were so many variants of tempo within Bartok's given tempos that the performance lacked backbone. Orchestral balances were uneven, and Leinsdorf leaned much too heavily on the brass and percussion sections. Joseph Silverstein had the piece well in hand, but his tone was too small and sugary to give proper profile to the solo part (like the rest of the orchestra, Silverstein was heard to better advantage in the Tchaikovsky).

The evening opened with a well-proportioned and clean performance of Haydn's 39th Symphony, a surprise symphony of unexpected pauses, melodic turns and transitions. Leinsdorf has given us many of the lesser-heard Haydn symphonies since he began his tenure in Boston. It has been exciting and enlightening, and may it continue.

—J. A.

84

The New York Times
D. 681,612 S. 1,304,447
JAN 23 1964

Music: Boston Symphony

Whitestone
Erich Leinsdorf, left, conferring with Joseph Silverstein

Leinsdorf Conducts at Philharmonic Hall

By HAROLD C. SCHONBERG

LAST night's Boston Symphony program, arranged and conducted by Erich Leinsdorf in Philharmonic Hall, contained the music of three well-known composers. But for once the well-known composers were represented by music that demonstrated their ability in ways the public does not often get a chance to test. Instead of one of Haydn's "London" Symphonies, we got No. 39 in G minor. Instead of Bartók's Concerto for Orchestra, there was the Violin Concerto No. 2. And instead of Tchaikovsky's "Pathétique," the Third Orchestral Suite was performed.

Of special interest in this absorbing program was the Tchaikovsky suite. It is a four-movement work that is as long as a symphony. When was it last played by a local orchestra? The only movement that is relatively well-known is the finale, a long and brilliant theme and variations. Some years back, George Balanchine choreographed this movement for Ballet Theatre, giving his work the title of the movement—"Theme and Variations."

●

Ballets as the last movement is the three other movements of the G major Suite are equally so (the second, indeed, is a waltz). It is a lovely work, full of melodies in the best Tchaikovsky vein, gorgeously orchestrated, harmonically inventive. Top-notch Tchaikovsky, in fact; and the score should be heard much more often than has been its fate. The same applies to the two other Tchaikovsky suites, especially No. 1, a real beauty.

Mr. Leinsdorf for some reason omitted the fifth variation of the last movement; otherwise the suite was played complete. It received a sharp, clear performance, but this really is not Mr. Leinsdorf's kind of music. He does not feel it. The Waltz was heavy and ungraceful, and the last movement merely noisy despite the clarity. For this music a conductor needs nuance, flexibility, color; he should use a good deal of rubato and give his orchestra its head when necessary. Instead Mr. Leinsdorf tried for control and ended up achieving mostly a metronomic beat and a tightness of rhythm.

The other music was more in Mr. Leinsdorf's emotional reference. Haydn's G minor Symphony is a masterpiece that almost never turns up—not because of any lack of musical worth but because of the reluctance of most conductors to investigate any but a handful of Haydn's 104 symphonies. Mr. Leinsdorf, of course, has many times in the past shown that he is a musician of intellectual curiosity. By bringing in this kind of score, he is doing more for music than any number of repetitions of No. 88 or No. 94.

●

He conducted it with style: reduced orchestra, of course, a good deal of rhythmic thrust and a careful molding of phrase. Nor did he let the passion of this passionate little symphony become romanticized. All of Haydn's strength was there, in Mr. Leinsdorf's reading, and it was a strength undiluted by conductorial mannerism or stylistic misapprehension.

Bartók's Second Violin Concerto is a late work, dating from 1938. Like most of this composer's music, it is difficult to play, and the solo part bristles with near-impossibilities. But what a beautiful score! There was a time when it was judged dissonant, incomprehensible, ungrateful. But those were in pre-serial days—or, rather, the days before serial music became popular. Today the Bartók concerto sounds tonal, almost conservative; and its nationalistic elements stand out in sharp relief, where previously they had a tendency to be hidden.

●

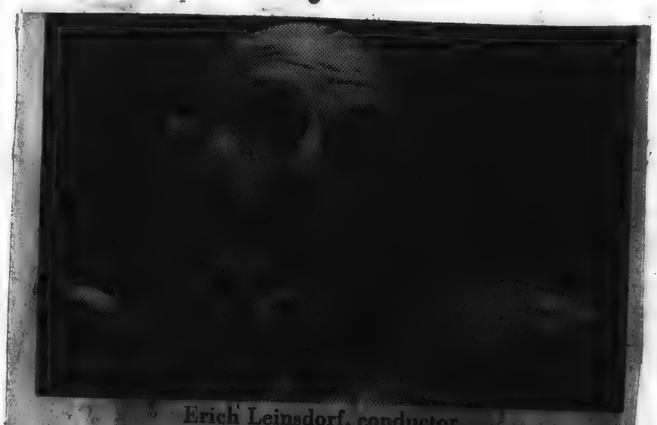
Joseph Silverstein, the concertmaster of the Boston Symphony, was the soloist. Needless to say, he gave the concerto a musicianly, lyrical reading. He has a very suave tone: not a big one, but one of unusual sweetness and what singers would call "placement." He also was enough of a technician to meet the bow and finger work head on. After intermission he returned to his regular chair to play the solos in the Tchaikovsky suite. The playing here was equally beautiful, and it sounded especially so in light of what has happened in the past when ballet orchestras have given the work. Many of us could really say that we heard the solos for the first time last night.

The Program

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Erich Leinsdorf, conductor; Joseph Silverstein, violinist. At Philharmonic Hall.

Symphony No. 39 in G minor ..... Haydn
Violin Concerto No. 2 ..... Bartok
Suite No. 3 in G ..... Tchaikovsky

Herald Tribune
D. 355,898 S. 451,279
JAN 24 1964



Erich Leinsdorf, conductor.

Leinsdorf With The Bostonians: Luminous Deeds

PHILHARMONIC HALL
Lincoln Center

Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Erich Leinsdorf. Soloist: Joseph Silverstein, violinist. The program:

Symphony No. 39 ..... Haydn
Violin Concerto No. 2 ..... Bartok
Suite No. 3 ..... Tchaikovsky

By Alan Rich

When a great conductor leads a superb orchestra through an imaginative program, there's still plenty of life in the institution of the symphony concert. That was the topic of Erich Leinsdorf's sermon with the Boston Symphony at Philharmonic Hall Wednesday night, and he preached it beautifully.

Haydn, Bartok and Tchaikovsky. There's nothing very special about that, as programs go. But look again. The Haydn and Tchaikovsky on this occasion were pieces well outside the common run, and Bartok's Violin Concerto isn't exactly overplayed, either. That's where the imagination comes in: casting new light on old friends.

Haydn's 39th Symphony is a top-drawer example of the composer's youthful experimentation. It is a work of passion and surprise, of extraordinary inventiveness applied to the ordinary materials of the composer's day. Just the insertion of a sudden bar of silence to interrupt the initial statement of the first theme is a stroke of genius. Just the idea of overlapping phrases in the minuet to give a rhythmic irregularity within a straightforward context is what separates a master like Haydn from the thousand scribblers contemporary to him.

Leinsdorf is a superb Haydn conductor, and he has been reviving just this kind of rarely heard music up in Boston and at Tanglewood. His performance of this symphony was beautifully proportioned and full of robust energy. He reduced the size of the string section and restored the harpsichord to its rightful place in the ensemble. His conception of the work was a triumph of incandescent musicianship. Let's hope his Haydn project continues forever; there is much to be done.

Bartok's Violin Concerto is a strange work. Much of it is extremely fine, but not all. The outer movements ramble; the first, especially, starts chasing its tail somewhere around the middle. But the beginning is seraphic, and so is the slow movement. The orchestral scoring is somewhat incredible.

The work was beautifully played. Joseph Silverstein, the orchestra's concertmaster, did not project the solo line with quite the power and the bedazzlement that others have done. But he did something else that was even more interesting. He brought the solo part closer to the surrounding orchestration and gave the work somewhat more unity than it sometimes has had. One heard the piece as a whole. Mr. Silverstein's playing was flawless in its understated way, and the sounds made by the orchestra were magnificent.

Tchaikovsky's Third Suite is not one of the composer's strongest works, but it has moments of great beauty. The subsidiary section of the first movement may wear its heart on its sleeve, but it is lovely music nevertheless. The scherzo is delightful; it sounds at times as if it ought to be played by an orchestra of toys. Actually, the most familiar section, the final set of variations, which is sometimes played by itself, is the weakest of the four sections. It goes on and on.

But a revival of a lesser work by a major composer is illuminating. This year we have had two such illuminations cast on Tchaikovsky, the "Manfred" and now the suite. One needn't be afraid to think at a concert. Mr. Leinsdorf and his orchestra are masters of illumination.

NEW YORK

FEB. 1964
MUSICAL AMERICA

Boston Symphony

For the first of the January brace of Boston Symphony concerts at Philharmonic Hall, Erich Leinsdorf presented on the 22nd Haydn's Symphony No. 39, the Bartok Second Violin Concerto (with concertmaster Joseph Silverstein as soloist) and the Tchaikovsky Third Suite. For me, the standout was the Tchaikovsky. This breezy piece is rarely heard and isn't even available complete on records. (I wish Leinsdorf would exhume the charming Fourth "Mozartiana" Suite also; the third and fourth suites would also make a beautiful disc.) The Boston Symphony's stirring performance showed how attractive and unfairly neglected a work the Third Suite is.

The sweep and sureness that made the Tchaikovsky performance so satisfying were the very elements missing in the Bartok Concerto. There were so many variants of tempo within Bartok's given tempos that the performance lacked backbone. Orchestral balances were uneven, and Leinsdorf leaned much too heavily on the brass and percussion sections. Joseph Silverstein had the piece well in hand, but his tone was too small and sugary to give proper profile to the solo part (like the rest of the orchestra, Silverstein was heard to better advantage in the Tchaikovsky).

The evening opened with a well-proportioned and clean performance of Haydn's 39th Symphony, a surprise symphony of unexpected pauses, melodic turns and transitions. Leinsdorf has given us many of the lesser-heard Haydn symphonies since he began his tenure in Boston. It has been exciting and enlightening, and may it continue.

—J. A.

BROOKLYN. | NEW YORK

85 3

DAILY NEWS
NEW YORK'S PICTURE NEWSPAPER
D. 2,006,983 S. 3,147,219

JAN 22 1964

New York World-Telegram
and
The Sun
D. 463,241 SAT. 175,139

JAN 17 1964

Triumph Repeated

Hollander to Play Prokofiev Concerto

By NINA McCAIN
Of the World-Telegram Staff

Lorin Hollander, a brilliant 19-year-old pianist who already has established himself as one of the country's foremost young musicians, will be the soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra Thursday at the Brooklyn Academy of Music.

Hollander will play Prokofiev's Concerto No. 5, the work which won him praise at Tanglewood last summer.

The young man is a child prodigy who has continued to achieve spectacular successes as he moved into the world of adult music. Hollander started playing the piano at the age of 5 and made his professional debut when he was 11.

He was the youngest artist to play on the Telephone Hour and the youngest to be named "The Artist of Tomorrow" by the National Orchestra Assn.

Hollander played five times in one season with the New York Philahrmonic and has played with several other major symphonies. On one notable occasion he substituted for Van Cliburn when a toothache kept the famous pianist from a concert in San Antonio.

In addition to Hollander, five members of the Boston Symphony will perform on Thursday's program. Joseph Silverstein, the concertmaster, and Doriot Dwyer and James Pappoutsakis, flutists, will be the soloists in Bach's Brandenburg Concerto No. 4. Soloists for Strauss' "Don Quixote" will be Samuel Mayes, cellist, and Joseph de Pasquale, violinist.

Erich Leinsdorf, recently named Musician of the Year in a nationwide poll of music editors and critics, will conduct the symphony in this season's third Boston concert at the academy.

Tickets for the concert, which begins at 8:30 p.m., are priced from $3.50 to $6 and are available at the academy's box office.

* * *

Helen Dayton
In Chekhov's "The Boor."

The New York Times
D. 681,612 S. 1,304,447

JAN 25 1964

BOSTONIANS PLAY PROKOFIEV'S FIFTH

Hollander Is Piano Soloist for Rarely Heard Work

Prokofiev's Fifth Piano Concerto was one of the last works he wrote before he decided to return to the Soviet Union for good, in 1933, and it is also in many ways one of his most enigmatic.

Last night it had one of its relatively rare performances here, in the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert in Philharmonic Hall, with Erich Leinsdorf as conductor and Lorin Hollander as soloist.

Ironically, Prokofiev confessed that in trying to find a "new simplicity" for the concerto he turned out something "complicated," largely by seeking to avoid old formulas.

He cast the work in five movements, instead of the customary three or four. He tried new technical devices in the solo part (although some of them sound like beefed-up Liszt), and he made almost no concessions to the broad lyric impulse that could give his works a sense of richness.

There are quiet passages, it is true, and there is a slow movement, but even this is interrupted by a flurry of fast music.

The texture of the work has a Prokofiev sound, in its sharp, brittle scoring, but it is dominated by the solo part, which is almost continuously relentless in its handling of both thematic and ornamental material.

It has neither the breadth nor the insinuating qualities of some of the earlier concertos, but its uncompromising and brilliant statement of its strong ideas makes it a strikingly powerful work.

Young Mr. Hollander, who at 19 is almost a veteran of the concert stage, played the concerto for all it was worth. There was strength of tone, even in the fastest runs, to keep the solo part riding over the orchestra. There was sensitivity to the lyric passages.

But above all there was a rhythmic poise that was remarkable in a work of this complexity. No matter how swiftly his hands were flying over the keyboard, Mr. Hollander kept the work in a kind of impersonal framework that was right for the music.

There was no danger of the pianist being carried away by the most headlong tempo. This kind of control, together with his brilliant technique, was a measure of his growing maturity.

Mr. Leinsdorf led his orchestra in a deft performance, one that meshed precisely with that of the soloist. Before the concerto he conducted a reduced ensemble in four excerpts from Richard Strauss's Orchestral Suite from "Der Bürger als Edelmann."

These were played with the transparency and polish expected from the Bostonians. A coherent, fine-balanced performance of Brahms's First Symphony brought the concert to a close.

RAYMOND ERICSON.

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE
047

Albany Knickerbocker News
Wednesday, January 22, 1964

Pianist Adds Built-in Stretch

New York (UPI)—It is a bit embarrassing for Lorin Hollander to play Prokofiev's Fifth Piano Concerto but he hopes to overcome the problem Friday when he performs with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Lincoln Center here.

Hollander, 19, is small but he performs the difficult piece with such verve that he rips the shoulders in his tailcoat.

For the performance this week he had a special stretch tailcoat made, the first ever produced. Hollander said if it works, he plans to perform the concerto again in March.

The symphony Friday night will be conducted by Erich Leinsdorf.

BOSTONIANS PLAY PROKOFIEV'S FIFTH

Hollander Is Piano Soloist for Rarely Heard Work

Prokofiev's Fifth Piano Concerto was one of the last works he wrote before he decided to return to the Soviet Union for good, in 1933, and it is also in many ways one of his most enigmatic.

Friday night it had one of its relatively rare performances here, in the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert in Philharmonic Hall, with Erich Leinsdorf as conductor and Lorin Hollander as soloist.

Ironically, Prokofiev confessed that in trying to find a "new simplicity" for the concerto he turned out something "complicated," largely by seeking to avoid old formulas.

He cast the work in five movements, instead of the customary three or four. He tried new technical devices in the solo part (although some of them sound like beefed-up Liszt), and he made almost no concessions to the broad lyric impulse that could give his works a sense of richness.

There are quiet passages, it is true, and there is a slow movement, but even this is interrupted by a flurry of fast music.

The texture of the work has a Prokofiev sound, in its sharp, brittle scoring, but it is dominated by the solo part, which is almost continuously relentless in its handling of both thematic and ornamental material.

It has neither the breadth nor the insinuating qualities of some of the earlier concertos, but its uncompromising and brilliant statement of its strong ideas makes it a strikingly powerful work.

Young Mr. Hollander, who at 19 is almost a veteran of the concert stage, played the concerto for all it was worth. There was strength of tone, even in the fastest runs, to keep the solo part riding over the orchestra. There was sensitivity to the lyric passages.

But above all there was a rhythmic poise that was remarkable in a work of this complexity. No matter how swiftly his hands were flying over the keyboard, Mr. Hollander kept the work in a kind of impersonal framework that was right for the music.

There was no danger of the pianist being carried away by the most headlong tempo. This kind of control, together with his brilliant technique, was a measure of his growing maturity.

Mr. Leinsdorf led his orchestra in a deft performance, one that meshed precisely with that of the soloist. Before the concerto he conducted a reduced ensemble in four excerpts from Richard Strauss's Orchestral Suite from "Der Bürger als Edelmann."

These were played with the transparency and polish expected from the Bostonians. A coherent, fine-balanced performance of Brahms's First Symphony brought the concert to a close.

RAYMOND ERICSON.

86

New York
Journal American
NEW YORK, N.Y.
D. 501,625 S. 760,395

JAN 26 1964

AT PHILHARMONIC HALL

Leinsdorf Gives A Fair Concert

By MILES KASTENDIECK

THIS TIME the Boston Symphony program yielded less satisfaction in Philharmonic Hall last night.

True to his search for variation, Erich Leinsdorf presented Strauss' suite from "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme" and Prokofieff's Piano Concerto No. 5.

These works did not, however, have quite the substance to make their reappearance so welcome. It fell to Brahms' Symphony No. 1 to provide the requisite compensation.

The Strauss is dating. It now demands a superman performance to give it the proper flavor, one that has plenty of humor. Since this quality did not come through, the piece sounded like conventional Strauss.

This frame of reference will no longer do; an enkindling performance is mandatory.

★

THE PROKOFIEFF has become something of a stranger. Time has not tempered its essential unattractiveness; indeed the work qualified more and more as a pianist's stunt piece last night.

Asking for prestidigious technical accomplishments, it offers a stiff workout with certain pitfalls difficult for a young pianist to circumvent.

Lorin Hollander gave a stunning digital account of the notes. He properly dazzled the audience, but did not fool the initiated.

As he pounded out the notes with youthful esprit, he became too mechanical in execution and too monotonous in coloring to ingratiate the listener.

Not that Prokofieff himself wrote much variety into the work. The second movement does have a sardonic flavor, however, absent in this performance.

The lyric passages can sound more persuasive if not just played soft on top of the keys. Even the virtuoso works need not be so percussive.

★

THUS THE BRAHMS brought the concert into focus. Mr. Leinsdorf let the Bostonians play in all their glory, though he exerted an almost metronomic control.

This raised the questions about playing in strict time and about punctuating the phrases more meaningfully.

Had he done so, the performance would have conveyed more of Brahms' warmth. It did emphasize his greatness and a goodly share of his grandeur.

There are more emotional values in this music than this listener felt last night, however effective Mr. Leinsdorf's conducting.

MUSICAL AMERICA
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 15,900

FEB 1964

Erich Leinsdorf: Bringing Boston to New York. Last month, the conductor led the Boston Symphony in two concerts in Philharmonic Hall and one in Carnegie.

Boston Symphony

The January 24 concert by the Boston Symphony featured two 20th-century works out of the ordinary: excerpts from Strauss' "Bourgeois Gentilhomme" Suite and Prokofieff's Fifth Piano Concerto (Lorin Hollander, soloist). The program was rounded off by the Brahms First Symphony. What a delight the Strauss score is, and what a delightful performance Erich Leinsdorf led of it. Using a much reduced orchestra, the conductor brought admirable transparency and wit to the five selections he chose from the suite of nine movements.

The Prokofieff is a noisy thing which rattles along through five movements of fidgeting acrobatics for piano. The nicest touch in it is the graceful opening of the slow movement; but this tranquil mood is short-lived, and soon the music is off again, like a dog chasing its tail. Anyway, the piece does provide a fantastic romp for a pianist, and on this occasion Lorin Hollander did a fantastic job of playing it. Here was one of the biggest piano sounds I have ever heard, coupled with enormous strength which allowed him to sail over the mass of sound the Boston men were kicking up. It was quite an exciting event.

The concluding Brahms was somewhat fussy for my tastes in the first and last movement, but the middle sections were realized with directness and honesty. The playing throughout was of the highest caliber. —J.A.

N.Y. HERALD TRIBUNE 1/25/64

OUT-OF-BREATH PROKOFIEV

By John Gruen

Who's afraid of Serge Prokofiev?

Certainly not Lorin Hollander performing that composer's demonic Fifth Piano Concerto with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Erich Leinsdorf, at Philharmonic Hall, last evening.

The 19-year-old pianist etched out its divine dissonances with dazzling bravura —the sort that left the audience stunned—and the pianist, conductor, and orchestra breathless, but triumphant.

It was another instance of Mr. Leinsdorf's superb sense for choosing a program that keeps one engrossed, even when pant of it—such as last evening's reading of Brahms' Symphony No. 1, was unsuited to his temperament.

The evening opened with excerpts from Richard Strauss' Orchestra Suite, "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme" which was once the incidental music for the play that preceded his opera "Ariadne Auf Naxos." The separate instrumental suite is scored for a large chamber orchestra, and Mr. Leinsdorf played it with all the bouquet of an excellent Rhine wine, served on an open-air terrace.

As for the Prokofiev, it is a work that could be compared to clusters of gigantic rhinestones, each cut with jagged precision, and each giving off a dazzling light. Mr. Hollander was master of all its intricacy, tossing off finger-breaking runs and skips, like so many wild punctuation marks, while constantly alert to the piquancy of the almost Ravelian lighter sections. Mr. Leinsdorf for his part, kept the orchestra in tow, wielding his logic and steely strength at every turn.

Logic and steely strength were not meant for Brahms' C Minor Symphony, but the conductor performed it as though the work were carved of ice. The empi were obsessively precise, the dynamic unsubtle, and the work's general atmosphere, charged with an unnatural militaristic aura.

Still, it was never dull, and that, at least, kept one's mind busy.

98

New York
Journal American
NEW YORK, N.Y.
D. 501,625 S. 760,395

JAN 25 1964

AT PHILHARMONIC HALL

Leinsdorf Gives A Fair Concert

By MILES KASTENDIECK

THIS TIME the Boston Symphony program yielded less satisfaction in Philharmonic Hall last night.

True to his search for variation, Erich Leinsdorf presented Strauss' suite from "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme" and Prokofieff's Piano Concerto No. 5.

These works did not, however, have quite the substance to make their reappearance so welcome. It fell to Brahms' Symphony No. 1 to provide the requisite compensation.

The Strauss is dating. It now demands a superman performance to give it the proper flavor, one that has plenty of humor. Since this quality did not come through, the piece sounded like conventional Strauss.

This frame of reference will no longer do; an enkindling performance is mandatory.

★

THE PROKOFIEFF has become something of a stranger. Time has not tempered its essential unattractiveness; indeed the work qualified more and more as a pianist's stunt piece last night.

Asking for prestidigious technical accomplishments, it offers a stiff workout with certain pitfalls difficult for a young pianist to circumvent.

Lorin Hollander gave a stunning digital account of the notes. He properly dazzled the audience, but did not fool the initiated.

As he pounded out the notes with youthful esprit, he became too mechanical in execution and too monotonous in coloring to ingratiate the listener.

Not that Prokofieff himself wrote much variety into the work. The second movement does have a sardonic flavor, however, absent in this performance.

The lyric passages can sound more persuasive if not just played soft on top of the keys. Even the virtuoso works need not be so percussive.

★

THUS THE BRAHMS brought the concert into focus. Mr. Leinsdorf let the Bostonians play in all their glory, though he exerted an almost metronomic control.

This raised the questions about playing in strict time and about punctuating the phrases more meaningfully.

Had he done so, the performance would have conveyed more of Brahms' warmth. It did emphasize his greatness and a goodly share of his grandeur.

There are more emotional values in this music than this listener felt last night, however effective Mr. Leinsdorf's conducting.

MUSICAL AMERICA
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 15,900

FEB 1964

Erich Leinsdorf: Bringing Boston to New York. Last month, the conductor led the Boston Symphony in two concerts in Philharmonic Hall and one in Carnegie.

Boston Symphony

The January 24 concert by the Boston Symphony featured two 20th-century works out of the ordinary: excerpts from Strauss' "Bourgeois Gentilhomme" Suite and Prokofieff's Fifth Piano Concerto (Lorin Hollander, soloist). The program was rounded off by the Brahms First Symphony. What a delight the Strauss score is, and what a delightful performance Erich Leinsdorf led of it. Using a much reduced orchestra, the conductor brought admirable transparency and wit to the five selections he chose from the suite of nine movements.

The Prokofieff is a noisy thing which rattles along through five movements of fidgeting acrobatics for piano. The nicest touch in it is the graceful opening of the slow movement; but this tranquil mood is short-lived, and soon the music is off again, like a dog chasing its tail. Anyway, the piece does provide a fantastic romp for a pianist, and on this occasion Lorin Hollander did a fantastic job of playing it. Here was one of the biggest piano sounds I have ever heard, coupled with enormous strength which allowed him to sail over the mass of sound the Boston men were kicking up. It was quite an exciting event.

The concluding Brahms was somewhat fussy for my tastes in the first and last movement, but the middle sections were realized with directness and honesty. The playing throughout was of the highest caliber. —J.A.

N.Y. HERALD TRIBUNE 1/25/64

OUT-OF-BREATH PROKOFIEV

By John Gruen

Who's afraid of Serge Prokofiev?

Certainly not Lorin Hollander performing that composer's demonic Fifth Piano Concerto with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Erich Leinsdorf, at Philharmonic Hall, last evening.

The 19-year-old pianist etched out its divine dissonances with dazzling bravura —the sort that left the audience stunned—and the pianist, conductor, and orchestra breathless, but triumphant.

It was another instance of Mr. Leinsdorf's superb sense for choosing a program that keeps one engrossed, even when part of it—such as last evening's reading of Brahms' Symphony No. 1, was unsuited to his temperament.

The evening opened with excerpts from Richard Strauss' Orchestra Suite, "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme" which was once the incidental music for the play that preceded his opera "Ariadne Auf Naxos." The separate instrumental suite is scored for a large chamber orchestra, and Mr. Leinsdorf played it with all the bouquet of an excellent Rhine wine, served on an open-air terrace.

As for the Prokofiev, it is a work that could be compared to clusters of gigantic rhinestones, each cut with jagged precision, and each giving off a dazzling light. Mr. Hollander was master of all its intricacy, tossing off finger-breaking runs and skips, like so many wild punctuation marks, while constantly alert to the piquancy of the almost Ravelian lighter sections. Mr. Leinsdorf for his part, kept the orchestra in tow, wielding his logic and steely strength at every turn.

Logic and steely strength were not meant for Brahms' C Minor Symphony, but the conductor performed it as though the work were carved of ice. The empi were obsessively precise, the dynamic unsubtle, and the work's general atmosphere, charged with an unnatural militaristic aura.

Still, it was never dull, and that, at least, kept one's mind busy.

CARNEGIE HALL

New York Post
D. 372,679 S. 255,557

JAN 27 1964

Bostonians Play Bruckner 'Seventh'

The Boston Symphony is demonstrating that the greatness of an orchestra begins with first class discipline, the kind that Erich Leinsdorf has been demanding from it (often with a joke and a smile) since he took over as musical director in the fall of 1962.

He conducted a performance of the hour-long Anton Bruckner Seventh Symphony in Carnegie Hall Saturday night that seemed the shortest within memory. The alternating colors of the ensemble varied from luscious to mystical. His pulsating interpretation met surge with lyrical contrast. The audience went wild in its enthusiasm at the work's conclusion.

Opening Tonight . . .

Down at the Metropolitan Opera the turn of events was less happy. Young American tenor James McCracken, scheduled to return for his first appearance of the season, and his first Manrico in Verdi's "Il Trovatore," had fallen downstairs Thursday and sprained his ankle. Least season, McCracken created a sensation in the title role of "Otello" after having left the Met several years earlier with a history of bit parts behind him. Ironically, he had to go to Europe to get his chance, while, in the meantime, the Met had often been more generous to Europeans of far less talent than McCracken. Flaviano Labo, in his first Met Maric,o substituted for McCracken.

HARRIETT JOHNSON

Bostonians

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf conducting, will play at Carnegie Hall Saturday night. Bach's "Brandenburg Concerto No. 4" and Bruckner's Symphony No. 7 will make up the program.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Times (m)
NEW YORK, N. Y.
Circ. 681,612

JAN 27 1964

LEINSDORF LEADS AT CARNEGIE HALL

Boston Symphony Presents Bach and Bruckner Works

Erich Leinsdorf and his Boston Symphony Orchestra offered a program of more than routine interest Saturday night at Carnegie Hall. Two works were listed, but two and one-third were played. The fraction was the third movement of Bache's Brandenburg Concerto No. 4 in G, which was repeated by the ensemble in response to the capacity audience's demand for an encore.

The other work, Anton Bruckner's Symphony No. 7 in E, was also greeted enthusiastically, but the four minutes of clapping and cheering did not persuade Mr. Leinsdorf to repeat one of its interminable movements.

Concurring with current practice, Mr. Leinsdorf used a chamber-size group for the Bach, and he played the harpsichord (an Eric Herz) himself. His realization were spare but firmly stated. The group playing was generally ragged but the solo work was splendid with Joseph Silverstein, the concertmaster, as violinist, and Doriot Anthony Dwyer and James Pappoutsakis, the flutists.

There was much beauty of orchestral sound in the Bruckner, the cellos soaring through the winds in a lofty melody and the brasses giving forth rich organlike sonorities in the slow movement. The Big C major climax of that movement thundered properly, and in general things were in their right places. It was not the last word in Bruckner though, despite these good points. One wished for more lightness in the Viennese dance sections, more hard fury in the scherzo.

But the reading was reputable and it was good to hear the seldom-played work again.

HOWARD KLEIN.

Herald Tribune
NEW YORK
D. 355,898 S. 451,270

JAN 27 1964

Erich Leinsdorf's Bruckner, to judge by his reading of the Seventh Symphony Saturday night in Carnegie Hall, is drenched in many waters. In its solidity and logic, it is dipped in Vienna's Danube, to be sure. But in its sunsplashed colors and classical line it drips the Mediterranean as well, and in its straightforwardness and brisk, rhythmic brio it sparkles as though washed in the Zuyder Zee, or as though the late Eduard Van Beinum had been at the helm. Despite these heritages, the conception was peculiarly Leinsdorf's own, and it was marvelous to hear the Boston Symphony, in superb form as is its wont, produce colors of noon-day brightness without losing the mellowness the writing demands. Combined with the aforementioned clarity and rhythmic thrust, it was Bruckner of a high order and was rousingly received by the audience. The evening opening with a reading of Bach's Fourth Brandenburg that had clarity and lovely textures but a soggy last movement. Mr. Leinsdorf led from the harpsichord.

W. B.

Music

Three B's Score an A

By LOUIS BIANCOLLI

The three B's at Carnegie Hall Saturday night were Bach, Bruckner, and the Boston Symphony, each the beneficiary of the masterly conducting of Erich Leinsdorf.

Louis Biancolli

Indeed, the combination of Bruckner's Seventh and Leinsdorf brought one of the season's longest and most rousing ovations for the visiting orchestra's dynamic new conductor. People jumped to their feet and cheered.

They couldn't have cheered a more deserving artist or a worthier cause. Still spurned and maligned in many quarters, Bruckner can use this kind of treatment and this kind of mass jubilation. The two made quite a thrilling experience Saturday night.

* * *

As one who outgrew an early dissatisfaction with Bruckner to become an ardent partisan, I was particularly stirred by the behavior of the crowd. The ovation was an expression of gratitude to Leinsdorf.

Gratitude for having reminded us once again, and with such eloquence, of the infinite stores of beauty in this symphony, and for having the utmost of musicianship, insight, and artistic truth to the performance.

And deep down I suppose everyone felt grateful to that pious and simple man—perhaps not so simple in his dazzling inner world—who in the face of staggering hostility composed this music in the light of his own vision.

* * *

That vision, of course, was God, and if ever there was a composer entitled to a place in those abodes of light that Dante visits in his "Paradiso" it was Bruckner. Besides his comic glow, the vision of Cesar Franck is a 100-watt bulb.

But there is another god in the Seventh Symphony—Richard Wagner. The Adagio—the most widely known of Bruckner's movements—was written in memory of the one composer Bruckner worshipped in word and music. Only he could have reconciled such gods.

Leinsdorf made of that movement, as he did of the whole symphony, a soul-satisfying experience. I sometimes think Bruckner repeats the glorious theme once, if not twice, too often. I didn't last night.

* * *

Each time it returned it was welcome, like another dring after renewed thirst, and at the end, when it seemed about to assert itself again, it reshaped, folded up, and casually faded with the movement. The timing and dynamics were superb.

New York
Journal American
NEW YORK, N.Y.
D. 501,625 S. 760,395

JAN 27 1964

★

ERICH LEINSDORF CONDUCTED one of his memorable performances with the Boston Symphony in Carnegie Hall Saturday night. Seldom has the Bruckner Seventh Symphony sounded more magnificent.

He was at his best in the famous scherzo, but throughout the performance he excelled himself. The Bostonians rose to the occasion, and Bruckner won still more converts.

The Bach Brandenburg Fourth Concerto also caught the audience's fancy. Its enthusiasm won an encore of the third movement.

MUSICAL AMERICA
FEB. 1964

Boston Symphony

For all its length and for all its moments of great beauty, the Bruckner Seventh Symphony has, for me, a way of passing in one ear and out the other. Every time I hear it is the first time—which may be an advantage. Erich Leinsdorf's performance with the Boston Symphony at Carnegie Hall on January 25 had an overall luster, an orchestral shimmer that relied heavily on the Boston's glossy and rich string sound. Of course, Bruckner's orchestration uses the strings to the exclusion of almost everything else (except maybe timpani).

Though one is grateful that the brasses have lost the tremulous French sound they had under Munch, on this occasion they sounded flaccid and uninvolved. The woodwinds tended to drown in the sea of voluptuous sound produced by the strings. Yet the sound was so bewitching that the almost didn't mind. Mr. Leinsdorf's conception resembled a Rubens nude—all flesh, no bones.

Opening the program was Bach's Fourth "Brandenburg" Concerto, with

CARNEGIE HALL

CAPITOL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
FROM NEW YORK
SERVICE
JAN 30, 1964

Bostonians—ne

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf conducting, will play at Carnegie Hall Saturday night. Bach's "Brandenburg Concerto No. 4" and Bruckner's Symphony No. 7 will make up the program.

New York Post
D. 372,679 S. 255,557
JAN 27 1964

Bostonians Play Bruckner 'Seventh'

The Boston Symphony is demonstrating that the greatness of an orchestra begins with first class discipline, the kind that Erich Leinsdorf has been demanding from it (often with a joke and a smile) since he took over as musical director in the fall of 1962.

He conducted a performance of the hour-long Anton Bruckner Seventh Symphony in Carnegie Hall Saturday night that seemed the shortest within memory. The alternating colors of the ensemble varied from luscious to mystical. His pulsating interpretation met surge with lyrical contrast. The audience went wild in its enthusiasm at the work's conclusion.

Down at the Metropolitan Opera the turn of events was less happy. Young American tenor James McCracken, scheduled to return for his first appearance of the season, and his first Manrico in Verdi's "Il Trovatore," had fallen downstairs Thursday and sprained his ankle. Least season, McCracken created a sensation in the title role of "Otello" after having left the Met several years earlier with a history of bit parts behind him. Ironically, he had to go to Europe to get his chance, while, in the meantime, the Met had often been more generous to Europeans of far less talent than McCracken. Flaviano Labo, in his first Met Maric,o substituted for McCracken.

HARRIETT JOHNSON

Opening Tonight . . .

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Times (m)
NEW YORK, N. Y.
Circ. 681,612
JAN 27 1964

LEINSDORF LEADS AT CARNEGIE HALL

Boston Symphony Presents Bach and Bruckner Works

Erich Leinsdorf and his Boston Symphony Orchestra offered a program of more than routine interest Saturday night at Carnegie Hall. Two works were listed, but two and one-third were played. The fraction was the third movement of Bache's Brandenburg Concerto No. 4 in G, which was repeated by the ensemble in response to the capacity audience's demand for an encore.

The other work, Anton Bruckner's Symphony No. 7 in E, was also greeted enthusiastically, but the four minutes of clapping and cheering did not persuade Mr. Leinsdorf to repeat one of its interminable movements.

Concurring with current practice, Mr. Leinsdorf used a chamber-size group for the Bach, and he played the harpsichord (as Eric Herz) himself. His realization were spare but firmly stated. The group playing was generally ragged but the solo work was splendid with Joseph Silverstein, the concertmaster, as violinist, and Doriot Anthony Dwyer and James Pappoutsakis, the flutists.

There was much beauty of orchestral sound in the Bruckner, the cellos soaring through the winds in a lofty melody and the brasses giving forth rich organlike sonorities in the slow movement. The Big C major climax of that movement thundered properly, and in general things were in their right places. It was not the last word in Bruckner though, despite these good points. One wished for more lightness in the Viennese dance sections, more hard fury in the scherzo.

But the reading was reputable and it was good to hear the seldom-played work again.

HOWARD KLEIN

New York World-Telegram
and
The Sun
D. 463,241 SAT. 175,139
JAN 27 1964

Music

Three B's Score an A

By LOUIS BIANCOLLI

The three B's at Carnegie Hall Saturday night were Bach, Bruckner, and the Boston Symphony, each the beneficiary of the masterly conducting of Erich Leinsdorf.

Louis Biancolli

Indeed, the combination of Bruckner's Seventh and Leinsdorf brought one of the season's longest and most rousing ovations for the visiting orchestra's dynamic new conductor. People jumped to their feet and cheered.

They couldn't have cheered a more deserving artist or a worthier cause. Still spurned and maligned in many quarters, Bruckner can use this kind of treatment and this kind of mass jubilation. The two made quite a thrilling experience Saturday night.

* * *

As one who outgrew an early dissatisfaction with Bruckner to become an ardent partisan, I was particularly stirred by the behavior of the crowd. The ovation was an expression of gratitude to Leinsdorf.

Gratitude for having reminded us once again, and with such eloquence, of the infinite stores of beauty in this symphony, and for having the utmost of musicianship, insight, and artistic truth to the performance.

And deep down I suppose everyone felt grateful to that pious and simple man—perhaps not so simple in his dazzling inner world—who in the face of staggering hostility composed this music in the light of his own vision.

* * *

That vision, of course, was God, and if ever there was a composer entitled to a place in those abodes of light that Dante visits in his "Paradiso" it was Bruckner. Besides his comic glow, the vision of Cesar Franck is a 100-watt bulb.

But there is another god in the Seventh Symphony—Richard Wagner. The Adagio—the most widely known of Bruckner's movements—was written in memory of the one composer Bruckner worshipped in word and music. Only he could have reconciled such gods.

Leinsdorf made of that movement, as he did of the whole symphony, a soul-satisfying experience. I sometimes think Bruckner repeats the glorious theme once, if not twice, too often. I didn't last night.

* * *

Each time it returned it was welcome, like another dring after renewed thirst, and at the end, when it seemed about to assert itself again, it reshaped, folded up, and casually faded with the movement. The timing and dynamics were superb.

Herald Tribune
D. 355,898 S. 451,270
JAN 27 1964

Erich Leinsdorf's Bruckner, to judge by his reading of the Seventh Symphony Saturday night in Carnegie Hall, is drenched in many waters. In its solidity and logic, it is dipped in Vienna's Danube, to be sure. But, in its sun-splashed colors and classical line it drips the Mediterranean as well, and in its straightforwardness and brisk, rhythmic brio it sparkles as though washed in the Zuyder Zee, or as though the late Eduard Van Beinum had been at the helm. Despite these heritages, the conception was peculiarly Leinsdorf's own, and it was marvelous to hear the Boston Symphony, in superb form as is its wont, produce colors of noon-day brightness without losing the mellowness the writing demands. Combined with the aforementioned clarity and rhythmic thrust it was Bruckner of a high order and was rousingly received by the audience. The evening opening with a reading of Bach's Fourth Brandenburg that had clarity and lovely textures but a soggy last movement. Mr. Leinsdorf led from the harpsichord.

W. R.

MUSICAL AMERICA
FEB. 1964

Boston Symphony

For all its length and for all its moments of great beauty, the Bruckner Seventh Symphony has, for me, a way of passing in one ear and out the other. Every time I hear it is the first time—which may be an advantage. Erich Leinsdorf's performance with the Boston Symphony at Carnegie Hall on January 25 had an overall luster, an orchestral shimmer that relied heavily on the Boston's glossy and rich string sound. Of course, Bruckner's orchestration uses the strings to the exclusion of almost everything else (except maybe timpani).

Though one is grateful that the brasses have lost the tremulous French sound they had under Munch, on this occasion they sounded flaccid and uninvolved. The woodwinds tended to drown in the sea of voluptuous sound produced by the strings. Yet the sound was so bewitching that the almost didn't mind. Mr. Leinsdorf's conception resembled a Rubens nude—all flesh, no bones.

Opening the program was Bach's Fourth "Brandenburg" Concerto, with concertmaster Joseph Silverstein, violin-

New York
Journal American
NEW YORK, N.Y.
D. 501,625 S. 760,395
JAN 27 1964

ERICH LEINSDORF CONDUCTED one of his memorable performances with the Boston Symphony in Carnegie Hall Saturday night. Seldom has the Bruckner Seventh Symphony sounded more magnificent.

He was at his best in the famous scherzo, but throughout the performance he excelled himself. The Bostonians rose to the occasion, and Bruckner won still more converts.

The Bach Brandenburg Fourth Concerto also caught the audience's fancy. Its enthusiasm won an encore of the third movement.

88 PROVIDENCE U.S.A. N. 31 3 ARA

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Reformer &
Vermont Phoenix (e)
BRATTLEBORO, Vt.
Circ. 7,503
JAN 29 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Union (m)
SPRINGFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 83,691
JAN 29 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Call (e)
WOONSOCKET, R. I.
Circ. 26,710
JAN 29 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 194,870
JAN 29 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Journal (m)
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
Circ. 61,299
JAN 29 1964

Hub Symphony Has To Postpone Concert

Last night's weather proved too savage to be charmed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra or the spinning tires of its chartered buses.

The orchestra postponed its concert at Veterans' Memorial Auditorium, disappointing hundreds of music lovers, some of whom had traveled to Providence by train or driven long distances.

But they will get a chance later to hear the orchestra, according to Laning Humphrey, symphony publicity man. Mr. Humphrey said an announcement will be made in Boston today about rescheduling the performance and honoring the tickets for it.

"The Boston Symphony is the busiest orchestra in the country," he said, "and it will take some mulling over of the schedule to fix a date, but we hope it will be as soon as possible."

Two buses carrying the orchestra of 101 men and three women with associate conductor Richard Burgin got from Boston to Dedham, at the junction of Routes 1 and 128, before the drivers pulled off the road into a restaurant parking lot.

It was then about 7:30 p.m. The buses and the truckload of instruments were making only about 20 miles an hour in the wind-driven snow and the crawling traffic. Norman Shirk, assistant manager in charge of the symphony's fourth seasonal trip to Providence, telephoned from the restaurant to Thomas D. Perry Jr., the manager, in Boston, and described the situation.

Mr. Perry ordered the orchestra buses to turn around and return the musicians to Boston.

Mr. Humphrey said it is the first time in recent decades that the orchestra has postponed a performance because of the weather and one of the few times it has canceled for any reason.

Continued on Page 9, Col. 4

Symphony

Continued From Page One

"We're very proud of our record of getting the show on, so it must have been very bad out there," Mr. Humphrey said.

Two years ago, he recalled, the orchestra got caught in another storm and arrived in Providence an hour and a half late, but last night's was the first of 374 engagements in Providence that the orchestra had failed to make.

The orchestra members ate a quick supper at the restaurant and boarded the buses to return to Boston shortly after 8 p.m.

Music stores were selling tickets to the performance for $5, and very few more were left unsold yesterday. The orchestra was scheduled to play the popular "Pathetique" Symphony by Tchaikovsky and Sibelius' Symphony No. 5.

The auditorium's 2,200 seats were expected to be filled for the one-hour-and-45-minute concert, and the lobby already was filled with people at 8 p.m. when Raymond Williams, who represents the orchestra in its Rhode Island ventures, announced that the bad weather and traffic conditions had forced the postponement.

There were groans of disappointment as patrons slowly milled out of the lobby and mixed with the crowd that was still arriving, not yet having heard the sad news.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Bulletin (e)
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
Circ. 144,028
JAN 29 1964

Symphony Rescheduled for March 3

The Boston Symphony Orchestra rescheduled for March 3 the concert at Veterans Memorial Hall that was canceled because of the storm last night.

A spokesman for the orchestra said that tickets for last night's performance will be honored at the March 3 concert.

The orchestra was forced to turn back at Dedham, at the junction of Routes 1 and 128, and to return to Boston when the buses encountered severe difficulty and were making only 20 miles an hour in heavy traffic on the wind-blown and snow-packed highway.

Music lovers by the hundreds had fought their ways through the storm to attend the concert, scheduled to be led by Richard Burgin, associate conductor. Notice of who will conduct the March 3 concert was not contained in the BSO announcement today.

Laning Humphrey, publicity representative for the orchestra, said last night that that was the first time in recent decades that the orchestra had postponed a concert because of weather and one of the few times it had postponed a performance for any reason.

"We're very proud of our record of getting the show on, so it must have been very bad out there," Mr. Humphrey said.

Two years ago, he recalled, the orchestra got caught in another storm and arrived in Providence an hour and a half late, but last night's was the first of 374 engagements in Providence that the orchestra had failed to make.

Music stores were selling tickets to the performance for $5, and very few more were left unsold yesterday. The orchestra was scheduled to play the popular "Pathetique" Symphony by Tchaikovsky and Sibelius' Symphony No. 5.

The auditorium's 2,200 seats were expected to be filled for the one-hour-and-45-minute concert, and the lobby already was filled with people at 8 p.m. when Raymond Williams, who represents the orchestra in its Rhode Island ventures, announced that the bad weather and traffic conditions had forced the postponement.

Postponed to March 3, 1964
See Page 112

FRI.- SAT. 15

89 ifteenth Program

N, JA UARY 31, at 2:00 o'clock

AY VENING, FEBRUARY 1, at 8:30 o'clock

LES MUNCH, Conductor

G osso for String Orchestra, Op. 6, No. 4 so – Allegro – Largo e piano – Allegro

Symphony in C major

NTERMISSION

phony No. 3 (Kaddish) for Orchestra, Mixed orus, Boys' Choir, Speaker and Soprano Solo Kaddish I
Kaddish II
male – Kaddish III

(First performance in America)

NEW ENGLAND CONSERVATORY CHORUS, LORNA COOKE DEVARON, Director
COLUMBUS BOYCHOIR, DONALD BRYANT, Director
JENNIE TOUREL, Soprano
FELICIA MONTELEAGRE, Speaker

These concerts will end about 3:45 o'clock on Friday Afternoon; 10:15 o'clock on Saturday Evening.

BALDWIN PIANO

RCA VICTOR RECORDS

[905]

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 194,870

JAN 7 1964

Bernstein's New Symphony To Have U.S. Premiere Here

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will present the first American performance of Leonard Bernstein's Third Symphony, "Kaddish," in Symphony Hall on Jan. 31.

The work, which was commissioned by the Boston Symphony and the Koussevitzky Music Foundation in celebration of the orchestra's 75th anniversary in 1955-56, will be conducted by Charles Munch, who was music director of the orchestra at the time the commission was made.

Erich Leinsdorf, who succeeded Munch in 1962, invited him to conduct this work during one of his scheduled guest appearances of the current season. Bernstein plans to be present for the premiere and to assist in the preparations for it.

The world premiere performance of "Kaddish" took place in Tel Aviv, Israel, on Dec. 10, 1963, the composer conducting. In view of its Jewish theme, he had requested the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Koussevitzky Music Foundation to allow him to present the work first in Israel.

"Kaddish" requires a full orchestra, mixed chorus, boys' choir, soprano soloist and narrator. The New England Conservatory Chorus, Lorna Cooke deVaron, director, and the Columbus Boychoir, Donald Bryant, director, will join the orchestra for this performance. Jennie Tourel, who sang the soprano role in Tel Aviv, will be soloist, and Felicia Montaleagre, who is the composer's wife and an actress, will be narrator.

The text of the Kaddish dates back to ancient times and takes the form of a doxology, or chant of praise to God, and ends with a prayer for peace. In more recent history it has become the traditional Jewish prayer for the dead.

Bernstein has chosen to emphasize the glorification of God and His creation, and the prayer for peace, in his work; and he has added a spoken address to God, of his own composition, which weaves in and out of the music.

The text in Bernstein's "Kaddish" is sung by the soprano and choruses in Aramaic, a Hebrew dialect which was the language of Palestine beginning about 150 years before Christ. The narrator's addresses are in English.

Bernstein's Third Symphony, "Kaddish," bears the following dedication: "To the beloved memory of John Fitzgerald Kennedy."

After its American premiere performance on Jan. 31, the work will be repeated for Boston Symphony Orchestra audiences on Feb. 1, 3, and 4.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Sunday Telegram
WORCESTER, Mass.
Circ. 102,270

DEC 29 1963

Bernstein's 3rd Symphony Set

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

Leonard Bernstein's Third Symphony, "Kaddish," will be given its American premiere on Jan. 31st in Symphony Hall, Boston. The Boston Symphony will be conducted by Charles Munch.

The work was commissioned by the Koussevitzky Music Foundation. Serge Koussevitzky was Bernstein's musical mentor and teacher.

It was with the Foundation's permission that the "Kaddish" Symphony received its world premiere at Tel Aviv, Israel, on Dec. 10th.

The Israel Philharmonic Orchestra was in rehearsal when President Kennedy was assassinated. The symphony then bore the dedication: "To the beloved memory of John F. Kennedy." The coincidence has been pointed out that "Kaddish is a mournful doxology, but it constitutes a prayer for ultimate spiritual peace."

"Kaddish" requires a full symphony orchestra, full chorus of male and female voices, children's chorus, and soprano soloist. It also contains a spoken dialogue with God. Bernstein himself is author of the dialogue.

Bernstein's two previous symphonies were: "Jerimiah," 1942; and "Age of Anxiety," 1949. He was born in Lawrence, Mass., August 25, 1918.

More BSO News

Erich Leinsdorf, Boston Symphony conductor, has been named Musician of the Year by Musical America. This was the result of a poll of the nation's music critics and editors. Leinsdorf's picture will appear on the January issue of the magazine.

Former Boston Symphony conductor, Charles Munch, has been awarded the Grand Prix National du Disque 1964 for his recording with the orchestra of Berlioz' "Romeo and Juliet." Soloists were Rosalind Elias, mezzo-soprano; Giorgio Tozzi, bass; Cesare Valletti, tenor. The chorus was from the New England Conservatory of Music.

Marian Anderson

Next season will be the last for the great lady, Marian Anderson. The famed Negro contralto will retire in the spring of 1965.

One has always felt in the presence of greatness when Miss Anderson came onstage. This has been equally true of her celebrated listeners.

Toscanini once said to her: "Yours is a voice heard one in a hundred years." Sibelius told her: "The roof of my house is too low for your voice." Stanislavsky brought her white lilacs in the depths of a Moscow winter. The King of Thailand broke all precedent by rising from his throne to greet her.

When she sings, Miss Anderson's face mirrors the truths about mankind — her voice is its voice. The last time we heard her in person was at the University of Connecticut, in 1959.

The 400 - plus audience became her disciples when she reached with outspread hands and sang — "He's Got De Whole World in His Hands."

When Miss Anderson was a little girl, she was taught this lesson by her mother: "Prayer begins where human capacity ends."

The Mail Bin

New England Regional Auditions for the Metropolitan Opera will be held, Feb. 8 and 9 at Jordan Hall, Boston. Application blanks may be obtained by writing the Metropolitan Auditions Committee, Junior League of Boston Inc., 117 Newbury St., Boston 16. Deadline for application is Jan. 17.

Israel National Youth Symphony - GADNA, composed of 85 musicians from 16 to 20, will make its first United States appearance in a 40 - city tour during the fall of 1964. The conductor is Shalom Ronly - Riklis, born in Israel in 1922.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Conn. Jewish Ledger
HARTFORD, Conn.
Weekly Jewish
Circ. 16,394

DEC 12 1963

LeonardBernstein Dedicates Work To J. F. Kennedy

TEL AVIV, (JTA) — Leonard Bernstein, famed American - Jewish composer and conductor, announced here that he has dedicated his new symphony, "Kaddish," to "the beloved memory of President John F. Kennedy." Mr. Bernstein said that he will play the new symphony in its world prmiere this week in Jerusalem, where he will conduct the Israeli Philharmonic in the new work.

The maestro told newsmen that the Boston Symphony Orchestra had ordered the work eight years ago, and that it had taken him seven years to complete the symphony. He said that, while all rights to the work had been reserved by the Boston Orchestra, he obtained an agreement that, because of the Jewish character of the symphony, its premiere would take place in Israel.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Times (m)
NEW YORK, N. Y.
Circ. 681,612

DEC 11 1963

ISRAEL APPLAUDS BERNSTEIN WORK

He Conducts at Premiere of Symphony in Tel Aviv

Special to The New York Times

TEL AVIV, Dec. 10—Leonard Bernstein won prolonged applause and favorable press criticism after leading the Israel Philharmonic Orchestra tonight in the world premiere of his third symphony, "Kaddish."

The work had been commissioned by the Koussevitzky Foundation for the Boston Symphony but it acceded to the composer's request to permit the premiere to take place here. Mr. Bernstein's choice of a Jewish theme and his gesture toward the Jewish state patently affected Israelis sentimentally.

"Kaddish" is a doxology, mostly in Aramaic but with some Hebrew phrases, that is best known as a mourner's prayer.

Mr. Bernstein dedicated the work to "the beloved memory of John F. Kennedy."

The symphony, Mr. Bernstein's first since 1954, was written during the last three summers. It is European in tradition with Jewish and American jazz overtones and some orchestral effects.

It has vocal parts for a mixed chorus, a children's choir and a soprano soloist as well as a spoken dialogue with God that weaves in and out of the music. Mr. Bernstein also wrote the spoken text.

In a review prepared for Haaretz, Alexander U. Boskovitch described the symphony as "great human and artistic document." He said the work had a "sublime mastery of musical values and techniques that mad use of all the advantages of our musical age."

The text of "Kaddish" has connotations of mourning but does not speak of death; it speaks of the magnificence of God and is a prayer for peace.

Mr. Bernstein combined the three meanings of the ancient prayer in his spoken text and the music. "Kaddish" is sung three times—by the mixed chorus, by the soloist and finally by everybody.

The conductor said he had submitted the symphony to Jewish scholars, including his father, to assure that religious susceptibilities would not be hurt.

Jennie Tourel was the soloist tonight and Hanna Rovina of the Habimah Theater read a Hebrew translation of Mr. Bernstein's spoken text. In the United States "Kaddish" will be sung in the original Aramaic and Hebrew and the spoken text will be in English.

The choral group, a combination of four choirs, was prepared for Mr. Bernstein by Abraham Kaplan, a young Israeli composer living in New York.

FRI.- SAT. 15

89

Fifteenth Program

...OON, JANUARY 31, at 2:00 o'clock

...RDAY EVENING, FEBRUARY 1, at 8:30 o'clock

...ARLES MUNCH, Conductor

...certo Grosso for String Orchestra, Op. 6, No. 4
...tuoso – Allegro – Largo e piano – Allegro

BIZET ..... Symphony in C major
I. Allegro vivo
II. Adagio
III. Allegro vivace; Trio
IV. Allegro vivace

INTERMISSION

BERNSTEIN ... Symphony No. 3 (Kaddish) for Orchestra, Mixed Chorus, Boys' Choir, Speaker and Soprano Solo
I. Invocation – Kaddish I
II. Din-torah – Kaddish II
III. Scherzo; Finale – Kaddish III

(First performance in America)

NEW ENGLAND CONSERVATORY CHORUS, LORNA COOKE DEVARON, Director
COLUMBUS BOYCHOIR, DONALD BRYANT, Director
JENNIE TOUREL, Soprano
FELICIA MONTELEAGRE, Speaker

These concerts will end about 3:45 o'clock on Friday Afternoon; 10:15 o'clock on Saturday Evening.

BALDWIN PIANO — RCA VICTOR RECORDS

[905]

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Telegram
WORCESTER, Mass.
Circ. 102,270
DEC 29 1963

Bernstein's 3rd Symphony Set

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

Leonard Bernstein's Third Symphony, "Kaddish," will be given its American premiere on Jan. 31st in Symphony Hall, Boston. The Boston Symphony will be conducted by Charles Munch.

The work was commissioned by the Koussevitzky Music Foundation. Serge Koussevitzky was Bernstein's musical mentor and teacher.

It was with the Foundation's permission that the "Kaddish" Symphony received its world premiere at Tel Aviv, Israel, on Dec. 10th.

The Israel Philharmonic Orchestra was in rehearsal when President Kennedy was assassinated. The symphony then bore the dedication: "To the beloved memory of John F. Kennedy." The coincidence has been pointed out that "Kaddish is a mournful doxology, but it constitutes a prayer for ultimate spiritual peace."

"Kaddish" requires a full symphony orchestra, full chorus of male and female voices, children's chorus, and soprano soloist. It also contains a spoken dialogue with God. Bernstein himself is author of the dialogue.

Bernstein's two previous symphonies were: "Jeremiah," 1942, and "Age of Anxiety," 1949. He was born in Lawrence, Mass., August 25, 1918.

More BSO News

Erich Leinsdorf, Boston Symphony conductor, has been named Musician of the Year by Musical America. This was the result of a poll of the nation's music critics and editors. Leinsdorf's picture will appear on the January issue of the magazine.

Former Boston Symphony conductor, Charles Munch, has been awarded the Grand Prix National du Disque 1964 for his recording with the orchestra of Berlioz' "Romeo and Juliet." Soloists were Rosalind Elias, mezzo-soprano; Giorgio Tozzi, bass; Cesare Valletti, tenor. The chorus was from the New England Conservatory of Music.

Marian Anderson

Next season will be the last for the great lady, Marian Anderson. The famed Negro contralto will retire in the spring of 1965.

One has always felt in the presence of greatness when Miss Anderson came onstage. This has been equally true of her celebrated listeners.

Toscanini once said to her: "Yours is a voice heard one in a hundred years." Sibelius told her: "The roof of my house is too low for your voice." Stravinsky brought her white lilacs from the depths of a Moscow winter. The King of Thailand broke all precedent by rising from his throne to greet her.

When she sings, Miss Anderson's face mirrors the truths about mankind — her voice is its voice. The last time we heard her in person was at the University of Connecticut, in 1959.

The 400 - plus audience became her disciples when she reached with outspread hands and sang — "He's Got De Whole World in His Hands."

When Miss Anderson was a little girl, she was taught this lesson by her mother: "Prayer begins where human capacity ends."

The Mail Bin

New England Regional Auditions for the Metropolitan Opera will be held, Feb. 8 and 9 at Jordan Hall, Boston. Application blanks may be obtained by writing the Metropolitan Auditions Committee, Junior League of Boston Inc., 117 Newbury St., Boston 16. Deadline for application is Jan. 17.

Israel National Youth Symphony GADNA, composed of 85 musicians from 16 to 20, will make its first United States appearance in a 40 - city tour during the fall of 1964. The conductor is Shalom Ronly – Rikliis, born in Israel in 1922.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 194,870
JAN 7 1964

Bernstein's New Symphony To Have U.S. Premiere Here

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will present the first American performance of Leonard Bernstein's Third Symphony, "Kaddish," in Symphony Hall on Jan. 31.

The work, which was commissioned by the Boston Symphony and the Koussevitzky Music Foundation in celebration of the orchestra's 75th anniversary in 1955-56, will be conducted by Charles Munch, who was music director of the orchestra at the time the commission was made.

Erich Leinsdorf, who succeeded Munch in 1962, invited him to conduct this work during one of his scheduled guest appearances of the current season. Bernstein plans to be present for the premiere and to assist in the preparations for it.

The world premiere performance of "Kaddish" took place in Tel Aviv, Israel, on Dec. 10, 1963, the composer conducting. In view of its Jewish theme, he had requested the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Koussevitzky Music Foundation to allow him to present the work first in Israel.

"Kaddish" requires a full orchestra, mixed chorus, boys' choir, soprano soloist and narrator. The New England Conservatory Chorus, Lorna Cooke deVaron, director, and the Columbus Boychoir, Donald Bryant, director, will join the orchestra for this performance. Jennie Tourel, who sang the soprano role in Tel Aviv, will be soloist, and Felicia Monteleagre, who is the composer's wife and an actress, will be narrator.

The text of the Kaddish dates back to ancient times and takes the form of a doxology, or chant of praise to God, and ends with a prayer for peace. In more recent history it has become the traditional Jewish prayer for the dead.

Bernstein has chosen to emphasize the glorification of God and His creation, and the prayer for peace, in his work; and he has added a spoken address to God, of his own composition, which weaves in and out of the music.

The text in Bernstein's "Kaddish" is sung by the soprano and choruses in Aramaic, a Hebrew dialect which was the language of Palestine beginning about 150 years before Christ. The narrator's addresses are in English.

Bernstein's Third Symphony, "Kaddish," bears the following dedication: "To the beloved memory of John Fitzgerald Kennedy."

After its American premiere performance on Jan. 31, the work will be repeated for Boston Symphony Orchestra audiences on Feb. 1 [illegible]

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Conn. Jewish Ledger
HARTFORD, Conn.
Weekly Jewish
Circ. 16,394
DEC 12 1963

LeonardBernstein Dedicates Work To J. F. Kennedy

TEL AVIV, (JTA) — Leonard Bernstein, famed American - Jewish composer and conductor, announced here that he has dedicated his new symphony, "Kaddish," to "the beloved memory of President John F. Kennedy." Mr. Bernstein said that he will play the new symphony in its world prmiere this week in Jerusalem, where he will conduct the Israeli Philharmonic in the new work.

The maestro told newsmen that the Boston Symphony Orchestra had ordered the work eight years ago, and that it had taken him seven years to complete the symphony. He said that, while all rights to the work had been reserved by the Boston Orchestra, he obtained an agreement that, because of the Jewish character of the symphony, its premiere would take place in Israel.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Times (m)
NEW YORK, N. Y.
Circ. 681,612
DEC 11 1963

ISRAEL APPLAUDS BERNSTEIN WORK

He Conducts at Premiere of Symphony in Tel Aviv

Special to The New York Times

TEL AVIV, Dec. 10—Leonard Bernstein won prolonged applause and favorable press criticism after leading the Israel Philharmonic Orchestra tonight in the world premiere of his third symphony, "Kaddish."

The work had been commissioned by the Koussevitzky Foundation for the Boston Symphony but it acceded to the composer's request to permit the premiere to take place here. Mr. Bernstein's choice of a Jewish theme and his gesture toward the Jewish state patently affected Israelis sentimentally.

"Kaddish" is a doxology, mostly in Aramaic but with some Hebrew phrases, that is best known as a mourner's prayer.

Mr. Bernstein dedicated the work to "the beloved memory of John F. Kennedy."

The symphony, Mr. Bernstein's first since 1954, was written during the last three summers. It is European in tradition with Jewish and American jazz overtones and some orchestral effects.

It has vocal parts for a mixed chorus, a children's choir and a soprano soloist as well as a spoken dialogue with God that weaves in and out of the music. Mr. Bernstein also wrote the spoken text.

In a review prepared for Haaretz, Alexander U. Boskowitch described the symphony as "a great human and artistic document." He said the work had a "sublime mastery of musical values and techniques that made use of all the advantages of our musical age."

The text of "Kaddish" has connotations of mourning but does not speak of death, it speaks of the magnificence of God and is a prayer for peace.

Mr. Bernstein combined the three meanings of the ancient prayer in his spoken text and the music. "Kaddish" is sung three times—by the mixed chorus, by the soloist and finally by everybody.

The conductor said he had submitted the symphony to Jewish scholars, including his father, to assure that religious susceptibilities would not be hurt.

Jennie Tourel was the soloist tonight and Hanna Rovina of the Habimah Theater read the Hebrew translation of Mr. Bernstein's spoken text. In the United States "Kaddish" will be sung in the original Aramaic and [illegible] and the spoken [illegible] in English.

The choral group, a combination of four choirs, was prepared for Mr. Bernstein by Abraham Kaplan, a young Israeli composer living in New York.

90

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Ledger-Times
BOSTON, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 12,500
JAN 23 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Christian Science
Monitor (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 174,850
JAN 20 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Times (e)
BEVERLY, Mass.
Circ. 8,350

JAN 13 1964

Symphony Premiere For Bernstein Composition

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will present the American premier of Leonard Bernstein's Third Symphony, "Kaddish" in Symphony hall, Boston on Friday, January 31.

The work, which was commissioned by the Boston Syphony Orchestra and the Koussevitsky Music Foundation in celebration of the orchestra's 75th anniversary in 1955-56, will be conducted by Charles Munch, who was music director of the orchestra at the time the commission was made. Bernstein plans to be present for the premiere and to assist in the preparations for it.

"Kaddish" requires a full orchestra, a mixed chorus, boy's choir, soprano soloist and narrator. The New England Conservatory Chorus with Lorna Cook de Varon, director, and the Columbus Boy Choir with Donald Bryant, director, will join the orchestra for this performance.

Jennie Tourel, who sang the soprano role in Tel Aviv, will be soloist, and Felicia Montalegre, who is Bernstein's wife and also a noted actress, will be narrator.

The text of the Kaddish dates back to ancient times and takes the form of a doxology, or chant of praise to God and ends with a prayer for peace. In more recent history it has become the traditional Jewish prayer for the dead. Bernstein's Third Symphony bears the following dedication: "To the beloved memory of John Fitzgerald Kennedy."

After its American premiere performance on January 31, the work will be repeated for Boston Symphony audiences on February 1, 3 and 4.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 465,653
JAN 26 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sun (e)
LOWELL, Mass.
Circ. 45,001
JAN 25 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Herald
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 283,819
JAN 26 1964

Symphony This Week

Munch to Direct Bernstein Music

Charles Munch, who retired in August, 1962, as music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra after 13 years at the post, will return as guest conductor for the next two weeks, at the invitation of his successor, Erich Leinsdorf. It will be his first visit to Boston this season.

At his program on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening Dr. Munch will conduct the American premiere of Leonard Bernstein's Symphony No. 3, "Kaddish," which was commissioned by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Koussevitzky Music Foundation to celebrate the orchestra's 75th Anniversary, 1955-56, during Dr. Munch's tenure.

For this performance the orchestra will be joined by Jennie Tourel, soprano; Felicia Montebagre, speaker, the New England Conservatory Chorus and the Columbus Boychoir. Mr. Bernstein plans to attend the premiere performance and to assist in the preparations for it.

Dr. Munch will begin the concert with Handel's Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra, Op. 6, No. 4 and continue with the Symphony in C major by Bizet. The Bernstein work will conclude the program.

Remains Active

In the year and a half since he left Boston, Dr. Munch has been continuously active as a guest conductor in many parts of the world. He has had engagements in France, Switzerland, Canada, Japan, England, Australia, Italy, and with most of the major orchestras of the United States. He resides in Paris when not traveling.

On Tuesday evening, Mr. Leinsdorf will conduct the orchestra in its fourth concert of the season in Providence, before his departure on a short vacation.

Charles Munch's Friday-Saturday program, including the new Bernstein work, will be repeated on Monday and Tuesday evenings, Feb. 3 and 4, at the regular subscription concerts.

BILLBOARD
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 50,000
JAN 25 1964

* * *

Leonard Bernstein's Third Symphony, "Kaddish," which had it's world premiere in Tel Aviv, will be given its American premiere on January 31 by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Charles Munch returning to the podium for the occasion. The work was commissioned by the Boston Symphony and the Koussevitzky Music Foundation in celebration of the orchestra's 75th anniversary in 1955. Munch was music director of the orchestra at that time and it was on the invitation of Erich Leinsdorf that he will conduct the performance. Bernstein will hopefully be present at the premiere.

The Home News
NEW BRUNSWICK, N. J.
D. 44,936 S. 44,277
FEB 2 1964

BOYCHOIR SINGS BERNSTEIN WORK

Forty boys from Columbus Boychoir School in Princeton, including sevreal from this area, are singing in the American premiere of Leonard Bernstien's new symphony, "The Kaddish," in Boston.

They are appearing with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which commissioned this work by Bernstein. The choir of the New England Conservatory of Music also is performing at the four concerts. Charles Munch is directing the performances, which began Friday and continue through Tuesday.

The world premiere of "The Kaddish" was in Israel last fall.

Columbus Boychoir also will appear in "The Kaddish" when it is presented by the New York Philharmonic under Bernstein's direction on April 9-12. They will record the composition on April 13.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Jewish Advocate
BOSTON, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 35,304
FEB 6 1964

BSO Performs

Bernstein's 'Kaddish' Symphony

By ALLAN SLY

The BSO's fifteenth program brought back Charles Munch, who guided some strings through a Handel Concerto Grosso (Op. 6, No. 4) and trotted, pranced, cantered and galloped a larger body through Bizet's Symphony in C, written when the composer was 17.

These charming diversions had to compete with the customary invasion by latecomers, who were admitted during the Handel and even during the Bizet slow movement; eventually, however, we knuckled down to the serious business of the evening, a long second half, the sensation of the season, the Bernstein Kaddish.

This work has now survived several Boston performances and most readers will have read about it or heard it discussed; many will actually have heard it. My purpose is to describe it for those who did not, in terms which hopefully may engage the interest of those who did.

Bernstein's muse has, over twenty years, fashioned a tonal vehicle for ideas literary, dramatic, philosophic. Kaddish (Symphony No. 3) stems from a religious impulse, though its theology is startling, to say the least.

Hardy's God had forgotten man and his world, had lost interest. Mark Twain's ("Letter From Paradise") was bored with it all. Bernstein postulates a state of affairs (see if this sounds somehow familiar) in which man suspects God of being old, tired, inattentive, even impotent to help him in his extremity. In this agony of distress the eternal feminine force in life undertakes to revive the faltering fatherhood of God; lulls Him into a sleep in which He (God) dreams again of man's potential, then awakens Him with challenges — to renew His own faith in His creation — to observe man's enlarged powers in action, in love, in hope.

This is an oversimplification and there is hardly space here to trace precedents (Job for one) nor to describe how this thesis, developed by a narrator, is cast as a sort of overlay on the traditional Kaddish ritual (solo and choruses). The orchestral function, of course, is a fully woven, sustaining, germinating matrix of audible thought (as in Wagner, as the chorus in Greek tragedy).

It is a lofty and large-scale concept and the enormous apparatus used is apparently necessary. The conceit can be seen as enobling the art of the symphonist, as transmuting concert attendance into a profound reappraisal of humanity's present condition and present prospects. (So, in another day and in different terms, did Wagner conceive of music's social destiny.)

In other opinions, it is asserted that Bernstein's Kaddish is an appalling parade of vulgarity and bad taste. Some shrink from the homely vernacular of his narrator-text; they resent the self-assurance with which he articulates idioms from the musical sidewalks, as it were. Others are scandalized by his unorthodox theology (indeed one wonders if he had rabbinical guidance or if this outbreak was "inner-directed").

An adopted Bostonian takes gleeful pleasure in detecting support from the Back Bay and rejection from Brookline, partisans in the Conservatory Chorus and frigidity across the Charles. Of course, these adverse reactions are rationalized by invoking tenets of musical style and declamation as we hitherto knew them. But where a bold new work is concerned I am tempted to paraphrase an aphorism from the 'Neurotics' Notebook, warning against constructive criticism since constructive praise bears down so hard.

In any event, the vernacular of neither speech nor music bothers me, even if it be to some stumbling block. Is it vulgar to mention seat-belts when the theology gets a bit tough-going?

All performers surpassed themselves. How Dr. Munch assimilated a work of such uncompromising virtuosity is one marvel; others are: the self-immolation undertaken by the narrator—Felicia Monteleagre; the ritualist role of Jennie Tourel; the polished singing of the Columbus Boychoir, the hair-raising performance of the New England Conservatory Chorus; the prodigies of percussion playing, the high brasses, the priestlike strings. Another marvel of performance, of course, is the overcoming of notational problems by the composer, but back of it all is a capacity for musical evolvement that staggers the imagination. Bernstein handles the sophisticated musical language of our times with aplomb, but with purpose. One example — the angular theme of frustration and despair becomes "by extension" the theme of ultimate salvation in love, hope and joy.

This is probably the instinctive aim of the composer — to induce in the listener a state of enlarged understanding, of hope in despair. Those Saturday night patrons who rushed for the exits will need to find other ways of reaching this happy frame of mind — many alternatives can be found. But concertgoers who could hang on to their hats (to use another vulgarism) had much to take away with them. If one recalls Bernstein's succesive larger compositions since the '40's one perceives a remarkable tenacity of purpose and an exploration beyond the established usages of our musical resources. On this point there seems to be general agreement. Opinions differ as to the validity of what Bernstein brings back with him from across the frontier. Each listener must decide for himself.

NEW YORK, N.Y.
VILLAGE VOICE
W. 18,600
FEB 6 1964

PLEASURE AND PAIN

In Boston last weekend Leonard Bernstein's Third Symphony ("Kaddish") had its first American performances by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on a tidal wave of publicity, and Daniel Pinkham's Concertante No. 4 (for organ, brass, and percussion) had its world premiere in circumstances that could almost be described as secretive. It was the Pinkham score which made the weekend.

The Concertante had been written specially for two concerts Sunday dedicating the new Peabody Memorial Organ at King's Chapel, of which Mr. Pinkham is music director. This famous church has a long and worthy history, and the concert of old and new music Mr. Pinkham had prepared and the flexible and eloquent new instrument built by Charles Fisk were and are something of which King's Chapel and Boston itself may well be proud.

Mr. Pinkham's piece might be described as ruggedly conservative. He never seems to lose sight of tonality, but he uses his traditional tools of composition in quite his own way. The three movements ("Canzona," "Procession," and "Plaint") are elaborate structures built on terse, extremely energized motifs, and the separations and mixings of the organ, brass (on and off stage), drum, cymbal, and gong timbres are fascinating in themselves.

Leonard Raver, organist at Pennsylvania State University, played this music and pieces by Couperin, Bach, Buxtehude, Persichetti, and others with a good deal of excitement.

Mr. Bernstein's new symphony reveals in heightened dimensions his "Mahler complex." Not that the music itself in any way imitates the great Viennese composer-conductor's towering symphonies. The resemblance lies in the apparent attempt to talk to God through music. Excluding musical considerations completely for the moment, one difference between the two men is that, while Mahler spoke as a child to God (the Second and Fourth Symphonies), Mr. Bernstein talks to Him as if to scold Him for not listening to the conductor's television lectures. The long spoken script, written by Mr. Bernstein and emoted by his wife, Felicia Monteleagre, might well have been titled, "Rabbi Strangelove, or: How God Learned to Stop Worrying and Love Lenny."

New Bernstein

The music, at least, is uneven. It uses a large orchestra, two choruses (at the Boston concerts the New England Conservatory Chorus and Columbus Boychoir), and soprano soloist (mezzo Jennie Tourel extending her normal range and singing all the way through with great musicianship and intensity). There is a lot of aural spectacle. There is also some 12-tone writing here and there that has a Bergian eloquence to it. But most of it deals with those 5-4-1-etc. sweeps of melody that sounded fine in "On the Waterfront" and "West Side Story," but tend, in a musico-religious attempt such as this symphony, to coat the marshmallow with inedible tinsel.

—Leighton Kerner

The New York Times
D. 681,612 S. 1,304,447
FEB 1 1964

Music: Bernstein's Symphony No. 3

Premiere of 'Kaddish' Given in Boston

Charles Munch Leads in Symphony Hall

By ROSS PARMENTER
Special to The New York Times

BOSTON, Jan. 31 — Leonard Bernstein's Symphony No. 3 "Kaddish," which was introduced in Tel Aviv on Dec. 10, had its first performance in America this afternoon. It was presented by the Boston Symphony, which had hoped to have the work to celebrate its 75th anniversary eight years ago.

Charles Munch, who was the orchestra's conductor at that time, led the work today. No one seemed bothered by the delay. Instead, one got the impression of gratitude that it was here. At the end the audience, which filled Symphony Hall, stood and cheered.

•

The enthusiasm was just as marked on the stage. In fact, the chief participants, with Mr. Bernstein at the center, were engulfed in applause. The members of the orchestra and all the singers applauded as fervently as the audience. Since both the New England Conservatory Chorus and the Columbus Boychoir were involved, the stage plaudits added considerably to the ovation.

This listener, however, had mixed feelings with more running con than pro. The 50-minute work is not really a symphony at all. Rather, it is part oratorio and part dramatic monologue. The recited part, indeed, bulked so large that it is almost as much a literary work as a musical one.

Mr. Bernstein has created a central character who identifies herself as the Lily of Sharon. She is an embodiment of "that part of man that refuses death. Felicia Montealegre, Mr. Bernstein's wife, enacted this role and this is how the character opens the work:

"Oh, Holy Father, ancient hallowed lonely disappointed Father, angry wrinkled old Majesty, I want to pray."

•

Thereafter, she prays publicly all through the piece. To one listener she began unsympathetically by almost shouting, "Listen, Almighty, with all your might." Later she cries, "Amen, did you hear that, Father?" Later, when her fever passes, she asks, "Have I hurt you, Father?"

Then she offers to sing to him. At this point Jennie Tourel, the soprano soloist, stood up and keened a sort of lullaby. Then the narrator has a dream of heaven with lambs frisking. Finally, she concludes, "We are in this thing together, you and I. You can no longer afford my death. I shall continue to create you and you me."

Shades of Lilith in George Bernard Shaw's "Back to Methuselah!" And in the music there are plenty of shades of Stravinsky, Debussey and Ravel. The music is decidedly more palatable than the text, where it had a good deal of rhythmic invention. There were exciting climaxes, a number of choral passages were lovely, and always the tone paintings, as in the vision of heaven and the contrasting chilly dawn, were vivid.

The work drves its name from the traditional Jewish prayer chanted for the dead. Its text, sung in Aramaic, weaves through the dramatic monologue.

Mr. Bernstein's previous symphonies are No. 1, "Jeremiah," introduced in 1944, and No. 2, "Age of Anxiety," introduced in 1949. Their success, and the fact that the composer has contributed to the musical stage in the meanwhile, led to a good deal of interest in how this new serious work was going to turn out.

•

Whether the spoken text will grate on others as it becomes more familiar remains to be seen. But this reviewer kept wishing he could have had only the music, for so much of it was expressive and interesting. The amplified spoken voice of Miss Montealegre kept seeming like an interruption, besides necessitating constant shifts of aural focus.

Mr. Bernstein was orchestrating the final Amen section on Nov. 22. Because of the events of that fatal day, he has dedicated the work "to the beloved memory of John F. Kennedy." The orchestra will repeat it agian tomorrow, Monday and Tuesday.

NEWSWEEK 2/10/64

The Prodigal Returns

"Magnified and sanctified be His great name," chants the chorus in Hebrew, and magnified Leonard Bernstein's third symphony, "Kaddish," certainly is. But the question of sanctity became controversial last week after the American première of the gigantic work in Boston's Symphony Hall. After two final glissandi whipsawed the raw nerves of the audience, there was dead silence. Then a wild tumult broke out, but was it the accolade of art or show business?

"Exciting!" was the sound most heard after the Bernstein sound died away. Backstage into the Green Room crowded living arpeggios of booted, mink-swathed lady subscribers. When the kissing had to stop, almost an hour had gone by, and then the handsome, gray-templed composer-conductor-comet could embrace his happy wife.

Actress Felicia Montealegre Bernstein had been an important part of the vast forces conducted by former Boston Symphony director Charles Munch during the long-awaited event. In a long white dress, blond head thrown back, arms flung out, she, as the Narrator, palavered with God, much as an intelligent woman might negotiate with a well-meaning but slightly mixed-up husband. She wants to praise God, she says at the start, because time is short. But in the second of the work's three parts, she scolds: "This time, you show me nothing." "You're bargaining with man," she accuses, and the huge orchestra jazzily wastes a little eternity.

But "Kaddish," based on the Hebrew prayer for the dead, inevitably moves to an upbeat ending. After soprano Jennie Tourel sings a lullaby that Bernstein calls a "Pieta," the orchestra shakes and shatters every theme in the work, so that the chaos of sound can eventuate in a folk-melody which signifies acceptance and simplicity. The finale is a jubilant fugue in which everybody —musicians, mixed chorus, boys' choir— purges every trace of negation and dissonance. "It should be organized mud," said Bernstein.

Mud, unorganized, hurtled toward Bernstein from some critical quarters. "Can the Narrator really have said 'Do I have your attention, majestic father?'" wondered new Boston Globe critic Michael Steinberg. But The Boston Herald's Robert Taylor proclaimed: "The prodigal son came home yesterday to redeem the promise of his youth."

"Kaddish" is dedicated "to the beloved memory of John Fitzgerald Kennedy." "I had just reached the final amens," said Bernstein, "when the assassination occurred. It seemed too much to bear . . ." But it seemed that Bernstein's "Kaddish" was more "J.B." than Job. "It's the sort of thing you can visualize on Cinemascope," said a violinist. Perhaps most pertinently, another musician thought, "it is the Kaddish of this generation with the dissonances and broken phrases of youth."

February 10, 1964

97

TIME
NEW YORK, N.Y.
W 2,737,925

FEB 7 1964

MUSIC

COMPOSERS

Boy with Cheek

"Listen, Almighty, with all your might," cries the speaker, shouting her furious prayer over the orchestra's anguished scream. "You show me nothing at all," she tells God, and the orchestra blares Amen. But that seems a bit stiff. "Have I hurt you, Father?" she inquires, then offers him the comfort of a nice lullaby. As the song ends, cosmic loneliness returns, and the existential monologue continues with the orchestra fast on its heels. At last a kind of accommodation is achieved. "We are in this thing together," the speaker tells God: "You and I."

Taking such a sharp and familiar tone with God would be called chutzpah in Yiddish, but what Leonard Bernstein intended for his Third Symphony was a musical statement of Kaddish, the Jewish prayer for the dead. Bernstein's Kaddish was commissioned for the Boston Symphony Orchestra's 75th anniversary eight years ago, but it was not until three years ago that Lenny was gripped with "this horrible sense of imminent destruction," and finally buckled down to work. Last week Boston finally played its Kaddish.

MILTON FEINBERG

MUNCH & BERNSTEIN
"Beaucoup mieux, Charles."

Curious Whimper. The 50-minute work, performed without interruption, is more an oratorio than a symphony, with speaker (Bernstein's wife, Actress Felicia Montealegre), soprano (Jennie Tourel), the New England Conservatory Chorus, the Columbus Boychoir and a drastically altered orchestra: 17 string players were crowded off the platform to make way for a percussion section that had to mun five timpani, three side drums, a bass drum, four kinds of cymbals, a tam-tam, three bongos, three temple blocks, a wood block, sandpaper blocks, rasp, whip, ratchet, triangle, maracas, claves, tambourine, chimes, glockenspiel, xylophone, vibraphone, celesta, piano and harp. Charles Munch, God bless him, conducted.

With such an ensemble, the Boston was committed to Kaddish up to its ears. Bernstein had come to town to cajole and kibitz while poor Munch tried to lead rehearsals. "Beaucoup mieux, Charles," Lenny called down from the balcony, then finally took the baton himself for one of the last run-throughs. "Wonderful! Marvelous! Beyond my greatest expectation!" Lenny cried when all was ready. And indeed, when the music dissolved into the curious whimper that closes the work, Boston's well-dowagered matinee audience gave Bernstein and all the performers a nonstop 15-minute ovation.

Sheepish Thunder. Boston liked Kaddish better than Tel Aviv did when Bernstein took it there for its December première. Few Israelis could accept what they called "this American Kaddish"; when the cantor chants the Kaddish in the synagogue, it is with a cry, not with the hand-clapping Lenny prescribed for the choruses. Said one Israeli critic: "It's philosophy, it's drama, it may even be music, but it certainly is not Kaddish."

Bernstein conceives of the prayer as less a lament for the dead than an affirmation of life in the face of death, a celebration of God at the very moment when his mystery is the most difficult to bear. This dualistic concept gives his music a savage, struggling complexity, in which great orchestral thunder dies under the thumb of fragmentary jazz melodies, then resolves itself in intricate contrapuntal passages for both chorus and orchestra. But Bernstein does not settle on any idiom long enough to perfect it. Because his concentration span is short to the point of dilettantism, he achieves with all his battalions of singers and musicians only the affectation of beauty.

Worse, his metaphysics overwhelms his music—the orchestra does little more than italicize the words of the speaker, and the emotional flow of the music follows the text almost sheepishly. The despair he portrays is only the despair of the prideful; drama is merely melodrama. Bernstein is a man of both cheek and genius; and in this case, the composer in him has been no more than the advocate of the showman, the charmer, the chap in the chukka boots shouting down from the balcony.

wEngland Newsclip Agency, Inc.
x 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Berkshire Eagle (e)
PITTSFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 29,087

FEB 1 1964

Leonard Bernsteins Symphony No. 3

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

BOSTON—Leonard Bernstein has used an immense canvas for his latest composition—his Symphony No. 3 which he has given the title of "Kaddish," a Jewish song of mourning.

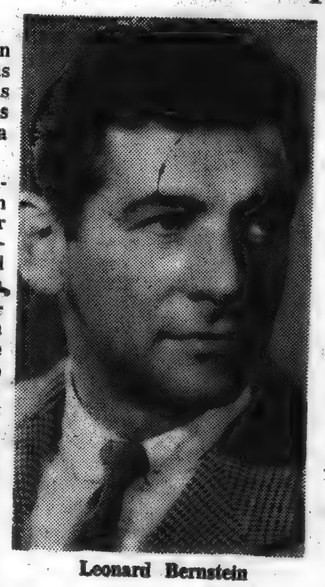
Its first American performance yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall in Boston under the baton of Charles Munch, returning to his previously-held post of director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for a two-week guest engagement, was a brilliant feat of control. He gave shape and breathed fire into Bernstein's truly marvelous score and the 44 minute symphony, in three movements played without pause, roused an auditorium filled to its greatest potential, to heights of excitement.

* * *

THE SYMPHONY has many details of similarity in scope to the War Requiem of Britten. It requires much the same batteries of musical troops, huge orchestra, mixed chorus and a boys' choir, a soprano soloist and a speaker.

While Bernstein's "West Side Story" is a far cry from this "Kaddish," there is at the base of each a sociological urge. Both show the composer to be a man concerned with the lot of his fellow man and both propose to do something about it, as antipodal as may be the paths.

Bernstein received a commission from the Koussevitzky Music Foundation seven years ago, in 1955, to write a major work for the 75th anniversary of the Boston Symphony, which would have been the following year, 1956. He obviously was a little tardy but as he was finishing it last November, the assassination occurred and he immediately dedicated it to the memory of President John Kennedy with whom he had had so much in common. They were both Boston boys of nearly an age and Harvard graduates, and each in his way was proud of his background and heritage, and mildly defiant of both their respective religious and racial aspects.



Leonard Bernstein

* * *

FOR SPEAKER, Bernstein chose his wife, Felicia Montealegre, and a more articulate and eloquent one, in our opinion, could not exist for the message he had assigned her. She spoke with the fervor and conviction, not of an actress, but of the embodiment of the spirit of the woman who by intuition pleads to the Lord for peace. Her lines are mainly in English although there were several phrases in Hebrew. The chorus sang in Hebrew and Aramaic.

The soprano soloist was Jennie Tourel who had also sung the part at the symphony's world premiere in Tel Aviv in December. Her aria does not come until the second movement but it is a remarkably effective bit of writing and she gave it a vocalization as lofty as the text she was furnished. Her only other opportunity is to state the fugal subject in the finale of the symphony and only here was there any suspicion of writing which did not give advantage to the medium selected. In all and every other instance Bernstein's sense of instrumentation and of sound values served him pre-eminently well.

In the main it is diatonic writing but the dissonances are deeply grateful to the ear. Munch achieved an impact where it was telling which swept the performers along as on the tail of a comet. Where Bernstein uses a 12-note series he makes it sound as though nothing else would do as well.

* * *

HIS RHYTHMS are engaging and often irregular. One can detect the same hand in that area as was used so memorably in "West Side Story." He uses many devices which enhance the force of his music: woodblocks, humming in the chorus and even after-beat hand-claps by the singers, and in the final exaltation piercing trumpets are the only sounds which could express the near-desperation of the music's appeal.

The composer had been in Boston helping in the preparation of the symphony and Munch would not acknowledge the triumph until Bernstein came out for the general and frenzied accolade the audience was eager to show him. There are several sections of this music which will stand alone on their own musical integrity but the coherence of the conception and the fortunate executants Boston could supply made this a milestone in the lives of everyone concerned.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Herald (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 178,553
FEB 1 1964

The Symphony

'Kaddish' Reveals Bernstein Genius

By ROBERT TAYLOR

The prodigal son came home yesterday to redeem the promise of his youth. With his Symphony No. 3. ('Kaddish'), which received a momentous and magnificent American premiere under the guest conductorship of Charles Munch, Leonard Bernstein has at last fulfilled himself as a serious composer.

So long has Mr. Bernstein occupied the role of the flawed genius that his triumph must be regarded as the release of a talent freed from the lashings of its own facility. He has often abused his gifts but he has not exhausted them. He has seemingly preferred the instant recognitions of the stage, the musical polemicist, the re-creative artist, to the arduous, private and terrible confrontations of the creator.

His Contribution

He has made a contribution to our musical culture through the valid medium of Broadway musical comedy; but till now he has not emerged as the symphonic composer presaged by the "Jeremiah" Symphony over two decades ago.

The "Kaddish" Symphony harks back to the Biblical meter of the "Jeremiah's" lamentations; but also exhibits some of the restless dissonance of the composer's Second Symphony, "The Age of Anxiety." Dedicated to 'the beloved memory of John F. Kennedy,' it is a belatedly-fulfilled commission for the Koussevitsky Musical Foundation as part of the Boston Symphony's 75th anniversary. The wait was worthwhile.

While the Symphony No. 3 can be said to absorb the expressive techniques of Mr. Bernstein's first two symphonies, it speaks a fresh and vital emotive language. The 'Kaddish', or Sanctification, the prayer chanted for the dead at all Judaic liturgies, carries a vast, meaningful connotation, both as mourning and as a celebration of the divinity of life.

Oratorio Frame

The composer sets the text within the musical and dramatic framework of oratorio, and the prayer is presented through the words of a speaker, through massed voices gathered in sorrow, jubilance and affirmation, through mezzo-soprano soloist who sings the sacred cadences ordinarily designated to men in the temple.

The tri-partite design is fundamentally narrative, with the narrator imploring, exhorting, and addressing God in terms of profound intimacy. The score comments on the emotional surge, which rushes from anger to humility to exaltation; and at times, molded to the natural inflections of spoken English, becomes the chief agent of a dramatic soliloquy.

Mr. Bernstein's stylistic garb is often eclectic, but he brings an overwhelming rhythmic invention, vivid and evocative orchestration and a spacing of sonorities to his writing, attaining an idiomatic warmth, Stravinsky, Strauss and Mahler color various passages; and in a section describing the pastoral glories of paradise the parallel to the Wunderhorn movement of Mahler's Fourth is evident. The closest relationship, however, is more to the tumult and the bedizened vitality of such a work as Walton's "Belshazzar's Feast."

Percussive Battery

The instrumentation includes a huge percussive battery (five timpani, sandpaper blocks, three bongos, three temple-blocks, rasp, finger cymbals, and scores of other exotic hues), high registered brass, a whole woodwind family and string orchestra.

The harmonics use atonality as an expression of anguish; but the diatonic prevails and its spontaneity has a smashing impact. Among the glories of this music is the tranquil mezzo-soprano solo which Jennie Tourel presented with such regal resplendence; a quarter-century ago her voice was opulent; today it is even more so.

To Felicia Monteleagre must go much of the credit, also for a performance as the speaker, in which the dynamics of the speeches were realized with an exquisite sense of timing and stress. She was no less than inspired.

Yet all the forces involved, the New England Conservatory Chorus, Columbus Boychoir, orchestra and conductor, merit superlatives; and the moving scene, when Mr. Bernstein appeared amid a thunder of applause and embraced Dr. Munch, must forever remain etched on this premiere. The composer is no longer young. It is not given to every man to realize a second creative life; but then, not every man is an artist of Mr. Bernstein's order.

Considering the excitement engendered by the 'Kaddish' Symphony, there is little space to comment on the happy return of the former conductor, Dr. Munch, who received a rising homage upon his entrance, led an excellent reading of the neglected Handel Concerto Grosso No. 4, and a briskly-paced, transparent account of Bizet's cheerful and melodic Symphony in C.

Next weekend, though, offers a characteristically Gallic program in which he excels: the Berlioz Fantastic Symphony; Ravel's Concerto, with Nicole Henriot-Schweitzer as the piano soloist; and Roussel's Symphony No. 3, in G Minor.

The Program

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch conducting, presented the 15th program of the 83rd season yesterday in Symphony Hall. Jennie Tourel, soprano, was the soloist, Felicia Monteleagre, narrator of the "Kaddish" Symphony of Bernstein. The program will be repeated tonight at 8:30.

Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra, Op. 6, No. 4 ..... Handel
Symphony in C Major ..... Bizet
Symphony No. 3 ("Kaddish"), for Orchestra, Mixed Chorus, Boys' Choir, Speaker, and Soprano Solo .... Bernstein

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Christian Science
Monitor (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 174,850
FEB 1 1964

Bernstein's 'Kaddish' in U.S. première

By Harold Rogers

Once upon a time at Symphony Hall there was a man named Serge Koussevitsky who had a protégé named Leonard Bernstein; and when they made music—together or separately—exciting things happened.

Things were nearly always exciting when Koussevitsky or Bernstein gave us a première. These weren't occasions to be shrugged at and turned from; they were events to be discussed, hotly argued, rabidly championed.

Such dear dead days, thank heaven, are not beyond recall; now and again something happens to make us feel the old electricity, and something happened Friday afternoon to quicken the pulse when Bernstein's "Kaddish"—his Third Symphony—was given its U.S. première by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Here again is something that can be hotly argued, rabidly championed. Let sword strike against swords; let sparks fly wild! But the fact remains that Bernstein has brought forth a fine new work of emotional thrust, of dramatic power.

♪ ♪ ♪

Composed for full orchestra, narrator, soprano, chorus, and boys choir, "Kaddish" takes the form of a long prayer—a prayer both primitive in its concept and highly sophisticated in its language, a prayer that both disturbs by the confusion of its theology and thrills by the audacity of its presentation.

In his notes on this work Jack Gottlieb has given us a key that may unlock the mystery that Mr. Bernstein's "Kaddish" presents to the non-Jew:

"Mr. Bernstein feels strongly the peculiar Jewishness of this man-God relationship: in the whole mythic concept of the Jew's love of God, from Moses to the Hassidic sect, there is a deep personal intimacy which allows things to be said to God that are almost inconceivable in another religion."

♪ ♪ ♪

It is difficult for many of us to conceive, for instance, of an anthropomorphic God, or of God created in the image and likeness of a human being. It is difficult for some of us to imagine a prayer in which God is charged with the possession of human frailties, with inability to hold His universe in order. It is difficult for us to imagine a prayer in which man must command God's attention, to shout to gain His ear.

Yet this is the God we find in Mr. Bernstein's "Kaddish"—a tribal Jehovah, a magnified mortal, a vindictive Father, "an old wrinkled majesty." But if we accept God in these limited terms—at least for the duration of this work—we can participate in what must be one of the most fascinating prayers ever to be uttered in a concert hall:

"I want to pray, and the time is short . . .

"Surely you can bring order to this dazed speck . . .

"I am that part of you that defines your immortality, that part of you that refuses death . . .

"Your bargain was tin and crumbles in my hand . . .

"Forgive me, Father, I am mad with fever . . . in fever I forgot that you, too, were vulnerable . . .

"Sleep, my Father, rest your anger, dream softly . . .

"This is your heaven, every immortal cliché in place . . .

"Behold, Father, the rainbow I have created for you! Have faith! Believe! Oh, God, believe in me and you shall see the kingdom of heaven!"

And so at the conclusion we have man declaring that he has created God as much as God has created man, that they are mutually dependent, give mutual comfort.

Thus the music ends in peace and glory.

♪ ♪ ♪

Mr. Bernstein's work is as extraordinary musically as it is theologically. It is a mature piece of composition; the eclectic lines, if any, are blurred: it represents the composer at his most serious and at his finest.

Vocal outbursts on behalf of the narrator (in this instance Felicia Monteleagre, Mr. Bernstein's wife) are matched by angry protestations on the part of the orchestra and chorus; never has the word Amen been so acridly set to notes.

At such times the music is apt to become completely atonal, with percussive punctuation, asymmetrical rhythms, polyrythms, augmentations, diminutions—name it, and he's done it. At other times—when the prayer becomes more repentant and contemplative—the music become tonal, serene, aspiring, lyrical.

Thus Mr. Bernstein has called upon the ancient and the modern in music to match the ancient Kaddish and his modern interpretation of it. He has successfully brought these disparate elements into a unified whole.

The work was conducted with vigor and élan by Charles Munch, in Boston for two weeks as the Boston Symphony's guest. The soprano solos by Jennie Tourel, though uttered in a voice no longer in its prime, were filled with heartfelt desire. Miss Monteleagre's monologue was stirring for its polemics. The New England Conservatory Chorus, trained by Lorna Cooke de Varon, discharged its duties with verve; and the Columbus Boychoir is to be commended for its flawless passages.

Mr. Bernstein was on hand to give his personal thanks to his wife, Miss Tourel, Dr. Munch, the orchestra, the singers, and to receive the cheering approval of his listeners.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Berkshire Eagle (e)
PITTSFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 29,087
FEB 1 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Journal (m)
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
Circ. 61,299
FEB 1 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Telegram (m)
WORCESTER, Mass.
Circ. 59,451
FEB 1 1964

Hub Symphony In Premiere of Bernstein Work

Boston — (UPI) — The Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday played the American premiere of Leonard Bernstein's Symphony No. 3, subtitled "Kaddish."

Charles Munch was guest conductor for the occasion with Bernstein's wife, actress Felicia Montealegre, as speaker. The work was commissioned for the orchestra's 75th anniversary season, 1955-1956, when Munch was music director.

Bernstein, music director of the New York Philharmonic, was in Symphony Hall for the premiere and helped in its rehearsal. The new England Conservatory Chorus and Columbus Boy Choir sang in the work which had its world premiere at Tel Aviv, Israel, last Dec. 10, with Bernstein conducting.

The symphony was commissioned by the orchestra and by the Koussevitzsky Foundation.

Bernstein, a native of Lawrence, Mass., was a protege of the late Serge Koussevitzsky for 25 years musical director of the Boston Symphony.

TIGHT BINDING

93

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Herald (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 178,553

FEB 1 1964

The Symphony

'Kaddish' Reveals Bernstein Genius

By ROBERT TAYLOR

The prodigal son came home yesterday to redeem the promise of his youth. With his Symphony No. 3, ('Kaddish'), which received a momentous and magnificent American premiere under the guest conductorship of Charles Munch, Leonard Bernstein has at last fulfilled himself as a serious composer.

So long has Mr. Bernstein occupied the role of the flawed genius that his triumph must be regarded as the release of a talent freed from the lashings of its own facility. He has often abused his gifts but he has not exhausted them. He has seemingly preferred the instant recognitions of the stage, the musical polemicist, the re-creative artist, to the arduous, isolate and terrible confrontations of the creator.

His Contribution

He has made a contribution to our musical culture through the valid medium of Broadway musical comedy; but till now he has not emerged as the symphonic composer presaged by the "Jeremiah" Symphony over two decades ago.

The "Kaddish" Symphony harks back to the Biblical meter of the "Jeremiah's" lamentations; but also exhibits some of the restless dissonance of the composer's Second Symphony, "The Age of Anxiety." Dedicated to 'the beloved memory of John F. Kennedy,' it is a belatedly-fulfilled commission for the Koussevitsky Musical Foundation as part of the Boston Symphony's 75th anniversary. The wait was worthwhile.

While the Symphony No. 3 can be said to absorb the expressive techniques of Mr. Bernstein's first two symphonies, it speaks a fresh and vital emotive language. The 'Kaddish', or Sanctification, the prayer chanted for the dead at all Judaic liturgies, carries a vast, meaningful connotation, both as mourning and as a celebration of the divinity of life.

Oratorio Frame

The composer sets the text within the musical and dramatic framework of oratorio, and the prayer is presented through the words of a speaker, through massed voices gathered in sorrow, jubilance and affirmation, through mezzo-soprano soloist who sings the sacred cadences ordinarily designated to men in the temple.

The tri-partite design is fundamentally narrative, with the narrator imploring, exhorting, and addressing God in terms of profound intimacy. The score comments on the emotional surge, which rushes from anger to humility to exaltation; and at times, molded to the natural inflections of spoken English, becomes the chief agent of a dramatic soliloquy.

Mr. Bernstein's stylistic garb is often eclectic, but he brings an overwhelming rhythmic invention, vivid and evocative orchestration and a spacing of sonorities to his writing, attaining an idiomatic warmth, Stravinsky, Strauss and Mahler color various passages; and in a section describing the pastoral glories of paradise the parallel to the Wunderhorn movement of Mahler's Fourth is evident. The closest relationship, however, is more to the tumult and the bedizened vitality of such a work as Walton's "Belshazzar's Feast."

Percussive Battery

The instrumentation includes a huge percussive battery (five timpani, sandpaper blocks, three bongos, three temple-blocks, rasp, finger cymbals, and scores of other exotic hues), high registered brass, a whole woodwind family and string orchestra.

The harmonics use atonality as an expression of anguish; but the diatonic prevails and its spontaneity has a smashing impact. Among the glories of this music is the tranquil mezzo-soprano solo which Jennie Tourel presented with such regal resplendence; a quarter-century ago her voice was opulent; today it is even more so.

To Felicia Monteleagre must go much of the credit, also for a performance as the speaker, in which the dynamics of the speeches were realized with an exquisite sense of timing and stress. She was no less than inspired.

Yet all the forces involved, the New England Conservatory Chorus, Columbus Boychoir, orchestra and conductor, merit superlatives; and the moving scene, when Mr. Bernstein appeared amid a thunder of applause and embraced Dr. Munch, must forever remain etched on this premiere. The composer is no longer young. It is not given to every man to realize a second creative life; but then, not every man is an artist of Mr. Bernstein's order.

Considering the excitement engendered by the 'Kaddish' Symphony, there is little space to comment on the happy return of the former conductor, Dr. Munch, who received a rising homage upon his entrance, led an excellent reading of the neglected Handel Concerto Grosso No. 4, and a briskly-paced, transparent account of Bizet's cheerful and melodic Symphony in C.

Next weekend, though, offers a characteristically Gallic program in which he excels: the Berlioz Fantastic Symphony; Ravel's Concerto, with Nicole Henriot-Schweitzer as the piano soloist; and Roussel's Symphony No. 3, in G Minor.

The Program

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch conducting, presented the 15th program of the 83rd season yesterday in Symphony Hall. Jennie Tourel, soprano, was the solist, Felicia Monteleagre, narrator of the "Kaddish" Symphony of Bernstein. The program will be repeated tonight at 8:30.

Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra, Op. 6, No. 4 ..... Handel
Symphony in C Major ..... Bizet
Symphony No. 3 ("Kaddish"), for Orchestra, Mixed Chorus, Boys' Choir, Speaker, and Soprano Solo .... Bernstein

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Christian Science
Monitor (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 174,850

FEB 1 1964

Bernstein's 'Kaddish' in U.S. première

By Harold Rogers

Once upon a time at Symphony Hall there was a man named Serge Koussevitsky who had a protégé named Leonard Bernstein; and when they made music—together or separately—exciting things happened.

Things were nearly always exciting when Koussevitsky or Bernstein gave us a première. These weren't occasions to be shrugged at and turned from; they were events to be discussed, hotly argued, rabidly championed.

Such dear dead days, thank heaven, are not beyond recall; now and again something happens to make us feel the old electricity, and something happened Friday afternoon to quicken the pulse when Bernstein's "Kaddish"—his Third Symphony—was given its U.S. première by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Here again is something that can be hotly argued, rabidly championed. Let sword strike against swords; let sparks fly wild! But the fact remains that Bernstein has brought forth a fine new work of emotional thrust, of dramatic power.

♪ ♪ ♪

Composed for full orchestra, narrator, soprano, chorus, and boys choir, "Kaddish" takes the form of a long prayer—a prayer both primitive in its concept and highly sophisticated in its language, a prayer that both disturbs by the confusion of its theology and thrills by the audacity of its presentation.

In his notes on this work Jack Gottlieb has given us a key that may unlock the mystery that Mr. Bernstein's "Kaddish" presents to the non-Jew:

"Mr. Bernstein feels strongly the peculiar Jewishness of this man-God relationship: in the whole mythic concept of the Jew's love of God, from Moses to the Hassidic sect, there is a deep personal intimacy which allows things to be said to God that are almost inconceivable in another religion."

♪ ♪ ♪

It is difficult for many of us to conceive, for instance, of an anthropomorphic God, or of God created in the image and likeness of a human being. It is difficult for some of us to imagine a prayer in which God is charged with the possession of human frailties, with inability to hold His universe in order. It is difficult for us to imagine a prayer in which man must command God's attention, to shout to gain His ear.

Yet this is the God we find in Mr. Bernstein's "Kaddish"—a tribal Jehovah, a magnified mortal, a vindictive Father, "an old wrinkled majesty." But if we accept God in these limited terms—at least for the duration of this work—we can participate in what must be one of the most fascinating prayers ever to be uttered in a concert hall:

"I want to pray, and the time is short . . .

"Surely you can bring order to this dazed speck . . .

"I am that part of you that defines your immortality, that part of you that refuses death . . .

"Your bargain was tin and crumbles in my hand . . .

"Forgive me, Father, I am mad with fever . . . in fever I forgot that you, too, were vulnerable . . .

"Sleep, my Father, rest your anger, dream softly . . .

"This is your heaven, every immortal cliché in place . . .

"Behold, Father, the rainbow I have created for you! Have faith! Believe! Oh, God, believe in me and you shall see the kingdom of heaven!"

And so at the conclusion we have man declaring that he has created God as much as God has created man, that they are mutually dependent, give mutual comfort.

Thus the music ends in peace and glory.

♪ ♪ ♪

Mr. Bernstein's work is as extraordinary musically as it is theologically. It is a mature piece of composition; the eclectic lines, if any, are blurred: it represents the composer at his most serious and at his finest.

Vocal outbursts on behalf of the narrator (in this instance Felicia Monteleagre, Mr. Bernstein's wife) are matched by angry protestations on the part of the orchestra and chorus: never has the word Amen been so acridly set to notes.

At such times the music is apt to become completely atonal, with percussive punctuation, asymmetrical rhythms, polyrythms, augmentations, diminutions—name it, and he's done it. At other times—when the prayer becomes more repentant and contemplative—the music become tonal, serene, aspiring, lyrical.

Thus Mr. Bernstein has called upon the ancient and the modern in music to match the ancient Kaddish and his modern interpretation of it. He has successfully brought these disparate elements into a unified whole.

The work was conducted with vigor and élan by Charles Munch, in Boston for two weeks as the Boston Symphony's guest. The soprano solos by Jennie Tourel, though uttered in a voice no longer in its prime, were filled with heartfelt desire. Miss Monteleagre's monologue was stirring for its polemics. The New England Conservatory Chorus, trained by Lorna Cooke de Varon, discharged its duties with verve; and the Columbus Boychoir is to be commended for its flawless passages.

Mr. Bernstein was on hand to give his personal thanks to his wife, Miss Tourel, Dr. Munch, the orchestra, the singers, and to receive the cheering approval of his listeners.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Berkshire Eagle (e)
PITTSFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 29,087

FEB 1 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Journal (m)
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
Circ. 61,299

FEB 1 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Telegram (m)
WORCESTER, Mass.
Circ. 59,451

FEB 1 1964

Hub Symphony In Premiere of Bernstein Work

Boston — (UPI) — The Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday played the American premiere of Leonard Bernstein's Symphony No. 3, subtitled "Kaddish."

Charles Munch was guest conductor for the occasion with Bernstein's wife, actress Felicia Montealegre, as speaker. The work was commissioned for the orchestra's 75th anniversary season, 1955-1956, when Munch was music director.

Bernstein, music director of the New York Philharmonic, was in Symphony Hall for the premiere and helped in its rehearsal. The new England Conservatory Chorus and Columbus Boy Choir sang in the work which had its world premiere at Tel Aviv, Israel, last Dec. 10, with Bernstein conducting.

The symphony was commissioned by the orchestra and by the Koussevitzsky Foundation.

Bernstein, a native of Lawrence, Mass., was a protege of the late Serge Koussevitzsky for 25 years musical director of the Boston Symphony.

TIGHT BINDING

93

...wEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Herald (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 178,553

FEB 1 1964

The Symphony

'Kaddish' Reveals Bernstein Genius

By ROBERT TAYLOR

The prodigal son came home yesterday to redeem the promise of his youth. With his Symphony No. 3, ('Kaddish'), which received a momentous and magnificent American premiere under the guest conductorship of Charles Munch, Leonard Bernstein has at last fulfilled himself as a serious composer.

So [illegible] Bernstein occupies [illegible] of the flawed genius that [illegible] must be regarded as the [illegible] of a talent freed from [illegible] lures of its own facility. [illegible] has often abused his gifts [illegible] he has not exhausted [illegible] has seemingly preferred [illegible] instant recognitions of the [illegible] the musical polemicist, the [illegible] artist, to the arduous, [illegible] and terrible confrontations [illegible] the creator.

His Contribution

He has made a contribution to [illegible] musical culture through the [illegible] meeting of Broadway musical comedy, but till now he has [illegible] to the symphonic [illegible] presaged by the "Jeremiah" Symphony over two decades ago.

The "Kaddish" Symphony harks back to the Biblical meter of the "Jeremiah's" lamentations; but also exhibits some of the restless dissonance of the composer's Second Symphony, "The Age of Anxiety." Dedicated to the beloved memory of John F. Kennedy, it is a belatedly-fulfilled commission for the Koussevitsky Musical Foundation as part of the Boston Symphony's 75th anniversary. The wait was worthwhile.

While the Symphony No. 3 can be said to absorb the expressive techniques of Mr. Bernstein's first two symphonies, it speaks a fresh and vital emotive language. The 'Kaddish', or Sanctification, the prayer chanted for the dead at all Judaic liturgies, carries a vast, meaningful connotation, both as mourning and as a celebration of the divinity of life.

Oratorio Frame

The composer sets the text within the musical and dramatic framework of oratorio, and the prayer is presented through the words of a speaker, through massed voices gathered in sorrow, jubilance and affirmation, through mezzo-soprano soloist who sings the sacred cadences ordinarily designated to men in the temple.

The tri-partite design is fundamentally narrative, with the narrator imploring, exhorting, and addressing God in terms of profound intimacy. The score comments on the emotional surge, which rushes from anger to humility to exaltation; and at times, molded to the natural inflections of spoken English, becomes the chief agent of a dramatic soliloquy.

Mr. Bernstein's stylistic garb is often eclectic, but he brings an overwhelming rhythmic invention, vivid and evocative orchestration and a spacing of sonorities to his writing, attaining an idiomatic warmth, Stravinsky, Strauss and Mahler color various passages; and in a section describing the pastoral glories of paradise the parallel to the Wunderhorn movement of Mahler's Fourth is evident. The closest relationship, however, is more to the tumult and the bedizened vitality of such a work as Walton's "Belshazzar's Feast."

Percussive Battery

The instrumentation includes a huge percussive battery (five timpani, sandpaper blocks, three bongos, three temple-blocks, rasp, finger cymbals, and scores of other exotic hues), high registered brass, a whole woodwind family and string orchestra.

The harmonics use atonality as an expression of anguish; but the diatonic prevails and its spontaneity has a smashing impact. Among the glories of this music is the tranquil mezzo-soprano solo which Jennie Tourel presented with such regal resplendence; a quarter-century ago her voice was opulent; today it is even more so.

To Felicia Monteleagre must go much of the credit, also for a performance as the speaker, in which the dynamics of the speeches were realized with an exquisite sense of timing and stress. She was no less than inspired.

Yet all the forces involved, the New England Conservatory Chorus, Columbus Boychoir, orchestra and conductor, merit superlatives; and the moving scene, when Mr. Bernstein appeared amid a thunder of applause and embraced Dr. Munch, must forever remain etched on this premiere. The composer is no longer young. It is not given to every man to realize a second creative life; but then, not every man is an artist of Mr. Bernstein's order.

Considering the excitement engendered by the 'Kaddish' Symphony, there is little space to comment on the happy return of the former conductor, Dr. Munch, who received a rising homage upon his entrance, led an excellent reading of the neglected Handel Concerto Grosso No. 4, and a briskly-paced, transparent account of Bizet's cheerful and melodic Symphony in C.

Next weekend, though, offers a characteristically Gallic program in which he excels: the Berlioz Fantastic Symphony; Ravel's Concerto, with Nicole Henriot-Schweitzer as the piano soloist; and Roussel's Symphony No. 3, in G Minor.

The Program

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch conducting, presented the 15th program of the 83rd season yesterday in Symphony Hall. Jennie Tourel, soprano, was the solist, Felicia Monteleagre, narrator of the "Kaddish" Symphony of Bernstein. The program will be repeated tonight at 8:30.

Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra, Op. 6, No. 4 ..... Handel
Symphony in C Major ..... Bizet
Symphony No. 3 ("Kaddish"), for Orchestra, Mixed Chorus, Boys' Choir, Speaker, and Soprano Solo ..... Bernstein

...wEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
: 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Christian Science
Monitor (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 174,850

FEB 1 1964

Bernstein's 'Kaddish' in U.S. première

By Harold Rogers

Once upon a time at Symphony Hall there was a man named Serge Koussevitsky who had a protégé named Leonard Bernstein; and when they made music—together or separately—exciting things happened.

Things were nearly always exciting when Koussevitsky or Bernstein gave us a première. These weren't occasions to be shrugged at and turned from; they were events to be discussed, hotly argued, rabidly championed.

Such dear dead days. thank heaven, are not beyond recall; now and again something happens to make us feel the old electricity, and something happened Friday afternoon to quicken the pulse when Bernstein's "Kaddish"—his Third Symphony—was given its U.S. première by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Here again is something that can be hotly argued, rabidly championed. Let sword strike against swords; let sparks fly wild! But the fact remains that Bernstein has brought forth a fine new work of emotional thrust, of dramatic power.

* * *

Composed for full orchestra, narrator, soprano, chorus, and boys choir, "Kaddish" takes the form of a long prayer—a prayer both primitive in its concept and highly sophisticated in its language, a prayer that both disturbs by the confusion of its theology and thrills by the audacity of its presentation.

In his notes on this work Jack Gottlieb has given us a key that may unlock the mystery that Mr. Bernstein's "Kaddish" presents to the non-Jew:

"Mr. Bernstein feels strongly the peculiar Jewishness of this man-God relationship: in the whole mythic concept of the Jew's love of God, from Moses to the Hassidic sect, there is a deep personal intimacy which allows things to be said to God that are almost inconceivable in another religion."

* * *

It is difficult for many of us to conceive, for instance, of an anthropomorphic God, or of God created in the image and likeness of a human being. It is difficult for some of us to imagine a prayer in which God is charged with the possession of human frailties, with inability to hold His universe in order. It is difficult for us to imagine a prayer in which man must command God's attention, to shout to gain His ear.

Yet this is the God we find in Mr. Bernstein's "Kaddish"—a tribal Jehovah, a magnified mortal, a vindictive Father, "an old wrinkled majesty." But if we accept God in these limited terms—at least for the duration of this work—we can participate in what must be one of the most fascinating prayers ever to be uttered in a concert hall:

"I want to pray, and the time is short . . .

"Surely you can bring order to this dazed speck . . .

"I am that part of you that defines your immortality, that part of you that refuses death . . .

"Your bargain was tin and crumbles in my hand . . .

"Forgive me, Father, I am mad with fever . . . in fever I forgot that you, too, were vulnerable . . .

"Sleep, my Father, rest your anger, dream softly . . .

"This is your heaven, every immortal cliché in place . . .

"Behold, Father, the rainbow I have created for you! Have faith! Believe! Oh, God, believe in me and you shall see the kindgom of heaven!"

And so at the conclusion we have man declaring that he has created God as much as God has created man, that they are mutually dependent, give mutual comfort.

Thus the music ends in peace and glory.

* * *

Mr. Bernstein's work is as extraordinary musically as it is theologically. It is a mature piece of composition; the eclectic lines, if any, are blurred: it represents the composer at his most serious and at his finest.

Vocal outbursts on behalf of the narrator (in this instance Felicia Monteleagre, Mr. Bernstein's wife) are matched by angry protestations on the part of the orchestra and chorus: never has the word Amen been so acridly set to notes.

At such times the music is apt to become completely atonal, with percussive punctuation, asymmetrical rhythms, polyrythms, augmentations, diminutions—name it, and he's done it. At other times—when the prayer becomes more repentant and contemplative—the music become tonal, serene, aspiring, lyrical.

Thus Mr. Bernstein has called upon the ancient and the modern in music to match the ancient Kaddish and his modern interpretation of it. He has successfully brought these disparate elements into a unified whole.

The work was conducted with vigor and élan by Charles Munch, in Boston for two weeks as the Boston Symphony's guest. The soprano solos by Jennie Tourel, though uttered in a voice no longer in its prime, were filled with heartfelt desire. Miss Monteleagre's monologue was stirring for its polemics. The New England Conservatory Chorus, trained by Lorna Cooke de Varon, discharged its duties with verve; and the Columbus Boychoir is to be commended for its flawless passages.

Mr. Bernstein was on hand to give his personal thanks, to his wife, Miss Tourel, Dr. Munch, the orchestra, the singers, and to receive the cheering approval of his listeners.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,In
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-42

Berkshire Eagle (e)
PITTSFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 29,087

FEB 1 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Journal (m)
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
Circ. 61,299

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,I
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4

Telegram (m)
WORCESTER, Mass.
Circ. 59,451

FEB 1 1964

Hub Symphony In Premiere of Bernstein Work

Boston — (UPI) — The Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday played the American premiere of Leonard Bernstein's Symphony No. 3, subtitled "Kaddish."

Charles Munch was guest conductor for the occasion with Bernstein's wife, actress Felicia Montealegre, as speaker. The work was commissioned for the orchestra's 75th anniversary season, 1955-1956, when Munch was music director.

Bernstein, music director of the New York Philharmonic, was in Symphony Hall for the premiere and helped in its rehearsal. The new England Conservatory Chorus and Columbus Boy Choir sang in the work which had its world premiere at Tel Aviv, Israel, last Dec. 10, with Bernstein conducting.

The symphony was commissioned by the orchestra and by the Koussevitzsky Foundation.

Bernstein, a native of Lawrence, Mass., was a protege of the late Serge Koussevitzsky for 25 years musical director of the Boston Symphony.

QK

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 194,870

FEB 1 1964

Composer Honored at Symphony Luncheon

American composer Walter Piston (center) relaxes at luncheon at the Midtown Motor Inn before symphony. With Piston are the Boston Symphony's Harry Ellis Dickson (left), Boston Globe music critic Michael Steinberg, Harvard's Elliott Forbes and Mrs. Piston.

At Symphony

Bernstein's 'Kaddish' In Premiere Here

By MICHAEL STEINBERG

There is something enviable about the utter lack of inhibition with which Leonard Bernstein carries on. His Symphony No. 3 (Kaddish) is a piece, in part, of such unashamed vulgarity, and it is so strongly derivative, that the hearing of it becomes as much as anything a strain on one's credulity. Can the narrator really have said "Do I have your attention, Majestic Father?" and did she declare to her God, "We are in this thing together now, you and I"?

But yes, there it was, along with, at the end, the familiar figure of the composer himself, fetched from the wings by his wife (who had narrated), and bowing to the cheers and to the applause amid a veritable extravaganza of bear-hugs and kisses.

"Kaddish" was commissioned by the Boston Symphony and the Koussevitzky Music Foundation for the orchestra's 75th anniversary season, 1955-56. The composer responded with an ambitious work, laid out on a large scale. At its center stands the Hebrew Kaddish, the prayer of sanctification, traditionally used as a prayer for the dead, though its text speaks not of death, but of the praise of God and the hope of peace. Bernstein has troped the liturgical words with an English text of his own, one in which the speaker fights her way, Job-like, from despair to faith.

The idea is splendidly imaginative, and it is tempting to think of what a poet like Auden might have made of it. But Bernstein as a writer of words has only fluency at his command, and that fluency produces a lava-flow of cliches wherein a few cozy intimacies (speaker to God, "We'll make it a sort of holiday") are contrasted against the tinny rhetoric of Norman Corwin's radio plays from the forties.

As a composer of music, Bernstein's bent is principally theatrical. He knows how to make an effect, and "Kaddish" is full of detail that really tells: the dense and anguished cadenza for chorus a cappella is an example, and so is the tremendous orchestral outburst, with trumpets shrilling on high C flat, that starts the finale. The last ten bars of Amen are quite wonderful, not only for the magic of their sonority, but for the precision and skill of their harmonic preparation as well.

At such a moment, Bernstein shows that he can compose, and I just wish he would. Mostly, he seems to prefer the easier way of assembling a series of tricks. These tricks are mutually incompatible, and they are generally irrelevant to the task at hand. The program notes explain how atonal chromaticism is associated with despair and G flat major with faith, but no symbolism can justify the musical illogic of the transition. The idea of such a symbol is perfectly plausible, but Bernstein just has not managed to compose it out properly.

"Kaddish" was in the final stages of scoring last November when circumstances commanded its dedication "to the beloved memory of John F. Kennedy."

Charles Munch, during whose directorship "Kaddish" was commissioned, conducted this, its American premiere, and he led a spirited and exciting approximation. There were many ragged attacks and not quite comprehensible rhythms. I suspect that balances perhaps suffered because crowded conditions on stage necessitated the exile of a number of violinists. The principal chorus was that of the New England Conservatory, impeccably prepared by Lorna Cooke deVaron, and superb in every way. The Columbus Boychoir, Donald Bryant, director, had a substantial part as well: pitch and tone are amazing, rhythm less so, and there is no diction to speak of. The narration was by Felicia Monteleagre (Mrs. Bernstein), who for all of her intensity is not really an interesting performer, and who was made to sound metallically cold by the electronic amplification. Jennie Tourel sang the soprano solos, and she did so with utmost beauty and distinction.

The concert began with Handel's Concerto Grosso, Opus 6, Number 4, in a curious reading that demonstrated that it is possible to achieve a certain charm even with every imaginable feature of sonority, speed, articulation, dynamics quite wrong. There followed Bizet's youthful Symphony in C, so attractive in its evocation of the 17-year-old boy's playing of Schubert duets. Mr. Munch slammed through it rather roughly, and I am afraid both its performance and that of the Handel demonstrated how much rehearsal that the Bernstein Symphony had required. I found it interesting that even Handel's and Bizet's relatively simple patterns of quarters and eighths came out pretty much all over the place, and I was the more braced, therefore, against the confustion caused by Bernstein's rather more complex metrical requirements.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 194,870

FEB 1 1964

Bernstein Back Home, Takes a Bow

By MARGO MILLER

An ovation greeted composer Leonard Bernstein Friday afternoon in Symphony Hall as his Symphony No. 3, "Kaddish," had its first U.S. performance.

Bernstein, New York Philharmonic conductor, a protege of the Boston Symphony's late musical director, Serge Koussevitzky, and known to millions for his Broadway shows, television concerts and book, "The Joy of Music," was commissioned by the Boston Symphony and the Koussevitzky Music Foundation to write a work for the orchestra's 75th anniversary.

Mrs. Koussevitzky, widow of the conductor, was in the capacity audience.

The new Bernstein Symphony takes as its subtitle "Kaddish," or "sanctification," from the prayer chanted for the Jewish dead, at the graveside, on memorial occasions, and at all synagogue services. The prayer, however, never mentions the word death; it is in fact, a compilation of paeans in praise of God.

Because of the Jewish theme of the work, the Boston Symphony relinquished the world premiere to the Israel Philharmonic. The composer conducted the initial performance in Tel Aviv on Dec. 10, 1963.

Leonard Bernstein was born in Lawrence on Aug. 25, 1918. Educated at Harvard, he was a conducting student of Serge Koussevitzky at the Berkshire Music Center. In the season of 1943-44, shortly after his 25th birthday, Bernstein substituted on a nationwide New York Philharmonic broadcast for an indisposed Bruno Walter, and was acclaimed the next day in the reviews.

His first Broadway hit, "On the Town," came that same season.

Subsequent shows have included "Wonderful Town," "Candide," and "West Side Story." Bernstein worte the music for the movie, "On the Waterfront." A musical version of the Thornton Wilder comedy, "The Skin of Our Teeth," is said to be forthcoming, as is a work commissioned by Lincoln Center for the Performing Arts.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Sunday Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 465,653

FEB 2 1964

Extramusical Idea In Third Symphony

By MARGO MILLER

MILLER

"Just like the old days," said Leonard Bernstein arriving at Symphony Hall, "I'm so sentimental."

This was in answer to a question: would he sit in the balcony for a rehearsal. The rehearsal was not one of Koussevitzky's, but the first full run-through of Bernstein's Symphony No. 3, "Kaddish," which had its American premiere Friday afternoon.

Charles Munch conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the New England Conservatory Chorus, the Columbus Boyschoir, soprano Jennie Tourel and speaker Felicia Monteleagre (Mrs. Bernstein). The work had been commissioned by the Boston Symphony and the Koussevitzky Foundation for the orchestra's 75th anniversary in the 1955-56 season. "Kaddish" has additional performances tomorrow and Tuesday evenings at 8:30.

Time for Koussevitzky

Bernstein arrived in Symphony Hall Wednesday afternoon, wrapped in a black overcoat with a Persian lamb collar. The contour of his garment suggested the cape which Koussevitzky had bequeathed to his protege. The cries of "Lennie" and the subsequent bearhugs bespoke long asociation with the orchestra. And, as always, there was time for a Koussevitzky story.

Remember, Lennie, when nuns came to Koussie's rehearsal and sat in the balcony. The trombone player made a mistake. Koussie tried to find the proper tone to admonish him. "The reason you play wrong; you don't believe in God."

Up in the balcony, that traditional spot to the right of the stage, convenient to the library and the conductor's room, all was business. Bernstein sat with a giant score which overflowed a music stand onto the balcony rail. He dictated a few instrumental markings to the B.S.O. librarian, corrected the pronunciation of a few Hebrew words for Lorna Cooke deBaron to pass onto her chorus, made notes for Charles Munch, greeted sundry official visitors, conducted a little in his seat and mused over what he called the collapse of his final fugue.

The "Right Button"

Bernstein had tried it several ways, always coming back to the original idea. Did the section end too suddenly? It reminded him of a passage in Beethoven. He led reporters through the music, and in the plain talk which has endeared the New York Philharmonic conductor to millions of television viewers, confessed in theater parlance, he was still looking for the "right button." It was a small point, overall one which tantalized but seemed to please the composer in its challenge. Like the Piano Concerto, commissioned by Lincoln Center and as yet unwritten, the solution was "hoving over my head. That's what it's like to be a composer."

The "Kaddish" Symphony was "very hard to talk about," he said. And then proceeded, despite the late hour and his strenuous day, to explain its origin for 20 minutes. Like his first two Symphonies, it has a subtitle. The first (1943) was "Jeremiah," on the lamentations, the Second (1949) was called "The Age of Anxiety."

"Practically everything I write partakes of the theater or something extra musical; an idea, a piece of literature, the dance. This opens me up to all sorts of tags and labels. People say I don't belong in the concert hall. What's wrong with theater in the concert hall and concert hall in the theater? Perhaps it's a weakness—no, I'm proud to admit I love the theater."

String of Adjectives

Symphony No. 3 makes dramatic use of the speaker's dialogue with a God she feels has forsaken the human race. The work, begun in the Summer of 1961, was first intended as a choral prayer with orchestra. Then Bernstein added "orchestral stuff" between the choral passages, and finally a speaker. "'Waddish' started out of a sense of urgency, out of the possibility of the imminent collapse of the race, our self-destruction with the bomb."

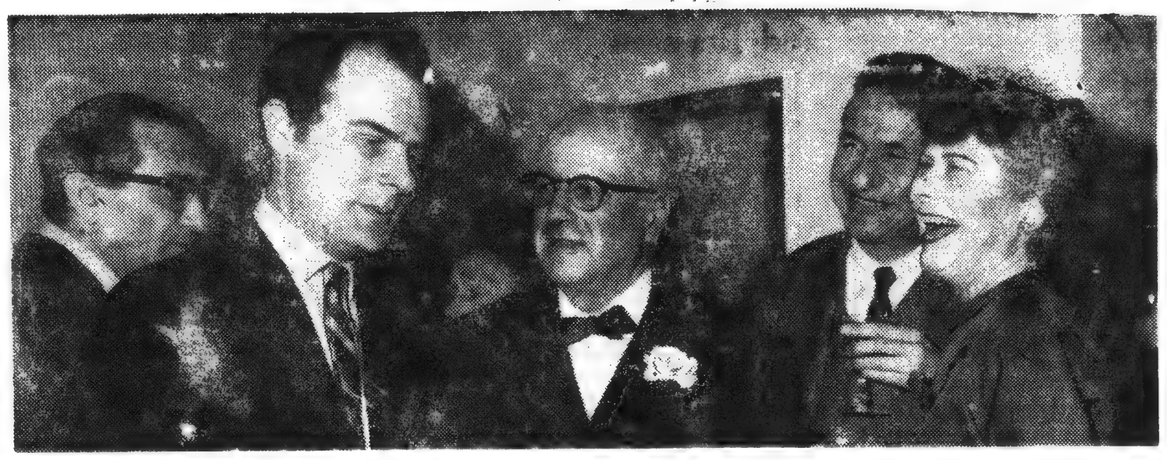
While Kaddish, the Hebrew word meaning "sanctification," is a prayer traditionally said by a man's son for his father, the prayer never mentions death. "The word 'Kaddish' is said three times. Kaddish is a string of adjectives praising God: 'blessed, praised and glorified, exalted, extolled and honored, magnified and lauded'," Bernstein continued, ticking off the words on his fingers.

The tradition of a mourner has grown outside the sense of the text. "Jewish men congratulated on a son: 'Mazel, you've got a Kaddish.' Or, they say to a friend, 'Meet my Kaddish.' It's come to mean someone who will mourn."

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 194,870

FEB 1 1964



Composer Honored at Symphony Luncheon

American composer Walter Piston (center) relaxes at luncheon at the Midtown Motor Inn before symphony. With Piston are the Boston Symphony's Harry Dickson (left), Boston Globe music critic Michael Steinberg, Harvard's Elliott Forbes and Mrs. Piston.

At Symphony

Bernstein's 'Kaddish' In Premiere Here

By MICHAEL STEINBERG

There is something enviable about the utter lack of inhibition with which Leonard Bernstein carries on. His Symphony No. 3 (Kaddish) is a piece, in part, of such unashamed vulgarity, and it is so strongly derivative, that the hearing of it becomes as much as anything a strain on one's credulity. Can the narrator really have said "Do I have your attention, Majestic Father?" and did she declare to her God, "We are in this thing together now, you and I"?

But yes, there it was, along with, at the end, the familiar figure of the composer himself fetched from the wings by his wife (who had narrated), and bowing to the cheers and to the applause amid a veritable extravaganza of bear-hugs and kisses.

"Kaddish" was commissioned by the Boston Symphony and the Koussevitzky Music Foundation for the orchestra's 75th anniversary season, 1955-56. The composer responded with an ambitious work, laid out on a large scale. At its center stands the Hebrew Kaddish, the prayer of sanctification, traditionally used as a prayer for the dead, though its text speaks not of death, but of the praise of God and the hope of peace. Bernstein has troped the liturgical words with an English text of his own, one in which the speaker fights her way, Job-like, from despair to faith.

The idea is splendidly imaginative, and it is tempting to think of what a poet like Auden might have made of it. But Bernstein as a writer of words has only fluency at his command, and that fluency produces a lava-flow of cliches wherein a few cozy intimacies (speaker to God, "We'll make it a sort of holiday") are contrasted against the tinny rhetoric of Norman Corwin's radio plays from the forties.

As a composer of music, Bernstein's bent is principally theatrical. He knows how to make an effect, and "Kaddish" is full of detail that really tells: the dense and anguished cadenza for chorus a cappella is an example, and so is the tremendous orchestral outburst, with trumpets shrilling on high C flat, that starts the finale. The last ten bars of Amen are quite wonderful, not only for the magic of their sonority, but for the precision and skill of their harmonic preparation as well.

At such a moment, Bernstein shows that he can compose, and I just wish he would. Mostly, he seems to prefer the easier way of assembling a series of tricks. These tricks are mutually incompatible, and they are generally irrelevant to the task at hand. The program notes explain how atonal chromaticism is associated with despair and G flat major with faith, but no symbolism can justify the musical illogic of the transition. The idea of such a symbol is perfectly plausible, but Bernstein just has not managed to compose it out properly.

"Kaddish" was in the final stages of scoring last November when circumstances commanded its dedication "to the beloved memory of John F. Kennedy."

Charles Munch, during whose directorship "Kaddish" was commissioned, conducted this, its American premiere, and he led a spirited and exciting approximation. There were many ragged attacks and not quite comprehensible rhythms. I suspect that balances perhaps suffered because crowded conditions on stage necessitated the exile of a number of violinists. The principal chorus was that of the New England Conservatory, impeccably prepared by Lorna Cooke deVaron, and superb in every way. The Columbus Boychoir, Donald Bryant, director, had a substantial part as well: pitch and tone are amazing, rhythm less so, and there is no diction to speak of. The narration was by Felicia Monteleagre (Mrs. Bernstein), who for all of her intensity is not really an interesting performer, and who was made to sound metallically cold by the electronic amplification. Jennie Tourel sang the soprano solos, and she did so with utmost beauty and distinction.

The concert began with Handel's Concerto Grosso, Opus 6, Number 4, in a curious reading that demonstrated that it is possible to achieve a certain charm even with every imaginable feature of sonority, speed, articulation, dynamics quite wrong. There followed Bizet's youthful Symphony in C, so attractive in its evocation of the 17-year-old boy's playing of Schubert duets. Mr. Munch slammed through it rather roughly, and I am afraid both its performance and that of the Handel demonstrated how much rehearsal that the Bernstein Symphony had required. I found it interesting that even Handel's and Bizet's relatively simple patterns of quarters and eighths came out pretty much all over the place, and I was the more braced, therefore, against the confustion caused by Bernstein's rather more complex metrical requirements.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 194,870

FEB 1 1964

Bernstein Back Home, Takes a Bow

By MARGO MILLER

An ovation greeted composer Leonard Bernstein Friday afternoon in Symphony Hall as his Symphony No. 3, "Kaddish," had its first U.S. performance.

Bernstein, New York Philharmonic conductor, a protege of the Boston Symphony's late musical director, Serge Koussevitzky, and known to millions for his Broadway shows, television concerts and book, "The Joy of Music," was commissioned by the Boston Symphony and the Koussevitzky Music Foundation to write a work for the orchestra's 75th anniversary.

Mrs. Koussevitzky, widow of the conductor, was in the capacity audience.

The new Bernstein Symphony takes as its subtitle "Kaddish," or "sanctification," from the prayer chanted for the Jewish dead, at the graveside, on memorial occasions, and at all synagogue services. The prayer, however, never mentions the word death; it is in fact, a compilation of paeans in praise of God.

Because of the Jewish theme of the work, the Boston Symphony relinquished the world premiere to the Israel Philharmonic. The composer conducted the initial performance in Tel Aviv on Dec. 10, 1963.

Leonard Bernstein was born in Lawrence on Aug. 25, 1918. Educated at Harvard, he was a conducting student of Serge Koussevitzky at the Berkshire Music Center. In the season of 1943-44, shortly after his 25th birthday, Bernstein substituted on a nationwide New York Philharmonic broadcast for an indisposed Bruno Walter, and was acclaimed the next day in the reviews.

His first Broadway hit, "On the Town," came that same season.

Subsequent shows have included "Wonderful Town," "Candide," and "West Side Story." Bernstein worte the music for the movie, "On the Waterfront." A musical version of the Thornton Wilder comedy, "The Skin of Our Teeth," is said to be forthcoming, as is a work commissioned by Lincoln Center for the Performing Arts.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Sunday Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 465,653

Extramusical Idea In Third Symphony

By MARGO MILLER

MILLER

"Just like the old days" said Leonard Bernstein arriving at Symphony Hall, "I'm so sentimental."

This was in answer to a question: would he sit in the balcony for a rehearsal. The rehearsal was not one of Koussevitzky's, but the first full run-through of Bernstein's Symphony No. 3, "Kaddish," which had its American premiere Friday afternoon.

Charles Munch conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the New England Conservatory Chorus, the Columbus Boyschoir, soprano Jennie Tourel and speaker Felicia Monteleagre (Mrs. Bernstein). The work had been commissioned by the Boston Symphony and the Koussevitzky Foundation for the orchestra's 75th anniversary in the 1955-56 season. "Kaddish" has additional performances tomorrow and Tuesday evenings at 8:30.

Time for Koussevitzky

Bernstein arrived in Symphony Hall Wednesday afternoon, wrapped in a black overcoat with a Persian lamb collar. The contour of his garment suggested the cape which Koussevitzky had bequeathed to his protege. The cries of "Lennie" and the subsequent bearhugs bespoke long association with the orchestra. And, as always, there was time for a Koussevitzky story.

Remember, Lennie, when nuns came to Koussie's rehearsal and sat in the balcony. The trombone player made a mistake. Koussie tried to find the proper tone to admonish him. "The reason you play wrong; you don't believe in God."

Up in the balcony, that traditional spot to the right of the stage, convenient to the library and the conductor's room, all was business. Bernstein sat with a giant score which overflowed a music stand onto the balcony rail. He dictated a few instrumental markings to the B.S.O. librarian, corrected the pronunciation of a few Hebrew words for Lorna Cooke deBaron to pass onto her chorus, made notes for Charles Munch, greeted sundry official visitors, conducted a little in his seat and mused over what he called the collapse of his final fugue.

The "Right Button"

Bernstein had tried it several ways, always coming back to the original idea. Did the section end too suddenly? It reminded him of a passage in Beethoven. He led reporters through the music, and in the plain talk which has endeared he New York Philharmonic conductor to millions of television viewers, confessed in theater parlance, he was still looking for the "right button." It was a small point, overall one which tantalized but seemed to please the composer in its challenge. Like the Piano Concerto, commissioned by Lincoln Center and as yet unwritten, the solution was "hoving over my head. That's what it's like to be a composer."

The "Kaddish" Symphony was "very hard to talk about," he said. And then proceeded, despite the late hour and his strenuous day, to explain its origin for 20 minutes. Like his first two Symphonies, it has a subtitle. The first (1943) was "Jeremiah," on the lamentations, the Second (1949) was called "The Age of Anxiety."

"Practically everything I write partakes of the theater or something extra musical; an idea, a piece of literature, the dance. This opens me up to all sorts of tags and labels. People say I don't belong in the concert hall. What's wrong with theater in the concert hall and concert hall in the theater? Perhaps it's a weakness—no, I'm proud to admit I love the theater."

String of Adjectives

Symphony No. 3 makes dramatic use of the speaker's dialogue with a God she feels has forsaken the human race. The work, begun in the Summer of 1961, was first intended as a choral prayer with orchestra. Then Bernstein added "orchestral stuff" between the choral passages, and finally a speaker. "'Kaddish' ... out of a sense of urgency ... of the possibility of imminent collapse of the ... our self-destruction with the bomb."

While Kaddish, the ... word meaning "sanctification," is a prayer traditionally said by a man's son ... father, the prayer never mentions death. "The word ... is said three times, [and] ... a string of adjectives ... God: 'blessed, praised ... glorified, exalted, ... and honored, magnified ... lauded'," Bernstein ... ticking off the words ... fingers.

The tradition of a ... has grown outside the ... of the text. "Jewish mothers ... gratulated on a son ... got a Kaddish.' Or, ... a friend, 'Meet my ... It's come to me ... who will mourn ...

TIGHT BINDING

Monday 4 & Tuesday 7.

95

Fourth Program

MONDAY EVENING, FEBRUARY 3, at 8:30 o'clock

CHARLES MUNCH, Conductor

HANDEL ..... Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra, Op. 6, No. 4
Larghetto affettuoso — Allegro — Largo e piano — Allegro
(First performance in this series)

BIZET ..... Symphony in C major
I. Allegro vivo
II. Adagio
III. Allegro vivace; Trio
IV. Allegro vivace
(First performance in this series)

INTERMISSION

BERNSTEIN ..... Symphony No. 3 (Kaddish) for Orchestra, Mixed Chorus, Boys' Choir, Speaker and Soprano Solo
I. Invocation — Kaddish I
II. Din-torah — Kaddish II
III. Scherzo; Finale — Kaddish III
(First performance in this series)

NEW ENGLAND CONSERVATORY CHORUS, LORNA COOKE DEVARON, Director
COLUMBUS BOYCHOIR, DONALD BRYANT, Director
JENNIE TOUREL, Soprano
FELICIA MONTELEAGRE, Speaker

A new plan for ticket reservations is announced on page 61.

BALDWIN PIANO RCA VICTOR RECORDS

Seventh Program

TUESDAY EVENING, FEBRUARY 4, at 8:30 o'clock

CHARLES MUNCH, Conductor

HANDEL ..... Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra, Op. 6, No. 4
Larghetto affettuoso — Allegro — Largo e piano — Allegro
(First performance in this series)

BIZET ..... Symphony in C major
I. Allegro vivo
II. Adagio
III. Allegro vivace; Trio
IV. Allegro vivace
(First performance in this series)

INTERMISSION

BERNSTEIN ..... Symphony No. 3 (Kaddish) for Orchestra, Mixed Chorus, Boys' Choir, Speaker and Soprano Solo
I. Invocation — Kaddish I
II. Din-torah — Kaddish II
III. Scherzo; Finale — Kaddish III
(First performance in this series)

NEW ENGLAND CONSERVATORY CHORUS, LORNA COOKE DEVARON, Director
COLUMBUS BOYCHOIR, DONALD BRYANT, Director
JENNIE TOUREL, Soprano
FELICIA MONTEALEGRE, Speaker

A new plan for ticket reservations is announced on page 61.

BALDWIN PIANO RCA VICTOR RECORDS

NEW YORK, N.Y.
CATHOLIC NEWS
W. 81,400

FEB 20 1964

New Bernstein Symphony Hailed

BOSTON (RNS) — The American premiere of Leonard Bernstein's new symphony based upon the Hebrew prayer, "Kaddish," was hailed here with a thunder of applause that included the plaudits of The Pilot, the Boston archdiocesan weekly.

Bernstein, the New York Philharmonic conductor, was commissioned to compose his Symphony No. 3 (Kaddish) by the Boston Symphony and the Koussevitzky Foundation to celebrate the orchestra's 75th season (1956-57). He completed the score in November, 1963, and dedicated the work "to the beloved memory of John F. Kennedy" shortly after the President's death.

The composer conducted the Israel Philharmonic in the initial performance of the symphony at Tel Aviv on December 10, 1963.

The U.S. premiere here was directed by retired-conductor Charles Munch. It included the performance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the New England Conservatory Chorus and the Columbus Boychoir.

Reviewing the symphony in The Pilot, music critic Joseph D. McLellan called the work "meaningful and well crafted." He noted that the music "has moments of considerable power."

The composer of "West Side Story," the reviewer added, "knows how to please an audience without compromising musical quality; his effects are vivid and well calculated, his structure loose, sometimes diffuse but often very effective."

Bernstein's symphony takes its subtitle, Kaddish, from a Jewish prayer of sanctification linked to prayers for the dead by folklore dating from the Middle Ages.

The composer placed "Kaddish" in the musical and dramatic construction of oratorio with the prayer presented through a speaker; massed voices singing in sorrow, jubilance and affirmation; and a soloist (mezzo soprano) who sings the cadences usually assigned to men in the temple. A narrator addresses God in terms of "profound intimacy."

(The narrator, for example, states: "Do I have your attention Majestic Father?" and is heard to declare to God: "We are in this thing together, you and I.")

The Pilot's critic commented on the "modern, humanistic context" in which Bernstein placed the prayer.

"In effect," the critic observed, "he is singing Kaddish for a world which seems determined to kill itself — a Kaddish sung before death because afterward there may be no one left to offer the prayer. . . . Yet the symphonic prayer ends not in despair but in hope — a hope in man more than in God."

The Pilot writer noted "how much of the best music" composed in recent years was religiously inspired.

He cited Benjamin Britten's "War Requiem," Stravinsky's "The Flood" and "A Sermon: A Narrative and A Prayer," and Poulenc's opera, "Dialogues of the Carmelites."

"It seems that the problems of our age are driving our artists more and more to ask themselves religious questions," Mr. McLellan stated.

"And," he added, "if the answers are not always orthodox, still they show an awareness of spiritual realities."

TIGHT BINDING

MONDAY 4: TUESDAY 7.

95

Fourth Program

MONDAY EVENING, FEBRUARY 3, at 8:30 o'clock

CHARLES MUNCH, Conductor

HANDEL . . . . . Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra, Op. 6, No. 4
Larghetto affettuoso — Allegro — Largo e piano — Allegro
(First performance in this series)

BIZET . . . . . Symphony in C major
I. Allegro vivo
II. Adagio
III. Allegro vivace; Trio
IV. Allegro vivace
(First performance in this series)

INTERMISSION

BERNSTEIN . . . . . Symphony No. 3 (Kaddish) for Orchestra, Mixed Chorus, Boys' Choir, Speaker and Soprano Solo
I. Invocation — Kaddish I
II. Din-torah — Kaddish II
III. Scherzo; Finale — Kaddish III
(First performance in this series)

NEW ENGLAND CONSERVATORY CHORUS, LORNA COOKE DEVARON, Director
COLUMBUS BOYCHOIR, DONALD BRYANT, Director
JENNIE TOUREL, Soprano
FELICIA MONTELEAGRE, Speaker

A new plan for ticket reservations is announced on page 61.

BALDWIN PIANO RCA VICTOR RECORDS

Seventh Program

TUESDAY EVENING, FEBRUARY 4, at 8:30 o'clock

CHARLES MUNCH, Conductor

HANDEL . . . . . Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra, Op. 6, No. 4
Larghetto affettuoso — Allegro — Largo e piano — Allegro
(First performance in this series)

BIZET . . . . . Symphony in C major
I. Allegro vivo
II. Adagio
III. Allegro vivace; Trio
IV. Allegro vivace
(First performance in this series)

INTERMISSION

BERNSTEIN . . . . . Symphony No. 3 (Kaddish) for Orchestra, Mixed Chorus, Boys' Choir, Speaker and Soprano Solo
I. Invocation — Kaddish I
II. Din-torah — Kaddish II
III. Scherzo; Finale — Kaddish III
(First performance in this series)

NEW ENGLAND CONSERVATORY CHORUS, LORNA COOKE DEVARON, Director
COLUMBUS BOYCHOIR, DONALD BRYANT, Director
JENNIE TOUREL, Soprano
FELICIA MONTEALEGRE, Speaker

A new plan for ticket reservations is announced on page 61.

BALDWIN PIANO RCA VICTOR RECORDS

NEW YORK N.Y.
CATHOLIC NEWS
JUN 1964

New Bernstein Symphony Hailed

BOSTON (RNS) — The American premiere of Leonard Bernstein's new symphony based upon the Hebrew prayer, "Kaddish," was hailed here with a thunder of applause that included the plaudits of The Pilot, the Boston archdiocesan weekly.

Bernstein, the New York Philharmonic conductor, was commissioned to compose his Symphony No. 3 (Kaddish) by the Boston Symphony and the Koussevitzky Foundation to celebrate the orchestra's 75th season (1956-57). He completed the score in November, 1963, and dedicated the work "to the beloved memory of John F. Kennedy" shortly after the President's death.

The composer conducted the Israel Philharmonic in the initial performance of the symphony at Tel Aviv on December 10, 1963.

The U.S. premiere here was directed by retired-conductor Charles Munch. It included the performance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the New England Conservatory Chorus and the Columbus Boychoir.

Reviewing the symphony in The Pilot, music critic Joseph D. McLellan called the work "meaningful and well crafted." He noted that the music "has moments of considerable power."

The composer of "West Side Story," the reviewer added, "knows how to please an audience without compromising musical quality; his effects are vivid and well calculated, his structure loose, sometimes diffuse but often very effective."

Bernstein's symphony takes its subtitle, Kaddish, from a Jewish prayer of sanctification linked to prayers for the dead by folklore dating from the Middle Ages.

The composer placed "Kaddish" in the musical and dramatic construction of oratorio with the prayer presented through a speaker; massed voices singing in sorrow, jubilance and affirmation; and a soloist (mezzo soprano) who sings the cadences usually assigned to men in the temple. A narrator addresses God in terms of "profound intimacy."

(The narrator, for example, states: "Do I have your attention Majestic Father?" and is heard to declare to God: "We are in this thing together, you and I.")

The Pilot's critic commented on the "modern, humanistic context" in which Bernstein placed the prayer.

"In effect," the critic observed, "he is singing Kaddish for a world which seems determined to kill itself — a Kaddish sung before death because afterward there may be no one left to offer the prayer . . . Yet the symphonic prayer ends not in despair but in hope — a hope in man more than in God."

The Pilot writer noted "how much of the best music" composed in recent years was religiously inspired.

He cited Benjamin Britten's "War Requiem," Stravinsky's "The Flood" and "A Sermon: A Narrative and A Prayer," and Poulenc's opera, "Dialogues of the Carmelites."

"It seems that the problems of our age are driving our artists more and more to ask themselves religious questions," Mr. McLellan stated.

"And," he added, "if the answers are not always orthodox, still they show an awareness of spiritual realities."

TIGHT BINDING

SATURDAY 1:30

Sixteenth Program

FRIDAY AFTERNOON, FEBRUARY 7, at 2:00 o'clock

SATURDAY EVENING, FEBRUARY 8, at 8:30 o'clock

CHARLES MUNCH, Conductor

BERLIOZ ..... *Fantastic Symphony, Op. 14a

I. Reveries, Passions
Largo; Allegro agitato e appassionato assai
II. A Ball
Waltz: Allegro non troppo
III. Scene in the Meadows
Adagio
IV. March to the Scaffold
Allegretto non troppo
V. Dream of the Witches' Sabbath
Larghetto; Allegro

INTERMISSION

RAVEL ..... *Concerto for Piano and Orchestra

I. Allegramente
II. Adagio assai
III. Presto

ROUSSEL ..... Symphony No. 3 in G minor, Op. 42

I. Allegro vivo
II. Adagio
III. Vivace
IV. Allegro con spirito

SOLOIST
NICOLE HENRIOT-SCHWEITZER
Mme. HENRIOT-SCHWEITZER plays the Baldwin Piano

These concerts will end about 3:55 o'clock on Friday Afternoon; 10:25 o'clock on Saturday Evening.

BALDWIN PIANO *RCA VICTOR RECORDS

[969]

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 465,653

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Herald
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 283,819
FEB 2 1964

The Symphony This Week

3 French Works In Munch Finale

Charles Munch, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra from 1949-1962, will conclude his visit as guest conductor of the orchestra with the concerts on Friday and Saturday. He will present a program of French composers and his soloist will be the French pianist Nicole Henriot-Schweitzer.

The weekend program will open with Berlioz' "Symphonie Fantastique." After the intermission Mme. Henriot-Schweitzer will be heard in the Concerto for Piano and Orchestra by Ravel, and the closing work will be Roussel's Symphony No. 3 in G minor.

The fifth open rehearsal of the season will take place on Thursday evening when Dr. Munch will make final preparations for his program of the coming weekend.

Dr. Munch will also conduct the orchestra at the regular subscription concerts of Monday and Tuesday evenings.

At those concerts he will repeat the program of this past weekend: Handel's Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra, Op. 6, No. 4; the Symphony in C major by Bizet; and the new work by Leonard Bernstein which receives its American premiere on Friday the Symphony No. 3, "Kaddish," in which the orchestra will be joined by Jennie Tourel, soprano; Felicia Montelegre, speaker; the New England Conservatory Chorus and the Columbus Boychoir.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Record-American (m) (a)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 531,565
FEB 3 1964

Munch's Guest Conducting Ends

Charles Munch, who will conclude his visit as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra with the Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts in Symphony Hall, will conduct the regular subscription concerts Monday and Tuesday at 8:30 p. m.

At those concerts he will repeat the program of this past weekend: — Handel's Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra, Op. 6, No. 4; the Symphony in C major by Bizet; and the new work by Leonard Bernstein which received its American premiere on Friday, Bernstein's Symphony No. 3, "Kaddish."

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Christian Science Monitor (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 174,850
FEB 8 1964

Gnats but no camels

By Harold Rogers

There are some conductors who strain at gnats and swallow camels.

But Charles Munch neither strains the one nor swallows the other.

The results?

Take Berlioz's "Fantastic" Symphony, for instance, heard Friday afternoon at Symphony Hall. Many little notes were out of place — gnats that slipped past Dr. Munch's active baton.

Yet he swallowed no metronomic camels. The music was a vital thing, a living organism, pulsing with red blood, breathing great chunks of air, snorting, even screaming; or else dreaming its scary dreams, swirling into spinning waltzes, marching to horrendous scaffolds, giddy with the glee of witches on a spree.

Was the Boston Symphony disintegrating under Dr. Munch's 13-year tenure as its music director? Now when he returns as a guest we learn that it was a glorious period, that the gnats he strained not at—the disintegration—truly went no deeper than a gnat's wing. Say what you will about Munch's conducting, he was seldom less than exciting; and his concert Friday afternoon should go down in history as one of his brightest hours.

* * *

He gave us a typical program, of course—the kind that many of his listeners had heard to the surfeit: Berlioz, Ravel, Roussel. But Dr. Munch, like Pierre Monteux, has reached that point in his career where he has earned the right to play only the music he loves, the music he does best. And can we hear a masterpiece too often?

After Intermission Nicole Henriot - Schweitzer came forward to give us a performance of Ravel's Concerto for Piano and Orchestra that was outstanding as a milestone in her personal growth as an artist. She can make the notes fly like darts as much as she ever used to—clean, swift, aimed straight, hitting home. Yet in the Adagio assai we found that deeper dimension we have longed to hear—her ability to love the note, to shape the phrase, caress it, hold it gladly in heart.

* * *

When she and Dr. Munch had been duly acclaimed, he closed the afternoon with a stirring reading of Roussel's Third Symphony — a work that must have alienated most of its hearers when given its first performance in Symphony Hall 34 years ago.

Yet its post-impressionist vigor, its forthright rhythms, its winging melodies now thrill us with its combination of intellectual strength and emotional thrust. Under Dr. Munch's guidance the impact was irresistible.

The wildest ovation of the afternoon, however, was won by the Berlioz.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Jewish Advocate
BOSTON, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 35,304
FEB 13 1964

At the BSO

Munch Conducts French Program

BY ALAN SLY

Last weekend's B.S.O. program was tres Munch, which means French music — old and not so old — brought off with elan: it would have sounded familiar, except that Munch's elan has a way of taking one always by surprise. The program more-over rated high in entertainment value — something was always going on to claim one's attention; one's interest was never allowed to flag for a single moment.

In fact the Berlioz Fantastique was more fun than a circus. At intervals of a couple of years one can gladly embark again on this rather ridiculous journey. Even the orchestra enjoys it in this spirit. This time we had the fastest (and neatest) trombone playing ever, the loudest bell sounds, the most explosive timpani playing — everything supercharged, as Berlioz would surely have wanted it if he could have had it.

The Ravel piano concerto was never (in the right places) so, so dynamic, so insinuating, so voluptuous, thanks to Mme. Henriot-Schweitzer and Dr. Munch, whose partnership in this work makes history. And how she hits all those right notes — using forearms like some prize fighter, and with such rounded or edgy tone according to context. Also she makes the piano sing at times, or jump, or drive, or snap. Of course the orchestral noises were equally apt and witty. This performance sets a new standard for others to shoot at.

The Roussel Third Symphony more than held up the end of the program — it filled out and justified it after the earlier diversions and entrancements. Its four strongly designed movements do separately and together what comes naturally to a true symphonist, putting together a broad spectrum of experience in compelling terms. While the style is harmonic, one hears always melodic strains in the plural, so that the orchestral texture flows from within. A firm drive forward carries one towards points of climax as by a skillful navigator; one finds oneself assenting to the rightness of the resultant emotional response. Isn't this the essence of classicism? And do not the right colors arise from the nature of the subject matter itself?

Dr. Munch is most persuasive with his French repertoire. One gladly concedes him the prerogatives that go with his unique status and he will carry away this time not only our gratitude but our renewed affection.

Next week Rudolf Serkin plays Reger's Piano Concerto, opus 114, and Mr. Leinsdorf brings us a little Rossini and a little Wagner.

SATURDAY 1:30

Sixteenth Program

FRIDAY AFTERNOON, FEBRUARY 7, at 2:00 o'clock

SATURDAY EVENING, FEBRUARY 8, at 8:30 o'clock

CHARLES MUNCH, Conductor

BERLIOZ ..... *Fantastic Symphony, Op. 14a

I. Reveries, Passions
Largo; Allegro agitato e appassionato assai
II. A Ball
Waltz: Allegro non troppo
III. Scene in the Meadows
Adagio
IV. March to the Scaffold
Allegretto non troppo
V. Dream of the Witches' Sabbath
Larghetto; Allegro

INTERMISSION

RAVEL ..... *Concerto for Piano and Orchestra

I. Allegramente
II. Adagio assai
III. Presto

ROUSSEL ..... Symphony No. 3 in G minor, Op. 42

I. Allegro vivo
II. Adagio
III. Vivace
IV. Allegro con spirito

SOLOIST
NICOLE HENRIOT-SCHWEITZER
Mme. HENRIOT-SCHWEITZER plays the Baldwin Piano

These concerts will end about 3:55 o'clock on Friday Afternoon; 10:25 o'clock on Saturday Evening.

BALDWIN PIANO *RCA VICTOR RECORDS

[969]

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 465,653

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Herald
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 283,819
FEB 2 1964

The Symphony This Week

3 French Works In Munch Finale

Charles Munch, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra from 1949-1962, will conclude his visit as guest conductor of the orchestra with the concerts on Friday and Saturday. He will present a program of French composers and his soloist will be the French pianist Nicole Henriot-Schweitzer.

The weekend program will open with Berlioz' "Symphonie Fantastique." After the intermission Mme. Henriot-Schweitzer will be heard in the Concerto for Piano and Orchestra by Ravel, and the closing work will be Roussel's Symphony No. 3 in G minor.

The fifth open rehearsal of the season will take place on Thursday evening when Dr. Munch will make final preparations for his program of the coming weekend.

Dr. Munch will also conduct the orchestra at the regular subscription concerts of Monday and Tuesday evenings.

At those concerts he will repeat the program of this past weekend: Handel's Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra, Op. 6, No. 4; the Symphony in C major by Bizet; and the new work by Leonard Bernstein which receives its American premiere on Friday the Symphony No. 3, "Kaddish," in which the orchestra will be joined by Jennie Tourel, soprano Felicia Montelegre, speaker; the New England Conservatory Chorus and the Columbus Boychoir.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Record-American (m) (a)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 531,565

Munch's Guest Conducting Ends

Charles Munch, who will conclude his visit as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra with the Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts in Symphony Hall, will conduct the regular subscription concerts Monday and Tuesday at 8:30 p. m.

At those concerts he will repeat the program of this past weekend: — Handel's Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra, Op. 6, No. 4; the Symphony in C major by Bizet; and the new work by Leonard Bernstein which receives its American premiere on Friday, Bernstein's Symphony No. 3, "Kaddish."

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Christian Science Monitor (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 174,850
FEB 8 1964

Gnats but no camels

By Harold Rogers

There are some conductors who strain at gnats and swallow camels.

But Charles Munch neither strains the one nor swallows the other.

The results?

Take Berlioz's "Fantastic" Symphony, for instance, heard Friday afternoon at Symphony Hall. Many little notes were out of place — gnats that slipped past Dr. Munch's active baton.

Yet he swallowed no metronomic camels. The music was a vital thing, a living organism, pulsing with red blood, breathing great chunks of air, snorting, even screaming; or else dreaming its scary dreams, swirling into spinning waltzes, marching to horrendous scaffolds, giddy with the glee of witches on a spree.

Was the Boston Symphony disintegrating under Dr. Munch's 13-year tenure as its music director? Now when he returns as a guest we learn that it was a glorious period, that the gnats he strained not at—the disintegration—truly went no deeper than a gnat's wing. Say what you will about Munch's conducting, he was seldom less than exciting; and his concert Friday afternoon should go down in history as one of his brightest hours.

* * *

He gave us a typical program, of course—the kind that many of his listeners had heard to the surfeit: Berlioz, Ravel, Roussel. But Dr. Munch, like Pierre Monteux, has reached that point in his career where he has earned the right to play only the music he loves, the music he does best. And can we hear a masterpiece too often?

After Intermission Nicole Henriot - Schweitzer came forward to give us a performance of Ravel's Concerto for Piano and Orchestra that was outstanding as a milestone in her personal growth as an artist. She can make the notes fly like darts as much as she ever used to—clean, swift, aimed straight, hitting home. Yet in the Adagio assai we found that deeper dimension we have longed to hear—her ability to love the note, to shape the phrase, caress it, hold it gladly in heart.

* * *

When she and Dr. Munch had been duly acclaimed, he closed the afternoon with a stirring reading of Roussel's Third Symphony — a work that must have alienated most of its hearers when given its first performance in Symphony Hall 34 years ago.

Yet its post-impressionist vigor, its forthright rhythms, its winging melodies now thrill us with its combination of intellectual strength and emotional thrust. Under Dr. Munch's guidance the impact was irresistible.

The wildest ovation of the afternoon, however, was won by the Berlioz.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Jewish Advocate
BOSTON, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 35,304
FEB 13 1964

At the BSO

Munch Conducts French Program

BY ALAN SLY

Last weekend's B.S.O. program was tres Munch, which means French music — old and not so old — brought off with elan: it would have sounded familiar, except that Munch's elan has a way of taking one always by surprise. The program more-over rated high in entertainment value — something was always going on to claim one's attention; one's interest was never allowed to flag for a single moment.

In fact the Berlioz Fantastique was more fun than a circus. At intervals of a couple of years one can gladly embark again on this rather ridiculous journey. Even the orchestra enjoys it in this spirit. This time we had the fastest (and neatest) trombone playing ever, the loudest bell sounds, the most explosive timpani playing — everything supercharged, as Berlioz would surely have wanted it if he could have had it.

The Ravel piano concerto was never (in the right places) so, so dynamic, so insinuating, so voluptuous, thanks to Mme. Henriot-Schweitzer and Dr. Munch, whose partnership in this work makes history. And how she hits all those right notes — using forearms like some prize fighter, and with such rounded or edgy tone according to context. Also she makes the piano sing at times, or jump, or drive, or snap. Of course the orchestral noises were equally apt and witty. This performance sets a new standard for others to shoot at.

The Roussel Third Symphony more than held up the end of the program — it filled out and justified it after the earlier diversions and entrancements. Its four strongly designed movements do separately and together what comes naturally to a true symphonist, putting together a broad spectrum of experience in compelling terms. While the style is harmonic, one hears always melodic strains in the plural, so that the orchestral texture flows from within. A firm drive forward carries one towards points of climax as by a skillful navigator; one finds oneself assenting to the rightness of the resultant emotional response. Isn't this the essence of classicism? And do not the right colors arise from the nature of the subject matter itself?

Dr. Munch is most persuasive with his French repertoire. One gladly concedes him the prerogatives that go with his unique status and he will carry away this time not only our gratitude but our renewed affection.

Next week Rudolf Serkin plays Reger's Piano Concerto, opus 114, and Mr. Leinsdorf brings us a little Rossini and a little Wagner.

TIGHT BINDING

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Herald (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 178,553
FEB 8 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 194,870
FEB 8 1964

THE SYMPHONY

Munch Demonstrates Freshness of Berlioz

By ROBERT TAYLOR

There is an essential shoddiness about the single-minded pursuit, in French music, of good taste. But even this did not mar one's pleasure in yesterday's program which the returning Charles Munch assembled and rendered sympathetically, musically, idiomatically.

A leaven of nostalgia seasoned the afternoon. It revived, as it properly should, the flavor of Dr. Munch's directorship, the second longest in the history of the orchestra, and his eminence in the interpretation of Gallic scores. Furthermore, after 46 years with the Boston Symphony, Louis Speyer, the English horn, was retiring.

Exquisite Art

The program afforded ample opportunity for Mr. Speyer to display his exquisite art: the limpid duet between the English horn and oboe in the Scene aux Champs of the Fantastic Symphony; the long cantilena of the Adagio of Ravel's Concerto, and as part of the transparent ensemble coloration of the Roussel Symphony.

His control over the tapered oboe line was splendid, his veiled tone captivating, his work in general no less than lovely. Like Dr. Munch his origins are French, and as he was brought forward for a bow it was obvious that we will miss this virtuoso very much indeed.

I wish I could say the same for the Fantastic Symphony; but having been steeped in, saturated by it, I approached it yesterday with a sense of satiety. Dr. Munch immediately proceeded to demonstrate the originality, freshness and power of the score, which retains glamor even across the century of the common man. Berlioz is an anomaly in French music, an untidy genius. Logic proportion, order, all these are as dross to him beside the intensity of his feelings.

And that is the glory of Charles Munch's reading of the Fantastic, a dionysiac propulsion of phrase and a dramatic moulding of narrative values. The reveries are phantasmagoric and the episodes acquire a brilliant flux of tumultuous detail; he has a rhythmic freedom that achieves the plasticity of rhapsodic romanticism. Only the final movement, the Dream of a Witches' Sabbath, pushes the tempo to inordinate lengths. The conductor cannot resist the temptation to pull out all his Berlioz stops, and the Fantastic ends in a blaze of bells and a clatter of kettledrums with the orchestra straining to keep up with the dizzying pace.

Tribute to Insight

Aside form the climax, however, the account of the Fantastic Sympony constitutes a tribute to Dr. Munch's insight into the nature of early romanticism. Has anyone ever invested the slow movements with as compelling a misterioso mood? Despite a tendency to rush, this remains a superb interpretation. The prominence of the English horn role, incidentally made me wonder if Berlioz picked it up from Rossini's William Tell, approximately the same date, for his orchestra.

With Ravel's Concerto we were back in the tradition of Gallic neo-classicism hybridized by jazz syncopations. For jazz read Gershwin, who is not a jazz composer, but whose example no less than Mozart or Saint-Saens. Mme. Henriot-Schweitzer, the soloist, played it in a traditional way, too; it was a small-scaled, tidy and fleet rendition, close to the keyboard and displaying a sophisticated salon elegance.

While the speed of her passage-work was carefully gauged to bring out the vivacity and wit fo the composer's ideas, I'm afraid it lost much of the urgency of this youthful-sounding work.

Charming Score

By way of contrast with the Berlioz, Dr. Munch kept the tempos leisurely, but the rhetorical approach of a Lorin Hollander, say, who leaves the pianoforte a virtual wreck, yet conveys a vitality inherent in the agility of the writing, projects the concerto more persuasively.

The Roussel No. 3, composed for the 50th anniversary of the Boston Symphony, is also a charming score, fastidious, ably constructed, but again, wanting only the passions of life: first-class second class music. The senorities and the textures of the playing conveyed the technical expressivity of the piece, and the performance was offered in a statement best described as "amiable." A wag put it to us, "call yesterday's concert 'In-Speyered';" the recollection of Charles Munch's contribution to our music added infinite grace to the Gallic keynote as well.

Erich Leinsdorf has scheduled three first performances at this series next weekend: Rossini's Overture to "Il Signor Bruschino;" Reger's F Minor Concerto for Piano and Orchestra, Op. 114, Rudolf Serkin soloist; and excerpts from Wagner's "Siegfried." Excerpts from Act III of "Die Walkure" will also be heard.

The Program

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch conducting, presented the 16th program of the 83rd season yesterday in Symphony Hall. Nicole Henriot-Schweitzer, piano, was the soloist. The program will be repeated tonight at 8:30.
Fantastic Symphony, Op. 14a.....Berlioz
Concerto for Piano and Orchestra..Ravel
Symphony No. 3, in G minor, Op. 42.....Roussel

At Symphony

Munch Conducts Berlioz: 'Fantastique'

By MICHAEL STEINBERG

When I was living in New York in the fifties, I used to imagine Symphony Hall as the scene of a more or less perpetual performance of the Berlioz 'Symphonie Fantastique', relieved now and again by 'Daphnis and Chloe' and 'La Mer'. A touch of the old days returned with the second week of Charles Munch's current engagement with the Boston Symphony when, on Friday, he once again gave us the 'Fantastique'.

He gave it much as he always did, coarse in sonority, frenzied in temper. The Symphony begins with a measure in which a few woodwinds and a horn play pianissimo. In the second measure, they all cadence, triple piano and diminuendo. Not a trace of becoming softer, therefore no sense of cadence, therefore no sense!

Fifteen measures later, Berlioz has the first violins weave a dainty filligree of rapid staccato scales, and he wants them to do it pianissimo and lightly, 'with the points of the bow.' A scale there was, yes, but somewhere near mezzo-forte, and coarsely scraped near the frog.

Munch conveys the Symphony's continuity only superficially as he proceeds from one abruption and one exaggeration to the next. 'Holds back very slightly' asks Berlioz, and Munch grinds to a near halt. 'No retard,' and Munch speeds up. In the final two movements, Munch altogether misses the mood. The March to the Scaffold is too fast to be sinister, and the Dream of a Wtiches' Sabbath is too fast for anything at all.

I know it's too fast for me to hear, and it is also too fast for the orchestra to play, and toward the end I had the impression of desperate wind players scattering notes into any feasible point of the measures at all in an attempt to be rid of them before Munch arrived at the final cadence.

All in all, I found it abominable. However, for the benefit of the lady who wrote in last week to object to my failure to report that the audience had liked that which I had not, I append the information that 27 persons shouted 'Bravo' and that Munch had four recalls.

After the intermission, Mme. Nicole Henriot-Schweitzer played Ravel's Piano Concerto in G. That event, too, has been quite a fixture at Symphony Hall. Mme. Henriot-Schweitzer has appeared in 11 out of the past 16 seasons, and she has played the Ravel four of those times. Perhaps it is naive of me to infer from the number of her engagements here that the Boston Symphony considers her nearly three times as interesting an artist as Firkusny, Graffman, Istomin, Janis, and Serkin (each of whom has played with the Symphony four times during the comparable period), or nearly four time as well worth hearing as Arrau and Fleisher (three engagements each), or 11 times more estimable than Curzon and Rubinstein.

Mme. Henriot-Schweitzer is a moderately engaging player, possessed of considerable personal charm, and apt to perform with attractive vigor and elan. She and her Baldwin piano between them produced a greyly limited range of sounds, and she lacks the control with which to keep the long cantilena in the Adagio alive and breathing. As a result she took to fussing with it rather, though even then she lost our attention and had us all coughing, rustling, stirring restlessly. Munch's accompaniment was admirably 'with it,' and full of nicely realized details, especially by way of wind playing.

The concert ended with Albert Roussel's Symphony No. 3 in G minor. It was composed in 1930 for the Boston Symphony's 15th anniversary season, and while it is far from the best known of that series of commissions, it is one of the most attractive. It was a pleasure to have that boldly original, yet quite conservative, Symphony back, and a double pleasure to have it in so lively end handsomely played a rendition.

Among other things Friday's concert was a showcase for the distinguished artistry of Louis Speyer, the orchestra's English Horn player, soon to retire at the end of 46 (!) years service.

With control of pitch and timbre unimpaired, he plays with the warmth and eloquence of a great singer. The slow movements of the Berlioz and Ravel works gave him glorious opportunities, and he was twice rought front and center for a bow, once—typically and delightfully—with reed in mouth, and looking happy as can be.

Next Friday Erich Leinsdorf returns with a program of excerpts from Wagner's 'Walkuere' and 'Siegfried', Rossini's Overture to 'Il Signor Bruschino', and the Reger Piano Concerto, which is to be played by Rudolf Serkin.

TIGHT BINDING

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Herald (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 178,553

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 194,870

FEB 8 1964

THE SYMPHONY

Munch Demonstrates Freshness of Berlioz

By ROBERT TAYLOR

There is an essential shoddiness about the single-minded pursuit, in French music, of good taste. But even this did not mar one's pleasure in yesterday's program which the returning Charles Munch assembled and rendered sympathetically, musically, idiomatically.

A heaven of nostalgia seasoned the afternoon. It revived, as it properly should, the flavor of Dr. Munch's directorship, the second longest in the history of the orchestra, and his eminence in the interpretation of Gallic scores. Furthermore, after 46 years with the Boston Symphony, Louis Speyer, the English horn, was retiring.

Exquisite Art

The program afforded ample opportunity for Mr. Speyer to display his exquisite art: the limpid duet between the English horn and oboe in the Scene aux Champs of the Fantastic Symphony; the long cantilena of the Adagio of Ravel's Concerto, and as part of the transparent ensemble coloration of the Roussel Symphony.

His control over the tapered oboe line was splendid, his veiled tone captivating, his work in general no less than lovely. Like Dr. Munch his origins are French, and as he was brought forward for a bow it was obvious that we will miss this virtuoso very much indeed.

I wish I could say the same for the Fantastic Symphony; but having been steeped in, saturated by it, I approached it yesterday with a sense of satiety. Dr. Munch immediately proceeded to demonstrate the originality, freshness and power of the score, which retains glamor even across the century of the common man. Berlioz is an anomaly in French music, an untidy genius. Logic proportion, order, all these are as cross to him beside the intensity of his feelings.

And that is the glory of Charles Munch's reading of the Fantastic, a dionysiac propulsion of phrase and a dramatic moulding of narrative values. The reveries are phantasmagoric and the episodes acquire a brilliant flux of tumultuous detail; he has a rhythmic freedom that achieves the plasticity of rhapsodic romanticism. Only the final movement, the Dream of a Witches' Sabbath, pushes the tempo to inordinate lengths. The conductor cannot resist the temptation to pull out all his Berlioz stops, and the Fantastic ends in a blaze of bells and a clatter of kettledrums with the orchestra straining to keep up with the dizzying pace.

Tribute to Insight

Aside form the climax, however, the account of the Fantastic Sympony constitutes a tribute to Dr. Munch's insight into the nature of early romanticism. Has anyone ever invested the slow movements with as compelling a misterioso mood? Despite a tendency to rush, this remains a superb interpretation. The prominence of the English horn role, incidentally made me wonder if Berlioz picked it up from Rossini's William Tell, approximately the same date, for his orchestra.

With Ravel's Concerto we were back in the tradition of Gallic neo-classicism hybridized by jazz syncopations. For jazz read Gershwin, who is not a jazz composer, but whose example no less than Mozart or Saint-Saens. Mme. Henriot-Schweitzer, the soloist, played it in a traditional way, too; it was a small-scaled, tidy and fleet rendition, close to the keyboard and displaying a sophisticated salon elegance.

While the speed of her passage-work was carefully gauged to bring out the vivacity and wit fo the composer's ideas, I'm afraid it lost much of the urgency of this youthful-sounding work.

Charming Score

By way of contrast with the Berlioz, Dr. Munch kept the tempos leisurely, but the rhetorical approach of a Lorin Hollander, say, who leaves the pianoforte a virtual wreck, yet conveys a vitality inherent in the agility of the writing, projects the concerto more persuasively.

The Roussel No. 3, composed for the 50th anniversary of the Boston Symphony, is also a charming score, fastidious, ably constructed, but again, wanting only the passions of life: first-class second class music. The senorities and the textures of the playing conveyed the technical expressivity of the piece, and the performance was offered in a statement best described as "amiable." A wag put it to us, "call yesterday's concert 'In-Speyered';" the recollection of Charles Munch's contribution to our music added infinite grace to the Gallic keynote as well.

Erich Leinsdorf has scheduled three first performances at this series next weekend: Rossini's Overture to "Il Signor Bruschino;" Reger's F Minor Concerto for Piano and Orchestra, Op. 114, Rudolf Serkin soloist; and excerpts from Wagner's "Siegfried." Excerpts from Act III of "Die Walkure" will also be heard.

The Program

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch conducting, presented the 16th program of the 83rd season yesterday in Symphony Hall. Nicole Henriot-Schweitzer, piano, was the soloist. The program will be repeated tonight at 8:30.

Fantastic Symphony, Op. 14a.....Berlioz
Concerto for Piano and Orchestra..Ravel
Symphony No. 3, in G minor, Op. 42.....Roussel

At Symphony

Munch Conducts Berlioz: 'Fantastique'

By MICHAEL STEINBERG

When I was living in New York in the fifties, I used to imagine Symphony Hall as the scene of a more or less perpetual performance of the Berlioz 'Symphonie Fantastique', relieved now and again by 'Daphnis and Chloe' and 'La Mer'. A touch of the old days returned with the second week of Charles Munch's current engagement with the Boston Symphony when, on Friday, he once again gave us the 'Fantastique'.

He gave it much as he always did, coarse in sonority, frenzied in temper. The Symphony begins with a measure in which a few woodwinds and a horn play pianissimo. In the second measure, they all cadence, triple piano and diminuendo. Not a trace of becoming softer, therefore no sense of cadence, therefore no sense!

Fifteen measures later, Berlioz has the first violins weave a dainty filligree of rapid staccato scales, and he wants them to do it pianissimo and lightly, 'with the points of the bow.' A scale there was, yes, but somewhere near mezzo-forte, and coarsely scraped near the frog.

Munch conveys the Symphony's continuity only superficially as he proceeds from one abruption and one exaggeration to the next. 'Holds back very slightly' asks Berlioz, and Munch grinds to a near halt. 'No retard,' and Munch speeds up. In the final two movements, Munch altogether misses the mood. The March to the Scaffold is too fast to be sinister, and the Dream of a Wtiches' Sabbath is too fast for anything at all.

I know it's too fast for me to hear, and it is also too fast for the orchestra to play, and toward the end I had the impression of desperate wind players scattering notes into any feasible point of the measures at all in an attempt to be rid of them before Munch arrived at the final cadence.

All in all, I found it abominable. However, for the benefit of the lady who wrote in last week to object to my failure to report that the audience had liked that which I had not, I append the information that 27 persons shouted 'Bravo' and that Munch had four recalls.

After the intermission, Mme. Nicole Henriot-Schweitzer played Ravel's Piano Concerto in G. That event, too, has been quite a fixture at Symphony Hall. Mme. Henriot-Schweitzer has appeared in 11 out of the past 16 seasons, and she has played the Ravel four of those times. Perhaps it is naive of me to infer from the number of her engagements here that the Boston Symphony considers her nearly three times as interesting an artist as Firkusny, Graffman, Istomin, Janis, and Serkin (each of whom has played with the Symphony four times during the comparable period), or nearly four time as well worth hearing as Arrau and Fleisher (three engagements each), or 11 times more estimable than Curzon and Rubinstein.

Mme. Henriot-Schweitzer is a moderately engaging player, possessed of considerable personal charm, and apt to perform with attractive vigor and elan. She and her Baldwin piano between them produced a greyly limited range of sounds, and she lacks the control with which to keep the long cantilena in the Adagio alive and breathing. As a result she took to fussing with it rather, though even then she lost our attention and had us all coughing, rustling, stirring restlessly. Munch's accompaniment was admirably 'with it,' and full of nicely realized details, especially by way of wind playing.

The concert ended with Albert Roussel's Symphony No. 3 in G minor. It was composed in 1930 for the Boston Symphony's 15th anniversary season, and while it is far from the best known of that series of commissions, it is one of the most attractive. It was a pleasure to have that boldly original, yet quite conservative, Symphony back, and a double pleasure to have it in so lively and handsomely played a rendition.

Among other things Friday's concert was a showcase for the distinguished artistry of Louis Speyer, the orchestra's English Horn player, soon to retire at the end of 46 (!) years service.

With control of pitch and timbre unimpaired, he plays with the warmth and eloquence of a great singer. The slow movements of the Berlioz and Ravel works gave him glorious opportunities, and he was twice brought front and center for a bow, once—typically and delightfully—with reed in mouth, and looking happy as can be.

Next Friday Erich Leinsdorf returns with a program of excerpts from Wagner's 'Walkuere' and 'Siegfried', Rossini's Overture to 'Il Signor Bruschino', and the Reger Piano Concerto, which is to be played by Rudolf Serkin.

98 FRI.- SAT. 17. CAMBRIDGE 4.

Seventeenth Program

FRIDAY AFTERNOON, FEBRUARY 14, at 2:00 o'clock

SATURDAY EVENING, FEBRUARY 15, at 8:30 o'clock

ROSSINI ..... Overture to "Il Signor Bruschino"
(First performance at these concerts)

REGER ..... Concerto in F minor for Piano and Orchestra, Op. 114
I. Allegro moderato
II. Largo con gran espressione
III. Allegro con spirito
(First performance at these concerts)

INTERMISSION

WAGNER ..... Excerpts from "Die Walküre," Act III
Ride of the Valkyries — Magic Fire Music

WAGNER ..... Excerpts from "Siegfried"
Prelude to Act II — Waldweben — Prelude to Act III — Siegfried's Ascent to Brünnhilde's Rock — Brünnhilde's Awakening
(First performance at these concerts)

SOLOIST
RUDOLF SERKIN
Mr. SERKIN plays the Steinway Piano

These concerts will end about 4:00 o'clock on Friday Afternoon; 10:30 o'clock on Saturday Evening.

BALDWIN PIANO RCA VICTOR RECORDS

Fourth Program

TUESDAY EVENING, FEBRUARY 11, at 8:30 o'cl

PISTON ..... Symphony No. 4
I. Piacevole
II. Ballando
III. Contemplativo
IV. Energico

RIMSKY-KORSAKOV ..... Suite from "Le Coq d'Or"
I. King Dodon in his palace
II. King Dodon in the country
III. King Dodon with the Queen of Shemakha
IV. Wedding March and the lamentable end of King Dodon

INTERMISSION

TCHAIKOVSKY ..... Suite No. 3, in G major
I. Elégie: Andante molto cantabile
II. Valse mélancolique: Allegro moderato
III. Scherzo: Presto
IV. Tema con variazioni: Andante con moto
(First performance in this series)

A new plan for ticket reservations is announced on page 61.

BALDWIN PIANO RCA VICTOR RECORDS

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 465,653
FEB 9 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Herald
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 283,819
FEB 9 1964

Symphony This Week

Serkin Is Soloist With Orchestra

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will present four concerts and an open rehearsal in the coming week. Erich Leinsdorf, having returned from a brief vacation in London, will conduct all programs.

The fourth "Cambridge" concert will be given Tuesday evening at Symphony Hall and will be telecast as usual by WGBH-TV, Channel 2. Mr. Leinsdorf's program will open with Walter Piston's Symphony No. 4, continue with Rimsky-Korsakov's Suite from "Le Coq d'Or" and close with the Suite No. 3 by Tchaikovsky.

Mr. Leinsdorf has invited Rudolf Serkin to be soloist at the concerts Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. He will perform Max Reger's Piano Concerto, Op. 114.

Mr. Leinsdorf will conduct the overture to "Il Signor Bruschino" by Rossini, and music from two of Wagner's operas, the Fire Music and Ride of the Valkyries from "Die Walkure" and excerpts from "Siegfried."

The sixth open rehearsal of the season will be held Thursday evening.

Mr. Serkin will again be soloist next Sunday afternoon and will play the Mozart Piano Concerto K. 459. The concert will open with Rossini's Overture to "Il Signor Bruschino." After the concert Mr. Leinsdorf will present music by Wagner: A Siegfried Idyll, the Fire Music and Ride of the Walkyries from "Die Walkure" and Excerpts from "Siegfried."

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Christian Science Monitor (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 174,850
FEB 1 5 1964

Sounding brass

By Harold Rogers

At the outset there was much to look forward to. Erich Leinsdorf's selections for the weekend Boston Symphony concerts included three first performances for this particular series, and novelty — like variety — is often the spice of program building.

There was Rossini's Overture to "Il Signor Bruschino," dashed off when he was a ripe 21. There was Max Reger's Concerto in F minor for Piano and Orchestra, with Rudolf Serkin as soloist, no less. And there were some excerpts from Wagner's "Siegfried" that included the Preludes to Act II and Act III, Waldweben, Siegfried's Ascent to Brünnhilde's Rock, and Brünnhilde's Awakening.

* * *

The only item not falling in the first-performance category was Wagner's Ride of the Valkyries and Magic Fire Music from "Die Walküre."

So much was promised.

The delivery, however, was something else. In retrospect one's heart goes out to Rossini; he composed con cuore, and if his Overture to "Il Signor Bruschino" is one of his more slender efforts, at least it had a certain charm of open-faced sincerity. The high point of the afternoon, for me, was the rhythmical clicking sounds made when the fiddlers tapped their bows against the music stands.

* * *

The Reger concerto is a stately bore, and all the Rudolf Serkins in the world could not make it anything more. Some passages—especially in the Largo con gran espressione—were superbly lovely; but by and large it is a labored work, bringing forth a mountain of thematic material that never arrives at an affirmative and satisfying statement. When the end seems long in coming, something is obviously wrong.

And the Wagner (Mr. Leinsdorf generally does some fine things with Wagner) did nothing to stir one's languid blood; not even did the Ride of the Valkyries—that old war horse—manage to vie with Pegasus. The parts from "Siegfried," with the exception of the idyllic strains of Waldweben, had better have been left in the opera house. They make no truly successful transition to the concert hall.

So our hopes—all but those pinned on Rossini—went one by one down the drain. Most of it was sounding brass and a tinkling cymbal, sounding and tinkling far too long.

FRI.- SAT. 17. CAMBRIDGE 4.

Seventeenth Program

FRIDAY AFTERNOON, FEBRUARY 14, at 2:00 o'clock

SATURDAY EVENING, FEBRUARY 15, at 8:30 o'clock

ROSSINI — Overture to "Il Signor Bruschino"
(First performance at these concerts)

REGER — Concerto in F minor for Piano and Orchestra, Op. 114
I. Allegro moderato
II. Largo con gran espressione
III. Allegro con spirito
(First performance at these concerts)

INTERMISSION

WAGNER — Excerpts from "Die Walküre," Act III
Ride of the Valkyrics — Magic Fire Music

WAGNER — Excerpts from "Siegfried"
Prelude to Act II — Waldweben — Prelude to Act III — Siegfried's Ascent to Brünnhilde's Rock — Brünnhilde's Awakening
(First performance at these concerts)

SOLOIST
RUDOLF SERKIN
Mr. SERKIN plays the Steinway Piano

These concerts will end about 4:00 o'clock on Friday Afternoon; 10:30 o'clock on Saturday Evening.

BALDWIN PIANO — RCA VICTOR RECORDS

Fourth Program

TUESDAY EVENING, FEBRUARY 11, at 8:30 o'c

PISTON — Sui
I. Piacevole
II. Ballando
III. Contemplativo
IV. Energico

RIMSKY-KORSAKOV — Suite from "Le Coq d'Or"
I. King Dodon in his palace
II. King Dodon in the country
III. King Dodon with the Queen of Shemakha
IV. Wedding March and the lamentable end of King Dodon

INTERMISSION

TCHAIKOVSKY — Suite No. 3, in G
I. Elégie: Andante molto cantabile
II. Valse mélancolique: Allegro moderato
III. Scherzo: Presto
IV. Tema con variazioni: Andante con moto
(First performance in this series)

A new plan for ticket reservations is announced on page 61

BALDWIN PIANO — RCA VICTOR RECORDS

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 194,870
FEB 15 1964

Serkin Ex

By MICHAEL STEINBER

Erich Leinsdorf returned the Boston Symphony on Fr day afternoon, and when t orchestra played so very w for him at the beginning the concert, it seemed

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 465,653
FEB 9 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Herald
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 283,819
FEB 9 1964

Symphony This Week

Serkin Is Soloist With Orchestra

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will present four concerts and an open rehearsal in the coming week. Erich Leinsdorf, having returned from a brief vacation in London, will conduct all programs.

The fourth "Cambridge" concert will be given Tuesday evening at Symphony Hall and will be telecast as usual by WGBH-TV, Channel 2. Mr. Leinsdorf's program will open with Walter Piston's Symphony No. 4, continue with Rimsky-Korsakov's Suite from "Le Coq d'Or" and close with the Suite No. 3 by Tchaikovsky.

Mr. Leinsdorf has invited Rudolf Serkin to be soloist at the concerts Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. He will perform Max Reger's Piano Concerto, Op. 114.

Mr. Leinsdorf will conduct the overture to "Il Signor Bruschino" by Rossini, and music from two of Wagner's operas, the Fire Music and Ride of the Valkyries from "Die Walkure" and excerpts from "Siegfried."

The sixth open rehearsal of the season will be held Thursday evening.

Mr. Serkin will again be soloist next Sunday afternoon and will play the Mozart Piano Concerto K. 459. The concert will open with Rossini's Overture to "Il Signor Bruschino." After the concert Mr. Leinsdorf will present music by Wagner: A Siegfried Idyll, the Fire Music and Ride of the Walkyries from "Die Walkure" and Excerpts from "Siegfried."

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Christian Science Monitor (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 174,850
FEB 15 1964

Sounding brass

By Harold Rogers

At the outset there was much to look forward to. Erich Leinsdorf's selections for the weekend Boston Symphony concerts included three first performances for this particular series; and novelty — like variety — is often the spice of program building.

There was Rossini's Overture to "Il Signor Bruschino," dashed off when he was a ripe 21. There was Max Reger's Concerto in F minor for Piano and Orchestra, with Rudolf Serkin as soloist, no less. And there were some excerpts from Wagner's "Siegfried" that included the Preludes to Act II and Act III, Waldweben, Siegfried's Ascent to Brünnhilde's Rock, and Brünnhilde's Awakening.

* * *

The only item not falling in the first-performance category was Wagner's Ride of the Valkyries and Magic Fire Music from "Die Walküre."

So much was promised.

The delivery, however, was something else. In retrospect one's heart goes out to Rossini; he composed con cuore, and if his Overture to "Il Signor Bruschino" is one of his more slender efforts, at least it had a certain charm of open-faced sincerity. The high point of the afternoon, for me, was the rhythmical clicking sounds made when the fiddlers tapped their bows against the music stands.

* * *

The Reger concerto is a stately bore, and all the Rudolf Serkins in the world could not make it anything more. Some passages—especially in the Largo con gran espressione—were superbly lovely; but by and large it is a labored work, bringing forth a mountain of thematic material that never arrives at an affirmative and satisfying statement. When the end seems long in coming, something is obviously wrong.

And the Wagner (Mr. Leinsdorf generally does some fine things with Wagner) did nothing to stir one's languid blood; not even did the Ride of the Valkyries—that old war horse—manage to vie with Pegasus. The parts from "Siegfried," with the exception of the idyllic strains of Waldweben, had better have been left in the opera house. They make no truly successful transition to the concert hall.

So our hopes—all but those pinned on Rossini—went one by one down the drain. Most of it was sounding brass and a tinkling cymbal, sounding and tinkling far too long.

TIGHT BINDING

99

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Herald (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 178,553
FEB 1 5 1964

The Symphony

Much Slag Shows Up in Concert Gold

By ROBERT TAYLOR

Erich Leinsdorf, an adventurous program maker, sometimes strikes gold amid the abandoned passages of the symphonic mother lode. Such zealous spading has its drawbacks, however, in the quantities of trivia also tossed up, and yesterday's program yielded these like a worked-out seam.

Rossini's overture to 'Il Signor Bruschino' and the Regar Concerto in F Minor were new to these concerts. The former is one of the Venetian examples of the master's 40-odd overtures to the operas, good, bad and indifferent, that flowed from his facile quill without stint, and although it exhibits a brisk sparkle, it is virtually indistinguishable from most of the others. The whole bag of tricks is displayed, then riffled off in succession, the thumping ensemble and ceaseless crescendi; and the fact that the second violins rap on their stands at four points as a reinforcement of the beat is indicative of the level of the humor therein.

The composer himself had the wit to disown the piece an instance of rare self-analysis. The tunes are pretty, and, like all of Rossini's, distributed helter-skelter regardless of technical convenience, so the polish and proportion of the light-handed texture paced by Mr. Leinsdorf's unrushed accelerandi can be accounted a triumph of interpretation over lazy creativity.

Indeed, from a standpoint of performance, the afternoon provided substantial interest. Appearing in the Reger Concerto, Rudolf Serkin gave a lithe, powerful and sharply-defined architecture to a score that intrinsically projects a turgid and sham heroism.

The Reger Concerto breathes the feeling that somehow we have heard it all before, and so we have: in Wagner, Brahms and Liszt. The composer is not averse to borrowing from his Victorian contemporaries, in itself not an invalid approach, but, alas, he has almost nothing to add. The work sprawls out on an ambitious scale, thickly-textured, tinted by Brahmsian horns and Wagnerian chromatics, with the dialogue of the piano submerged in a concertante form. The sentimentality of the music has little of the vigor of a post-romantic such as Rachmaninoff, being rather, drenched in the beery bathos of an academic brooding over his stein in a rathskeller while the student dueling society carries on nearby, in the manner of Romberg.

To the credit of Mr. Serpin, he was never blotted out by the orchestra. The phrasing of what is essentially an obbligato role kept the line of Reger's musical thought to the fore. There was a full-sized range of tone to each section, though one couuld feel a natural longing for a greater depth of sonority in the opening allegro moderato. The strength and grasp of structure were always present and, while the conceptions were not sensuoss, the design emerged carefully articulated by Mr. Serkin and tactfully balanced by Mr. Leinsdorf.

The excerpts from 'Die Walkure' and 'Siegfried' held a soaring opulence by way of contrast; the magnificence of a radiant and resplendent clarity. Mr. Leinsdorf's way with this music is well-known: he conductid a memorable Ring cycle with the Metropolitan prior to assuming the directorship of the Boston Symphony, and his selection of tempos, his sympathy with the inner spirit of the inflections of detail is authoritative. Unlike the Fantastic Symphony, which Charles Munch conducted so splendidly last week, the mathematics of the score contribute to the emotional effect, and Mr. Leinsdorf's meticulous preparation pays handsome dividends.

Despite this advantage, the edited Wagner in the concert hall discloses the artifice of a scissors-and-paste anthology. True operatic voices aren't necessary, say as they are in Bellini; but the arrangement of the sections bends a theatrical statement out of shape. Serge Koussevitzky conducted the complete Act III of "Siegfried" so the excerpts there are a series premiere by virtue of the Prelude to Act II and the "Forest Murmurs." The absence of the vocalist is felt: "Loki, Loki, hear me and heed!" the eldritch cries of the Valkyries; the bridges between the concert hall sections buckle under the strain of their removal from the grand arch of their operatic design. In short, the development is missing. The absence of Wagner's melodies from the serious concert is not surprising; you will encounter him more often at Pops; the random fragment is native there.

Next weekend Phyllis Curtin, soprano, is the soloist, and Berg's excerpts from "Wozzeck," Op. 7 have been scheduled. Mr. Leinsdorf also lists Schumann's Overture, Scherzo and Finale, Op. 52, and Beethoven's Symphony No. 7, in A Major, Op. 92.

The Program

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf conducting, presented the 17th program of the 83rd season yesterday in Symphony Hall. Rudolf Serkin, pianist, was the solo performer. The program will be repeated tonight at 8:30.

Overture to 'Il Signor Bruschino'.. Rossini
Concerts in F Minor for Piano and Orchestra, Op. 114.....Reger
Excerpts from 'Die Walkure,' Act III Wagner
Excerpts from 'Siegfried'.....Wagner

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 194,870
FEB 15 1964

At Symphony

Serkin Exciting in Reger Concerto

By MICHAEL STEINBERG

Erich Leinsdorf conducted o[n] the Boston Symphony on F[ri]day so very w[ell] [th]e [pro]gram of though in one week he had recapitulated the year 1962 when he first took the Symphony over.

He started with Rossini's Overture to 'Il Signor Bruschino,' a diverting little item in which the second violins have to turn percussionists and rap rhythmically on their stands with their bows. Conductors like to put Rossini overtures on their programs for reasons other than their entertainment value: they make, rather unostentatiously, revealing showcases for the elegance of an orchestra's solo winds, even more for the precision and lightness of the strings. The kind of playing Leinsdorf got here was something gladly to be welcomed back to Symphony Hall.

The big event of the afternoon was Rudolf Serkin's playing of Max Reger's F minor Piano Concerto, Opus 114. The piece is hardly ever heard, though Serkin has made something of a specialty of it.

Written in 1910, the concerto stands on the very brink of stylistic crisis. Intensely chromatic, modulating at a feverish rate, the harmonic style is not far removed from that of Schoenberg's music of a couple of years earlier. One more step would have put Reger firmly into the 20th century, but that step was one he would never take; indeed, he himself characterized it as one "no decent musician would take."

In a way, Reger's concerto is a great mountain of unsolved compositional problems. It is fascinating in its very energy, the piano writing itself is most inventive, and so is much of the thematic material. There are moments of great genius, even: the way the finale grows harmonically out of the Largo, for example, or the brilliant effect of the ending in an unexpected key.

Like so much of the music of the first decade of our century, Schoenberg's included Reger's concerto suffers from a sort of textural indigestion. There are unbelievable amounts of notes all the time. One comes almost to gasp for a little air to be let in. That makes things no easier for the players.

Serkin's interpretation of the work is complete, his ability to convey it grandiose and exciting. Leinsdorf's accompaniment was better adjusted in timing than in balance, or, in other words, it was too loud. Serkin is not usually a pianist to get covered, but there were several occasions when there was little to be heard that corresponded with the sight of all those chords and octaves flying the length of the keyboard. Granted that the accompaniment is too thickly written, and that its language is essentially foreign to the orchestra players, nonetheless the imbalance of parts made the performance unattractive in sound, and Reger's music just plain hard to hear. Undoubtedly by the third time through on Sunday afternoon, this will all be much better adjusted.

For the second half of the program, Leinsdorf produced some excerpts from Wagner's 'Die Walkure' and 'Siegfried,' a sort of Nibelungensalat. It was all quite incoherent musically—there was some sport to be had in trying to guess where these odd 'arrangements' would skip to next—and the only reason for programming this sort of thing at all is sheer indulgence in the audience's and the conductor's taste for noise. And even as sound effects, it wasn't much fun to hear because the wind playing was so imprecise and so out-of-tune (except for the startlingly clear and beautiful E major chord at the end of the Magic Fire Music).

Next week, Erich Leinsdorf will conduct Schumann's Overture, Scherzo, and Finale, Opus 52; the concert excerpts from Alban Berg's opera 'Wozzeck,' to be given with the assistance of Phyllis Curtin, soprano, and a group of boys from the Sacred Heart Boychoir of Roslindale; and Beethoven's Seventh Symphony.

The ARTS
NEWS REVIEWS

Symphony No. 4
om "Le Coq d'Or"
Dodon
No. 3 in G major
d on page 61.
RCA VICTOR RECORDS
[9]
ns long in coming, someg is obviously wrong.
nd the Wagner (Mr.
nsdorf generally does he fine things with Wag-
) did nothing to stir one's guid blood; not even did Ride of the Valkyries—
t old war horse—manage vie with Pegasus. The rts from "Siegfried," with exception of the idyllic ains of Waldweben, had tter have been left in the era house. They make no ly successful transition to e concert hall.
So our hopes—all but those nned on Rossini—went one one down the drain. Most it was sounding brass and tinkling cymbal, sounding d tinkling far too long.

TIGHT BINDING

99

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Herald (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 178,553

FEB 1 5 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 194,870

The Symphony

Much Slag Shows Up in Concert Gold

By ROBERT TAYLOR

Erich Leinsdorf, an adventurous program maker, sometimes strikes gold amid the abandoned passages of the symphonic mother lode. Such zealous spading has its drawbacks, however, in the quantities of trivia also tossed up, and yesterday's program yielded these like a worked-out seam.

Rossini's overture to 'Il Signor Bruschino' and the Regar Concerto in F Minor were new to these concerts. The former is one of the Venetian examples of the master's 40-odd overtures to the operas, good, bad and indifferent, that flowed from his facile quill without stint, and although it exhibits a brisk sparkle, it is virtually indistinguishable from most of the others. The whole bag of tricks is displayed, then riffled off in succession, the thumping ensemble and ceaseless crescendi; and the fact that the second violins rap on their stands at four points as a reinforcement of the beat is indicative of the level of the humor therein.

The composer himself had the wit to disown the piece an instance of rare self-analysis. The tunes are pretty, and, like all of Rossini's, distributed helter-skelter regardless of technical convenience, so the polish and proportion of the light-handed texture paced by Mr. Leinsdorf's unrushed accelerandi can be accounted a triumph of interpretation over lazy creativity.

Indeed, from a standpoint of performance, the afternoon provided substantial interest. Appearing in the Reger Concerto, Rudolf Serkin gave a lithe, powerful and sharply-defined architecture to a score that intrinsically projects a turgid and sham heroism.

The Reger Concerto breathes the feeling that somehow we have heard it all before, and so we have: in Wagner, Brahms and Liszt. The composer is not averse to borrowing from his Victorian contemporaries, in itself not an invalid approach, but, alas, he has almost nothing to add. The work sprawls out on an ambitious scale, thickly-textured, tinted by Brahmsian horns and Wagnerian chromatics, with the dialogue of the piano submerged in a concertante form. The sentimentality of the music has little of the vigor of a post-romantic such as Rachmaninoff, being rather, drenched in the beery bathos of an academic brooding over his stein in a rathskeller while the student dueling society carries on nearby, in the manner of Romberg.

To the credit of Mr. Serpin, he was never blotted out by the orchestra. The phrasing of what is essentially an obbligato role kept the line of Reger's musical thought to the fore. There was a full-sized range of tone to each section, though one couuld feel a natural longing for a greater depth of sonority in the opening allegro moderato. The strength and grasp of structure were always present and, while the conceptions were not sensuoss, the design emerged carefully articulated by Mr. Serkin and tactfully balanced by Mr. Leinsdorf.

The excerpts from 'Die Walkure' and 'Siegfried' held a soaring opulence by way of contrast; the magnificence of a radiant and resplendent clarity Mr. Leinsdorf's way with this music is well-known: he conductid a memorable Ring cycle with the Metropolitan prior to assuming the directorship of the Boston Symphony, and his selection of tempos, his sympathy with the inner spirit of the inflections of detail is authoritative. Unlike the Fantastic Symphony, which Charles Munch conducted so splendidly last week, the mathematics of the score contribute to the emotional effect, and Mr. Leinsdorf's meticulous preparation pays handsome dividends.

Despite this advantage, the edited Wagner in the concert hall discloses the artifice of a scissors-and-paste anthology. True operatic voices aren't necessary, say as they are in Bellini; but th arrangement of the sections bend a theatrical statement out o shape. Serge Koussevitzky con ducted the complete Act III o "Siegfried" so the excerpts there are a series premiere by virtue of the Prelude to Act II and the "Forest Murmurs." The absence of the vocalist is felt: "Loki Loki, hear me and heed!" the eldritch cries of the Valkyries; the bridges between the concert hall sections buckle under the strain of their removal from the grand arch of their operatic design. In short, the development is missing. The absence of Wagner's melodies from the serious concert is not surprising; you will encounter him more often at Pops; the random fragment is native there.

Next weekend Phyllis Curtin, soprano, is the soloist, and Berg's excerpts from "Wozzeck," Op. 7 have been scheduled. Mr. Leinsdorf also lists Schumann's Overture, Scherzo and Finale, Op. 52, and Beethoven's Symphony No. 7, in A Major, Op. 92.

The Program

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf conducting, presented the 17th program of the 83rd season yesterday in Symphony Hall. Rudolf Serkin, pianist, was the solo performer. The program will be repeated tonight at 8:30.

Overture to 'Il Signor Bruschino' ..... Rossini
Concerto in F Minor for Piano and Orchestra, Op. 114 ..... Reger
Excerpts from 'Die Walkure,' Act III ..... Wagner
Excerpts from 'Siegfried' ..... Wagner

At Symphony

Serkin Exciting in Reger Concerto

By MICHAEL STEINBERG

The Arts News Reviews

Though in one week he had recapitulated the year 1962 when he first took the Symphony over.

He started with Rossini's Overture to 'Il Signor Bruschino,' a diverting little item in which the second violins have to turn percussionists and rap rhythmically on their stands with their bows. Conductors like to put Rossini overtures on their programs for reasons other than their entertainment value: they make, rather unostentatiously, revealing showcases for the elegance of an orchestra's solo winds, even more for the precision and lightness of the strings. The kind of playing Leinsdorf got here was something gladly to be welcomed back to Symphony Hall.

The big event of the afternoon was Rudolf Serkin's playing of Max Reger's F minor Piano Concerto, Opus 114. The piece is hardly ever heard, though Serkin has made something of a specialty of it.

Written in 1910, the concerto stands on the very brink of stylistic crisis. Intensely chromatic, modulating at a feverish rate, the harmonic style is not far removed from that of Schoenberg's music of a couple of years earlier. One more step would have put Reger firmly into the 20th century, but that step was one he would never take; indeed, he himself characterized it as one "no decent musician would take."

In a way, Reger's concerto is a great mountain of unsolved compositional problems. It is fascinating in its very energy, the piano writing itself is most inventive, and so is much of the thematic material. There are moments of great genius, even: the way the finale grows harmonically out of the Largo, for example, or the brilliant effect of the ending in an unexpected key.

Like so much of the music of the first decade of our century, Schoenberg's included Reger's concerto suffers from a sort of textural indigestion. There are unbelievable amounts of notes all the time. One comes almost to gasp for a little air to be let in. That makes things no easier for the players.

Serkin's interpretation of the work is complete, his ability to convey it grandiose and exciting. Leinsdorf's accompaniment was better adjusted in timing than in balance, or, in other words, it was too loud. Serkin is not usually a pianist to get covered, but there were several occasions when there was little to be heard that corresponded with the sight of all those chords and octaves flying the length of the keyboard. Granted that the accompaniment is too thickly written, and that its language is essentially foreign to the orchestra players, nonetheless the imbalance of parts made the performance unattractive in sound, and Reger's music just plain hard to hear. Undoubtedly by the third time through on Sunday afternoon, this will all be much better adjusted.

For the second half of the program, Leinsdorf produced some excerpts from Wagner's 'Die Walkure' and 'Siegfried,' a sort of Nibelungensalat. It was all quite incoherent musically—there was some sport to be had in trying to guess where those odd 'arrangements' would skip to next—and the only reason for programming this sort of thing at all is sheer indulgence in the audience's and the conductor's taste for noise. And even as sound effects, it wasn't much fun to hear because the wind playing was so imprecise and so out-of-tune (except for the startlingly clear and beautiful E major chord at the end of the Magic Fire Music).

Next week, Erich Leinsdorf will conduct Schumann's Overture, Scherzo, and Finale, Opus 52; the concert excerpts from Alban Berg's opera 'Wozzeck,' to be given with the assistance of Phyllis Curtin, soprano, and a group of boys from the Sacred Heart Boychoir of Roslindale; and Beethoven's Seventh Symphony.

100

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 465,653
FEB 23 1964

See Page 251 for Mr. Leinsdorf's Reply

Wagner Better Than Concert Excerpts Suggest

Program by Leinsdorf Provokes Worries

By MICHAEL STEINBERG

Wagner himself started the practice of giving orchestral excerpts from his music dramas in the concert hall. He did it for reasons of propaganda as much as anything. The public needed to become familiar with his work, and the theaters were slow in bringing it to the stage.

STEINBERG

Now, of course, the battle for Wagner is long won. Familiarity with "Tristan" or "Meistersinger" need be no further than one's record player or radio, and it is perhaps not out of place to examine for a moment some of the disservice rendered Wagner by a series of extracts like those Erich Leinsdorf conducted at a recent Boston Symphony concert.

Voice Still Matters

It is a commonplace, even at the most unsophisticated level of the music appreciation trade, to point out that in Wagner's operas the orchestra's became unprecedentedly important. This did not mean the elimination of the human voice, nor can one infer from the greatly increased responsibilities of the Wagnerian orchestra that the voice might as well be eliminated.

It is true enough that Wagner is full of passages — Isolde's Love Death is a famous instance — that make perfect grammatical sense even when the voice is left out. None of these passages, not even the Love Death, makes full expressive sense under those conditions. Wagner still thinks in terms of the special relationship, a kind of tension, really, between the orchestral instruments and the human voice.

Even though the inspiration is not Wagner's noblest, a place that never fails to tell rhetorically in performance is that at the end of "Die Walkuere" when Wotan has called into being the ring of fire around Bruennhilde and exclaims, "Let none who fear the point of this spear ever stride through these flames," and the solemn echo of his pronouncement by the trombones. With no singer, and with no dramatic point to be made, this becomes merely a rather pompous phrase in the orchestra, immediately repeated for no evident reason rather more loudly by heavier brass.

The Ride of the Valkyries is a much maligned piece, principally by those who do not know it as Wagner imagined it. Wagner builds an enormous and colorful climax by his gradual addition of the eight women's voices as the Valkyries arrive. When we have no voices we have no climax: there is only the now pointless repitition of some phrases that serve magnificently in the dramatic role Wagner imagined for them, but have little musical interest of their own. An amazingly evocative piece of dramatic picture music is turned into a shapelessly repetitive gallop that finally just peters out at some quite arbitrary point.

Shapeless "Ride"

Forest Murmurs from "Siegfried" is in its standard concert arrangement something too abjectly stupid to be even discussed. The main psychological point of this remarkable scene of the young hero's oedipal musings is that after tasting the dragon's blood he can understand the singing of the wood-bird; exit principal flute, enter Miss Sutherland. No singer, no point, and the concert version's representation of the transformation by the addition of a glockenspiel is quite disgusting in effect.

Leinsdorf led into Forest Murmurs by way of the Prelude to Act II of "Siegfried." Now that is not, properly speaking, a piece of music at all. It is theatrical atmosphere, and as such it is marvelous. It prepares one for the sinister goings-on outside the dragon's lair. In the dark theater, with the curtain not yet up, it doesn't even matter if it is not very cleanly played. One doesn't, after all, except a dragon to play the tuba very well, but in the bright and wordly light of Symphony Hall at half past three on Friday afternoon, there is no believing in the dragon at all. There is Erich Leinsdorf and a plainly visible orchestra, one never thinks of Fafner, one knows only that tuba and contra-bassoon are being played with dreadful intonation, and one squirms.

Messy Surgery

And those concert endings! Such sutures, ligatures, headless beginnings, messy amputations! These concert endings are emergency measures for the stopping of haemhorrages, and Symphony Hall must still be blood-stained from some of the brutal surgery performed on poor Siegfried. There is the whole matter also of the alien intrusion into Wagner's music: the sudden death of Siegfried's Rhine Journey as manufactured by Humperdinck, or those loathsome, out-of-style fanfares that brought Leinsdorf's "Siegfried" extracts to a close. No, it is just not true that any old C major blasts will suffice to finish what was presented (with literal truth perhaps, but with moral mendaciousness) as the glorious scene of Bruennhilde's Awakening.

The irony of it all is that there are orchestral passages in the Wagner dramas that are perfectly adapted to concert presentation, and which we never hear. The Prelude to Act III of "Tannhaeuser" in the Dresden version is an example, and so is the Venusberg music (but not in conjunction with the Overture). The most beautiful example of all is Wagner's own concert version of the Prelude to Act I of "Tristan." Here the concert ending is a real ending, not just some place where the music happens to stop. Quite apart from its general implications about this whole problem, this concert version of the "Tristan" Prelude ends with some of Wagner's most magically beautiful pages, pages which I have yet to hear. Most conductors do not even know this exists, though Muck and Strauss both recorded it. Can we not have it once from Mr. Leinsdorf?

Wagner was a composer of gigantic imagination and abilities, but from the Symphony programs of 14 and 15 February, one could have inferred only that he was a masterful orchestrator, though with odd aberrations (that glockenspiel!), the creator of an occasional poetic effect, though given to much empty rhetoric, and totally devoid of a sense of form.

It's the worst kind of misrepresentation, really. To play thus with his music is to indulge the shoddiest musical tastes. It seems no longer defensible on practical grounds, and it never was civilized.

Berkshire Eagle (e)
PITTSFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 29,087
FEB 17 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Jewish Advocate
BOSTON, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 35,304
FEB 20 1964

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 20, 1964

At the B. S. O.

Serkin Performs Reger Concerto

By ALLAN SLY

The B.S.O.'s Francophiles had perforce to cross the Rhine for last week's program (the 17th) — except for an appetizer — a rather fatuous little overture from Rossini's youth (Il Signor Bruschino), in which bows have to tap on desks. Nothing wrong with that if they don't damage them (the desks).

Seriously, however, Mr. Leinsdorf's way with a funny old piece like this is miraculous, as was Toscanini's, though in this rarefied atmosphere everything becomes crystal-clear — no secrets are hid. Mr. Leinsdorf is obviously born to command, and for him the orchestra gives a solid and organic sound that is usually the perfect vehicle for the matter in hand. It results from his firm control over the ensemble and this is among the greater glories of last season and this. There were, however, two (matching) spots in the Rossini where at the peak of an ascending phrase the violins (probably unconsciously) showed signs of being inhibited, by this very control, from the fulfillment one had expected, as the phrase tried to pour over into what followed. When the texture is heavier, such intimate secrets are less often revealed.

And heavier it certainly was, after our palettes had been teased and we had crossed the Rhine. Reger's piano concerto, opus 114, has waited 54 years for a Boston performace. Its monumental scope and intense spiritual travail proved a splendid vehicle for Rudolf Serkin's volcanic pianism. He has been championing this work since 1926 and one might hope for it to take root in the repertoire.

Since 1914 the world has been cruelly wrenched out of shape and the normal dissemination of such late romantic German music as this never occurred. Exotic personalities and styles, and some unnatural abberations from normality captured the imagination of a distraught world. If we could go back to the age of Nikisch what a rich fare would be waiting for us! This Reger, for example. Perhaps Mr. Leinsdorf has something of the kind in mind. One can hope.

From this standpoint one can willingly submit to the mesmerism of Wagner, knowing where it may lead. It is hardly an end in itself, not in 1964, but it is certainly magnificent as Mr. Leinsdorf does it. Possibly a little cool-headed, in a classic manner. The Ride of the Valkyries and the Magic Fire Music were followed by a generous sequence from Siegfried — new to these concerts. More peculiar theology — but somehow familiar. Who has not at some point surrendered to the spell of this mythos? The wonder is, we so rarely hear the inner workings of a Wagner score, and such performances as these come as revelations.

Next week Phyllis Curtin sings excerpts from Wozzeck, and the orchestra will take retrospective note of Schumann (opus 52) and Beethoven (Symphony No. 7).

EIGHTY-THIRD SEASON •

Eigh

TUESDAY EVENI

ROSSINI
(First MOZART
I. Allegro
II. Allegretto
III. Allegro assai
(First p
IN BRUCKNER
I. Allegro moderato
II. Adagio: Schr feierlic
III. Scherzo: Allegro; Tr
IV. Finale: Bewegt, doch

RU
Mr. SERKIN

BALDWIN PIANO

100

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Sunday Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 465,653

See Page 251 for Mr. Leinsdorf's Reply

Wagner Better Than Concert Excerpts

Program by Leinsdorf Provokes Worries

By MICHAEL STEINBERG

Wagner himself started the practice of giving orchestral excerpts from his music dramas in the concert hall. He did it for reasons of propaganda as much as anything. The public needed to become familiar with his work, and the theaters were slow in bringing it to the stage.

STEINBERG

Now, of course, the battle for Wagner is long won. Familiarity with "Tristan" or "Meistersinger" need be no further than one's record player or radio, and it is perhaps not out of place to examine for a moment some of the disservice rendered Wagner by a series of extracts like those Erich Leinsdorf conducted at a recent Boston Symphony concert.

Voice Still Matters

It is a commonplace, even at the most unsophisticated level of the music appreciation trade, to point out that in Wagner's operas the orchestra's became unprecedentedly important. This did not mean the elimination of the human voice, nor can one infer from the greatly increased responsibilities of the Wagnerian orchestra that the voice might as well be eliminated.

It is true enough that Wagner is full of passages—Isolde's Love Death is a famous instance — that make perfect grammatical sense even when the voice is left out. None of these passages, not even the Love Death, makes full expressive sense under those conditions. Wagner still thinks in terms of the special relationship, a kind of tension, really, between the orchestral instruments and the human voice.

Even though the inspiration is not Wagner's noblest, a place that never fails to tell rhetorically in performance is that at the end of "Die Walkuere" when Wotan has called into being the ring of fire around Bruennhilde and exclaims, "Let none who fears the point of this spear ever stride through these flames," and the solemn echo of his pronouncement by the trombones. With no singer, and with no dramatic point to be made, this becomes merely a rather pompous phrase in the orchestra, immediately repeated for no evident reason rather more loudly by heavier brass.

The Ride of the Valkyries is a much maligned piece, principally by those who do not know it as Wagner imagined it. Wagner builds an enormous and colorful climax by his gradual addition of the eight women's voices as the Valkyries arrive. When we have no voices we have no climax: there is only the now pointless repitition of some phrases that serve magnificently in the dramatic role Wagner imagined for them, but have little musical interest of their own. An amazingly evocative piece of dramatic picture music is turned into a shapelessly repetitive gallop that finally just peters out at some quite arbitrary point.

Shapeless "Ride"

Forest Murmurs from "Siegfried" is in its standard concert arrangement something too abjectly stupid to be even discussed. The main psychological point of this remarkable scene of the young hero's oedipal musings is that after tasting the dragon's blood he can understand the singing of the wood-bird; exit principal flute, enter Miss Sutherland. No singer, no point, and the concert version's representation of the transformation by the addition of a glockenspiel is quite disgusting in effect.

Leinsdorf led into Forest Murmurs by way of the Prelude to Act II of "Siegfried." Now that is not, properly speaking, a piece of music at all. It is theatrical atmosphere, and as such it is marvelous. It prepares one for the sinister goings-on outside the dragon's lair. In the dark theater, with the curtain not yet up, it doesn't even matter if it is not very cleanly played. One doesn't, after all, except a dragon to play the tuba very well, but in the bright and wordly light of Symphony Hall at half past three on Friday afternoon, there is no believing in the dragon at all. There is Erich Leinsdorf and a plainly visible orchestra, one never thinks of Fafner, one knows only that tuba and contra-bassoon are being played with dreadful intonation, and one squirms.

Messy Surgery

And those concert endings! Such sutures, ligatures, headless beginnings, messy amputations! These concert endings are emergency measures for the stopping of haemhorrages, and Symphony Hall must still be blood-stained from some of the brutal surgery performed on poor Siegfried. There is the whole matter also of the alien intrusion into Wagner's music: the sudden death of Siegfried's Rhine Journey as manufactured by Humperdinck, or those loathsome, out-of-style fanfares that brought Leinsdorf's "Siegfried" extracts to a close. No, it is just not true that any old C major blasts will suffice to finish what was presented (with literal truth perhaps, but with moral mendaciousness) as the glorious scene of Bruennhilde's Awakening.

The irony of it all is that there are orchestral passages in the Wagner dramas that are perfectly adapted to concert presentation, and which we never hear. The Prelude to Act III of "Tannhaeuser" in the Dresden version is an example, and so is the Venusberg music (but not in conjunction with the Overture). The most beautiful example of all is Wagner's own concert version of the Prelude to Act I of "Tristan." Here the concert ending is a real ending, not just some place where the music happens to stop. Quite apart from its general implications about this whole problem, this concert version of the "Tristan" Prelude ends with some of Wagner's most magically beautiful pages, pages which I have yet to hear. Most conductors do not even know this exists, though Muck and Strauss both recorded it. Can we not have it once from Mr. Leinsdorf?

Wagner was a composer of gigantic imagination and abilities, but from the Symphony programs of 14 and 15 February, one could have inferred only that he was a masterful orchestrator, though with odd aberrations (that glockenspiel!), the creator of an occasional poetic effect, though given to much empty rhetoric, and totally devoid of a sense of form.

It's the worst kind of misrepresentation, really. To play thus with his music is to indulge the shoddiest musical tastes. It seems no longer defensible on practical grounds, and it never was civilized.

Berkshire Eagle (e)
PITTSFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 29,087

FEB 17 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Jewish Advocate
BOSTON, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 35,304

1964

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 20, 1964

At the B. S. O.

Serkin Performs Reger Concerto

By ALLAN SLY

The B.S.O.'s Francophiles had perforce to cross the Rhine for last week's program (the 17th) — except for an appetizer, a rather fatuous little overture from Rossini's youth (Il Signor Bruschino), in which bows have to tap on desks. Nothing wrong with that if they don't damage them (the desks).

Seriously, however, Mr. Leinsdorf's way with a funny old piece like this is miraculous, as was Toscanini's, though in this rarefied atmosphere everything becomes crystal-clear — no secrets are hid. Mr. Leinsdorf is obviously born to command, and for him the orchestra gives a solid and organic sound that is usually the perfect vehicle for the matter in hand. It results from his firm control over the ensemble and this is among the greater glories of last season and this. There were, however, two (matching) spots in the Rossini where at the peak of an ascending phrase the violins (probably unconsciously) showed signs of being inhibited, by this very control, from the fulfillment one had expected, as the phrase tried to pour over into what followed. When the texture is heavier, such intimate secrets are less often revealed.

And heavier it certainly was, after our palettes had been teased and we had crossed the Rhine. Reger's piano concerto, opus 114, has waited 54 years for a Boston performace. Its monumental scope and intense spiritual travail proved a splendid vehicle for Rudolf Serkin's volcanic pianism. He has been championing this work since 1926 and one might hope for it to take root in the repertoire.

Since 1914 the world has been cruelly wrenched out of shape and the normal dissemination of such late romantic German music as this never occurred. Exotic personalities and styles, and some unnatural aberations from normality captured the imagination of a distraught world. If we could go back to the age of Nikisch what a rich fare would be waiting for us! This Reger, for example. Perhaps Mr. Leinsdorf has something of the kind in mind. One can hope.

From this standpoint one can willingly submit to the mesmerism of Wagner, knowing where it may lead. It is hardly an end in itself, not in 1964, but it is certainly magnificent as Mr. Leinsdorf does it. Possibly a little cool-headed, in a classic manner. The Ride of the Valkyries and the Magic Fire Music were followed by a generous sequence from Siegfried — new to these concerts. More peculiar theology — but somehow familiar. Who has not at some point surrendered to the spell of this mythos? The wonder is, we so rarely hear the inner workings of a Wagner score, and such performances as these come as revelations.

Next week Phyllis Curtin sings excerpts from Wozzeck, and the orchestra will take retrospective note of Schumann (opus 52) and Beethoven (Symphony No. 7).

Suggest

EIGHTY-THIRD SEASON

Eig

TUESDAY EVENI

ROSSINI

First p

MOZART

I. Allegro
II. Allegretto
III. Allegro assai

First p

IN

BRUCKNER

I. Allegro moderato
II. Adagio: Sehr feierli
III. Scherzo: Allegro; Tr
IV. Finale: Bewegt, doch

RU

MR. SERKIN

BALDWIN PIANO

TIGHT BINDING

SUNDAY 5. TUESDAY 8

101 3

Postponed to April 5. 1964

EIGHTY-THIRD SEASON • NINETEEN HUNDRED SIXTY-THREE–SIXTY-FOUR

See Page 143

Fifth Program

SUNDAY AFTERNOON, FEBRUARY 16, at 3:00 o'clock

ROSSINI ..... Overture to "Il Signor Bruschino"
(First performance in this series)

REGER ..... Concerto in F minor for Piano and Orchestra, Op. 114
I. Allegro moderato
II. Largo con gran espressione
III. Allegro con spirito
(First performance in this series)

INTERMISSION

WAGNER ..... Excerpts from "Die Walküre," Act III
Ride of the Valkyries — Magic Fire Music

WAGNER ..... Excerpts from "Siegfried"
Prelude to Act II — Waldweben — Prelude to Act III — Siegfried's Ascent to Brünnhilde's Rock — Brünnhilde's Awakening
(First performance in this series)

SOLOIST
RUDOLF SERKIN
Mr. SERKIN plays the Steinway Piano

A new plan for ticket reservations is announced on page 61.

BALDWIN PIANO RCA VICTOR RECORDS

EIGHTY-THIRD SEASON • NINETEEN HUNDRED SIXTY-THREE–SIXTY-FOUR

Eighth Program

TUESDAY EVENING, FEBRUARY 18, at 8:30 o'clock

ROSSINI ..... Overture to "Il Signor Bruschino"
(First performance in this series)

MOZART ..... Piano Concerto in F major, K. 459
I. Allegro
II. Allegretto
III. Allegro assai
(First performance in this series)

INTERMISSION

BRUCKNER ..... Symphony No. 7, in E major
I. Allegro moderato
II. Adagio: Sehr feierlich und langsam
III. Scherzo: Allegro; Trio: Etwas langsamer
IV. Finale: Bewegt, doch nicht schnell

SOLOIST
RUDOLF SERKIN
Mr. SERKIN plays the Steinway Piano

BALDWIN PIANO RCA VICTOR RECORDS

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Herald (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 178,553
FEB 17 1964

Symphony Offers Special Treat To Loyal Fans

Patrons of the Boston Symphony Orchestra who braved yesterday's storm to attend the regular Sunday afternoon concert were offered a special treat when Music Director Erich Leinsdorf asked them to move closer to the stage while the orchestra practiced two future presentations.

By the normal 3 p.m. starting time, a third of the anticipated sell-out of 2700 persons had taken their seats. Leinsdorf then made his request and the impromptu concert went on.

The Orchestra rehearsed Mozart's "Concerto for Piano and Orchestra in F Major" with Rudolph Serkin at the piano and Beethoven's "Seventh Symphony."

The scheduled program will be presented at a later date.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Times (e)
GLOUCESTER, Mass.
Circ. 10,050
FEB 17 1964

Snow puts a new twist on concert

BOSTON (UPI)—Weather provided a different twist to a Sunday afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

By the normal 3 p.m. starting time, only one-third of the anticipated sellout audience of 2,700 persons had taken their seats in Symphony Hall.

After a backstage consultation among symphony officials, Music Director Erich Leinsdorf appeared in a rehearsal jacket and urged the audience to draw in close to the orchestra while it practiced two works scheduled for future presentation.

The orchestra rehearsed Mozart's Concerto in F for piano and orchestra with Rudolf Serkin as soloist and Beethoven's Seventh Symphony.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 194,870
FEB 17 1964

BSO Rewards 850 For Defying Storm

The Boston Symphony Orchestra proved again Sunday afternoon that it's a go-through group.

The snowstorm didn't have much of an effect on the orchestra, but it depleted the audience.

The concert, the fifth in a series, was slated to go on at 3 p.m., but at 3:15 only 850 of the 2600 sold-out seats were occupied.

Conductor Erich Leinsdorf conferred with manager Thomas D. Perry Jr. and decided that the show must go on.

Dressed in a rehearsal jacket, Leinsdorf stepped onto the stage and urged the audience to move to the front to hear a two-hour rehearsal.

Included in the program were Mozart's Concerto in F Major for piano and orchestra, Rudolf Serkin soloist, and the brisk, cheery Seventh Symphony of Beethoven.

For those who had bought tickets in advance for the afternoon of music, the regularly scheduled concert will be made up at a later date — probably Sunday, Apr. 5.

The organ recital by Robert Town, slated for 6 p.m. was called off.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Record-American (m) (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 531,565
FEB 17 1964

BSO AUDIENCE GIVEN BONUS

Some 900 hardy music lovers received a special bonus at Boston Symphony Hall yesterday.

Conductor Erich Leinsdorf cancelled the regular Sunday afternoon concert when only one-third of the anticipated sell-out audience of 2700 persons arived for the performance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

TIGHT BINDING

SUNDAY 5. TUESDAY 8

Postponed to April 5. 1964

EIGHTY-THIRD SEASON • NINETEEN HUNDRED SIXTY-THREE–SIXTY-FOUR

See Page 143

Fifth Program

SUNDAY AFTERNOON, FEBRUARY 16, at 3:00 o'clock

ROSSINI ..... Overture to "Il Signor Bruschino"
(First performance in this series)

REGER ..... Concerto in F minor for Piano and Orchestra, Op. 114
I. Allegro moderato
II. Largo con gran espressione
III. Allegro con spirito
(First performance in this series)

INTERMISSION

WAGNER ..... Excerpts from "Die Walküre," Act III
Ride of the Valkyries — Magic Fire Music

WAGNER ..... Excerpts from "Siegfried"
Prelude to Act II — Waldweben — Prelude to Act III — Siegfried's Ascent to Brünnhilde's Rock — Brünnhilde's Awakening
(First performance in this series)

SOLOIST
RUDOLF SERKIN
MR. SERKIN plays the Steinway Piano

A new plan for ticket reservations is announced on page 61.

BALDWIN PIANO RCA VICTOR RECORDS

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Herald (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 178,553

FEB 17 1964

Symphony Offers Special Treat To Loyal Fans

Patrons of the Boston Symphony Orchestra who braved yesterday's storm to attend the regular Sunday afternoon concert were offered a special treat when Music Director Erich Leinsdorf asked them to move closer to the stage while the orchestra practiced two future presentations.

By the normal 3 p.m. starting time, a third of the anticipated sell-out of 2700 persons had taken their seats. Leinsdorf then made his request and the impromptu concert went on.

The Orchestra rehearsed Mozart's "Concerto for Piano and Orchestra in F Major" with Rudolph Serkin at the piano and Beethoven's "Seventh Symphony."

The scheduled program will be presented at a later date.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Times (e)
GLOUCESTER, Mass.
Circ. 10,050

FEB 17 1964

Snow puts a new twist on concert

BOSTON (UPI)—Weather provided a different twist to a Sunday afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

By the normal 3 p.m. starting time, only one-third of the anticipated sellout audience of 2,700 persons had taken their seats in Symphony Hall.

After a backstage consultation among symphony officials, Music Director Erich Leinsdorf appeared in a rehearsal jacket and urged the audience to draw in close to the orchestra while it practiced two works scheduled for future presentation.

The orchestra rehearsed Mozart's Concerto in F for piano and orchestra with Rudolf Serkin as soloist and Beethoven's Seventh Symphony.

EIGHTY-THIRD SEASON • NINETEEN HUNDRED SIXTY-THREE–SIXTY-FOUR

Eighth Program

TUESDAY EVENING, FEBRUARY 18, at 8:30 o'clock

ROSSINI ..... Overture to "Il Signor Bruschino"
(First performance in this series)

MOZART ..... Piano Concerto in F major, K. 459
I. Allegro
II. Allegretto
III. Allegro assai
(First performance in this series)

INTERMISSION

BRUCKNER ..... Symphony No. 7, in E major
I. Allegro moderato
II. Adagio: Sehr feierlich und langsam
III. Scherzo: Allegro; Trio: Etwas langsamer
IV. Finale: Bewegt, doch nicht schnell

SOLOIST
RUDOLF SERKIN
MR. SERKIN plays the Steinway Piano

BALDWIN PIANO RCA VICTOR RECORDS

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 194,870

FEB 17 1964

BSO Rewards 850 For Defying Storm

The Boston Symphony Orchestra proved again Sunday afternoon that it's a go-through group.

The snowstorm didn't have much of an effect on the orchestra, but it depleted the audience.

The concert, the fifth in a series, was slated to go on at 3 p.m., but at 3:15 only 850 of the 2600 sold-out seats were occupied.

Conductor Erich Leinsdorf conferred with manager Thomas D: Perry Jr. and decided that the show must go on.

Dressed in a rehearsal jacket, Leinsdorf stepped onto the stage and urged the audience to move to the front to hear a two-hour rehearsal.

Included in the program were Mozart's Concerto in F Major for piano and orchestra, Rudolf Serkin soloist, and the brisk, cheery Seventh Symphony of Beethoven.

For those who had bought tickets in advance for the afternoon of music, the regularly scheduled concert will be made up at a later date — probably Sunday, Apr. 5.

The organ recital by Robert Town, slated for 6 p.m. was called off.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Record-American (m) (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 531,565

FEB 17 1964

BSO AUDIENCE GIVEN BONUS

Some 900 hardy music lovers received a special bonus at Boston Symphony Hall yesterday.

Conductor Erich Leinsdorf cancelled the regular Sunday afternoon concert when only one-third of the anticipated sell-out audience of 2700 persons arived for the performance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

SUNDAY 5. TUESDAY 8

...ued to April 5. 1964

...N • NINETEEN HUNDRED SIXTY-THREE–SIXTY-FOUR

...ee Page 143

Fifth Program

...TERNOON, FEBRUARY 16, at 3:00 o'clock

R... ..... Overture to "Il Signor Bruschino"
(First performance in this series)

R... ...oncerto in F minor for Piano and Orchestra, Op. 114
...o moderato
...go con gran espressione
...legro con spirito
(First performance in this series)

INTERMISSION

WAGNER ..... Excerpts from "Die Walküre," Act III
Ride of the Valkyries — Magic Fire Music

WAGNER ..... Excerpts from "Siegfried"
Prelude to Act II — Waldweben — Prelude to Act III — Siegfried's Ascent to Brünnhilde's Rock — Brünnhilde's Awakening
(First performance in this series)

SOLOIST
RUDOLF SERKIN
Mr. SERKIN plays the Steinway Piano

A new plan for ticket reservations is announced on page 61.

BALDWIN PIANO RCA VICTOR RECORDS

EIGHTY-THIRD SEASON • NINETEEN HUNDRED SIXTY-THREE–SIXTY-FOUR

Eighth Program

...ESDAY EVENING, FEBRUARY 18, at 8:30 o'clock

R... ..... Overture to "Il Signor Bruschino"
(First performance in this series)

M... ..... Piano Concerto in F major, K. 459
Allegro
Allegretto
Allegro assai
(First performance in this series)

INTERMISSION

BRU... ..... Symphony No. 7, in E major
Allegro moderato
Adagio: Sehr feierlich und langsam
Scherzo: Allegro; Trio: Etwas langsamer
Finale: Bewegt, doch nicht schnell

SOLOIST
RUDOLF SERKIN
Mr. SERKIN plays the Steinway Piano

BALDWIN PIANO RCA VICTOR RECORDS

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
...2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Herald (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 178,553
FEB 1 7 1964

Symphony Offers Special Treat To Loyal Fans

Patrons of the Boston Symphony Orchestra who braved yesterday's storm to attend the regular Sunday afternoon concert were offered a special treat when Music Director Erich Leinsdorf asked them to move closer to the stage while the orchestra practiced two future presentations.

By the normal 3 p.m. starting time, a third of the anticipated sell-out of 2700 persons had taken their seats. Leinsdorf then made his request and the impromptu concert went on.

The Orchestra rehearsed Mozart's "Concerto for Piano and Orchestra in F Major" with Rudolph Serkin at the piano and Beethoven's "Seventh Symphony."

The scheduled program will be presented at a later date.

Berkshire Eagle (e)
PITTSFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 29,087
FEB 1 7 1964
NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Times (e)
GLOUCESTER, Mass.
Circ. 10,050
FEB 1 7 1964

Snow puts a new twist on concert

BOSTON (UPI)—Weather provided a different twist to a Sunday afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

By the normal 3 p.m. starting time, only one-third of the anticipated sellout audience of 2,700 persons had taken their seats in Symphony Hall.

After a backstage consultation among symphony officials, Music Director Erich Leinsdorf appeared in a rehearsal jacket and urged the audience to draw in close to the orchestra while it practiced two works scheduled for future presentation.

The orchestra rehearsed Mozart's Concerto in F for piano and orchestra with Rudolf Serkin as soloist and Beethoven's Seventh Symphony.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 194,870
FEB 1 7 1964

BSO Rewards 850 For Defying Storm

The Boston Symphony Orchestra proved again Sunday afternoon that it's a go-through group.

The snowstorm didn't have much of an effect on the orchestra, but it depleted the audience.

The concert, the fifth in a series, was slated to go on at 3 p.m., but at 3:15 only 850 of the 2600 sold-out seats were occupied.

Conductor Erich Leinsdorf conferred with manager Thomas D: Perry Jr. and decided that the show must go on.

Dressed in a rehearsal jacket, Leinsdorf stepped onto the stage and urged the audience to move to the front to hear a two-hour rehearsal.

Included in the program were Mozart's Concerto in F Major for piano and orchestra, Rudolf Serkin soloist, and the brisk, cheery Seventh Symphony of Beethoven.

For those who had bought tickets in advance for the afternoon of music, the regularly scheduled concert will be made up at a later date — probably Sunday, Apr. 5.

The organ recital by Robert Town, slated for 6 p.m. was called off.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Record-American (m) (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 531,565
FEB 1 7 1964

BSO AUDIENCE GIVEN BONUS

Some 900 hardy music lovers received a special bonus at Boston Symphony Hall yesterday.

Conductor Erich Leinsdorf cancelled the regular Sunday afternoon concert when only one-third of the anticipated sell-out audience of 2700 persons arived for the performance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

SUNDAY 5. TUESDAY 8

101 3

Moved to April 5. 1964

EIGHTY-THIRD SEASON • NINETEEN HUNDRED SIXTY-THREE–SIXTY-FOUR

See Page 143

Fifth Program

SUNDAY AFTERNOON, FEBRUARY 16, at 3:00 o'clock

ROSSINI ..... Overture to "Il Signor Bruschino"
(First performance in this series)

REGER Concerto in F minor for Piano and Orchestra, Op. 114
I. Allegro moderato
II. Largo con gran espressione
III. Allegro con spirito
(First performance in this series)

INTERMISSION

WAGNER ..... Excerpts from "Die Walküre," Act III
Ride of the Valkyries — Magic Fire Music

WAGNER ..... Excerpts from "Siegfried"
Prelude to Act II — Waldweben — Prelude to Act III — Siegfried's Ascent to Brünnhilde's Rock — Brünnhilde's Awakening
(First performance in this series)

SOLOIST
RUDOLF SERKIN
Mr. SERKIN plays the Steinway Piano

A new plan for ticket reservations is announced on page 61.

BALDWIN PIANO RCA VICTOR RECORDS

EIGHTY-THIRD SEASON • NINETEEN HUNDRED SIXTY-THREE–SIXTY-FOUR

Eighth Program

TUESDAY EVENING, FEBRUARY 18, at 8:30 o'clock

ROSSINI ..... Overture to "Il Signor Bruschino"
(First performance in this series)

MOZART ..... Piano Concerto in F major, K. 459
I. Allegro
II. Allegretto
III. Allegro assai
(First performance in this series)

INTERMISSION

BRUCKNER ..... Symphony No. 7, in E major
I. Allegro moderato
II. Adagio: Sehr feierlich und langsam
III. Scherzo: Allegro; Trio: Etwas langsamer
IV. Finale: Bewegt, doch nicht schnell

SOLOIST
RUDOLF SERKIN
Mr. SERKIN plays the Steinway Piano

BALDWIN PIANO RCA VICTOR RECORDS

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Herald (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 178,553
FEB 17 1964

Symphony Offers Special Treat To Loyal Fans

Patrons of the Boston Symphony Orchestra who braved yesterday's storm to attend the regular Sunday afternoon concert were offered a special treat when Music Director Erich Leinsdorf asked them to move closer to the stage while the orchestra practiced two future presentations.

By the normal 3 p.m. starting time, a third of the anticipated sell-out of 2700 persons had taken their seats. Leinsdorf then made his request and the impromptu concert went on.

The Orchestra rehearsed Mozart's "Concerto for Piano and Orchestra in F Major" with Rudolph Serkin at the piano and Beethoven's "Seventh Symphony."

The scheduled program will be rescheduled at a later date.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Berkshire Eagle (e)
PITTSFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 29,087
FEB 17 1964

Snow puts a new twist on concert

BOSTON (UPI)—Weather provided a different twist to a Sunday afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

By the normal 3 p.m. starting time, only one-third of the anticipated sellout audience of 2,700 persons had taken their seats in Symphony Hall.

After a backstage consultation among symphony officials, Music Director Erich Leinsdorf appeared in a rehearsal jacket and urged the audience to draw in close to the orchestra while it practiced two works scheduled for future presentation.

The orchestra rehearsed Mozart's Concerto in F for piano and orchestra with Rudolf Serkin as soloist and Beethoven's Seventh Symphony.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Times (e)
GLOUCESTER, Mass.
Circ. 10,050
FEB 17 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 194,870
FEB 17 1964

BSO Rewards 850 For Defying Storm

The Boston Symphony Orchestra proved again Sunday afternoon that it's a go-through group.

The snowstorm didn't have much of an effect on the orchestra, but it depleted the audience.

The concert, the fifth in a series, was slated to go on at 3 p.m., but at 3:15 only 850 of the 2600 sold-out seats were occupied.

Conductor Erich Leinsdorf conferred with manager Thomas D. Perry Jr. and decided that the show must go on.

Dressed in a rehearsal jacket, Leinsdorf stepped onto the stage and urged the audience to move to the front to hear a two-hour rehearsal.

Included in the program were Mozart's Concerto in F Major for piano and orchestra, Rudolf Serkin soloist, and the brisk, cheery Seventh Symphony of Beethoven.

For those who had bought tickets in advance for the afternoon of music, the regularly scheduled concert will be made up at a later date — probably Sunday, Apr. 5.

The organ recital by Robert Town, slated for 8 p.m. was called off.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Record-American (m) (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 531,565
FEB 17 1964

BSO AUDIENCE GIVEN BONUS

Some 900 hardy music lovers received a special bonus at Boston Symphony Hall yesterday.

Conductor Erich Leinsdorf cancelled the regular Sunday afternoon concert when only one-third of the anticipated sons arived for the performance of the Boston Symphony

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Patriot-Ledger (e)
QUINCY, Mass.
Circ. 47,164

FEB 19 1964

The Sound of Music

Mozart Concerto Joins Serkin, Leinsdorf, BSO

By Peter M. Knapp

Erich Leinsdorf and his guest soloist, pianist Rudolf Serkin, seemed to relish their collaboration last night at Symphony Hall. The audience did, too, and warmly applauded a bright performance of Mozart's Piano Concerto in F, K. 459.

Mr. Serkin has his own way with Mozart. It is, perhaps, not the most Mozartean way. Yet the pianist has interesting ideas, the scholarship to support them, and a glistening technique to execute it all.

While many pianists try for the crystalline tone that perhaps is best suited to the works of the Salzburg master, Mr. Serkin is not reluctant to use a firmer touch. While others are gentle, Mr. Serkin plays Mozart — as he does everything else he touches—with a virile strength. There is, however, grace, subtlety and delicacy in his Mozart, even though he is more robust than most.

The K. 459 concerto is ideally suited for the kind of close teamwork soloist and conductor achieved last night. It is more of a musical dialogue between soloist and orchestra than a vehicle for instrumental solo with accompaniment. The cadenzas are not show-stoppers, and are written with taste and moderation. This is a sunny and melodic composition, designed to entertain, unfettered by somber emotions.

Mr. Serkin's exact and sensitive performance was matched by superb orchestral playing. With the exception of a few stiff passages, the Boston Symphony showed it is making gains in acquiring the flexibility and nuance of the Mozartean style under Mr. Leinsdorf's guidance. The first movement was especially fine.

The finale, though, turned out to be more Serkin than Mozart. As was noticeable at the Tanglewood concerts last summer, Mr. Serkin likes the final movements of Mozart concerti to be taken at a brisk gallop. While the pianist evidently can tear through the notes at any pace, the music deserves more of a chance to breathe.

For the major work on the program, Mr. Leinsdorf chose Anton Bruckner's sprawling Symphony No. 7 in E—a score about the size of the federal budget. Requiring an hour or so to perform, Bruckner's Seventh is generously melodic and generally appealing.

Yet after the last fortissimo chord dies away, the listener has the feeling that although he has heard something big and bulky—even overwhelming at times—there is little he will carry home to remember from the experience. It is a curious mixture of the banal and the imaginative, of sickly sentiment and genuine emotion.

The last movement, with its brassy Wagnerian bluster, its dependence on empty orchestral tricks, unfortunately undoes much of the admirable craftsmanship that has preceded it.

The scherzo, constructed of a rollicking rhythm and catchy theme, is most likely to stick in the memory, even though the adagio movement contains the most inspiration and depth. Here we find a mood of profound solemnity, brilliant harmonic writing, and two melodies of exceptional loveliness. Yet, Bruckner never knew when to quit, and this movement suffers from its excessive length.

RUDOLF SERKIN

Whatever the symphony's shortcomings, they were not shared by the Boston Symphony last night. Mr. Leinsdorf and his men gave an impassioned performance, in which sheer tonal beauty matched musicianship. While all the instrumental choirs performed this busy and grueling score with distinction, the cello section deserves an extra nod for its precision and sonority.

Mr. Leinsdorf opened the concert with a delightful reading of Rossini's Overture to "Il Signor Bruschino," a comic opera written by the maestro when he was 21 and shortly thereafter consigned to oblivion except for the sparkling overture. The score is light-hearted and witty, with an amusing musical gag in which the second violins rap on their music stands with their bows.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Herald (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 178,553
FEB 19 1964

MUSIC

Serkin and Mozart: A Common Purpose

By McLAREN HARRIS

Ther was a sentence in last night's Symphony program notes, concluding the Mozart concerto section, that might just as well have been taken from Rudolf Serkin's biography, so well did it summarize the pianist's final appearance with the orchestra this season.

It referred to the Concerto in F major, K. 459, as "the choice for a performer who loves Mozart at least as much as his own prowess in glittering cascades." Mr. Serkin is such a performer; indeed, his dedication in the composer's service is one of the major marks of his career.

Yet some credit is due Mozart, as this concerto is a work for which love can hardly be refused. Besides the sort of universal cheerfulness that raised Mozart's music above the state of his personal affairs, the steadfast dotted rhythm of the opening theme bespeaks an optimistic firmness that could reflect a period of prosperity for the composer. As it was, K. 459 made a total of six piano concertos for the year 1784 — a good time, if the number of these concertos is taken as an economic barometer.

Forsaking bravura for pure musical invention, the F major Concerto radiates charm—or ingenuity—less in pianistic thunderbolts than in the artistic polish of contrapuntal workmanship. As a symuhonic network entwines both soloist and orchestra, even the cadenzas become extensions of the concerto substance — particularly that of the finale, continuing as a miniature development in slightly more virtuosic terms.

If one is able to sit close enough, he may notice how complete is Mr. Serkin's involvement with his art. All the time that scales and passage-work flowed beneath his fingers in liquified articulation, the pianist's facial and bodily gestures doubled the accompanying and contrasting figures from the orchestra. During the gentle lilt of the Allegretto the soloist intoned the relatively unadorned melodic lines against a silken sheen of strings, as Erich Leinsdorf produced his most exquisite phraesology.

The brisk and brilliant finale gave rise to rapid exchanges of statement and rebuttal between piano and winds; seeing and hearing Serkin and Symphony in animated conversation induced ever-widening smiles among the audience, spreading quickly to the performers upon a merry conclusion.

Mr. Leinsdorf opened the program with Rossini's Overture to "Il Signor Bruschino" and continued after intermission with Bruckner's Symphony No. 7. These works have appeared on previous Symphony programs, and performance reviews can be found in the issues of Feb. 15 and Jan. 11, respectively.

The Program

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf conductor, presents the 8th program of the Tuesday evening series last night at Symphony Hall. Soloist for the Mozart Concerto was Rudolf Serkin.

Overture to "Il Signor Bruschino" Rossini
Pieno Concerto to F maior, K 459 Mozart
Symphony No 7 in E maior Bruckner

Globe 2/19/64

Pianist

Serkin Soloist In Mozart

Rudolf Serkin, who played the Reger Piano Concerto with the Boston Symphony in weekend concerts, participated in a routine performance Tuesday night of the F-major Mozart Piano Concerto, K. 459. Erich Leinsdorf conducted.

On the part of the orchestral forces, a reduced band of some 40 players, the problem seemed to be one of detail. When Leinsdorf has Mozart to himself, he takes better care of the range of dynamic shadings and of total sound. Tuesday evening, however, he made little attempt in this direction. The orchestra sounded muddy, no proper accompaniment for Serkin's dulcet piano nor an equal partner in one of Mozart's most engaging works.

This concerto, sometimes numbered 19, was written for the composer's own performance in Vienna, as were his five other piano concertos of that year, 1784. The F-major is a series of allegros, temperate in tempo and schewing pianistic fireworks in favor of continual development of the musical materials.

Serkin knows the heart of this concerto. Especially thrilling to hear, to meditate on is his realization of the viable balance of phrases. They might appear to be static, but Mozart turns them once again and Serkin nudges them to proper peaks. The flow of a Serkin performance is extraordinary.

This flow was present, in good measure, when the piano could be clearly heard. The mellowness of Serkin's tone warred futuily against the ill-blend and loudness of the orchestra.

Flanking the concerto were Rossini's Overture to "Il Signor Bruschino," as the opening work, and after intermission, the Bruckner Symphony No. 7 in E minor. M.M

FRI.- SAT. 18.

103 3

NINETEEN HUNDRED SIXTY-THREE–SIXTY-FOUR

ighteenth Program

NOON, FEBRUARY 21, at 2:00 o'clock

URDAY EVENING, FEBRUARY 22, at 8:30 o'clock

.....Overture, Scherzo, and Finale, Op. 52
Andante con moto; Allegro
Vivo: Trio: L'istesso tempo
Allegro molto vivace

....Excerpts from the Opera "Wozzeck," Op. 7

INTERMISSION

..... Symphony No. 7, in A major, Op. 92
I. Poco sostenuto; Vivace
II. Allegretto
III. Presto; Assai meno presto; Tempo primo
IV. Allegro con brio

SOLOIST
PHYLLIS CURTIN, Soprano

SACRED HEART BOYCHOIR OF ROSLINDALE, JOHN OLIVER, Conductor

These concerts will end about 3:50 o'clock on Friday Afternoon; 10:20 o'clock on Saturday Evening.

A new plan for ticket reservations is announced on page 1143.

BALDWIN PIANO

RCA VICTOR RECORDS

The following Excerpts from Berg's "Wozzeck" will be played:

Act I, Scene 3
Introduction to Act III
Close of Act III

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Sunday Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 465,653

6 1964

Phyllis Curtin Soloist In 'Wozzeck' Excerpts

The American soprano Phyllis Curtin will be soloist in excerpts from Alban Berg's opera, "Wozzeck," at the concerts Friday at 2 and Saturday at 8:30 p.m. by the Boston Symphony. Erich Leinsdorf will conduct.

The program will open with Schumann's Overture, Scherzo and Finale, Op. 52, and will conclude with Beethoven's Symphony No. 7 in A major, Op. 92.

Miss Curtin was soloist last summer in the American premiere at Tanglewood of Britten's War Requiem and at later performances in Boston and New York.

Rudolf Serkin will be soloist with the orchestra this afternoon at 3. He will play the Reger Piano Concerto. Leinsdorf will conduct, and the concert will include Rossini's Overture to "El Signor Bruschino" and excerpts from Wagner's "Die Walkure" Act III and "Siegfried." Serkin will again appear with the orchestra in Tuesday's concert at 8:30 p.m.

The orchestra's sixth open rehearsal of the season, which was postponed last Thursday, wil be held this Thursday at 7:30. Leinsdorf will make final preparations for the week-end program. The open rehearsals are held each season for the benefit of the orchestra's pension fund.

Today at 6 p.m. Robert Town will give the fourth Symphony Hall Organ Concert of the season. The 27-year-old organist is being presented as a result of winning the 1963 Young Artists Competition for organists, sponsored by the Boston Chapter of the American Guild of Organists with the cooperation of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He will play works by Buxtehude, J. S. Bach, Jehan Alain, and Marcel Dupre. All seats for the organ concert, which will last approximately one hour without an intermission, are unreserved.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Sunday Herald
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 283,819

FEB 16 1964

Symphony This Week

Opera Excerpts By Phyllis Curtin

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf, music director, will present concerts this afternoon, Tuesday evening, Friday afternoon and Saturday evening.

Rudolf Serkin will be soloist with the orchestra this afternoon, playing Reger's Piano Concerto in F minor, op. 114. Mr. Leinsdorf will begin the program with Rossini's Overture to "Il Signor Bruschino," and after the intermission will present more music by Wagner: excerpts from Act III of "Die Walkure"; and excerpts from "Siegfried."

Mr. Leinsdorf has invited Mr. Serkin to be soloist also on Tuesday evening, in the Mozart Piano Concerto, K. 459. The program will open with the Rossini Overture and conclude with the Bruckner Symphony No. 7.

At the Friday-Saturday programs Phyllis Curtin, soprano, will be soloist in excerpts from the opera "Wozzeck" by Alban Berg. Mr. Leinsdorf will open the concerts with Schumann's Overture, Scherzo, and Finale Op. 52, and will conclude with the Beethoven Symphony No. 7.

The orchestra's sixth open rehearsal of the season, which was postponed last Thursday, will be held this Thursday at 7:30.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Parkway Transcript
BOSTON, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 7,803

MAR 5 1964

Sacred Heart Boys' Choir With Symphony

The eighteenth program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra held on February 21 and 22 under the direction of Erich Leinnsdorf presented an unusual change which would be of interest to local residents.

Mr. Leinnsdorf inserted in this program excerpts from the opera Wozzeck Op. 7 by Alban Berg.

The well known soprano, Phyllis Curtin sang the lead, and sixteen members of the boys' choir of the Sacred Heart Parish were featured.

The Sacred Heart Boys' Choir sings under the direction of John Oliver, conductor, and Gerard Phillips, musc director. The choir was started four years ago at the request of Rt. Rev. Edward A. Murray, pastor. All of the boys are in the Sacred Heart Parish School.

Those participating were: Kevin McGinty, soloist, and Davd Botte, Richard Cullinana, Dennis Curran, Donald DiNapoli, John Hamilton, Francis Hannon, John Ieni, Mark Murphy, Paul Nicholson, Francis O'Donnell, Philip O'Donnell, Joseph Porcaro, Robert Quinn, Daniel Sullivan,, and Francis Trevisani.

FRI.- SAT. 18.

103

Eighteenth Program

...ERNOON, FEBRUARY 21, at 2:00 o'clock

...TURDAY EVENING, FEBRUARY 22, at 8:30 o'clock

S... ..... Overture, Scherzo, and Finale, Op. 52

I. Overture: Andante con moto; Allegro
II. Scherzo: Vivo; Trio; L'istesso tempo
III. Finale: Allegro molto vivace

BERG ..... Excerpts from the Opera "Wozzeck," Op. 7

INTERMISSION

BEETHOVEN ..... Symphony No. 7, in A major, Op. 92

I. Poco sostenuto; Vivace
II. Allegretto
III. Presto; Assai meno presto; Tempo primo
IV. Allegro con brio

SOLOIST
PHYLLIS CURTIN, Soprano

SACRED HEART BOYCHOIR OF ROSLINDALE, JOHN OLIVER, Conductor

These concerts will end about 3:50 o'clock on Friday Afternoon; 10:20 o'clock on Saturday Evening.

A new plan for ticket reservations is announced on page 1143.

BALDWIN PIANO

RCA VICTOR RECORDS

The following Excerpts from Berg's "Wozzeck" will be played:

Act I, Scene 3
Introduction to Act III
Close of Act III

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 465,653
FEB 16 1964

Phyllis Curtin Soloist In 'Wozzeck' Excerpts

The American soprano Phyllis Curtin will be soloist in excerpts from Alban Berg's opera, "Wozzeck," at the concerts Friday at 2 and Saturday at 8:30 p.m. by the Boston Symphony. Erich Leinsdorf will conduct.

The program will open with Schumann's Overture, Scherzo and Finale, Op. 52, and will conclude with Beethoven's Symphony No. 7 in A major, Op. 92.

Miss Curtin was soloist last Summer in the American premiere at Tanglewood of Britten's War Requiem and at later performances in Boston and New York.

Rudolf Serkin will be soloist with the orchestra this afternoon at 3. He will play the Reger Piano Concerto. Leinsdorf will conduct, and the concert will include Rossini's Overture to "El Signor Bruschino" and excerpts from Wagner's "Die Walkure" Act III and "Siegfried." Serkin will again appear with the orchestra in Tuesday's concert at 8:30 p.m.

The orchestra's sixth open rehearsal of the season, which was postponed last Thursday, wil be held this Thursday at 7:30. Leinsdorf will make final preparations for the week-end program. The open rehearsals are held each season for the benefit of the orchestra's pension fund.

Today at 6 p.m. Robert Town will give the fourth Symphony Hall Organ Concert of the season. The 27-year-old organist is being presented as a result of winning the ... Young Artists Competition for organists, sponsored by the Boston Chapter of the American Guild of Organists with the cooperation of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He will play works by Buxtehude, J. S. Bach, Jehan Alain, and Marcel Dupre. All seats for the organ concert, which will last approximately one hour without an intermission, are unreserved.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Herald
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 283,819
FEB 16 1964

Symphony This Week

Opera Excerpts By Phyllis Curtin

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf, music director, will present concerts this afternoon, Tuesday evening, Friday afternoon and Saturday evening.

Rudolf Serkin will be soloist with the orchestra this afternoon, playing Reger's Piano Concerto in F minor, op. 114. Mr. Leinsdorf will begin the program with Rossini's Overture to "Il Signor Bruschino," and after the intermission will present more music by Wagner: excerpts from Act III of "Die Walkure"; and excerpts from "Siegfried."

Mr. Leinsdorf has invited Mr. Serkin to be soloist also on Tuesday evening, in the Mozart Piano Concerto, K. 459. The program will open with the Rossini Overture and conclude with the Bruckner Symphony No. 7.

At the Friday-Saturday programs Phyllis Curtin, soprano, will be soloist in excerpts from the opera "Wozzeck" by Alban Berg. Mr. Leinsdorf will open the concerts with Schumann's Overture, Scherzo, and Finale, Op. 52, and will conclude with the Beethoven Symphony No. 7.

The orchestra's sixth open rehearsal of the season, which was postponed last Thursday, will be held this Thursday at 7:30.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Parkway Transcript
BOSTON, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 7,803
MAR 5 1964

Sacred Heart Boys' Choir With Symphony

The eighteenth program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra held on February 21 and 22 under the direction of Erich Leinnsdorf presented an unusual change which would be of interest to local residents.

Mr. Leinnsdorf inserted in this program excerpts from the opera Wozzeck Op. 7 by Alban Berg.

The well known soprano Phyllis Curtin sang the lead and sixteen members of the boys' choir of the Sacred Heart Parish were featured.

The Sacred Heart Boys Choir sings under the direction of John Oliver, conductor and Gerard Phillips, music director. The choir was started four years ago at the request of Rt. Rev. Edward A. Murray, pastor. All of the boys are in the Sacred Heart Parish School.

Those participating were Kevin McGinty, soloist, and Davd Botte, Richard Cullinana, Dennis Curran, Donald DiNapoli, John Hamilton, Francis Hannon, John Ienl, Mark Murphy, Paul Nicholson, Francis O'Donnell, Philip O'Donnell, Joseph Porcaro, Robert Quinn, Daniel Sullivan,, and Francis Trevisani.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 194,870
FEB 22 1964

At New York Concert

Leinsdorf's Fresh Look At Beethoven's 7th

By MICHAEL STEINBERG

NEW YORK—The performance of the really familiar masterworks is one of the most troublesome of a conductor's responsibilities. The Beethoven symphonies, for example, are inherently difficult. They are done so frequently as to stand always in danger of losing their freshness for performer and listener, and records at least have the potential of acquainting audiences with a wide variety of interpretations.

The conductor faced with the task of presenting Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, as was Erich Leinsdorf at Friday afternoon's Boston Symphony concert, sometimes finds he communicates mainly his own boredom, or he falls into the trap of "different at any price."

Leinsdorf did neither. He gave an interpretation that was, in the best sense, fresh. With the traditions of this music, which is to say, other conductors' habits, quite erased from his mind, he reconsidered the whole piece from the ground up.

Leinsdorf's observance of the repeats may serve as an example. Those in the first, third and fourth movements are customarily ignored. Leinsdorf gave every one, and for each he demonstrated that it has a structural and rhetorical function rather than being a mere notational formality. Never before, for instance, had it been made so clear how wittily the start of the first movement's development is a variant of the exposition's opening.

Leinsdorf's most valuable achievement was in the second movement. After it had been misunderstood for decades, Toscanini began our re-education by demonstrating that this was an allegretto, not a slow movement, not to mention a funeral march or a procession of monks. Leinsdorf caught the character perfectly. The tempo was right, the phasing most sensitive with its sharply and springily articulated pairs of quarter notes, and the in tempo ending of the whole movement was just what was wanted.

Except in the allegretto, which was beautifully played as well as planned, the actual execution was inelegant. The introduction, whose massive chords should surely be punctuations rather than phrase beginnings, went wrong. Early in it Leinsdorf more or less stopped conducting, but the strings, ungrateful for the confidence thus shown them, promptly flew all to pieces during that 16th note scale.

Also, the first, third and fourth movements abound in rhythmic figures which, while themselves quite simple, are easily played inaccurately. They were, and, especially in the last two movements, metrical slovenliness reigned. When Leinsdorf has taught the orchestra to play it, his performance of the Beethoven Seventh should be a remarkable one.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 194,870
FEB 25 1964

'Symphony'

Berg, Schumann Heard At Friday's Symphony

By MICHAEL STEINBERG

Sometimes life's amenities can make things too convenient. Last Friday afternoon, the miracle of being able to arrive in New York 90 minutes after leaving a concert at Symphony Hall and being able to call in a review by long-distance telephone, all this somehow backfired.

There was a perverse telephone connection which kept cutting off—something hard to know when one is talking to a dictating machine—and what with one thing and another, the review of Friday afternoon's Boston Symphony concert appeared under a New York dateline, and with the comments on half the concert missing altogether.

The concert in question was, of course, one of the Symphony's regular Friday afternoon series in Symphony Hall, Boston, and the first half of the program had consisted of the standard set of concert excerpts from Alban Berg's opera "Wozzeck" and Robert Schumann's Overture, Scherzo, and Finale, Opus 52.

Berg's dense textures were admirably sorted out by Erich Leinsdorf, which is much to be grateful for, but everything sounded a little inhibited from the expressive point of view. Leinsdorf sometimes beats things out rather rigidly, and a touch more of elasticity and warmth, that old-time Viennese slush, would have been welcome.

The soprano Phyllis Curtin beautifully sang, spoke, and "spoke-sang" the part of Marie. Her very appearance is so stunning as to disarm criticism, but quite seriously, voice, musicianship, and temperament, are at a level that ought practically to make her the most famous American singer today.

Her work, as exemplified by her touching and passionate singing on Friday, is miles in advance of that of three dozen of her more famous colleagues. The group of boys from the Sacred Heart Boychoir of Roslindale, John Oliver, conductor, did their small but important part with complete competence.

The concert began with Schumann's "Symphonette," to give the work the title he himself assigned to it for a while. In spite of a few lapses into his vacant-minded treadmill style, the Overture, Scherzo, and Finale is a most charming work. Its 61 year absence from the Boston Symphony concerts was too long, and it was good to have it back, even in a reading a trifle lethargic.

After a tour, the orchestra returns on Mar. 6 to be conducted for the first time by Leopold Stokowski. He will lead Mozart's Wind Concertante, Stravinsky's "Petrouchka," and shorter pieces by Gabrieli, Vivaldi, Hovhaness, and Rorem.

THE SYMPHONY

Truncated 'Wozzeck' Rouses Interest

By ROBERT TAYLOR

Opera in the concert hall is not unlike closet drama, a recollection in tranquility, as it were, of an action meant to be presently experienced. For the second time in a week operatic excerpts loom prominent at Symphony. The fragments of Berg's "Wozzeck" make a more coherent pattern than the Wagnerian quiltwork last Friday, but they are fragments all the same.

"Wozzeck" has never been presented in Boston. It is, to my way of thinking, the composer's masterpiece. The content is infinitely more human, more accessible, more alive than anything in "Lulu," where the master laid down his pen — and we shall probably have to await Sarah Caldwell's decision or the enterprise of a workshop group to hear the opera in its original garb.

Gave Blessing

Furthermore, Berg himself gave his blessing to a concert suite in advance of production. And the performance yesterday illustrated the expressive potentials of the score in Phyllis Curtin's brilliantly idiomatic vocalism. The Sacred Heart Boychoir of Roslindale added to this. There are a number of reasons why Erich Leinsdorf probably felt justified in scheduling the anthology, but one fundamental reason why he should not: our time would have been spent more profitably in the symphonic repertoire.

Instead of piecing out the drama in the imagination, and hopscotching through the text (an almost insurmountable problem since we may assume that all but a sprinkling of the audience know "Wozzeck" only by hearsay), we should get a viable statement consonant with the concert hall.

No matter. Having voiced our objections, let us point out that Miss Curtin's phrasing of the lullaby, her realization of the dramatic inflections of the sprechtstimme, conveyed the emotional essence of the opera admirably. More than a concert hall voice, the beautiful sound the artist is capable of bringing to "Wozzeck," a singing-actress is required; and Miss Curtin's security in the pitches marked for the song-speech projected a character.

The performance eliminated the four interludes between the scenes, but one received a sense of the music as a close approximation of natural sound, and of the revolutionary break with the "unending melody" recitativo of Wagner, which in turn reacted against the parlando recitation of Italian opera. Whether or not this will arouse interest in "Wozzeck" is debatable; but hearing it truncated may arouse a desire to hear it whole.

In reviving Schumann's Overture, Scherzo and Finale, however, last performed in 1903, Mr. Leinsdorf has done noble service: it is a lovely score. The conventional holds unexpected rewards, and this music is marvelously unconventional in disclosing the neglected riches of genius.

One can't help hearing hints of other Schumann in it, especially the Second Symphony; the grace of the melodies floating from the warmly expressive strings to the woodwinds held a suavity and a control in which they seemed to sing of their own accord. The orchestra played elegantly for Mr. Leinsdorf while the proportions of the reading retained a firm grasp on balance without sacrificing the relaxed animation of the parts.

This was Mr. Leinsdorf's first Beethoven Seventh with The Boston Symphony, and an incisive one, too, a blend of virtuosity and mellow introspection. A colleague of mine once expressed the opinion that he found Leinsdorf's Beethoven more an examination of the master than anything else; but the analytic detachment that gives his "Eroica" a certain academic aspect isn't evident in the Seventh.

The bold lines are urged forward in a powerful flow, and the repeats reveal the care with which the work has been prepared. The phrase-making is eminently clear, and here is a persuasive surge in the articulate, ordered tempi.

The meticulous restraint of the final movement has a poise rare in such a monumental scale. Best of all, I think, the orchestra has a glow of confident vigor, a personality in which the climaxes are not over-driven and attain genuine Olympian breadth.

The Program

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf conducting, presented the 18th program of the 83rd season yesterday in Symphony Hall. Phyllis Curtain, soprano was the soloist. The program will be repeated tonight at 8:30.

Overture, Scherzo and Finale, Op. 52 ..... Schumann
Excerpts from the Opera "Wozzeck," Op. 7 ..... Berg
Symphony No. 7, in A Major Op. 92 ..... Beethoven

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Christian Science Monitor (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 174,850

105

Miss Curtin's 'Wozzeck' excerpts

By Roland Nadeau

Erich Leinsdorf always thinks and feels musical form: to watch and listen as he directs his orchestra is to witness musical analysis and logic incarnate. Indeed, there is a professional aura of polished certainty about his interpretations that is awesome to contemplate.

At the performance of the Boston Symphony Friday afternoon at Symphony Hall one felt that his struggle for musical understanding had already been won; that what we were given was the composer, captured and interpreted stylistically with impeccable taste. The one thing missed perhaps was the sense of immediate discovery and adventure—that feeling of unbridled, laissez-faire excitement that his two predecessors with the Boston Symphony possessed in abundance—perhaps in too much abundance.

* * *

The program began with Robert Schumann's Overture, Scherzo, and Finale, Op. 52. Here Mr. Leinsdorf divined exactly what was needed for its interpretation. Written as it was during a most felicitous period of the composer's life, less than a year after his marriage to Clara and following the highly successful "Spring" Symphony, this piece is happy, elegant, without a trace of the morbidity that was to creep into his work later on.

Mr. Leinsdorf accordingly worked for clarity of texture in the orchestral sound and simplicity of musical statement. What a pleasure to hear Schumann crisp, clean, and serene; not lathered over with pseudo - Beethovenesque intensities and bombast. Now we could understand Schumann's reverence and love for the music of Mendelssohn.

Next came a symphonic suite from Berg's Opera "Wozzeck," Op. 7, with Phyllis Curtin, soprano soloist, and the Sacred Heart Boychoir of Roslindale, of which John Oliver is the conductor. Again Mr. Leinsdorf's analytical gifts served well.

* * *

The whole opera, which on the surface appears to be a massive blob of subdued nervous energy, is actually welded together by the strongest bonds of classical instrumental form. The conductor underlined these organizing strands, always stamping logic and sense into the smoldering witches' brew of orchestral sound.

Miss Curtin sang a surprisingly chaste and pure Marie. Unfortunately for her, at times her lovely tones were submerged by the orchestra. This was more apparent, however, in the sprechstimme sections. Perhaps here a little more musical hysteria alternating with the feeling of contriteness would have propelled the voice over the orchestra more effectively.

Beethoven's Seventh Symphony ended the program. Ever since Wagner called the symphony "the Dance in its highest condition," some conductors have been delivering themselves of its urgencies in orgiastic, frenetic terms. Not so with Mr. Leinsdorf.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
The Pilot
BOSTON, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 155,000
FEB 20 1964

Helen E. Sullivan

MUSIC

Sarah Caldwell's production of "Madame Butterfly" was so beautifully staged and so well sung, last week, that it seems ungrateful to complain that, after all, it was only "Madame Butterfly." But the fact is that she produced the same opera last year with the same exquisite scenery. Musically, the present production was a considerable improvement. Camilla Williams is a lovely Butterfly, visually and vocally, and Edith Evans is as fine a Suzuki as you will ever hear. The men in the opera matter less, but they filled their parts ably.

Perhaps we are being spoiled, in a year which has brought us "Lulu," "I Puritani" an extraordinary "Magic Flute," but somehow "Madame Butterfly" twice in two years does not seem to fit in with the lively imagination that conceived the other productions. The final opera of the season will be, once again, one that is not heard nearly often enough —the splendidly funny "L'Elisir d'Amore" of Donizetti.

Perhaps it was the operatic note in Symphony Hall last weekend that started this train of thought, for there we had some tantalizing excerpts from "Wozzeck," sung by Phyllis Curtin with the Boston Symphony. From the available evidence—an oldish and sometimes questionable recording, a reading of the score and the suite heard last weekend—this may be one of the most powerful operas of our century. Can we hope to see it staged next year with the Caldwell touch?

John Oliver's Sacred Heart Boys' Choir of Roslindale received very well deserved recognition in its appearance with the Symphony. And Mr. Leinsdorf brought a second undeservedly neglected work to attention with his performance of Schumann's Overture, Scherzo and Finale. Leinsdorf's Beethoven Seventh, by the way, is sometimes strikingly close to Toscanini's (and I know no greater praise.) If my ears do not deceive me, he even included some of the Maestro's re-writing in the third movement, where Toscanini distinctly improves on Beethoven.

106

TOUR #4

BALTIMORE

The News American
BALTIMORE, MD.
D. 219,257 SUN. 312,266

FEB 23 1964

You doubt this?—regardez: Starting off tonight at the Lyric with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Erich Leinsdorf, we'll hear excerpts from Alan Berg's opera "Wozzeck," with the Met soprano Phyllis Curtain as soloist, and Mahler's Symphony No. 5.

The News American
BALTIMORE, MD.
D. 219,257 SUN. 312,266

FEB 16 1964

ERIC LEINSDORF
What's on your mind, Maestro?

Next Sunday at 8.30 P. M., Eric Leinsdorf will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in a concert at the Lyric presented under the auspices of the Baltimore Symphony Orchestra.

THE EVENING SUN
BALTIMORE, MD.
D. 212,245

FEB 21 1964

The Boston Symphony, under the direction of Erich Leinsdorf, returns to the Lyric for one performance at 8.30 P.M. Sunday.

The concert, included in the sixteen pair mid-week programs, is primarily for Wednesday subscribers. Tuesday evening patrons heard the Royal Philharmonic under Sir Malcolm Sargent last October 21.

The Boston Symphony program will include excerpts from Alban Berg's "Wozzeck" with Phyllis Curtain, soprano, as soloist, and Mahler's "Symphony No. 5."

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, one of the oldest in the nation, has the longest concert season of any privately supported orchestra in the world. Last year's season included 227 concerts, compared to Baltimore's 175.

The 104-member orchestra's five series and open rehearsals in Symphony Hall (capacity 2,631) are generally sold-out on season subscription.

The News American
BALTIMORE, MD.
D. 219,257 SUN. 312,266

FEB 24 1964

Boston Symphony

Maestro Leinsdorf Conducts Mahler and Berg Gloriously

By R. P. HARRISS

A brilliant revelation of the contrasts and kinships of romantic and modern music was brought to a rapt Lyric audience last night by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Conducted by Eric Leinsdorf, the concert was devoted to Alban Berg and Gustav Mahler, with Phyllis Curtin as soprano soloist.

THE PROGRAM consisted of:

Berg: Excerpts from the opera "Wozzeck," with Miss Curtin.

Mahler: Symphony No. 5 in C-sharp minor.

Contemporaries of the expressionist Schoenberg — the one as his early supporter, the other as his disciples—Mahler and Berg afford in their music exciting examples of the romantic divergence from classicism and the modernist break with romanticism. And also in these two works are revealed the common ties they never completely severed.

THE "WOZZECK" excerpts, despie their sometimes nosiy expressionism and a hardshness imposed on the soloist by both libretto and score, had a direct appeal that engaged the listener's emotions strongly.

The story of "Wozzeck," which had its premiere at the Berlin State Opera in 1925, is simple: Wozzeck is a sad-sack soldier, father of an illegitimate child by Marie. A drum major seduces Marie; Wozzeck confronts the seducer and gets beaten up. Wozzeck stabs Marie on the shore of a lake, drops the blood-stained knife in the water, and apparently in an effort to retrieve the knife, drowns himself.

THOUGH Wozzeck's feckllessness inhibits sympathy for him, the music is exceedingly rewarding to listeners who are willing to lean forward to it, instead of slumping back passively in their seats. The orchestral interludes, evocative and descriptive, were marvels of delicate shading under Maestro Leinsdorf's conducting.

Miss Curtain sang exrcepts from the role of Marie with intensity and understanding. If requirements of the score caused her notes at times to sound tortured, constricted and harsh, there were brief passages of smooth pure song in which her soprano soared gloriously.

MAHLER'S Fifth received a dynamic and profoundly moving reading. The composer offered this as absolute music (though his attitude toward programmatic music was ambivalent, to say the least) and certainly it doesn't need the dreadful gobbledegook, sueh as Paul Stefan's, in last night's program notes.

While not as readily comprehended as Mahler's First, which the Philadelphia Orchestra performed earlier this season, nevertheless this long symphony held the audience as in a spell.

The Scherzo, with its lovely pizzicato passages and exquisite French horn obbligato, was in itself a reward such as may not be equaled in a lifetime of concert-going.

THE SUN
BALTIMORE, MD.
(MORNING)
D. 188,856 S. 321,686

FEB 24 1964

Music Notes

Boston Symphony

By ELLIOTT W. GALKIN

ERICH LEINSDORF presented a new model of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to the audience at the Lyric Theater last evening, one which in the short period of his tenure as its musical director he has already molded in his stylistic image.

The appearance of the noted ensemble was a bonus feature for Wednesday evening ticket holders of this season's subscriptions to the Baltimore Symphony Orchestra series.

For approximately 40 years, the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been an organization developed by maestros in the French tradition and has reflected their particular stylistic proclivities. The musical ideals of Koussevitzky and Munch were those based upon characteristics typical of the orchestras of Paris.

Elegant Spirit Of Dance

Thus the Boston Symphony Orchestra became celebrated as the American symphonic ensemble singular for its lightness and brilliant transparency of string sound, for a sense of finely focused brass sonority, floating woodwinds, and, in its phrasing, for an ever-present, elegant spirit of the dance.

Leinsdorf, its thirteenth musical director is of a different tradition. His is a style influenced by the opera house, Middle European in its solidity of phrase, moderation of tempo, and balance of part in which the importance of melodic consideration are achieved in relation to the total architectural structure.

Thus a Leinsdorf performance, no matter how impassioned, is at the same time lucid and controlled.

These were the characteristics, which in terms of repertory and interpretation were made evident by the noted Vienna born conductor last evening. Under his disciplined direction, the Boston Symphony Orchestra has become a tightly knit, highly organized mechanism, more cohesive than it was under Munch.

Golden Glow Of Power

Texturally the strings play with a fuller and flatter bow, and with a more pulsating vibrato than before. The fine edge of the brass has disappeared to be replaced with a golden glow of power; and the woodwinds have become heavier and obviously deliberate. As a total ensemble, the precision is extraordinary.

Leinsdorf's program was one which was ideal for the demonstration of these newly developed characteristics. While Munch's performances inevitably emphasized compositions of French impressionism, Leinsdorf's offerings were devoted exclusively to German works written during the first quarter of this century.

Featuring soprano Phyllis Curtin, it began with excerpts from "Wozzeck" by Alban Berg, the opera in which the composer was able to humanize some of the abstract principles of the abstract procedures of twelve-tone technique which developed from the world of the Nineteenth Century. It concluded with the Fifth Symphony of Gustav Mahler, one of the most complex and visionary spokesman of post-Romanticism.

In "Wozzeck" the reading of the Bible by the ill-fated heroine consists of seven variations and is one of the most moving scenes of the opera. Miss Curtin recounted the tragedy of human frailty and begged for pity and forgiveness with poignancy and intensity.

Here is a voice of power and majesty, infallible in this difficult music, in both pitch and flexibility. Her use of the half-spoken Sprechstimme was filled with color and dramatic impact against the hallucinative quality of the score.

Imaginative Insight

Mr. Leinsdorf conducted Mahler's tragic and mysterious Fifth Symphony with imaginative insight. The voluptuous sarcasm, the psychological emphases of the dramatic digressions, and the bitter-sweet lyricism were all projected with a master hand.

and vivid, yet is one which essaism. There was, therefore, in his performance warmth as well as accuracy. The unique combination of these characteristics made for an evening of distinguished music making.

THE EVENING SUN
BALTIMORE, MD.
D. 212,245

: 196: Segretta

Music In Review

Boston Symphony Performs Two Works

By Adelaide C. Rackemann

Two Twentieth Century works, [illegible] fluenced in part by Alma [illegible] Mahler, were performed [illegible] Lyric last night by the [illegible] Symphony Orchestra, un- [illegible] Erich Leinsdorf.

The first offering, featuring [illegible] Curtin as soloist, consisted of excerpts from Alban Berg's "Wozzeck," Opus 7. This opera, completed forty years ago, dedicated to the wife of Gustav Mahler, and often performed still remains something of an oddity.

This music describes the anguish of a pathetic, simpleminded soldier, beset by problems, teased by the captain of his regiment, tormented by Marie, the faithless common-law wife who despises him. Atonal, dissonant, a somewhat ponderous example of contemporary music, it is unique. Hearing the opera, one appreciates the ingenuity of the music. The abbreviated concert form, unfortunately, seems less effective.

Pleasing Voice

Phyllis Curtin, whose voice is both pleasing and true, sang several of Marie's scenes from the opera. This is not an easy soprano role, not especially pretty, but it was sung with appropriate expression, always suggesting the heartless Marie. The last excerpt, played by the orchestra alone, is an especially poignant scene in Wozzeck, in which his young son, told by an older child that his mother is dead, continues happily to rock back and forth on his hobby horse, quite ignorant of the meaning of death. It was played with chilling effect.

The Symphony No. 5 in C sharp minor by Gustav Mahler, completed a few months after the composer's marriage in 1902, is a long, varied and rather baffling work. A solemn, sometimes lyrical, first movement introduces a theme developed in a slow, funeral march, movement. But in the second part, enlivened by a lovely French horn obligato (played last night by James Stagliano), there is an abrupt change of mood. A charming Scherzo introduces waltz passages which are repeated and varied by different sections of the orchestra.

Eloquently Played

The third part begins with an Adagietto, where the strings are supported by harp arpeggios. It was eloquently played and is perhaps the most beautiful part of the symphony. The ending is a Rondo—Finale, full of contrasts, gay and tuneful, changing to the key of D Major.

This Mahler symphony, which has a little of everything to offer the listener, represents a tremendous outpouring of feeling and invention. At the time when it was written, Mahler no longer believed in explaining his works to other people and was quite satisfied to let this symphony stand alone. As conducted by Mr. Leinsdorf, whose style of conducting is highly individual, graceful and sweeping—somewhat like a gigantic bird soaring to great heights—it was a work of restrained majesty. The Boston Symphony Orchestra has a lightness and a subtlety which owe much to Mr. Leinsdorf's direction. It is interesting to consider the extent to which the physique and bearing of a conductor determine the shape and sound of an orchestra.

PHILADELPHIA

The Philadelphia Inquirer
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
D. 604,828 S. 1,000,980

FEB 23 1964

Erich Leinsdorf conducts the Boston Symphony Orchestra in concert Monday at Academy, given by Philadelphia Forum.

The Sunday Bulletin
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
S. 687,065

FEB 23 1964

Leinsdorf, Kostelanetz Conduct at Academy

By JAMES FELTON

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY will make its second appearance here tomorrow night under the baton of Erich Leinsdorf, its permanent music director.

Appearing in the Academy of Music on the Philadelphia All Star-Forum Series, Mr. Leinsdorf has chosen to present Haydn's Symphony No. 39 and Gustav Mahler's Fifth Symphony. In accord with the smaller ensembles customary in Haydn's time, the Orchestra will be reduced in size to play the music very much as 18th century listeners might have heard it.

With few exceptions, Mahler's nine completed symphonies are seldom heard here. His lengthy style, as well as that of his compatriot Anton Bruckner, has not found favor, although the works of both men are considered landmarks in the development of Austrian symphonic literature. The Mahler Fifth is long and sprawling in conception, with sharply varying moods shot through with epic color. Any performance of the Fifth is bound to be a major undertaking, accessible to only the best-equipped orchestras.

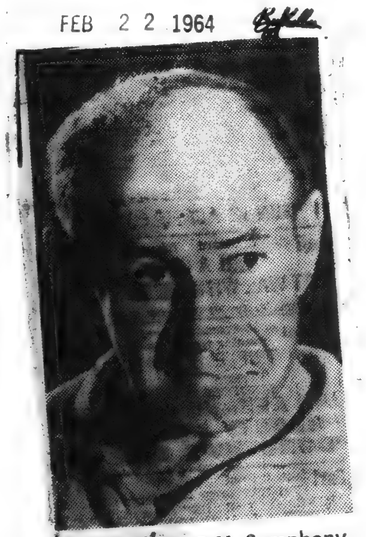
The Boston Symphony made history on January 19 when Mr. Leinsdorf conducted a nationally-televised performance of Mozart's Requiem Mass for President Kennedy at the Holy Cross Cathedral in Boston. Richard Cardinal Cushing celebrated Mass at that time, the entire service being the first of its kind ever conducted in the United States.

Mr. Leinsdorf will take occasion on his visit here to hold auditions for prospective members of Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood for the 1964 season. They will be held on Monday afternoon at The New School of Music. Special auditions for harp and percussion applicants only will be held Monday evening at 7 P. M. in the Academy of Music. First-chair members of the Orchestra are to be the judges.

ERICH LEINSDORF conducts Boston Symphony Orchestra here, tomorrow night.

PHILADELPHIA DAILY
NEWS
D. 318,507 S. 231,568

FEB 22 1964



THE BOSTON Symphony, under baton of Erich Leinsdorf, appears at the Academy Monday night in its only Philadelphia concert of season.

The Sunday Bulletin
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
S. 687,065

FEB 9 1964

Boston Symphony

THE BOSTON Symphony Orchestra will be presented by the Philadelphia Forum at 8.30 Feb. 24 at the Academy of Music.

The virtuoso ensemble will be under the baton of its permanent conductor, Erich Leinsdorf.

The program: Haydn's Symphoney No. 39 and Mahler's Symphony No. 5.

The Philadelphia Inquirer
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
D. 604,828 S. 1,000,980

FEB 23 1964

Bostonians booked

By DANIEL WEBSTER
Of The Inquirer Staff

The Boston Symphony Orchestra plays its annual Philadelphia concert Monday evening at the Academy of Music.

The Philadelphia Orchestra, on tour part of the week, returns Friday night to play its second Junior Student concert and a pops concert Saturday night conducted by Andre Kostelanetz.

The Boston Symphony, now in its second season under Vienna-born Erich Leinsdorf, will play a program of Viennese music: Haydn's Symphony No. 29 and the monumental Symphony No. 5 by Gustav Mahler.

The Philadelphia Inquirer
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
D. 604,828 S. 1,000,980

FEB 9 1964

Mahler Fifth slated By Boston Symphony

The Boston Sympony Orchestra will play Mahler's Symphony No. 5 when it makes its annual appearance Feb. 24 at the Academy of Music.

Erich Leinsdorf, music director, will also lead the ensemble in Haydn's Symphony No. 39. The orchestra appears in the Philadelphia Forum series.

Philadelphia Inquirer
PHILADELPHIA, PA.

The Evening Bulletin
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
D. 709,751

FEB 25 1964

At the Academy

Leinsdorf Shows Flexibility

By DANIEL WEBSTER
Of The Inquirer Staff

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, cast now in the image of Erich Leinsdorf, proved a nicely proportioned instrument of great flexibility when it played Monday at the Academy of Music.

Leinsdorf's program probed two disparate areas of the repertoire which he has favored since taking over the direction of the orchestra two seasons ago. He played Haydn and Mahler.

His program was carefully shaped in a way to give attention to both works and to display the precision and depth of his orchestra's special abilities.

The Mahler Fifth Symphony has emerged as a sort of Leinsdorf specialty. Bringing to it the dedication to clarify that makes his Haydn and Mozart, so refreshing, he plays Mahler with proportion and energy but without chootic color for its own sake.

MOLDS WITH CARE

Essential to Mahler's sprawling later symphonies is a clear idea of wheer it all is going. Leinsdorf molded his interpretation with great attention to phrase and to the total effect as well.

For those who find Mahler too romantic for comfort, the Fifth symphony is almost the epitome of cloying musical posturing. But for Leinsdorf it is a searing and anguished musical event; he conveys the sincere writing of a titan of grief.

His orchestra has been shaped for the German repertoire and now moves into it with a glowing tone in the strings and brilliance in the winds and brass.

The performance had its high points. The opening funeral march is great Mahler and suited to the sound of this orchestra; the lanedler of the third section, the Scherzo, has at once grace, strength and musical interest, and the adagietto with its floating long phrases was memorable.

GRACEFUL HORNIST

The Scherzo was graced by the artistic playing of James Stagliano, the principal hornist, whose obbligato leads, suggests and comments on the music as it grows from dance to symphonice statement back to the easy Austrian dance rhythm.

The finale was precise, with the conductor keeping strict order in the flurry and extreme dynamics around the final crash of emotion.

WITHDREW SYMPHONY

Mahler withdrew the symphony after its premiere in 1902 in Cologne to rescore it. He continued to reshape it for years afterward. The symphony played his first revision Monday.

The leap to Mahler from the early work of Haydn showed the versatility of the ensemble. Leinsdorf's approach to that of a strict classicist: he reduces his orchestra, adds a harpsichord, demands needle-sharp response to his ideas.

SOME INNOVATIONS

This Haydn, the Symphony No. 39 in G minor, is the work of the composer just gaining freedom in the style. It has some innovations, the characteristic brusque minuetto, the surprises of silence in the opening allegro, the strong second violin line in the finale.

It is a symphony full of life. In Leinsdorf's concept it shimmered with clarity, good spirits and masculinity. The addition of the harpsichord gave it an attractive flavor and a ring of authenticity.

The orchestra played in the Philadelphia Forum series.

Boston Symphony Performs Well In Rarely-Heard Musical Works

By MAX de SCHAUENSEE

The Boston Symphony, that most civilized of orchestras, gave its annual concert at the Academy of Music, last night, under the auspices of the Philadelphia Forum. Vienna-born Erich Leinsdorf, the Boston Symphony's regular conductor, made his second appearance here as leader of the Bostonians.

Unlike some visiting orchestras which present staples of the symphonic repertoire, Mr. Leinsdorf and his people gave us two symphonies that are not often heard — Haydn's Symphony in G Minor No. 39, and the monumental Symphony No. 5 in C-sharp Minor by Gustav Mahler.

The Boston Symphony sounded quite wonderful under Mr. Leinsdorf. The tone was mellow at all times and exceedingly canny in the delicate matter of balance. Precision was always one of Boston's chief qualities, and if anything was lost in this matter under other leaders, it has been regained with interest. Concert-goers are always avid for stated comparisons; they were again last night. It will suffice to say that the Boston and Philadelphia Orchestras have their own special characteristics as they stand among the great orchestras of the land.

The orchestra was very much reduced in size for its performance of the charming Haydn. It was Mr. Leinsdorf's idea to approximate what 18th-century listeners might have heard; furthering this idea was the happy addition of a harpsichord. Mr. Leinsdorf is noted as a conductor of classics, with the result that Haydn's music was given a winsome performance.

The programming of the one-hour-and-five-minute Mahler Fifth came as a boon to ears surfeited with the staples of the repertoire. Here the entire Boston forces were employed, for the Mahler looms as an undertaking of the first magnitude.

Conducting without score, Mr. Leinsdorf's enthusiasm was infectious; the great length of the symphony only filled one with wonder at its variety and its sustained passion. The audience listened with close attention; one felt there was no fatigue in the house after the final chords that concluded a brilliant performance.

The brass and woodwinds of the Bostonians were put to a severe test which was met on all counts. The opening "Trauermarsch" proved most impressive with its introductory fanfares. The wildly romantic and plangently protesting "Sturmisch bewegt" that followed, swept the symphony onward to the "Scherzo" with its finely played horn obbligato by James Stagliano. This is a movement of waltzes and surprises.

The "Adagietto" is perhaps the most enamoring part of the symphony — wonderfully reflective music, deeply lyrical and obviously deeply felt by its composer. The finale has an over-all, all-out lyric sweep with fugal passages urging the music to its final climax.

At the close, Mr. Leinsdorf and his men were given a well-deserved ovation. The Academy had quite a few empty seats last night. Apparently there are Philadelphians who feel that their own orchestra has all the answers. Happy indeed is such spirit of contentment—and limiting.

NEW YORK

New York World-Telegram
and
The Sun
D. 463,241 SAT. 175,139

FEB 27 1964

Music

Perfect Philharmonic Pair

By LOUIS BIANCOLLI

The bracketing of Berg's "Wozzeck" and Mahler's "Fifth Symphony" was an act of inspiration on the part of Erich Leinsdorf at last night's Boston Symphony concert in Philharmonic Hall.

Louis Biancolli

Mahler, to my thinking, is the real dividing line between the classical and the modern outlook. Everything in modernism, even the modern temper, is pre-figured in his music.

Berg worshipped him, followed him about, studied his music. Mahler may never have acknowledged him, musically speaking, as his child, but legitimate or not he was his offspring. It was Mahler not Schoenberg who fathered the new freedom.

Of course, only excerpts of the opera were heard, but these were superlatively played by the orchestra and no less superlatively sung by Phyllis Curtin and the Columbus Boychoir.

"Wozzeck" makes my flesh creep—much more so in the opera house than in the concert hall. I'd rather imagine the drab horror of the badgered patsy than see it. Hearing it is lacerating enough.

Leinsdorf was electrifying in the atonal mazes of the score. Actually it seemed as transparent as the thinnest gauze through which one beheld the wounded, crying spirit of man maligned.

Berg and Mahler had this other thing in comomn last night — the superb unmasking of motive that was the combined clairvoyance of conductor and orchestra.

For Mahler's "Fifth," whatever the experts say, is another revelation of his divided self — now bruised and self-caricatured, now like a god in his conjuring of worlds from chaos.

I have read, here and there, that Leinsdorf, impeccable musician though he be, is cold. This is pure nonsense, as any will avow who heard him conduct the Adagietto last night.

There, if anywhere, is pure tenderness spun out like a timeless dream of compassion. Mahler felt every note of it; so did Leinsdorf last night; so did the musicians, and so did the grateful crowd.

I spent the intermission and the early part of the Mahler symphony at the Dvorak "Requiem." But what I heard of the Fifth was overpowering. The finale rang out like the aggregate hopes of all men of good will.

The New York Times
D. 681,612 S. 1,304,447

FEB 28 1964

'WOZZECK' PROGRAM IS LED BY LEINSDORF

Mahler's Symphony No. 5 was the big piece on the Boston Symphony's program at Philharmonic Hall Wednesday. But because the orchestra played the same work earlier this season at Carnegie Hall, the spotlight was on the curtain raiser.

It consisted of the excerpts that Berg drew from his opera "Wozzeck" in the years when it was impossible to get a performance for the whole work. To give them, Erich Leinsdorf engaged Phyllis Curtin to sing Marie and there were some members of the Columbus Boychoir to enact the children of the finale.

In her glistening white dress, the handsome Miss Curtin looked too glamorous to suggest the character she was portraying, but she sang the angular vocal lines with ease and exquisite clarity. The orchestra, too, played with the utmost refinement.

As a result, the excerpts hardly sounded modern at all, and one could listen without shock to the extraordinary rightness of the instrumentation in communicating the shades of feeling Berg wanted to convey. In the perspective of time, one realizes that "Wozzeck" is not really so far from "Pelléas." It certainly sounded more concentrated and perhaps deeper in feeling than the lengthy Mahler Symphony.

ROSS PARMENTER.

Herald Tribune
D. 355,898 S. 451,270

FEB 27 1964

LEINSDORF AND BOSTONIANS AND MAGNIFICENT MAHLER

By Eric Salzman

Leinsdorf, the Boston Symphony and the Mahler Fifth were back in town last night.

The combo turned up earlier this season at Carnegie; yesterday it went on at Philharmonic Hall. Leinsdorf still likes his Mahler big and hard-driving. Last night's reading was, if anything, even tenser, wirier, more explosive, set out on an even bigger scale than the earlier one.

This is Mahler in a brilliant, even harsh light. The point is that Mahler can take it just the way Leinsdorf dishes it out. It is hardly the old Vienna we knew and love but, without nostalgia, without sloppiness, without weeping and whipped cream, we still get something magnificent: open, intense, revealed, even less inconsistent and "vulgar," less true to some of the original expressive vision no doubt, but perhaps more meaningful and significant for today.

The "new" music on the program was also from not-so-old Vienna: excerpts from Alban Berg's "Wozzeck." By a set of curious chances, I had the good fortune to hear this piece last week end in the glorious acoustic surroundings of Sympony Hall, Boston, a spot in which the extraordinary singing of Phyllis Curtin, the small but significant contribution of the Columbus Boy choir and the glorious Boston Symphony sound could be heard to even better advantage than in Philharmonic Hall.

Again, this was unanguished, unfrantic expressionist music but it was still rich and dramatic in the performance conception. In a way, it is a shame that we must still make do with the Suite from "Wozzeck" when we should be getting the whole opera on a regular basis; but at least we were able to rediscover some essence of the expressive greatness of this music though the simple, richly phrased, eloquent singing of Miss Curtin and the gorgeous clarity and binding strength of that Leinsdorf-Boston sound and line.

BROOKLYN.

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

NEW YORK NEWS
Tuesday, February 18, 1964

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

N.Y. MUSICAL AMERICAN
Wednesday, February 26, 1964

New York Post
D. 372,679 S. 255,557

NOV 27 1963

NEW YORK AND BROOKLYN DAILY
D. 40,130 S. 40,130

FEB 19 1964

DAILY NEWS
NEW YORK'S PICTURE NEWSPAPER
D. 2,006,983 S. 3,147,219

FEB 18 1964

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
RECORD
BAY RIDGE RECORD
W. 12,100

PAGE ONE CERTIFIED

FEB 21 1964

Music Time:

Boston Symphony At Boro Academy

Erich Leinsdorf, Music Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will conduct works by a contemporary American composer and two pre-Revolution Russians on Thursday evening, February 27, at 8 p.m. a tthe Brooklyn Academy of Music.

The native composer is Walter Piston the two Russians are Nicholas A. Rimsky-Korsakov and Peter I. Tchaikovsky. The complete program follows:

Symphony No. 4, Piston; Suite from "Le Coq d'Or," Rimsky-Korsakov; Suite No. 3 in G major, Tchaiskovsky.

The February 27th program is typical of Leinsdorf's search for neglected music of important composers, works which the conductor believes belong in the repertoire of a major symphony orchestra.

Mr. Piston's Symphony No. 4 was commissioned by the University of Minnesota. The Boston Symphony Orchestra first played it in October of 1962. It is filled with melodic solo passages for clarinet, English horn and oboe. One movement is a dancing section, with free rhythms, a waltz and passages reminiscent of country fiddling. Piston himself said "My music is becoming more relaxed . . . "

NE
MUSICAL AMERICA
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 15,900

APR 1964

Boston Symphony

The temperature was Symphony's concert
Hall on February 28.
the predominantly co
music on the progra
Erich Leinsdorf's res
trolled readings. Schu
Scherzo and Finale, zero because it is suc work. Proceedings pi ably with Walter P
No. 4. The most po poser's symphonies ( by several orchestras work flows smoothly
fication wholly typic classic style. Object trifle unadventurou a rewarding wor played by the Bost
Rudolf Serkin de elegant performanc
Concerto in F, K. perfection; phrasing style could not have considered. This w
edly shared by th
In conclusion Le synthesis from W including the "For Prelude to Act III, hilde's rock and ening. Aside from t that "bleeding chu operas make effect this was a disappo conductor finds it over these excellent ing a rigid control a moment the ensem
pieces, is beyond r cold and four-squa
of the grandiose sy

Herald
D. 355,898 S. 45

FEB 29 1964

Cond

The Boston orchestra at Ph
Hall last night he those superpreciation
when the conducto most everything
when he wants Leinsdorf was in humor and made t
the warm Boston sustained, lyric p of Schumann's
Scherzo, and Fina that somewhat u
the grand tuttis trating on melodic
There was mor
the spicy Sympho
by Walter Piston.
neoclassical work, scored and very s
alternating moods

NEW YORK

The New York Times
D. 681,612 S. 1,304,447

FEB 29 1964

SERKIN AND BOSTON PLAY CONCERT HERE

An exaltedly light-hearted performance of Mozart's Piano Concerto in F major (K. 459) with Rudolf Serkin as soloist, stood out in an otherwise fairly tame Boston Symphony concert at Philharmonic Hall last night.

Mr. Serkin, with Mr. Leinsdorf's perfectly appropriate help, made the music positively smile. The pianist's phrases responded like lightning to the music's moods. He played as though he loved the concerto and was laughing at it all at once. He earned an ovation at its end.

For the rest of the evening, Mr. Leinsdorf offered Schumann's Overture, Scherzo and Finale (Op. 52); Walter Piston's Symphony No. 4 and excerpts from Wagner's "Siegfried."

The Schumann is an ingratiating trifle, and it was fondly treated as such by Mr. Leinsdorf. Piston's Symphony, all middle-ground and conservatively modern gave the orchestra a chance to show a little muscle. Mr. Piston's ideas are carefully marshaled in this work, and if there are no surprises, there are no frustrations either.

Throughout the evening, the Bostonians were their usual secure selves under Mr. Leinsdorf's assured direction.

THEODORE STRONGIN.

esting nsider-mony e com-played a), the sophis-
's neo-style. C... and a trifle unaccep... ps, but still a rewar... beautifully played [illegible]

Rudolf S... poised and elegant perf... ozart's Piano Concerto i... rything was perfection ... rhythm and style could not ... been more happily considered. This was a success deservedly shared by the orchestra's winds.

In conclusion Leinsdorf presented a synthesis from Wagner's "Siegfried," including the "Forest Murmurs," the Prelude to Act III, the ascent to Brünnhilde's rock and Brünnhilde's Awakening. Aside from the debatable theory that "bleeding chunks" from Wagner's operas make effective concert pieces, this was a disappointment. Why the conductor finds it necessary to hover over these excellent musicians, exercising a rigid control as if he felt that any moment the ensemble would fall to pieces, is beyond me. The result was cold and four-square, conveying little of the grandiose sweep of the music.

P.D.

Conductor's Dream

The Boston Symphony orchestra at Philharmonic Hall last night had one of those superprecision evenings when the conductor gets almost everything he wants, when he wants it. Maestro Leinsdorf was in a mellow humor and made the most of the warm Boston sound in a sustained, lyric performance of Schumann's Overture, Scherzo, and Finale, Op. 52, that somewhat underplayed the grand tuttis by concentrating on melodic breadth.

There was more mettle in ... spicy Symphony No. 4 ... Walter Piston, a pleasant neoclassical work, brilliantly scored and very successful in alternating moods of fun and thoughtfulness. There was great gusto, too, in the gorgeously lush fabric woven by Mr. Leinsdorf and the orchestra in the pastiche of favorite leitmotifs from Wagner's "Siegfried" that concluded the program.

The prevailing good humor was sustained by pianist Rudolf Serkin in an unusually genial performance of Mozart's Concerto No. 19, K. 459. Mr. Serkin began in a pearly, rather perfunctory manner but loosened up in the second movement and was positively lilting in the third, although his fast tempo there led to a will-o-the-wisp darting about of themes at the expense of cantabile.

JUDITH ROBISON

BRIDGEPORT

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Post (e)
BRIDGEPORT, Conn.
Circ. 81,942

MAR 2 1964

TOUR ENDS HERE FOR SYMPHONY

By RICHARD DAY

The Boston Symphony orchestra, under Erich Leinsdorf, ended its mid-winter tour here Saturday night with a concert in the Klein Memorial auditorium.

Chief works of the evening were Bartok's demanding Violin Concerto No. 2, and Beethoven's Seventh Symphony (performed here a few days ago by the Fairfield County Symphony).

The orchestra rang-up the curtain with a spirited rendition of the Overture to Il Signor Bruschino, perhaps the most enduring of Rossini's early opera buffas.

Silverstein Soloist

Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster, was soloist in the Bartok concerto. His interpretation was sure-lined and the technique fluent. However, he does not play on a scale grand enough to do full justice to the composer's massive, romantic score. The heights and depths of the music escaped him, standing his reading somewhat in the superficial vein. In the Andante tranquillo movement where Mr. Silverstein was not called upon to produce effects beyond his powers, little doubt could be entertained regarding his artistry, or that he is best as section leader or ensemble player.

Mr. Leinsdorf's conception of the orchestral portions of this wild, and beautiful unmistakably Magyar influenced creation was properly romantic, and he had the good taste not to lay the loving hand on too heavily.

Beethoven's big, exuberant Seventh, bursting with strong rhythms, a superb Allegretto and vital Scherzo, was for the most part given with sculptured care. Remembering Mr. Leinsdorf's Viennese origins, this reading, which had both intensity and mellow line, was predictable and logical. Unfortunately, there were moments when Mr. Leinsdorf's relentless command for increased volumes of sound spoiled the quality of the first and second violins.

Readers may be interested to learn that in musical lore exists a tale to the effect that Wagner (who called the Seventh "The Apotheosis of the Dance") once actually tried to "dance" the symphony—to the piano accompaniment, and possibly sardonic humor of Liszt.

A Precision Orchestra

Mr. Leinsdorf's impact upon the musicians, his technique, and phrasing deserve further comment.

First, the orchestra has gained precision in every choir, with the whole more responsive in ensemble, and closer knit than under the Munch regime. Second, the tonal character has gained luster.

The shaping of phrases is inclined toward the plasticity and some of the finish which made Furtwangler's musicianship the consummate entity it was.

No ridiculous antics on the podium achieve these good results; rather, having discarded the baton, Mr. Leinsdorf uses his hands to shape every phrase in the air for all the instrumentalists to follow.

Like another equally competent, but lesser known conductor, Dr. Elmer Tidmarsh, professor of music emeritus, Union College, Mr. Leinsdorf is a great one for employing facial expressions to convey moods and instructions to his band.

Under this new leadership the Boston Symphony has regained its place as one of the first orchestras of America.

A large and appreciative audience was loath to see the men from Boston go, and called them back for an encore, which, regretably, was not given.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Telegram (m)
BRIDGEPORT, Conn.
Circ. 13,172

MAR 2 1964

Boston Symphony Thrills Large Audience at Klein

By RICHARD DAY

Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony, an orchestra unmistakably his own after but a season and a half on the podium, ended a mid-winter tour Saturday with a concert in the Klein Memorial auditorium.

Chief works of the evening were Bartok's demanding Violin Concerto No. 2, and Beethoven's Seventh Symphony (performed here a few days ago by the Fairfield County Symphony).

The orchestra rang-up the curtain with a spirited rendition of the Overture to Il Signor Bruschino, perhaps the most enduring of Rossini's early opera buffas.

Silverstein Soloist

Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster, was soloist in the Bartok concerto. His interpretation was sure-lined and the technique fluent. However, he does not play on a scale grand enough to do full justice to the composer's massive, romantic score. The heights and depths of the music escaped him, sranding his reading somewhat in the superficial vein. In the Andante tranquillo movement where Mr. Silverstein was not called upon to produce effects beyond his powers, little doubt could be entertained regarding his artistry, or that he is best as section leader or ensemble player.

Mr. Leinsdorf's conception of the orchestral portions of this wild, and beautiful unmistakably Magyar influenced creation was properly romantic, and he had the good taste not to lay the loving hand on too heavily.

Beethoven's big, exuberant Seventh, bursting with strong rhythms, a superb Allegretto and vital Scherzo, was for the most part given with sculptured care. Remembering Mr. Leinsdorf's Viennese origins, this reading, which had both intensity and mellow line, was predictable and logical. Unfortunately, there were moments when Mr. Leinsdorf's relentless command for increased volumes of sound spoiled the quality of the first and second violins.

Readers may be interested to learn that in musical lore exists a tale to the effect that Wagner (who called the Seventh "The Apotheosis of the Dance") once actually tried to "dance" the symphony—to the piano accompaniment, and possibly sardonic humor of Liszt.

Mr. Leinsdorf's impact upon the musicians, his technique, and phrasing deserve further comment.

First, the orchestra has gained precision in every choir, with the whole more responsive in ensemble, and closer knit than under the Munch regime. Second, the tonal character has gained luster.

The shaping of phrases is inclined toward the plasticity and some of the finish which made Furtwangler's musicianship the consummate entity it was.

No ridiculous antics on the podium achieve these good results; rather, having discarded the baton, Mr. Leinsdorf uses his hands to shape every phrase in the air for all the instrumentalists to follow.

Like another equally competent, but lesser known conductor, Dr. Elmer Tidmarsh, professor of music emeritus, Union College, Mr. Leinsdorf is a great one for employing facial expressions to convey moods and instructions to his band.

Under this new leadership the Boston Symphony has regained its place as one of the first orchestras of America.

A large and appreciative audience were loath to see the men from Boston go, and called them back for an encore, which, regretably, was not given.

NEW YORK

MUSICAL AMERICA
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 15,900

APR 1964

Bos[illegible]

Th[illegible] Boston Sy[illegible] concert [illegible] harmonic Ha[illegible] February 29 [illegible] due to the [illegible] manti[illegible] re of the mus[illegible] pr[illegible] conductor Eric[illegible] ndorff's rostr[illegible] and control[illegible] dings. Schuma[illegible] Overture, Sch[illegible] and Finale. Op[illegible] registered zero[illegible] ise it is such a[illegible] teresting work[illegible] proceedings picked [illegible] considerably with Walter Pist[illegible] ymphony No. 4. The most popular of the composer's symphonies (it has been played by several orchestras this season), the work flows smoothly and with a sophistication wholly typical of Piston's neoclassic style. Objective music and a trifle unadventurous, perhaps, but still a rewarding work, and beautifully played by the Bostonians.

Rudolf Serkin delivered a poised and elegant performance of Mozart's Piano Concerto in F, K. 459. Everything was perfection; phrasing, touch, rhythm and style could not have been more happily considered. This was a success deservedly shared by the orchestra's winds.

In conclusion Leinsdorf presented a synthesis from Wagner's "Siegfried," including the "Forest Murmurs," the Prelude to Act III, the ascent to Brünnhilde's rock and Brünnhilde's Awakening. Aside from the debatable theory that "bleeding chunks" from Wagner's operas make effective concert pieces, this was a disappointment. Why the conductor finds it necessary to hover over these excellent musicians, exercising a rigid control as if he felt that any moment the ensemble would fall to pieces, is beyond me. The result was cold and four-square, conveying little of the grandiose sweep of the music.

P.D.

The New York Times
D. 681,612 S. 1,304,447

FEB 29 1964

SERKIN AND BOSTON PLAY CONCERT HERE

An exaltedly light-hearted performance of Mozart's Piano Concerto in F major (K. 459) with Rudolf Serkin as soloist, stood out in an otherwise fairly tame Boston Symphony concert at Philharmonic Hall last night.

Mr. Serkin, with Mr. Leinsdorf's perfectly appropriate help, made the music positively smile. The pianist's phrases responded like lightning to the music's moods. He played as though he loved the concerto and was laughing at it all at once. He earned an ovation at its end.

For the rest of the evening, Mr. Leinsdorf offered Schumann's Overture, Scherzo and Finale (Op. 52); Walter Piston's Symphony No. 4 and excerpts from Wagner's "Siegfried."

The Schumann is an ingratiating trifle, and it was fondly treated as such by Mr. Leinsdorf. Piston's Symphony, all middle-ground and conservatively modern gave the orchestra a chance to show a little muscle. Mr. Piston's ideas are carefully marshaled in this work, and if there are no surprises, there are no frustrations either.

Throughout the evening, the Bostonians were their usual secure selves under Mr. Leinsdorf's assured direction.

THEODORE STRONGIN.

NEW YORK
Herald Tribune
D. 355,898 S. 451,270

FEB 29 1964

Conductor's Dream

The Boston Symphony orchestra at Philharmonic Hall last night had one of those superprecision evenings when the conductor gets almost everything he wants, when he wants it. Maestro Leinsdorf was in a mellow humor and made the most of the warm Boston sound in a sustained, lyric performance of Schumann's Overture, Scherzo, and Finale, Op. 52, that somewhat underplayed the grand tuttis by concentrating on melodic breadth.

There was more mettle in the spicy Symphony No. 4 by Walter Piston, a pleasant neoclassical work, brilliantly scored and very successful in alternating moods of fun and thoughtfulness. There was great gusto, too, in the gorgeously lush fabric woven by Mr. Leinsdorf and the orchestra in the pastiche of favorite leitmotifs from Wagner's "Siegfried" that concluded the program.

The prevailing good humor was sustained by pianist Rudolf Serkin in an unusually genial performance of Mozart's Concerto No. 19, K. 459. Mr. Serkin began in a pearly, rather perfunctory manner but loosened up in the second movement and was positively lilting in the third, although his fast tempo there led to a will-o-the-wisp darting about of themes at the expense of cantabile.

JUDITH ROBISON

BRIDGEPORT

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Post (e)
BRIDGEPORT, Conn.
Circ. 81,942

MAR 2 1964

TOUR ENDS HERE FOR SYMPHONY

By RICHARD DAY

The Boston Symphony orchestra, under Erich Leinsdorf, ended its mid-winter tour here Saturday night with a concert in the Klein Memorial auditorium.

Chief works of the evening were Bartok's demanding Violin Concerto No. 2, and Beethoven's Seventh Symphony (performed here a few days ago by the Fairfield County Symphony).

The orchestra rang-up the curtain with a spirited rendition of the Overture to Il Signor Bruschino, perhaps the most enduring of Rossini's early opera buffas.

Silverstein Soloist

Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster, was soloist in the Bartok concerto. His interpretation was sure-lined and the technique fluent. However, he does not play on a scale grand enough to do full justice to the composer's massive, romantic score. The heights and depths of the music escaped him, standing his reading somewhat in the superficial vein. In the Andante tranquillo movement where Mr. Silverstein was not called upon to produce effects beyond his powers, little doubt could be entertained regarding his artistry, or that he is best as section leader or ensemble player.

Mr. Leinsdorf's conception of the orchestral portions of this wild, and beautiful unmistakably Magyar influenced creation was properly romantic, and he had the good taste not to lay the loving hand on too heavily.

Beethoven's big, exuberant Seventh, bursting with strong rhythms, a superb Allegretto and vital Scherzo, was for the most part given with sculptured care. Remembering Mr. Leinsdorf's Viennese origins, this reading, which had both intensity and mellow line, was predictable and logical. Unfortunately, there were moments when Mr. Leinsdorf's relentless command for increased volumes of sound spoiled the quality of the first and second violins.

Readers may be interested to learn that in musical lore exists a tale to the effect that Wagner (who called the Seventh "The Apotheosis of the Dance") once actually tried to "dance" the symphony—to the piano accompaniment, and possibly sardonic humor of Liszt.

A Precision Orchestra

Mr. Leinsdorf's impact upon the musicians, his technique, and phrasing deserve further comment.

First, the orchestra has gained precision in every choir, with the whole more responsive in ensemble, and closer knit than under the Munch regime. Second, the tonal character has gained luster.

The shaping of phrases is inclined toward the plasticity and some of the finish which made Furtwangler's musicianship the consummate entity it was.

No ridiculous antics on the podium achieve these good results; rather, having discarded the baton, Mr. Leinsdorf uses his hands to shape every phrase in the air for all the instrumentalists to follow.

Like another equally competent, but lesser known conductor, Dr. Elmer Tidmarsh, professor of music emeritus, Union College, Mr. Leinsdorf is a great one for employing facial expressions to convey moods and instructions to his band.

Under this new leadership the Boston Symphony has regained its place as one of the first orchestras of America.

A large and appreciative audience was loath to see the men from Boston go, and called them back for an encore, which, regretably, was not given.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Telegram (m)
BRIDGEPORT, Conn.
Circ. 13,172

MAR 2 1964

Boston Symphony Thrills Large Audience at Klein

By RICHARD DAY

Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony, an orchestra unmistakably his own after but a season and a half on the podium, ended a mid-winter tour Saturday with a concert in the Klein Memorial auditorium.

Chief works of the evening were Bartok's demanding Violin Concerto No. 2, and Beethoven's Seventh Symphony (performed here a few days ago by the Fairfield County Symphony).

The orchestra rang-up the curtain with a spirited rendition of the Overture to Il Signor Bruschino, perhaps the most enduring of Rossini's early opera buffas.

Silverstein Soloist

Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster, was soloist in the Bartok concerto. His interpretation was sure-lined and the technique fluent. However, he does not play on a scale grand enough to do full justice to the composer's massive, romantic score. The heights and depths of the music escaped him, sranding his reading somewhat in the superficial vein. In the Andante tranquillo movement where Mr. Silverstein was not called upon to produce effects beyond his powers, little doubt could be entertained regarding his artistry, or that he is best as section leader or ensemble player.

Mr. Leinsdorf's conception of the orchestral portions of this wild, and beautiful unmistakably Magyar influenced creation was properly romantic, and he had the good taste not to lay the loving hand on too heavily.

Beethoven's big, exuberant Seventh, bursting with strong rhythms, a superb Allegretto and vital Scherzo, was for the most part given with sculptured care. Remembering Mr. Leinsdorf's Viennese origins, this reading, which had both intensity and mellow line, was predictable and logical. Unfortunately, there were moments when Mr. Leinsdorf's relentless command for increased volumes of sound spoiled the quality of the first and second violins.

Readers may be interested to learn that in musical lore exists a tale to the effect that Wagner (who called the Seventh "The Apotheosis of the Dance") once actually tried to "dance" the symphony—to the piano accompaniment, and possibly sardonic humor of Liszt.

Mr. Leinsdorf's impact upon the musicians, his technique, and phrasing deserve further comment.

First, the orchestra has gained precision in every choir, with the whole more responsive in ensemble, and closer knit than under the Munch regime. Second, the tonal character has gained luster.

The shaping of phrases is inclined toward the plasticity and some of the finish which made Furtwangler's musicianship the consummate entity it was.

No ridiculous antics on the podium achieve these good results; rather, having discarded the baton, Mr. Leinsdorf uses his hands to shape every phrase in the air for all the instrumentalists to follow.

Like another equally competent, but lesser known conductor, Dr. Elmer Tidmarsh, professor of music emeritus, Union College, Mr. Leinsdorf is a great one for employing facial expressions to convey moods and instructions to his band.

Under this new leadership the Boston Symphony has regained its place as one of the first orchestras of America.

A large and appreciative audience were loath to see the men from Boston go, and called them back for an encore, which, regretably, was not given.

112

PROVIDENCE

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Times (e)
PAWTUCKET-
CENTRAL FALLS, R. I.
Circ. 38,168
MAR 4 1964

Music In Review

Concert Audience Acclaims Boston Symphony, Director

No doubt that since 1893 when Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 6 in D-Minor (Pathetique) had its world premiere it has been played as well, but it could not have been played better than it was Tuesday night by the Boston Symphony Orchestra with Richard Burgin conducting in Veterans Memorial Auditorium, Providence. The orchestra never seemed as relaxed, or have they responded more effectively, than they did to Burgin's persuasive demands for expressive tone and cadence.

✦✦✦

COMPLETED JUST prior to Tchaikovsky's death, it seemed to have a premonitive essence combined with a procession of periods of the past. The low-voiced, ominous opening statement was soon erased by the haunting wistfulness of the melody that succeeded it. But even that ended on a note of despair. A melody, more hopeful yet brooding, followed. Then, as though in self reproach, the tempo changed to allegro with the drums and brasses speaking in anger until, near the end, still continuing its rebuke, it seemed to find peace in exhaustion.

✦✦✦

THEN, A LARGE number of late comers delayed the beginning of the next movement so long that the continuity was lost and the tranquil resignation of the mood was destroyed. Though blithe and lilting, the second movement when they resumed—a movemene that is so enhanced and beautified because of the graveness of the preceding one—seemed not to be related to the work at all.

✦✦✦

BUT THE THIRD movement, allegro molto vivace, had a dancing gaiety, and the original foreboding was forgotten when the mood became bold, ecstatic and exultant. Yet, after its blazing finish that provoked premature applause, the mood of tragedy returned in the finale movement, adagio lamentoso. The muted strings and the stopped horns bespoke, with almost tearful lamentation, the hopelessness of hope and futility of waning life, ending in engulfing waves of sorrowful sound in the cellos and basses.

The other work was Sibelius' radiant and at times sparkling "Symphony No. 5 in E-Flat Major" which has for its purpose only to bring beauty to the world. It described nothing, painted no moods, spoke of nothing. It sang gloriously all the way through. It was pure music, divinely expressed. A well-deserved ovation was shared by the orchestra and Mr. Burgin.

C. H. L.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Journal (m)
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
Circ. 61,299
MAR 4 1964

Music Last Night

Boston Orchestra Plays At Veterans Auditorium

By RUTH TRIPP

Things were different last night for the Boston Symphony Orchestra patrons in the vicinity of Veterans Memorial Auditorium. That is, different from on Jan. 28 last. The stars were out, the air was balmy and the orchestra arrived. No need to go into the matter of Arctic weather, ice and gale winds. Things were different last night.

The only suggestion of the far North was the Sibelius Symphony No. 5 with its scintillating, ice-blue brilliance. As we heard Richard Burgin's interpretation of this masterpiece, it was truly an aurora borealis in sound. Its construction is intensely interesting. The central core of tone from which the many figurations emerge, and around which they come and go, is basic throughout the four movements. To be sure it is not always the same but it is always there.

The first time I ever heard this work was in the old days when Koussevitzky was paying homage to Sibelius and his music back in the 30s. His first and second symphonies sing their way into your consciousness. For me, the fifth burns its way through. Burgin and the musicians kept perfect balance among the many patterns of the great structure and the final climax of the work was tremendous. It was truly reminiscent of the Koussevitzky days.

The concert opened with Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 6, the "Pathetique." Here we heard all the glory of this rich score displayed with the opulent tone of the wonderful strings of the Boston orchestra. There are few orchestras equal to it and none better. The reeds and brass also excelled in beauty of tone. Tchaikovsky's brilliant music was given all the warmth and understanding possible, yet there was a refinement and control as Burgin expressed the extravagance of the writing, which spoke with great emphasis. He made it seem logical and right to appreciate the understandable melodies of this appealing score. Heard in this manner, it may once again become fashionable to like Tchaikovsky.

The Boston Symphony passed its "make-up" concert with flying colors and the audience accorded a warm reception to the conductor and his musicians. It scarcely seems possible that the last concert of their series is only two weeks away, on March 17.

Postponed from Jan 28, 1964
See Page 88

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Journal
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
Circ. 193,108
FEB 16 1964

Favor Will Be Repaid

A FEW SEASONS ago the Boston Symphony Orchestra did a favor for the Rhode Island Philharmonic. Later this month it will be repaid.

It all came about as a result of the cancellation of the Boston Symphony's Jan. 28 concert because of a snowstorm.

For that program, Richard Burgin, the symphony's assistant conductor, had scheduled a performance of Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 6. When the performance was rescheduled for March 3 everything seemed all right until someone noticed that the R.I. Philharmonic had scheduled the same Tchaikovsky work for its Feb. 29 program, three days before the symphony engagement.

Recalling a similar situation a few years ago in which the circumstances were reversed, David G. Kent, Philharmonic manager, said that the orchestra decided to repay the Boston Symphony by dropping the Tchaikovsky work from its Feb. 29 program and substituting Dvorak's Symphony No. 5, "From the New World."

That's what is called "musicianship."

FRI.- SAT. 19. MON. 5. TUESDAY 9 (13

NINETEEN HUNDRED SIXTY-THREE–SIXTY-FOUR

...enth Program

...ARCH 6, at 2:00 o'clock

...AY EVENING, MARCH 7, at 8:30 o'clock

...OKOWSKI, Guest Conductor

.....Canzon Quarti Toni a 15
...formance at these concerts)

...oncerto Grosso in D minor, Op. 3, No. 11

...

Sinfonia Concertante, in E-flat, K. 297b

I. Allegro
II. Adagio
III. Andantino con variazioni

Oboe: RALPH GOMBERG
Clarinet: GINO CIOFFI
Bassoon: SHERMAN WALT
Horn: JAMES STAGLIANO

INTERMISSION

HOVHANESS Prelude and Quadruple Fugue for Orchestra, Op. 128
(First performance at these concerts)

ROREM .....Eagles (After Walt Whitman)
(First performance at these concerts)

STRAVINSKY .....Suite from the Ballet "Petrouchka"
Russian Dance – Chez Petrouchka – Grand Carnival – Nurses' Dance –
The Bear and the Peasant Playing a Hand Organ – The Merchant and the Gypsies – The Dance of the Coachman and Grooms – The Masqueraders
Piano Solo: BERNARD ZIGHERA

BALDWIN PIANO

RCA VICTOR RECORDS

MONDAY MARCH 10, 1964
CONCERT SAME AS
FRI. SAT.

EIGHTY-THIRD SEASON • NINETEEN HUNDRED SIXTY-THREE–SIXTY-FOUR

Ninth Program

TUESDAY EVENING, MARCH 10, at 8:30 o'clock

...OLD STOKOWSKI, Guest Conductor

.....Canzon Quarti Toni a 15
(First performance in this series)

Concerto Grosso in D minor, Op. 3, No. 11

...

Sinfonia Concertante, in E-flat, K. 297b

...ino con variazioni

Oboe: RALPH GOMBERG
Clarinet: GINO CIOFFI
Bassoon: SHERMAN WALT
Horn: JAMES STAGLIANO

INTERMISSION

Prelude and Quadruple Fugue for Orchestra, Op. 128
(First performance in this series)

Eagles (After Walt Whitman)
(First performance in this series)

.....Suite from the Ballet "Petrouchka"
...n Dance – Chez Petrouchka – Grand Carnival – Nurses' Dance –
...ear and the Peasant Playing a Hand Organ – The Merchant and the ...sies – The Dance of the Coachman and Grooms – The Masqueraders
Piano Solo: BERNARD ZIGHERA

BALDWIN PIANO

RCA VICTOR RECORDS

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Journal
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
Circ. 193,108
FEB 23 1964

Stokowski Due Here March 6-7

Leopold Stokowski will be guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the first time in next month.

Stokowski will conduct concerts here March 6 and 7 after the orchestra returns from a tour of Baltimore, Philadelphia, New York and Bridgeport, Conn.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Herald
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 283,819
FEB 23 1964

The Pittsburgh Press
D. 356,355 S. 730,398
FEB 29 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Journal (m)
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
Circ. 61,299
FEB 29 1964

PHILADELPHIA DAILY
NEWS
D. 318,507 S. 231,568
FEB 29 1964

Stokowski to Present Three New Works

BOSTON (UPI).—Leopold Stokowski will introduce three works new to Boston Symphony Orchestra audiences next month when he appears as guest conductor of the orchestra for the first time.

The Boston premieres will include "Eagles" by Ned Rorem and a prelude and quadruple fugue by Alan Hovhaness, a native of Somerville, Mass.

FRI.- SAT. 19. MON. 5. TUESDAY 9 13

eteenth Program

, MARCH 6, at 2:00 o'clock

RDAY EVENING, MARCH 7, at 8:30 o'clock

LEOPOLD STOKOWSKI, Guest Conductor

GABRIELI ..... Canzon Quarti Toni a 15
(First performance at these concerts)

VIVALDI ..... Concerto Grosso in D minor, Op. 3, No. 11
I. Maestoso
II. Largo
III. Allegro

MOZART ..... Sinfonia Concertante, in E-flat, K. 297b
I. Allegro
II. Adagio
III. Andantino con variazioni

Oboe: RALPH GOMBERG
Clarinet: GINO CIOFFI
Bassoon: SHERMAN WALT
Horn: JAMES STAGLIANO

INTERMISSION

HOVHANESS ..... Prelude and Quadruple Fugue for Orchestra, Op. 128
(First performance at these concerts)

REM ..... Eagles (After Walt Whitman)
(First performance at these concerts)

STRAVINSKY ..... Suite from the Ballet "Petrouchka"
Russian Dance — Chez Petrouchka — Grand Carnival — Nurses' Dance — The Bear and the Peasant Playing a Hand Organ — The Merchant and the Gypsies — The Dance of the Coachman and Grooms — The Masqueraders

Piano Solo: BERNARD ZIGHERA

BALDWIN PIANO

RCA VICTOR RECORDS

MONDAY, MARCH 10, 1964.
CONCERT SAME AS
FRI- SAT.

11

Ninth Program

TUESDAY EVENING, MARCH 10, at 8:30 o'clock

LEOPOLD STOKOWSKI, Guest Conductor

GABRIELI ..... Canzon Quarti Toni a 15
(First performance in this series)

VIVALDI ..... Concerto Grosso in D minor, Op. 3, No. 11
I. Maestoso
II. Largo
III. Allegro

MOZART ..... Sinfonia Concertante, in E-flat, K. 297b
I. Allegro
II. Adagio
III. Andantino con variazioni

Oboe: RALPH GOMBERG
Clarinet: GINO CIOFFI
Bassoon: SHERMAN WALT
Horn: JAMES STAGLIANO

INTERMISSION

HOVHANESS ..... Prelude and Quadruple Fugue for Orchestra, Op. 128
(First performance in this series)

REM ..... Eagles (After Walt Whitman)
(First performance in this series)

STRAVINSKY ..... Suite from the Ballet "Petrouchka"
Russian Dance — Chez Petrouchka — Grand Carnival — Nurses' Dance — The Bear and the Peasant Playing a Hand Organ — The Merchant and the Gypsies — The Dance of the Coachman and Grooms — The Masqueraders

Piano Solo: BERNARD ZIGHERA

BALDWIN PIANO

RCA VICTOR RECORDS

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Journal
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
Circ. 193,108
FEB 23 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Herald
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 283,819
FEB 23 1964

Stokowski Due Here March 6-7

Leopold Stokowski will be guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the first time in next month.

Stokowski will conduct concerts here March 6 and 7 after the orchestra returns from a tour of Baltimore, Philadelphia, New York and Bridgeport, Conn.

The Pittsburgh Press
D. 356,355 S. 730,398
FEB 29 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Journal (m)
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
Circ. 61,299
FEB 29 1964

PHILADELPHIA DAILY
NEWS
D. 318,507 S. 231,568
FEB 29 1964

Stokowski to Present Three New Works

BOSTON (UPI).—Leopold Stokowski will introduce three works new to Boston Symphony Orchestra audiences next month when he appears as guest conductor of the orchestra for the first time.

The Boston premieres will include "Eagles" by Ned Rorem and a prelude and quadruple fugue by Alan Hovhaness, a native of [illegible], Mass.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Herald
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 283,819
MAR 1 1964

Symphony This Week

Leopold Stokowski Orchestra's Guest

Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has invited Leopold Stokowski to be guest conductor of the orchestra for the first time. The 82-year-old conductor, who now works primarily with the American Symphony Orchestra in New York City which he created in 1962, will conduct the Symphony Hall concerts of Friday and Saturday, Monday, March 9 and Tuesday, March 10.

Mr. Stokowski will open the Friday - Saturday program with Giovanni Gabrieli's "Canzon Quarti Toni a 15," performed for the first time at these concerts, and continue with Vivaldi's Concerto Grosso in D minor, Op. 3, No. 11. This will be followed by the Sinfonia Concertante, K. 297b, of Mozart, in which the soloists will be Ralph Gomberg, oboe; Gino Cioffi, clarinet; Sherman Walt, bassoon; and James Stagliano, horn.

After the intermission Mr. Stokowski will conduct the Prelude and Quadruple Fugue for Orchestra, Op. 128, by Alan Hovhaness and Ned Rorem's "Eagles," both of which works will be first performances at these concerts. The concert will conclude with Stravinsky's Suite from the ballet "Petrouchka," in which Bernard Zighera will play the piano solo.

After his conducting debut in Paris in 1908, Mr. Stokowski came to the United States as conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony and became an American citizen. He held the post of music director of the Philadelphia Orchestra from 1912 to 1938, during which time he achieved his first worldwide fame. He has also had posts as conductor of the Hollywood Bowl Orchestra, the City Center Orchestra, the City Center Orchestra of New York, All-American Youth Orchestra, New York Philharmonic, NBC Symphony Orchestra, and Houston Symphony Orchestra.

Drawing by Margaret Burnham Humphrey

Leopold Stokowsky will make his debut as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, at Symphony Hall.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Christian Science Monitor (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 174,850
MAR 5 1964

HIGH POINT, N. C.
ENTERPRISE
D. 20,000 S. 26,100
MAR 8 1964

ERICH LEINSDORF, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has invited Leopold Stokowski to be guest conductor of the orchestra in New York City, which he created in 1962. After his conducting debut in Paris in 1908, Stokowski came to the United States as conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony and became an American citizen. He held the post of music director of the Philadelphia Orchestra from 1912 to 1938, during which time he achieved his first worldwide fame.

He also had posts as conductor with many outstanding orchestras after his tenure with the Philadelphia Orchestra, and now at 82 Stokowski fills more conducting engagements than a half a dozen or more younger men together in the same period of time.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Herald (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 178,553
MAR 4 1964

★ ★ ★

NO CONFORMIST is Stokowski who comes to conduct Symphony this weekend. In fact, at 84 he's a legend with his youthful, glowing face, cloud of white hair, tempestuous personal life which he would tell you has nothing to do with music. He persuaded Disney to spend $2 million on "Fantasia" which educated millions to Bach, Stravinsky and Beethoven. If called eccentric, Stokowski counters, "Take Bach, he had 20 children; he was virile and passionate, but we only need to think about the quality of his music."

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Patriot-Ledger (e)
QUINCY, Mass.
Circ. 47,164
MAR 11 1964

The Sound of Music

Stokowski's Downbeat, Upbeat With BSO

By Peter M. Knapp

Leopold Stokowski had both a catastrophe and a triumph at Symphony Hall last night.

The cheers for his triumph in the Stravinsky "Petrouchka" ballet suite, however, drowned out the ennui of the veteran conductor's perusal of a Mozart score as Mr. Stokowski ended his first appearances as guest conductor with the Boston Symphony. Much more than the Stravinsky and the Mozart were on the program, but these represented the zenith and the nadir of last night's concert.

The ups and downs of Leopold Stokowski are, of course, nothing new. He has been surprising, shocking, infuriating and delighting concert-goers for more than half a century.

Now at the age of 77 or 82—depending on which source one picks—Mr. Stokowski may not be the flamboyant "golden boy" of his youthful days. But he still excels at the large, exciting and colorful scores, and unfortunately persists in transplanting the musical values which make the big works vital onto the fragile delicacies of the baroque and the classic. While whipped cream is fine for cake, it smothers the bonbons.

Thus Stravinsky is Stokowski's dish, not Mozart. He is a master at unleashing the big score into gobs and splashes of sound, at raising a monumental crescendo and letting it fall to a throbbing whisper, or guiding the flow of orchestral color from one instrumental choir to the next.

Complex as "Petrouchka" is, Stokowski never let the full-bodied tones become bloated, or the orchestral lines tangled. In perfect control here, he brought out the suite's vitality and brashness in an exciting reading enhanced by Bernard Zighera's skillful solo piano work.

LEOPOLD STOKOWSKI

The other two offerings on the post-intermission menu were also cut out for Stokowski's style. Alan Hovhaness' Prelude and Quadruple Fugue for Orchestra, Op. 128, is a stunning example of clean craftsmanship. Although written in 1955, the work lies more in the age of Bach and Handel. The difference lies in its Eastern flavor.

The brief prelude, with its exotic melody introduced by violas over gentle, rocking pizzicato strings, leads rather quickly to a four-voiced fugue, which picks up momentum through four distinct fugal subjects until the four themes are finally combined in a massive whirr of strings at the coda. Despite the intricacy of the writing, Hovhaness' counterpoint is lean and never muddied. The appealing work and its vigorous performance was warmly applauded.

The other contemporary work was Ned Rorem's "Eagles," a pictorial rendering of Walt Whitman's poem, "The Dalliance of the Eagles." Rorem is a young American composer. His "Eagles" is dated 1958.

In contrast to Hovhaness' Prelude and Fugue, "Eagles" seems over-orchestrated for such a brief work. The percussion battery really gets a workout. There are, however, some bright moments in the score and some lush—if nearly saccharine—melodies. Rorem's work has the splashes of color Stokowski dotes on, and the orchestra played with enthusiasm for him.

Mozart, though, is best left untouched by Mr. Stokowski. The work performed was the Sinfonia Concertante in E flat, K. 297b, a gracious tidbit which is a kind of concerto grosso for string orchestra and wind continuo. The solo parts were stylishly played by Ralph Gomberg, oboe; Gino Cioffi, clarinet; Sherman Walt, bassoon, and James Stagliano, horn, and the soggy performance certainly was not their fault.

The sound was fine, but little else. Behind the pretty tones were neither substance, nor direction. The adagio section became an interminable dirge during which the audience was noticeably restless.

Vivaldi's Concerto Grosso in D minor, Op. 3, No. 11, was also more Stokowski than Vivaldi. Curiously, for the Mozart, the conductor cut his forces down to the appropriate size. But for the Vivaldi, he called forth a regiment of strings. The sound came forth accordingly—rich, mellow, splendidly romantic. But it sounded nothing like Vivaldi.

There were also a series of the famous Stokowski devices—the pregnant pause, the lengthy hold, the bravura attack, the precipitous dynamic change, the dramatic ritard and the billowing crescendo held out in a mighty final chord.

The concert opened with a sonorous reading of Giovanni Gabrieli's "Canzon Quarti Toni A 15," which is a short way of saying a "song" in the fourth mode for three instrumental choirs of five parts each.

The groupings, two brass and a wind choir, were placed at both ends of the stage front and center rear, respectively, to give the antiphonal or "answering" effect. The Gabrieli work, given the superlative musicianship of the Boston Symphony's wind players, was a tonal treat. Mr. Stokowski chose a deliberate tempo and emphasized the glistening sound and the movement of the voices.

Movement, in fact, is what characterized the first section of the program, as the players encountered logistical problems in their game of musical chairs. In each of the first three pieces, the composition and arrangement of the orchestra was changed. The wind players for the Gabrieli were replaced by the string orchestra for the Vivaldi, and the Mozart necessitated another platooning.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Record-American (m) (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 531,565
MAR 1964

Stokowski Makes Debut As BSO Guest Conductor

Leopold Stokowski mounted the Boston Symphony Orchestra's podium for the first time here yesterday afternoon. His six-course collation offered something for everyone, from Italian antipasto to Russia kasha. He leapfrogged from the elegent eighteenth century into the turbulent twentieth as if to prove that he could eschew raddled romanticism of the XIX era.

Actually, the appetizer was derived from Italy's artistically flourishing Cinquecento — Andrea Gabrieli's Canzon Quarti Toni a 15, an instrumental song for winds, resembling a madrigal in format, but less strict in style, and in the Hypophrygian mode Onstage left were seven brasses, with a dozen woodwinds in the center and a brass octet to the conductor's right. Thus did 27 virtuosi voice a long, finely articulated melody, a deeply felt largo chant; a chain of contrasting sections, numbering seven, with a brief coda, were bound together only by their contrasting characters.

After this moving music was heard at a Stokowski-Philharmonic concert fifteen years ago, Irving Kolodin remarked to a New York Sun cigaret-smoking colleague "LS/MFT means Leopold Stokowski makes fine tone." He still does, as a musical Merlin of the MacArthurian generation. No matter what orchestra he directs, he manages to make it sound as the Philadelphians did under his tapering hands.

VIRTUOSO TRIO

Vivaldi's Concerto in D minor for Strings, Op. 3 No. 11, gave the gifted guest conductor his first opportunity to display the luxus quality of the Bostonian strng choir, achieving some remarkable sonorities even when a susurrus effect was scored. The concertino comprised Joseph Silverstein and Alfred Kripa, violinists, with Samuel Mayes, cellist, pitted against the regular strings as a "tutti."

Both trio and string orchestra played with warmth and and precision, projecting the rich, healy, opulent texture of Vivaldi's magisterial concerto with harmonic fervor.

Mozart's Sinfonia Concertante in E flat (KV. App. #9) for wind quartet and string orchestra was a rather nourishing dish for a Lenten Friday, served forth by a brilliant, if undersized, main body of strings. It has become the fashion among contemporary conductor to regard Mozart as a symphonist in miniature, though musicologists pointed out long ago that when the composer was sojourning in Paris he asked for-and got-as many instrumentalists as the Conservatory could provide for his orchestral concerts. Indeed, Dr. Stokowski has been known to use half again as many strings as were employed at yesterday's performance of this thoroughly Mozartistic novelty.

FROM SOMERVILLE

Some musicians opine that the bredth of the opening allegro is attained at the expense of a goodish bit of repetition, but once the solo instruments enter such repetition is amply justified, for here the composer gave his melodic material a special coloring, adorning it with brilliant ornamentation which would be swallowed up unless the listener perceived it against the simpler stringed background. First-desk Bostonians, Ralph Gomberg, oboist; Gino Cioffi, clarinetist; Sherman Walt, bassoonist, and James Stagliano, French horn, played with doting care and unvarying precision.

After the interval, there were two more first performances at these concerts (the Gabrieli was a first, also) after a false start before a timpanist, a drummer and a bassoon (or buffoon?) had seated themselves. All three were needed for Somerville-born Alan Hovhaness' Prelude and Quadruple Fugue for Orchestra, Op. 128.

This thoroughly competent composer has equated brisk tempi with balanced style in contrapuntal elegance noteworthy both in the prelude and fugal segment. He offers both compactness and an affinity for contemporary sonorities, plus the spice of variety. Entwining pertinent fugal material is no easy task, to do so with four contrapuntal subjects smacks of Merlinesque magic.

The conductorship was evocative, the performance stunning.

Stokowski's familiar readin of "Petrouchka" brought a distinguished, variegated concert to an exhilarating conclusion. Once again the feeling came over your transplanted Philadelphian annotator that he was reliving an orchestral program twoscore years ago, revisiting the Academy of Music for the razzle-dazzle orchestral pyrotechnics and puppetry of forty years ago, with cascading arpeggio sweeps, blaring fanfares and the identically incisive, steel-clipped rhythms and crunching string attacks led by the same Stokowski but not before the same audience except for ROLFE BOSWELL.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Jewish Advocate
BOSTON, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 35,304
MAR 1964

At the BSO

Stokowski Is Guest Conductor

BY ALLAN SLY

Those present at Stokowski's B.S.O. program last week (the season's 19th) were gently but firmly reminded by the maestro himself that after all the orchestra does the playing. Chivalrously he deferred to the many soloists that his unusual program brought to the fore. He even seemed reluctant to take the stage at all, but of course, with increasing intensity, the program became more and more conductor-centered, until the Petrouchka Suite brought him into sharp focus. Even then, however, he brought Mr. Zighera down to center stage, as if to remind us that Stravinsky's ballet grew from a piano-concerto-like germ idea.

This willingness to champion the composer's intention emerges as a dominant force in Stokowski's make-up. Apparently in many visits to St. Mark's in Venice he has conjured for himself how Gabrieli must have deployed his forces. In the big Vivaldi string concerto he certainly thought in terms of bowing — such resonance, such containment, such insistence — and in the Mozart Concertante (four winds) he set up intimate relations in Gallic style.

Thus in the first half we were invited to participate in three situations differing widely from our normal Saturday evening environment. After intermission we were back home—with full orchestra — but with new repertoire: Hovhaness' Prelude and Quadruple Fugue (wind, timpani and strings), Rorem's Eagles (plus hardware) and the Petrouchka Suite as already described.

From the rear it apears that Stokowski's overweening concern is with a precision of timing, with meticulous realization of over-all design as well as detail in terms of time placement. Sonorities he might influence were he longer with a given orchestra, though even in this one guest appearance he produced some characteristic resonances.

Already in the Gabrieli the (wind) players breathed differently. Over the years one has heard this and similar Renaissance works fall just short of rebirth — but on Saturday those wonderful phrases lived, in breath, in living tone relationships. (Parenthetically did the audience really know what was going on? In my section some few dozen consumers seemed to think they were at a band concert — not, I fear, because of the tuning to a B flat, but through inattention. However, those solemn phrases got the point across to them in due course.)

Exit winds, enter strings (all of them), whose meaty sounds must have induced many to go home and do likewise. And observing Stokowski's involvement one could spare a thought for his early years as an organist, familiar with church acoustics. How he has continuously evolved as a musical personality. In the Mozart he was as eager to learn as to dominate. Only once, when Mr. Cioffi took a notion to help himself to a bit more elbow room, did Stokowski have to grab the tiller — and the formation was right there again within the measure.

It could well be that the full orchestral body found it not at all easy to play this man's way; his is a self-fashioned style, rather off to one side of the Nikisch-Reiner-Leinsdorf manner and very individual. In the Hovhaness there were all sorts of conflicting rhythms going on at once and Stokowski chose to conform his motions to the dominating ones. The others had to fall into place and one had to admire the section disciplines within the B.S.O. personnel.

The Rorem piece rather specialized in hardware noises — though not exclusively, and a composer who starts from a Whitman poem has already earned our consideration, now that Old Walt is old hat to many of our bright boys. How like Stokowski to champion Hovhaness' contrapuntal tour de force and Rorem's today-unfashionable impressionism! But how better lead up to the Petrouchka, a real field day fc all?

The 82-year-young maestr can still turn a concert aroun his little finger. May he com and do it again in Boston an let us not use that silly wor debut for this elder, just be cause we had never befor coaxed him here. A Bosto debut is for the untried. Wha less apt epithet can be found for this superlative senior?

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Traveler (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 164,299
MAR 7 1964

Decades Overdue

Stokowski, 82, In Hub Debut

By ROBERT TAYLOR

Leopold Stokowski, officially 82, made his conducting debut with The Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday, and Janus must have been his tutelary deity, for the first half was an enervating program of 17th and 18th century musiçal history, whilst in the second half the conductor was absolutely wonderful.

Two conductors: two orchestras; two programs—this was the effect of a singular concert. Let us begin by belatedly welcoming Mr. Stokowski to Boston. That he should achieve this distinction in the eighth decade of his life bespeaks our unwonted timidity. Throughout his long and illustrious career, Leopold - Boleslawowicz-Stanislaw-Antoni-Stokowski, has been the storm-center of his ardent experimentalism, admittedly sometimes ill-starred, but never less than exciting, controversial, venturesome, exultant: his appearance at Symphony is decades overdue.

Of 19th Century

Now, there he stood, his various achievements blending into the figure of a grand old man, that familiar figure with its mane of long hair, bold profile and attenuate hands, facing the Boston Symphony like a youthful colossus.

It will be noted that Mr. Stokowski's program included no 19th century music. He himself is the 19th century, really, though the spirit of his work is eternally and audaciously modern—one of the last of the late romantic virtuoso conductors.

By comparison, his 20th century colleagues are splendid engineers, though there is much to be said for the stark beauties of engineering. Those who try to perpetuate the old tradition such as Leonard Bernstein never quite succeed in convincing us that they have the panache: the times are out of joint for them, and the iron of our era has entered their soul.

All Mr. Stokowski's limitations seemed evident in the first half of yesterday's program. He is a much better musicologist than many of his critics admit, but in this instance it was less a matter of historical purity than the fact that his balances sounded awry.

Best in Venice

To hear the Gabrieli properly, it would be necessary to transport the audience to St. Mark's in Venice, where the acoustical structure of the cathedral is built into the antiphonal responses.

The separation of the choirs on the stage achieved the tonal dimensions of brilliance, but the wizardry of Mr. Stokowski was not up to the sfumato Venetian mysticism of the Canzon, simply because it is an impossible element to inject without the echoing vaults, the soaring naves and reverberation time of the surrounding architecture.

The wind playing was accurate enough, the golden burnish of tone, still the ecclesiastical colors and the ghostly presence of the supernatural within the pomp of ritual part-writing for concerted bands, failed to emerge.

The Vivaldi, which allowed the amplitude of the strings to develop a sonorous terraced dynamic, was the most successful conception of the early half, while the thinly-weighted Mozart demanded a fuller body of violins. In both these works, the legato phrasing of the conductor sounded too lush; indeed, if Technicolor was an attribute of sound, this is the way it would distinguish itself.

There was an absence of definition, of crisp and delicate line, and the generally soggy texture of the music—particularly in the Mozart where the tuttis had an excessive rubato—made this a limp half hour of archeology.

All Changed

But in the contemporary scores, everything changed, magnificently so. After a false start, Mr. Stokowski transposed Ned Rorem's Eagles, based on the inspiration of a Walt Whitman poem, with the Hovhaness Prelude and Quadruple Fugue. Both works have the virtue of brevity combined with an admirable accessibility.

The Rorem is not a tissue of narrative sound effects but a surpassingly well-constructed pattern in which the tensions of repose and energy are amplified, contrasted and heroically voiced, while Hovhaness is one of the few moderns who can write counterpoint in an intricate rhythmic context, in which the subjects have identity without harking back to the baroque. The scores are first-rate, and Mr. Hovhaness who was present, passed through the audience and took a deserved bow from in front of the stage.

And finally, there was the Petrouchka" suite, the quintessence of Stokowski, a blaze of carnival, a galvanic, emotional evocation of the Slavic of the ballet source and the pulsating jostle of exotic, swirling figures. For one such experience of teeming life, who could not understand the appeal of the post-romantic? May Mr. Stokowski's career flourish in its incandescent light.

Next weekend, Mr. Leinsdorf schedules the world premiere of Tochi's Fifth Symphony; Excerpts from Berlioz's "The Damnation of Faust," Op. 24, and Brahms's Piano Concerto No. 1, in D Minor Op. 15. Van Cliburn soloist.

The Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra Leopold Stokowski conducting, presente the 19th program of the 83d seaso yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hal The program will be repeated tonigh at 8:30.

Canzon Quarti Toni a 15 ..... Gabrie
Concerto Grosso in D Minor, Op. 3 No. 11 ..... Vivald
Sinfonia Concertante, in E-flat, K 297b ..... Mozar
Prelude and Quadruple Fugue for Or chestra, Op. 128 ..... Hovhanes
Eagles (After Walt Whitman) ..... Roren
Suite from the Ballet "Petrouchka" ..... Stravinski

116

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 194,870
MAR 7 1964

At Symphony

Stokowski, BSO Share Afternoon of Glamour

By MICHAEL STEINBERG

Leopold Stokowski conducted the Boston Symphony for the first time on Friday, and during an afternoon not devoid of some dazzling moments, conveyed to a remarkable degree the glamour of the concert world.

He chose a program of music from the 16th, 18th, and 20th centuries. In the first half, there was a Canzona by Gabrieli, a Concerto of Vivaldi's, and the Wind Concertante by Mozart. After the intermission, there were short works by Ned Rorem and Alan Hovhaness, and the suite from Stravinsky's "Petrouchka."

The program seemed put together as though to show us what a good orchestra we have, and at the same time to demonstrate how readily Stokowski could make it sound like one of his own.

The Gabrieli was for winds only, three five-voiced choirs of them occupying the front corners and the rear center of the stage. The Vivaldi was for strings alone—it was the famous D minor from Opus 3 that Koussevitzky was so fond of—and it made sounds that Vivildi, at least in so far as he was a connoisseur of string playing, would have been impressed by. And the Mozart brought to the fore the virtuosity and taste of a quartet of wind principals, Ralph Gomberg, oboe, Gino Cioffi, clarinet, Sherman Walt, bassoon, and James Stagliano, horn.

The contemporary works all used full orchestra, and few blindfold listeners would have guessed "Boston" on hearing the raw, visceral sounds Stokowski evoked.

Modern music has always had a big place in Stokowski's program building, and he has conducted significant American premieres of music by Mahler, Berg, Stravinsky, Schoenberg, Prokofiev, and others. There was another side to his pioneering, however, for he always had a taste for trivial exotica, Henry Eichheim and such people, and it is that side of his predilections that he has favored in recent years.

Ned Rorem's "Eagles," after Whitman's "The Dalliance of the Eagles," has some evocative pictorialisms and just enough touches of freshness to make one regret their entombment among cliches well staled in Hollywood. The Prelude and Quadruple Fugue by Alan Hovhaness is of the composer's usual studied simplicity, this time clothed in cap and gown. It fulfills its modest ambitions with vigor and competence, and it earned Hovhaness, who was present, a big hand.

Stokowski as an interpreter of music is obviously a well known quantity by now. He makes orchestras produce a wonderful sound that, for a few pieces, is just the right one. It's mostly right for the gaudy Shrovetide Fair atmosphere of "Petrouchka" though the rhythmic edge is softer than that which Stravinsky himself applies to this music. And what would the composer's comment be on the tam-tam added to the Coachmen's Dance?

Stokowski makes his own pieces out of raw material by Gabrieli and Vivaldi. The pitches are right, so are most of the metrical relationships and some of the timbres. Their pieces were not displeasing to hear, but if you think you can find out from a Stokowski performance what sort of music Gabrieli and Vivaldi wrote, forget it!

In the Mozart "Sinfonia Concertante," the solo parts were beautifully played, especially in the second and third movements. Stokowski was least effective here. Since he was accompanying a solo quartet, he couldn't very well turn it into one of his own pieces, yet he hasn't the discipline to play it properly. As a result the performance mostly hovered in an air of inhibited academicism, interrupted now and again by a little swoon. It isn't one of Mozart's great pieces anyhow, its main quality being its truly extraordinary euphony, and its 30-odd minutes were just a little tedious.

But "Petrouchka" really blazed, the orchestra men even smiled as they gave out those wonderful tunes, and those 15 minutes were by far the most excited and exciting music-making I have heard at Symphony since arriving here.

Next week Erich Leinsdorf returns to conduct the standard excerpt from the Berlioz "Damnation of Faust;" the world premiere of Ernst Toch's Fifth Symphony, and he will collaborate with Van Cliburn in Brahms' D minor Concerto.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Christian Science Monitor (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 174,850
MAR 7 1964

Stokowski debut

Same old magic

By Harold Rogers

It seems almost incredible that Leopold Stokowski— at the age of 82 with an extraordinarily distinguished career behind him — could have just made his debut as a guest conductor of the Boston Symphony.

Yet he has. And it is far less incredible that his debut was extraordinarily successful. His appearance at Symphony Hall Friday afternoon was an event of the first order, no matter how you look at it: his program, his performance of it, its impact on the listeners—all were infused with musical interest and emotional excitement. The old maestro is still filled with the old magic.

But the old dramatics were gone. Tall, straight, dignified, he used his hands in the familiar way, yet without drawing undue attention. He moved them just enough to indicate what he wanted; that's all that a conductor's hands are ever needed for. His heart will tell his musicians far more than his hands. It is not what a conductor makes his players see that makes them play. It's what he makes them feel. Witness Monteux, witness Reiner, both of whom have never done much more than beat the time, as far as the eye can see. What they have made the heart feel is something else again.

* * *

His program? There were three first performances for the Boston Symphony's weekend series — Gabrieli's Canzon Quarti Toni a 15 (played with a brass choir at far left and far right, with the woodwinds center stage for maximum stereophonic effect), Ned Rorem's "Eagles" (after Walt Whitman's "The Dalliance of the Eagles"), and Alan Hovhaness's Prelude and Quadruple Fugue for Orchestra, Op. 128.

There were other things, too — Vivaldi's Concerto Grosso in D minor for strings, Op. 3, No. 11; Mozart's Sinfonia Concertante in E flat, K. 297b, and Stravinsky's Suite from "Petrouchka." It seems amazing that a program could hold so much of the old, the late, and the new without assuming the look of a patchwork quilt.

The Rorem "Eagles" is a powerful piece of writing in what might be thought of as American neo-impressionism—the battery strong, intervals leaping, harmonies wide open, melodies careening in large circling phrases. In form it closely follows the Whitman lines — first majestic, then agitated, then again majestic.

* * *

The Hovhaness Prelude and Fugue could have been written by an old master as far as its technical complexities are concerned. In mood it is to be found in Mr. Hovhaness's neo-Oriental style now his hallmark; the prelude could almost have been a page out of Rimsky-Korsakov; the fugue, however, is a marvel of interweaving lines, the likes of which Rimsky never dared to fabricate. Mr. Hovhaness, formerly of Boston, was on hand to accept the rapturous applause.

But everything was rapturously applauded — the Mozart with a superlative concertino made up of Ralph Gomberg's oboe, Gino Cioffi's clarinet, Sherman Walt's bassoon, and James Stagliano's French horn: the Vivaldi, pulsating with a richness of string tone reminiscent of the Koussevitzky era; and Stravinsky's "Petrouchka," in which Stokowski kept the great masses of sound buoyantly alive and moving.

FRI.-SAT. 20

117

EIGHTY • NINETEEN HUNDRED SIXTY-THREE–SIXTY-FOUR

entieth Program

FRID N, MARCH 13, at 2:00 o'clock

RDAY EVENING, MARCH 14, at 8:30 o'clock

BERLIOZ ...cerpts From "The Damnation of Faust," Op. 24
- Will-o'-the-Wisps
- Sylphs
- March (Rakoczy)

TOCH ..... Fifth Symphony (In One Movement)
(First performance)

INTERMISSION

BRAHMS ..... Piano Concerto No. 1, in D minor, Op. 15
- I. Maestoso
- II. Adagio
- III. Rondo: Allegro non troppo

SOLOIST
VAN CLIBURN
MR. CLIBURN plays the Steinway Piano

These concerts will end about 3:50 o'clock on Friday Afternoon; 10:20 o'clock on Saturday Evening.

BALDWIN PIANO RCA VICTOR RECORDS

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sun (e)
LOWELL, Mass.
Circ. 45,001
MAR 7 1964.

Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony orchestra, will return to the podium next Friday and Saturday (March 13-14) after a brief vacation. He has invited Van Cliburn to be guest soloist at these concerts, and his program will also include one of the world premieres he has scheduled for this season.

Mr. Cliburn will appear next week-end for the first time at the regular Friday-Saturday concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra. In 1958 he was soloist at the Orchestra's annual Pension Fund concert, shortly after his return from Moscow as winner of the Tchaikovsky Competition. Last summer Mr. Leinsdorf invited him to appear as guest artist at a Berkshire Festival concert at Tanglewood. At the coming week-end programs he will play the Brahms Piano Concerto No. 1.

Mr. Leinsdorf and the orchestra will present the first performance of Ernst Toch's Symphony No. 5 (in one movement), which was completed last spring. The program will begin with excerpts from "The Damnation of Faust" by Berlioz.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Herald
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 283,819
MAR 8 1964

Symphony This Week

Orchestra's Guest To Be Van Cliburn

Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will return to the podium Friday and Saturday after a brief vacation. He has invited Van Cliburn to be guest soloist at those concerts, and his program will include a world premiere.

Mr. Cliburn will appear for the first time at the Friday-Saturday concerts of the orchestra. In 1958 he was soloist at the orchestra's annual Pension Fund concert, shortly after his return from Moscow as winner of the Tchaikovsky Competition. Last summer Mr. Leinsdorf invited him to appear as guest artist at a Berkshire Festival concert. At the coming weekend programs he will play the Brahms Piano Concerto No. 1.

Mr. Leinsdorf and the orchestra will present the first performance of Ernst Toch's Symphony No. 5 (in one movement), which was completed last spring. The program will begin with Excerpts from "The Damnation of Faust" by Berlioz.

Leopold Stokowski will conclude his visit as guest conductor with the regular subscription concerts of Monday and Tuesday evenings. His program will be the same as that of his previous Friday- Saturday concerts: Gabrieli's Canzon Quartl Toni a 15; the Concerto Grosso, Op. 3, No. 11 of Vivaldi; Mozart's Sinfonia Concertante, K. 297b; Hovhaness' Prelude and Quadruple Fugue for Orchestra, Op. 128; "Eagles" by Rorem; and the Suite from "Petrouchka" by Stravinsky.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 465,653

Leinsdorf to Conduct New Symphony of Toch

Ernst Toch's Symphony No. 5 (in one movement) will have its world premiere at the Friday-Saturday concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Erich Leinsdorf will conduct.

Van Cliburn will appear next week-end for the first time at the regular Friday-Saturday concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. In 1958 he was soloist at the orchestra's annual Pension Fund Concert, shortly after his return from Moscow as winner of the Tchaikovsky Competition. Last Summer Leinsdorf invited him to appear as guest artist at the Berkshire Festival, Tanglewood. At the coming week-end concerts he will play the Brahms Piano Concerto No. 1.

The program will begin with excerpts from "The Damnation of Faust" by Berlioz.

Leopold Stokowski will conclude his visit as guest conductor with the regular subscription concerts of Monday and Tuesday evenings at 8:30. His program will be the same as that of his previous Friday-Saturday concerts: Gabrieli's Canzon Quarti Toni a 15; the Concerto Grosso, Op. 3, No. 11, of Vivaldi; Mozart's Sinfonia Concertante, K. 297b; Hovhaness' Prelude and Quadruple Fugue for Orchestra, Op. 128; "Eagles" by Rorem; and the Suite from "Petrouchka" by Stravinsky.

"Symphony Week," which was designated by the proclamation of Gov. Endicott Peabody and Mayor John F. Collins to honor the Boston Symphony Orchestra and to emphasize its need for continuous support by the community and commonwealth, will conclude on Mar. 12 with the annual meeting of the Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, those who have made a contribution to the orchestra for the 1963-64 season. Members of the orchestra will present a special surprise program for the Friends, which was suggested by the orchestra members especially for this meeting and which is now in secret preparation. The Friends will also hear a short address by Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees, and have an informal reception afterward in the gallery.

On Tuesday, afternoon, Mar. 10, Gov. and Mrs. Peabody will honor Mr. and Mrs. Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony Orchestra with a governor's reception at the State House. Invitations have been extended to the members of the orchestra, members of the legislature and heads of state, and the Council of Friends of the orchestra.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Herald (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 178,553
MAR 9 1964

★ ★ ★

VAN CLIBURN comes to town the week end as soloist with Symphony and that's a star-studded event. Since 1958 when he came home to a N. Y. ticker-tape parade after winning Moscow's International Piano Festival, the tall 29-year-old Texan has continued a dizzying round of sell out concerts, works with blazing energy but continues boyish and uncomplicated . . . Joe Whiteford of Boston has been staying since December at Van Cliburn's Tucson rambling desert ranch where Van rests and practises between concerts.

VAN CLIBURN

FRI.-SAT. 20

117

EIGHTY-THIRD SEASON • NINETEEN HUNDRED SIXTY-THREE–SIXTY-FOUR

ventieth Program

FRIDAY AFTERNOON, MARCH 13, at 2:00 o'clock

SATURDAY EVENING, MARCH 14, at 8:30 o'clock

BERLIOZ — Excerpts from "The Damnation of Faust," Op. 24

I. Minuet of the Will-o'-the-Wisps
II. Ballet of the Sylphs
III. Hungarian March (Rakoczy)

TOCH — Fifth Symphony (In One Movement)
(First performance)

INTERMISSION

BRAHMS — Piano Concerto No. 1, in D minor, Op. 15

I. Maestoso
II. Adagio
III. Rondo: Allegro non troppo

SOLOIST
VAN CLIBURN
Mr. CLIBURN plays the Steinway Piano

These concerts will end about 3:50 o'clock on Friday Afternoon; 10:20 o'clock on Saturday Evening.

BALDWIN PIANO — RCA VICTOR RECORDS

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sun (e)
LOWELL, Mass.
Circ. 45,001
MAR 7 1964

Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony orchestra, will return to the podium next Friday and Saturday (March 13-14) after a brief vacation. He has invited Van Cliburn to be guest soloist at these concerts, and his program will also include one of the world premieres he has scheduled for this season.

Mr. Cliburn will appear next week-end for the first time at the regular Friday-Saturday concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra. In 1958 he was soloist at the Orchestra's annual Pension Fund concert, shortly after his return from Moscow as winner of the Tchaikovsky Competition. Last summer Mr. Leinsdorf invited him to appear as guest artist at a Berkshire Festival concert at Tanglewood. At the coming week-end programs he will play the Brahms Piano Concerto No. 1.

Mr. Leinsdorf and the orchestra will present the first performance of Ernst Toch's Symphony No. 5 (in one movement), which was completed last spring. The program will begin with excerpts from "The Damnation of Faust" by Berlioz.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Herald
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 283,819
MAR 8 1964

Symphony This Week

Orchestra's Guest To Be Van Cliburn

Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will return to the podium Friday and Saturday after a brief vacation. He has invited Van Cliburn to be guest soloist at those concerts, and his program will include a world premiere.

Mr. Cliburn will appear for the first time at the Friday-Saturday concerts of the orchestra. In 1958 he was soloist at the orchestra's annual Pension Fund concert, shortly after his return from Moscow as winner of the Tchaikovsky Competition. Last summer Mr. Leinsdorf invited him to appear as guest artist at a Berkshire Festival concert. At the coming weekend programs he will play the Brahms Piano Concerto No. 1.

Mr. Leinsdorf and the orchestra will present the first performance of Ernst Toch's Symphony No. 5 (in one movement), which was completed last spring. The program will begin with Excerpts from "The Damnation of Faust" by Berlioz.

Leopold Stokowski will conclude his visit as guest conductor with the regular subscription concerts of Monday and Tuesday evenings. His program will be the same as that of his previous Friday-Saturday concerts: Gabrieli's Canzon Quarti Toni a 15; the Concerto Grosso, Op. 3, No. 11 of Vivaldi; Mozart's Sinfonia Concertante, K. 297b; Hovhaness' Prelude and Quadruple Fugue for Orchestra, Op. 128; "Eagles" by Rorem; and the Suite from "Petrouchka" by Stravinsky.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 465,653
MAR 8 1964

Leinsdorf to Conduct New Symphony of Toch

Ernst Toch's Symphony No. 5 (in one movement) will have its world premiere at the Friday-Saturday concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Erich Leinsdorf will conduct.

Van Cliburn will appear next week-end for the first time at the regular Friday-Saturday concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. In 1958 he was soloist at the orchestra's annual Pension Fund Concert, shortly after his return from Moscow as winner of the Tchaikovsky Competition. Last Summer Leinsdorf invited him to appear as guest artist at the Berkshire Festival, Tanglewood. At the coming week-end concerts he will play the Brahms Piano Concerto No. 1. The program will begin with excerpts from "The Damnation of Faust" by Berlioz.

Leopold Stokowski will conclude his visit as guest conductor with the regular subscription concerts of Monday and Tuesday evenings at 8:30. His program will be the same as that of his previous Friday-Saturday concerts: Gabrieli's Canzon Quarti Toni a 15; the Concerto Grosso, Op. 3, No. 11, of Vivaldi; Mozart's Sinfonia Concertante, K. 297b; Hovhaness' Prelude and Quadruple Fugue for Orchestra, Op. 128; "Eagles" by Rorem; and the Suite from "Petrouchka" by Stravinsky.

"Symphony Week," which was designated by the proclamation of Gov. Endicott Peabody and Mayor John F. Collins to honor the Boston Symphony Orchestra and to emphasize its need for continuous support by the community and commonwealth, will conclude on Mar. 12 with the annual meeting of the Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, those who have made a contribution to the orchestra for the 1963-64 season. Members of the orchestra will present a special surprise program for the Friends, which was suggested by the orchestra members especially for this meeting and which is now in secret preparation. The Friends will also hear a short address by Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees, and have an informal reception afterward in the gallery.

On Tuesday, afternoon, Mar. 10, Gov. and Mrs. Peabody will honor Mr. and Mrs. Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony Orchestra with a governor's reception at the State House. Invitations have been extended to the members of the orchestra, members of the legislature and heads of state, and the Council of Friends of the orchestra.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Herald (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 178,553
MAR 9 1964

★ ★ ★

VAN CLIBURN comes to town the week end as soloist with Symphony and that's a star-studded event. Since 1958 when he came home to a N. Y. ticker-tape parade after winning Moscow's International Piano Festival, the tall 29-year-old Texan has continued a dizzying round of sell out concerts, works with blazing energy but continues boyish and uncomplicated . . . Joe Whiteford of Boston has been staying since December at Van Cliburn's Tucson rambling desert ranch where Van rests and practices between concerts.

VAN CLIBURN

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Herald (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 178,553
MAR 14 1964

118

The Symphony

Van Cliburn Adds To Pensive Theme

By ROBERT TAYLOR

Save for the opening episodes by Berlioz, this weekend's Symphony concerts may be described as "pensive." With Van Cliburn giving a wistful account of the Brahms D minor Piano Concerto, with the world premiere of Ernst Toch's darkling, tenuous Fifth Symphony, a mood of gentle romanticism enfolds the program; lyric glints, but also an amorphous lack of contrast.

Toch's Fifth Symphony, played in one movement, is relatively orthodox in its language. It takes the form of a ricercar, I should judge, an essay in a polyphonic succession of free-flowing themes, and the instrumentation by contemporary standards has a sparing mixture of color. The most prominent tints derive from four solo violins, flute, and at the close, the shadowy timbre of muffled percussion.

Debt to Mahler

With this Symphony we find the influence of Gustav Mahler still dominating the contemporary composer. Lukas Foss ("Time Cycle"), Leonard Bernstein ("Kaddish"), and the early scores of Leon Kirchner come to mind at random, as examples of today's talents who owe a considerable debt to Mahler. Toch's Fifth Symphony, with its plangent Oriental cadences, inevitably suggests the symbolic, wraith-like reverberations of The Song of the Earth.

At first hearing, it strikes one intermittently; themes of a fragile beauty are stated, but the statement of the music as a whole isn't pronounced. A set of Mahleresque components — the varied instrumental doublings, the balance of solo instruments poised against each other, the bass clarinet voicing—is placed before us, yet never achieves complete identity. The melodic flow has freedom, the sound a floating Eastern overtone, the writing for woodwinds and strings creates a texture of delicate, filigreed lightness.

The thought, however, is almost too terse for comfort. The music is vividly phrased, and the opening with its veiled unison violins over which the flute enters, rapidly gives way to harmonies that suggest background moods for a Hollywood film that hasn't been produced yet. And then we are confronted by a singularly fresh dialogue between flute and violin. These abrupt, angular transitions are logical, still they give the Fifth Symphony a fragmented sense of purpose: it is a collection of lovely attenuated moments.

Van Cliburn's approach to Brahms's massive Piano Concerto No. 1 is intense, serious, and intelligent. For me, Mr. Cliburn is foremost among the younger American pianists, yet yesterday's performance seldom attained the exciting monumentality of Gary Graffman's playing of the same work at Symphony seven years ago.

The quality of the piano tone was resplendent, and the refinement of the soloist's conception should not be scanted: the solo role in the concerto is not one of pretentious virtuosity. The cantabile outline and finely-chiseled phrase realize the melancholy lyricism of the score's dimensions.

The projection of sturm and drang tension, though, slackens under such a diamond-clear precision. Mr. Cliburn was at his best in the first movement where the chains of trills seem to lie easily within the compass of his right hand; and in the serene probing of the adagio. The last movement did not have the Beethoven-oriented heroism that it might properly have expressed in the rondo. Throughout Mr. Cliburn's playing was a model of elegant clarity; but in the process he sacrificed large-scale energy for the graceful articulation of detail.

Admirable Balance

The orchestral role had a wholly admirable balance under Mr. Leinsdorf, and a special word should be added for his treatment of the scenes from "The Damnation of Faust." I do not relish these very much as an opening; they have long association with the realm of light concert music, and an overture, complete in itself, like "Beatrice and Benedict" would seem far more pertinent.

In respect to rubato, tonal sheen and agreeable line, nonetheless, this was something special. Take only the "Rakoczy" March: the relaxed slow tempo unfolds a majectic panoply that completely obliterates the tinny, village bandstand element we so ordinarily hear. Erich Leinsdorf needs to defer to no one as an interpreter of Berlioz.

Next weekend Ruth Posselt will be the soloist in Hindemith's Violin Concerto. Mr. Leinsdorf has also scheduled Telemann's Overture in C and Strauss's "Thus Spake Zarathustra."

The Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf conducting, presented the 20th program of the 83rd season yesterday in Symphony Hall. The soloist was Van Cliburn, piano. The program will be repeated tonight at 8:30.

Excerpts from "The Damnation of Faust," Op 24 — Berlioz
Fifth Symphony (In One Movement) — Toch
Piano Concerto No. 1, In D minor, Op. 15 — Brahms

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Christian Science Monitor (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 174,850
MAR 14 1964

Cliburn and Brahms

By Roland Nadeau

As one observes as well as listens to Van Cliburn at the keyboard, a feeling comes that a story is being told, that he is telling it primarily to himself while kinesthetically his whole being responds vividly to every subtle nuance of the tale. And because the physical manifestation of the inner musical thought is natural and true for him, one does not object to the artistic mummery.

For certain listeners, of course, this mimetic guide tour to the spiritual riches of a score has definite value. The problem arises with some players when a false visual façade is substituted for the real thing, when outer gyrations are not balanced by the inner truth and depth of musical perception.

At Friday' afternoon's Symphony Hall concert by the Boston Symphony Van Cliburn, playing the Concerto in D minor by Brahms, showed that despite considerable pianistic histrionics, what he feels inwardly and projects outwardly are consistent and that the results are noble and good.

* * *

Brahms' First Piano Concerto certainly tells no story, nor does it suggest a program of any kind. In fact, as much as any of his other works, it represents the absolutist ideal in music: beauty welling from within the materials themselves; nothing in excess; above all, a perfect balance of all forces.

As far as the dialogue between soloist and orchestra is concerned, everybody starts and finishes even. In this matter Brahms followed the path of Berlioz in "Harold in Italy," of Schumann in his Piano Concerto in A minor, and Beethoven in his Fourth Concerto in G major.

For all these pieces the conductor must funnel the emotion through the orchestra as a whole; the soloist must be considered as the leading instrument within the whole, never the tyrant or protagonist.

* * *

In this performance Erich Leinsdorf rightly brought the concerto to its inevitable cogent and absolutist conclusions by always bringing out in the orchestra what was important, even if it occasionally tripped up the soloist. Tempos were always moderate so that possible pyrotechnics in the solo part could never destroy the delicate balance of forces.

Mr. Cliburn at times submerged his own brilliant pianistic voice to the work of the whole. Since this concerto is so sane and logical, excess being foreign to it on every level — excesses of tempo, accent, and soloistic bravura—one thing is needed to make it come off: when the soloist possesses the melodic line he must siphon from it the utmost in personal expression and passion. Otherwise the piece can drift into academic limbo and ennui.

The program opened with excerpts from the "Damnation of Faust" by Berlioz. The Boston Symphony has not forgotten how to play this master, but they play him differently now. It is perhaps safe to say that with Mr. Leinsdorf the logic of his music is now underlined while its coloristic aspects are somewhat downgraded. Tempos were remarkably easy and relaxed without sacrificing essential motion, thus permitting many nooks and crannies to be explored that were perhaps not noticed before.

* * *

A first performance was also offered: the Fifth Symphony by Ernst Toch. In one-movement symphonies the problem is to compress the drama into a brief time span.

The composer attempted this by writing a work resembling a long baroque canzone, with many short lyric sections alternating with fast dramatic ones. This in itself was effectively managed. Especially beautiful were the muted string interludes that hinted so strongly of late Mahler.

But somehow the piece missfired. Perhaps the problem was that nowhere was to be found a true climax. Each brilliant section rose to approximately the same emotional intensity, but none prevailed to crest out, achieve climax, and give direction to the whole.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 194,870
MAR 14 1964

At Symphony Hall

Van Cliburn Performs Brahms First Concerto

By MICHAEL STEINBERG

Van Cliburn, who played Brahms' First Piano Concerto with the Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday afternoon, is a formidable pianist and most considerable artist as well. His sound is varied, and through all its variations, beautiful. He is almost alone in possessing the strength with which to give out that grand E-major chord at the beginning of the first movement recapitulation, a heroically conceived moment that often makes less of an effect in performance than the score promises. And at the other end of the gamut, the Adagio's most reticent lines never lost the intense songfulness that characterizes all Cliburn's playing.

The songfulness is one of the beauties of his work. Everything is melody: even the hailstorm of octaves in the first movement development was of handsomely sculptured shape.

He is a careful player. Once only did he attack a chord from above shoulder height a la Rubinstein. But that's not Cliburn's way, and his wrong notes don't sound as good as Rubinstein's. Anything by way of personal flamboyance is quite foreign to Cliburn, anyhow. He is amazingly tall, famous almost beyond reason, and that seems to be enough.

The simplicity that is so admirable and prepossessing in Cliburn's personal deportment characterizes his playing also. He has played mostly music in styles that are traditionally subject to distortion, but he has always played simply. By choosing to play simply, and by having the integrity to stick with his choice, Cliburn has not made his artistic task easier. His work sometimes sounds a little impersonal, in part because he is above offering idiosynerasies as a cheap substitute for personality.

He takes no risks. The greatest players generally have, but some of the very greatest have projected their personalities within the context of the simplicity and integrity that are so beautiful in Cliburn's playing.

His reading of the Brahms D Minor is not yet all there. It holds a promise of greatness though already Cliburn's playing is some of the most admirable around.

The work presupposes a near-perfect integration of piano and orchestra. Much of Leinsdorf's work was very good, and his use of double woodwinds clarified many places that often don't work at all. Still, he seems fundamentally an unsympathetic concerto conductor. There were no violent differences of opinion, but where there is not unanimity, one wants a suggestion of conscious and intelligent variation. Instead there was simply a sense of things being not quite right: the performance just didn't fit.

Erich Toch's Fifth Symphony was given its first performance, is a confused piece of modern eclecticism. Nearly everything is in it, and it was hard to sense, even through the really very good performance, what relationship the composer intended to obtain between his rambling reminiscences.

Eclectic music can be beautiful and personal—Britten's, for instance—but Toch's Symphony, completed in 1963, is ordinary in sound and sentiment, and it could have been composed by any number of people. As, indeed, in a sense it was.

The concert opened with three excerpts from Berlioz' Damnation of Faust. They were played well, and the march in particular had an elating brilliance.

Next Friday, Ruth Posselt plays Hindemith's Violin Concerto, and Erich Leinsdorf will conduct an overture by Telemann and Also Sprach Zarathustra by Richard Strauss.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Record-American (m) (e
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 531,565
MAR 14 1964

Leinsdorf and Van Cliburn Make Magical and Massive Music at Symphony

Erich Leinsdorf and Van Cliburn made magical and massive music at the Boston Symphony's orchestral concert here yesterday afternoon. Between brainy, beauteous Berlioz and brawny, breathful Brahms was sandwiched the world premiere of Ernst Toch's one-movement fifth symphony.

"Call no conductor sensitive in the highest degree to musical impressions until you have heard him in Berlioz," George Bernard Shaw, then a working music critic, commented 75 years ago. Leinsdorf's Mozartistry is thoroughly musicianly, but his Berlioz remained an unknown quantity to these ears until yesterday.

A conductor need not be a Berlioz specialist to do symphonic justice to the much-played three excerpts from the French master's "Damnation of Faust." His scores are precisely indited and they go best as the composer marked them.

TOCH TICKED OFF

The "Minuet of the Will-o'-the-Wisps" evoked delicious woodwind playing; the "Ballet of the Sylphs" recalled one's childhood music-box, projecting perfect time when properly wound, while the concluding "Rakoczy March" was brilliant, then violent, though it did not make this annotator feel "towards the end that if it were to last another minute (he) must charge out and capture Trafalgar sq. single-handed." Probably GBS wouldn't have either; he'd have penned another preface.

Octogenarian Ernst Toch, Viennese composer of some originality and good taste, has produced sensitive and imaginative music for Hollywood film scores, "Peter Ibbetson," for example. Unfortunately, his talents became abused to the point where he became tagged almost exclusively for eerie background music for B-class mysteries.

A notable exception was his third symphony, commissioned by the American Jewish Tercentenary Committee of Chicago, Pulitzer Prize-winner for 1956.

His fifth symphony appears to stem from Toch's "Chinese Flute," an enchanting earlier work derived from the same celestial verses used for Mahler in "Das Lied von der Erde," which might account for the Mahlerian touches heard yesterday. Paprika-flavored Chinoiserie is blent into Scriabinesque "musicine" with skillful Hollywoodmanship.

GRAND CLIMAX

If Brahms' first great orchestral work, this fifteen opus in D-minor, indeed be a piano concerto, it still poses maximum difficulty for all pianists, nor is it at all easy to evaluate in performance. Primarily, it is a conductor's concerto, though the piano part demands virtuoso technique.

With Van Cliburn's initial entrance, listeners knew exactly the sort of performance they were to hear. His cool, clean piano tone is well-suited to Brahms' thick-textured, large-scaled concerto; he has the requisite technique and temperament for this youthfully ebullient score.

Notes were detached with exquisite clarity. The slow movement was built up to a big, authoritative climax and the finale vouchsafed clear, muscular, unhurried playing.

ROLFE BOSWELL

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Herald
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 283,819
MAR 22 1964

Robert Taylor's Notes

BOSTON SYMPHONY LAGS ON NEW MUSIC

Show Guide | MUSIC

By ROBERT TAYLOR

The new music at Symphony this year has not been of particular merit.

I liked the "Kaddish" of Leonard Bernstein, but this is a minority report, and the vast forces demanded by the score make the chances of live revivals scant; I also like Ned Rorem's "Eagles," but this is an unpretentiously pictorial work of modest aims.

On the whole, contemporary composition is not the distinctive mark of the Boston Symphony's season so far.

Ernst Toch's Fifth Symphony, which had its world premiere last week, contains some effective writing, although the pattern doesn't add up to much at first hearing. Earlier this season William Sydeman's Second Study for Orchestra had the unfortunate fate to be programmed the day of President's Kennedy's assassination, and I may have been conditioned by the traumas of that grim afternoon, even so, in another environment I think it would have struck me as excessively noisy and full of droning pedal point. Alan Hovhaness's Op. 128, a Prelude and Quadruple Fugue for Orchestra, is shapely and meticulous — and that comprises the picture.

UNDER THE circumstances, one might ask where the new composers are, bemoan the sterile social conditions of the present, and blame various factors that cause the wells of creativity to run dry. But perhaps the situation requires another approach than that implied by the word "blame." It may be that contemporary composition is less modern than we think.

Earlier this year the aforesaid Mr. Bernstein, in his ballwick as symphonic conductor, drew criticism for a series of avant-guard concerts, which featured among other things, a mechanical conductor who looked like a clockwork weathervane, and no doubt signified the process of the dehumanization of art which has been the direction of advanced aesthetic theory in every art in this century.

Subscription series may be the improper place for the experimental, since they correspond to our museums as repositories for the great works of the past.

LET US, however, contrast the present year in music with one 50 years ago, 1914. At the moment the comparison seems perhaps ludicrous. Nineteen-fourteen was the year of the historic premiere of Stravinsky's "Sacre du Printemps," at the Casino de Paris, with Pierre Monteux conducting. This alone would enshrine it in gold in the annals of music.

It was the year that Marinetti and Russolo gave a concert of "futurist" music, which caused a riot in the Milanese theater, the musicians onstage being divided into two groups: "those who continued to play, and those who went down in the pit to fracas with the audience."

Among the other events of 1914 listed by Slonimsky's valuable "Music Since 1900," were the introduction by Schoenberg, the composer conducting, of "Five Orchestral Pieces" to London ("Reminiscent of a Nightmare," Musical America); Vaughan Williams's "A London Symphony" ("If his thoughts are not pleasant on all hopeful individually, they build up to something which is beautiful in its entirety," London Times); the barless piano pieces of Satie; and the symphonic sketches in which Schoenberg embodies the first principles of 12-tone composition.

THIS WOULD seem overwhelming, but we possess the advantage of hindsight. Nineteen-fourteen also saw the premiere of Victor Herbert's opera "Madeleine," Elgar's patriotic "Carillon" and a Strauss premiere, his first ballet, Josephslegende.

Not all the works of 1914 were seminal. Many, however, still seem strangely contemporary in conception. I would suggest that the attitudes of audiences have changed more than the writing of music; they are less hostile to change. Yet this raises an interesting point. Might not the music we consider contemporary merely be a repetition of our listening habits?

We are tuned to 1914's experimentalism rather than to the future, psychologically. Is it possible for a composer to make a statement now, that stirs an audience to riot? Uproars aren't the best climate, yet the composer today seems unable to react against 1914 as 1914 reacted against 1864. Attitudes of respectful audience indifference may well be the rule until another revolution takes place in music.

120

PROVIDENCE 5.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Sunday Journal
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
Circ. 193,108

MAR 15 1964

TUESDAY

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY Orchestra makes its final visit of the season at 8:15 p.m. at Veterans Memorial Auditorium.

The program, which includes music of Irish inspiration is as follows:

Symphony No. 7, in A major, Op. 92 ..... Beethoven
I. Poco sostenuto; Vivace
II. Allegretto
III. Presto; Assai meno presto; Tempo primo
IV. Allegro con brio
Excerpts from "Die Walkure," Act III ..... Wagner
Excerpts from "Siegfried" .... Wagner

[illegible] at Rhode Island College, Daniel R.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Journal (m)
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
Circ. 61,299

MAR 20 1964

A Musical Treat

To hear good music is always a pleasure.

To hear good music played by a superb orchestra is a treat.

To hear good music played by a superb orchestra inspired is a thrill that comes but rarely in a lifetime.

Such a rare thrill was bestowed on a houseful of Rhode Islanders Tuesday evening in Veterans Memorial Auditorium when Erich Leinsdorf led the Boston Symphony in a program of Beethoven and Wagner that was truly inspired. As our critic, Ruth Tripp, put it, this was an evening "to cherish."

The Boston Symphony's performance should inspire Rhode Island music lovers to cherish even more dearly the orchestra's long association with this city.

It also should inspire us to cherish and to support with more enthusiasm our own orchestras and other musical organizations which share in a common dedication to bringing good music to Rhode Islanders.

Finally, such a performance should inspire all who experienced it to aspire to like excellence in whatever they do. Such occasions serve to remind us how men can rise above themselves when each strives to excel and all strive together in a worthy purpose.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Times (e)
PAWTUCKET-CENTRAL FALLS, R. I.
Circ. 38,168

MAR 18 1964

Music In Review

Leinsdorf's Genius Evident At Symphony Series Finale

The Boston Symphony Orchestra and its inspiring director, Erich Leinsdorf, concluded its Providence series of concerts in a flood of applause and cheers Tuesday in Veterans Memorial Auditorium. And, in gratitude for the acclaim, Leinsdorf and the orchestra played an encore, an unprecedented gesture in the memory of this critic.

The program, the final in an unforgettable season of concerts, corroborated the opinions of many since Leinsdorf became music director that these musicians give him more heart and soul than they ever gave a previous conductor. He has the divine gift of conveying to them — and through them to the audience — the beauty, perfection and majesty of every work. They give sublime expression and pure beauty of tone. Through them Leinsdorf reveals more than understanding of everything he conducts; he also discloses the meaning — and that is the essence of art.

The major work that opened the concert was Beethoven's "Symphony No. 7 in A Major," introduced with a sostenuto movement that was calm but bright and then changed to a vivace that was shoutingly happy in a spirited dancing rhythm.

The second movement, allegretto, had a measured, sober, accented pace, flowing, rising and falling, brightened with brass chords leading into the third movement that had the speed and steady gait and beat of smoothly galloping chase. Then, after a restful interlude filled with the call of the horn echoed by the strings, and the bird songs in the woodwinds played against soft brasses, it returned to the tempo primo. The finale, allegro con brio, was a gathering up of all the brilliance and the majestic masses of harmony, heaping chord upon chord in a towering mountain of musical grandeur.

Wagner filled the latter half of the program. The "riding" theme of the Beethoven presto movement was continued, only in the more ponderous rhythm of the battlefield horse in "The Ride of the Valkyries." This was followed by the eloquently described "Magic Fire Music," both from Wagner's "Die Walkure."

The concluding pieces were excerpts from "Siegfried" — "Waldweben — Prelude to Act III" and "Siegfried's Ascent and Brunnhilde's Awakening." This was when the audience vociferously declared a reluctance to let them go with standing applause and cheers until they played an encore. And the applause resumed in equal volume at the closing chord.

C.H.L.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Journal (m)
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
Circ. 61,299

MAR 18 1964

Music Last Night

Boston Symphony Gives Last Concert of Season

By RUTH TRIPP

Erich Leinsdorf conducted the fifth and last of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts last evening at Veterans Memorial Auditorium. The concert was indeed a gala occasion, marked by splendid orchestral sounds, great enthusiasm from the audience, cheers at the close of the concert and, of all things at a Boston Symphony program, an encore.

It scarcely seems possible that this program was the 375th played in Providence. It is, however, entirely possible that it was one of the best. The musicians were aware of every nuance in both the Beethoven Symphony No. 7 and the Wagnerian excerpts from "Die Walkure" and from "Siegfried." Erich Leinsdorf conducted with more than his usual enthusiasm and his every suggestion was followed.

At the end of the program, few people left the hall and after a second recall, the conductor announced the "Rakoczy" March by Berlioz. The tremendous climax brought the cheering and another prolonged ovation.

The Beethoven Seventh, with its tremendously interesting rhythmic structure, had perfect unity in all directions. The color contrasts were exquisitely drawn and throughout the playing, the magnificence of Beethoven's musical ideas was the predominant element. This was really an interpretation to cherish.

Wagner's music has not been played here for some time. We heard the exciting "Ride of the Valkyries" and the "Magic Fire Music". It was easy to lose oneself in thoughts of the operatic pageantry.

The "Siegfried" excerpts were "Waldweben—" Prelude to Act III—"Siegfried's Ascent to Brunhilde's Rock" and "Brunhilde's Awakening". It would be a cold heart indeed that was not reached by the ardor of the Wagnerian music. Leinsdorf has a special gift for bringing every bit of beauty from this complex writing. The marvel of it all is that he never uses a score.

He was generous in sharing the applause with his players and we had special acknowledgement for the entire reed and brass sections which could not have played more beautifully as well as many bows from the entire orchestra.

The orchestra will be on tour soon, playing in Washington, the regular pair of concerts at Constitution Hall at the end of this month and on the afternoon of March 31, members of the orchestra will play for the first time in the East Room of the White House, a special concert for the children of the Embassy delegations to the United States.

President and Mrs. Johnson and the Leinsdorfs are friends of long standing. During President Johnson's first term in Congress, in 1938, he made the arrangements for the extension of Mr. Leinsdorf's visa.

Tanglewood concerts come along soon and then another important and delightful friendship of the Boston Symphony and the music lovers of Providence. This friendship, too, is a long and lasting one. Last evening's ovation emphasized fall and winter series in this im this fact.

FRI-SAT 21, SUNDAY 6 121

[illegible]enty-first Program

FRIDAY AF[illegible]ON, MARCH 20, at 2:00 o'clock

[illegible]URDAY EVENING, MARCH 21, at 8:30 o'clock

TELEMANN .....Overture in C major

[illegible]Allegro — Grave; Sarabande: The sleeping Thetis —
[illegible]: The waking Thetis — Loure: The beloved Neptune —
[illegible]: Harlequinade — The playful Triton — The storming
[illegible]: Minuet: The agreeable Zephyr — Gigue: ebb and flow —
[illegible]: The merry messengers
(First performance at these concerts)

HINDEMITH .....Concerto for Violin and Orchestra

I. Moderato
II. Andante
III. Vivace

INTERMISSION

STRAUSS .....“Also sprach Zarathustra,” Tone Poem
(Freely after Friedrich Nietzsche)

SOLOIST
RUTH POSSELT

These concerts will end about 3:45 o'clock on Friday Afternoon; 10:15 o'clock on Saturday Evening.

BALDWIN PIANO RCA VICTOR RECORDS

EIGHTY-THIRD SEASON • NINETEEN HUNDRED SIXTY-THREE–SIXTY-FOUR

Sixth Program

[illegible]Y AFTERNOON, MARCH 22, at 3:00 o'clock

.....Overture to “Il Signor Bruschino”
(First performance in this series)

.....Symphony No. 7, in A major, Op. 92

[illegible]stenuto; Vivace
[illegible]ttio
[illegible]Assai meno presto; Tempo primo
[illegible]egro con brio

INTERMISSION

STR[illegible]

“Also sprach Zarathustra,” Tone Poem
(Freely after Friedrich Nietzsche)

A new plan for ticket reservations is announced on page 61.

BALDWIN PIANO RCA VICTOR RECORDS

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Sunday Standard-Times
NEW BEDFORD, Mass.
Circ. 52,312

MAR 29 1964

Leinsdorf and Boston Symphony Excel in Strauss

The Boston Symphony's concert in Symphony Hall last Sunday afternoon included three works—Rossini's overture to “Il Signor Bruschino,” Beethoven's “Symphony No. 7,” and Richard Strauss' “Also Sprach Zarathustra.” About the Rossini, nothing needs to be said, it is merely marshmallow-like music, fluffy and insubstantial.

Conductor Erich Leinsdorf's reading of the familiar Beethoven work needs little comment either; it is a good, workmanlike reading, a little skimpy perhaps with the requisite lightness but right in the vein in the boisterous finale.

The Strauss tone poem, however, deserves special praise. Mr. Leinsdorf's conception of this brilliantly orchestrated work — a conception marked by imagination and by genuine understanding—was magnificent, as was the playing of his musicians. “Also Sprach Zarathustra” used to be one of the staples in the conducting repertoire of the late Serge Koussevitsky. It is high praise to say that he undoubtedly would have been delighted by Mr. Leinsdorf's remarkable and beautifully integrated reading.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Standard-Times (e)
NEW BEDFORD, Mass.
Circ. 65,046

MAR 23 1964

6th Boston Symphony Concert Is Rated Highly

By EARL J. DIAS
Standard-Times Music Critic

Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony Orchestra performed the sixth program in the 1963-64 Sunday afternoon series yesterday in Symphony Hall. The program included Rossini's Overture to “Il Signor Bruschino,” Beethoven's “Symphony No. 7 in A Major,” and Richard Strauss' “Also Sprach Zarathustra.”

Rossini's opera buffa, “Il Signor Bruschino,” was never much of a success—an unhappy circumstance perhaps due to its trite, uninspired, and inane libretto. Written when he was only 21, the overture to the work, however. does display the cheerfulness and high spirits for which Rossini was famous. Although it is scarcely great music, it is a pleasing curtain raiser, and Mr. Leinsdorf and his musicians played it in a sprightly manner, complete with the second violin section rapping their bows on their music stands to mark the beat.

Beethoven's Symphony No. 7,” by contrast, is genuinely great music, with a joyous spirit and exhilirating rhythms that have inspired many musicologists to interpret the score in choreographic or Dionysiac terms. In fact, Wagner's definition of the work as “the apotheosis of the dance” is continuously quoted.

It is this dance-like quality of the score that Mr. Leinsdorf emphasizes in his reading—except in the opening Vivace, which was done somewhat heavy-handedly. Particularly effective, however, was the Allegretto, with its famous, almost-funereal-like theme; the skipping Presto (really a scherzo), which demands so much agility from the orchestra, and, best of all, the rough-and-ready, boisterous Finale, with its peasant-like earthiness and its rambunctious virility.

The highlight of the program, however, was Mr. Leinsdorf's brilliant, imaginative, and superlatively controlled reading of the Strauss tone poem, “Also Sprach Zarathustra.” This is a remarkable example of the musical genre which Strauss took over from Liszt, developed and perfected, and in it carried the art of orchestration several steps farther than Wagner.

Based on Friedrich Nietzsche's prose-poem, the work is program music that, for the most part, implies a particular philosophical outlook concerning the nature of man and his relationship to the universe and his fellow men. In it, Strauss reveals his great technical mastery of the orchestra—and when the orchestra is the Boston Symphony, the results can be thrilling, indeed.

The work has many moods — man emerging from primeval slime, his yearning toward high ideals, his final acceptance of the mystery of life. These varied moods are brilliantly conveyed in passages that throb with emotion (particularly in the lovely performance of the strings) and in sections that utilize all the resources of the orchestra—including tolling bells, a tinkling xylophone, the shrill cry of the trumpet, the mellow tones of the cellos and basses.

Mr. Leinsdorf's conception of the work is as clearcut and definitive as that of his predecessor, Koussevitsky — and we can give no higher praise than this, for the Strauss tone poem was one of the staples of Koussevitsky's repertoire.

Incidentally, the concert originally scheduled for March 22 but postponed because of a blizzard will be performed on Sunday April 5. Pianist Rudolf Serkin will be the soloist in Mozart's “Piano Concerto in D Minor, K. 466.”

FRI-SAT 21, SUNDAY 22 121

EIGHTY-THIRD SEASON • NINETEEN HUNDRED SIXTY-THREE–SIXTY-FOUR

Twenty-first Program

FRIDAY AFTERNOON, MARCH 20, at 2:00 o'clock

SATURDAY EVENING, MARCH 21, at 8:30 o'clock

TELEMANN ..... Overture in C major

Grave — Allegro — Grave; Sarabande: The sleeping Thetis —
Bourrée: The waking Thetis — Loure: The beloved Neptune — Gavotte: Harlequinade — The playful Triton — The storming
Aeolus — Minuet: The agreeable Zephyr — Gigue: ebb and flow —
Canarie: The merry messengers

(First performance at these concerts)

HINDEMITH ..... Concerto for Violin and Orchestra

I. Moderato
II. Andante
III. Vivace

INTERMISSION

STRAUSS ..... "Also sprach Zarathustra," Tone Poem (Freely after Friedrich Nietzsche)

SOLOIST
RUTH POSSELT

These concerts will end about 3:45 o'clock on Friday Afternoon; 10:15 o'clock on Saturday Evening.

BALDWIN PIANO — RCA VICTOR RECORDS

EIGHTY-THIRD SEASON • NINETEEN HUNDRED SIXTY-THREE–SIXTY-FOUR

Sixth Program

SUNDAY AFTERNOON, MARCH 22, at 3:00 o'clock

R[illegible] ..... Overture to "Il Signor Bruschino"

(First performance in this series)

B[illegible] ..... Symphony No. 7, in A major, Op. 92

I. Poco sostenuto; Vivace
II. Allegretto
III. Presto; Assai meno presto; Tempo primo
IV. Allegro con brio

INTERMISSION

STRAUSS ..... "Also sprach Zarathustra," Tone Poem (Freely after Friedrich Nietzsche)

A new plan for ticket reservations is announced on page 61.

BALDWIN PIANO — RCA VICTOR RECORDS

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Standard-Times
NEW BEDFORD, Mass.
Circ. 52,312
MAR 29 1964

Leinsdorf and Boston Symphony Excel in Strauss

The Boston Symphony concert in Symphony Hall last Sunday afternoon included three works—Rossini's overture to "Il Signor Bruschino," Beethoven's "Symphony No. 7" and Richard Strauss' "Also Sprach Zarathustra." About the Rossini, nothing needs to be said; it is merely marshmallow-like music, fluffy and insubstantial.

Conductor Erich Leinsdorf's reading of the familiar Beethoven work needs little comment either; it is a good, workmanlike reading, a little skimpy perhaps with the requisite lightness but right in the vein in the boisterous finale.

The Strauss tone poem, however, deserves special praise. Mr. Leinsdorf's conception of this brilliantly orchestrated work — a conception marked by imagination and by genuine understanding—was magnificent, as was the playing of his musicians. "Also Sprach Zarathustra" used to be one of the staples in the conducting repertoire of the late Serge Koussevitsky. It is high praise to say that he undoubtedly would have been delighted by Mr. Leinsdorf's remarkable and beautifully integrated reading.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Standard-Times (e)
NEW BEDFORD, Mass.
Circ. 65,046
MAR 23 1964

6th Boston Symphony Concert Is Rated Highly

By EARL J. DIAS
Standard-Times Music Critic

Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony Orchestra performed the sixth program in the 1963-64 Sunday afternoon series yesterday in Symphony Hall. The program included Rossini's Overture to "Il Signor Bruschino," Beethoven's "Symphony No. 7 in A Major," and Richard Strauss' "Also Sprach Zarathustra."

Rossini's opera buffa, "Il Signor Bruschino," was never much of a success—an unhappy circumstance perhaps due to its trite, uninspired, and inane libretto. Written when he was only 21, the overture to the work, however, does display the cheerfulness and high spirits for which Rossini was famous. Although it is scarcely great music, it is a pleasing curtain raiser, and Mr. Leinsdorf and his musicians played it in a sprightly manner, complete with the second violin section rapping their bows on their music stands to mark the beat.

Beethoven's Symphony No. 7," by contrast, is genuinely great music, with a joyous spirit and exhilirating rhythms that have inspired many musicologists to interpret the score in choreographic or Dionysiac terms. In fact, Wagner's definition of the work as "the apotheosis of the dance" is continuously quoted.

It is this dance-like quality of the score that Mr. Leinsdorf emphasizes in his reading—except in the opening Vivace, which was done somewhat heavy-handedly. Particularly effective, however, was the Allegretto, with its famous, almost-funereal-like theme; the skipping Presto (really a scherzo), which demands so much agility from the orchestra, and, best of all, the rough-and-ready, boisterous Finale, with its peasant-like earthiness and its rambunctious virility.

The highlight of the program, however, was Mr. Leinsdorf's brilliant, imaginative, and superlatively controlled reading of the Strauss tone poem, "Also Sprach Zarathustra." This is a remarkable example of the musical genre which Strauss took over from Liszt, developed and perfected, and in it carried the art of orchestration several steps farther than Wagner.

Based on Friedrich Nietzsche's prose-poem, the work is program music that, for the most part, implies a particular philosophical outlook concerning the nature of man and his relationship to the universe and his fellow men. In it, Strauss reveals his great technical mastery of the orchestra—and when the orchestra is the Boston Symphony, the results can be thrilling, indeed.

The work has many moods — man emerging from primeval slime, his yearning toward high ideals, his final acceptance of the mystery of life. These varied moods are brilliantly conveyed in passages that throb with emotion (particularly in the lovely performance of the strings) and in sections that utilize all the resources of the orchestra—including tolling bells, a tinkling xylophone, the shrill cry of the trumpet, the mellow tones of the cellos and basses.

Mr. Leinsdorf's conception of the work is as clearcut and definitive as that of his predecessor, Koussevitsky — and we can give no higher praise than this, for the Strauss tone poem was one of the staples of Koussevitsky's repertoire.

Incidentally, the concert originally scheduled for March 22 but postponed because of a blizzard will be performed on Sunday April 5. Pianist Rudolf Serkin will be the soloist in Mozart's "Piano Concerto in D Minor, K. 466."

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Herald
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 283,819
MAR 15 1964

Symphony This Week

Hindemith, Strauss Telemann Music

Erich Leinsdorf will conduct a program of Telemann, Hindemith and Strauss at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concerts next Friday and Saturday. He has also invited Ruth Posselt, violinist, to be the guest artist on the program.

The concert will open with George Philip Telmann's Overture in C major. Miss Posselt will then join the orchestra and Mr. Leinsdorf as soloist in the violin Concerto by the late Paul Hindemith. To conclude the program Mr. Leinsdorf will conduct the tone poem "Also sprach Zarathustra" by Richard Strauss whose 100th anniversary is being observed this year.

Miss Posselt, a concert artist of wide renown, a member of the faculty of New England Conservatory and also of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, will make her seventeenth appeaarnce in Boston with the orchestra on this occasion.

On Thursday evening the orchestra will hold its seventh open rehearsal of the season, in final preparation for the Friday-Saturday concerts.

NEXT CONCERT of the current Sunday afternoon series will take place next Sunday. Mr. Leinsdorf will conduct the following program: Rossini's Overture to "Il Signor Bruschino"; the Symphony No. 7 of Beethoven; and excerpts from Wagner's "Die Walkure" and "Siegfried."

This coming Tuesday the orchestra will present its fifth and final concert of the season at the Veterans Memorial Auditorium in Providence. Mr. Leinsdorf will conduct the program.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Christian Science Monitor (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 174,850
MAR 21 1964

Thus spake Posselt

By Robert W. Dumm

Erich Leinsdorf began Friday afternoon's Symphony concert with a local "first," the Overture in C major by Georg-Philipp Telemann. Like so much music by Bach's popular senior at Leipzig, it apes the French style, not only in its procession of bourrée, and gavotte, but in the playful titles ascribed to each. These were all marine in this case, though the gavotte on the "Playful Triton" is surely the tamest Triton afloat.

Names or no names, the players measured their impeccable paces as one man, the reduced instrumentation lending them the sharpness of a chamber ensemble. Even the two flutes and cembalo clearly held their own through the deft choreography of the writing.

♪ ♪ ♪

Then Ruth Posselt came on stage for Hindemith's Violin Concerto, and — as those who knew her playing might expect — turned out some superior musicmaking. From her first forthright downbeat, she gave us not one unmotivated note. Her manner has a trend of impetuosity (almost wildness) and control that is most compelling, which not only holds its own against a turbulent orchestra, but steers it like a conscience.

She can do two things many violinists cannot do: spike her rhythms with genuine accents (even on top of a forte), and intone the most stratospheric lines without pinchedness or whiteness. Moreover, she keeps her virtuosity working for her imagination, making ink for the alto register, and blue flame for those eerie high roulades.

♪ ♪ ♪

Even such assets might not add up to the lyric persuasivness of her Andante—that was pure heart in a very sound mind. This sort of sound gets around like lightning, and the orchestra outdid itself in pert response to Leinsdorf's signals.

The concert ended with Richard Strauss's tone poem "Also Sprach Zarathustra," philosophy limned in a score (and Nietzsche's at that), which might promise a fairly murky business. Fortunately Strauss always had the good sense to let his reflections play on sonorities and the byways of color.

♪ ♪ ♪

This is Leinsdorf's own book, too, and perhaps nowhere does his seismographic command of balances shine more than when all the stops are pulled out. Surprisingly, what we get is not so much tone-mass, but caverns of tone, resounding like echo chambers to the heart of a fortissimo, or to the vanishing taper of a line.

Thus the full symphony could taper to Joseph Silverstein's lone violin in the Tanzlied section, on the verge of a tiny upbeat, and then back again into the plunge, with no imbalance other than the giddiness the composer intended. In fact, when tempo, intonation, timing, and dynamic strata are so well pre-sorted and rehearsed, the conductor simply needn't shout what can be perfectly well heard.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 465,653
MAR 15 1964

Ruth Posselt Soloist With Boston Symphony

Hindemith's Violin Concerto will be played by Ruth Posselt at the Friday-Saturday concerts of the Boston Symphony. Erich Leinsdorf will conduct.

The concert will open with Georg Philip Telemann's Overture in C major. The program will conclude with the tone poem "Also sprach Zarathustra" by Richard Strauss, whose 100th anniversary is being observed this year.

Miss Posselt, a concert artist of wide reknown, a member of the faculty of New England Conservatory and also of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, will make her 17th appearance in Boston with the orchestra on this occasion.

On Thursday evening, at 7:30 the orchestra will hold its seventh open rehearsal of the season, in final preparation for the Friday-Saturday concerts.

The next concert of the current Sunday Afternoon Series will take place on Mar. 22 at 3 p.m. Leinsdorf will conduct the following program: Rossini's Overture to "Il Signor Bruschino"; the Symphony No. 7 of Beethoven; and Excerpts from Wagner's "Die Walkure" and "Siegfried."

This coming Tuesday evening the Boston Symphony Orchestra will present its fifth and final concert of the season at the Veterans Memorial Auditorium in Providence. Leinsdorf will conduct the program.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 194,870
MAR 21 1964

At Symphony

Ruth Posselt Plays Brilliantly

By MICHAEL STEINBERG

Ruth Posselt is a dynamic performer, full of temperament and emanating vitality. The intelligence and quick-wittedness of her playing, its rhythmic snap, the tensile strength of the sustained passages, made her an ideal interpreter of Paul Hindemith's Violin Concerto. The orchestra part was smartly done by the Boston Symphony players, though in a few places imperfectly coordinated with the solo.

It was interesting, and in part a pleasure, to hear the work itself again. The violin writing is expert and grateful, but routine. It's interesting that Stravinsky and Bartok, neither one a string player, wrote much more interestingly for violin, and doubtlessly because their imaginations were liberated from the players' thought and finger patterns.

The Andante is beautiful Hindemith, and the Finale is full of diverting touches. The first movement contains just about nothing that couldn't have been produced by one of Hindemith's more gifted pupils, of whom so many became so expert at imitating the master's harmonic, rhythmic, and textural mannerisms. But there is no magic to the piece. One could imagine writing something like it given all of Hindemith's immense competence, but not even the gift of Stravinsky's competence could possibly lead one even to the first chord of his concerto.

Magic is something that Strauss' "Also Sprach Zarathustra" does have. It is in many ways a preposterous piece, mainly because it is not up to what, for short, we may call its subject, Friedrich Nietzche's ecstatic prose poem. Not even in the finale of "Elektra" did Strauss' waltz obsession impose itself more unsuitably than in the Dance Song of the Nietzschean Superman. It is certainly the most overwritten dance ever; its orchestration makes Kostelanetz seem as chaste as Webern.

Still, the whole work is shot through with an inventiveness, which, however uncritical, is tremendously exuberant. "Zarathustra" contains some of Strauss' most interesting music. The fugue, again however foolish it seems as a representation of "Science" is a glorious orgy of self-indulgence in sound, and in a manner that looks forward a half century to "Metamorphosen."

The C major-B major conflict is a superb central invention for the whole tone poem, and it is worked out with impressive consistency. Leinsdorf conducted it skillfully and it was thoroughly entertaining to listen to. I think, though, that Strauss meant it to be more than entertaining, and its failure to be more than entertaining is perhaps the essential failure of the work in spite of its many moments of genius.

At the beginning of the concert, Leinsdorf did not perform Telemann's C major Overture as much as he embalmed it. The piece is charming — Telemann was a good composer, better probably than Vivaldi whose stock stands higher just now — but at Friday's concert it just lay down and died.

Leinsdorf conducted from the harpsichord, but that was really just a lot of musicological swank. The instrument was not clearly audible most of the time, and for that matter it was not even played enough. Either the piece should be prepared to the point where it can really be led from the keyboard, or if a great deal of conducting seems necessary, someone else should play. Such a trivial bow to authenticity seemed a mockery anyhow, because the rhythms played (in the slow section of the Overture, for instance) were not those the composer intended to convey with his notation, and perhaps two thirds of the ornaments were missing altogether.

There is no good reason for that sort of thing: information is no farther away than the phone on Leinsdorf's desk, and correctness just might be a first step toward vitality. Unlike Charles Munch's Handel some weeks ago, this was not even charming in the wrong way.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Herald (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 178,553

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Record-American (m) (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 531,565
MAR 21 1964

123

SYMPHONY

Violinist Posselt Superb In Hindemith Concerto

By ROBERT TAYLOR

Hindemith's Violin Concerto, to which Ruth Posselt brought an exquisite musical sensibility at yesterday's performance in the Boston Symphony's weekend pair of concerts, is a work of grave and noble utterance.

Miss Posselt's association with this music is close. Her husband, Richard Burgin, the long-time concertmaster of the BSO, introduced the work to America, and later the same year, 1940, she reiterated the concerto. According to Even's "Complete Book of the 20th Century Music," Ruth Posselt was the American premiere soloist on March 14, 1940, but this appear erroneous. A check of The Herald files reveals that Alexander Williams reviewed the Hindemith premiere as Mr. Burk's notes have it, in April, 1940, when the soloist was Mr. Burgin. This is further verified by Johnson's "Symphony Hall, Boston." Mr. Williams, incidentally, showed prescience by prophesying that "it will be considered one of the important concertos for violin in modern times."

Inclined to Agree

"I would concur with that estimate, though it would seem to me that the sustained melodic ideas are so long in span that they differentiate the concerto from the canon forms in Hindemith's other work, to which it was then related. Miss Posselt gave it a singing, expressive flow, an interpretation that depended not on double-stoppings and legato bowings in which the music abounds, but on an eloquent revelation of her emotional insight into a fine-grained composition.

The concerto provides a lot for the soloist to do, including an intricate cadenza appropriately rounding off the design. At the same time it is not a flashy piece, and its ruminative beauty has an essential dignity stated most forcefully in the middle movement where the quarter-notes must not exceed 40, and the fingering lies in the formidable higher positions. Miss Posselt provided a brave momentum, nor did she neglect the graceful, introverted lyricism of an exceedingly tuneful idiom. The playing of the woodwinds proved impressive in the contrapuntal accompaniment which is more recognizably Hindemithian, the master being indebted to the most distinguished sources —to wit, himself, in "Mathis der Maler."

The program proceeded, in terms of sonority, from light to heavy, rather in the manner of a wine-tasting. The Telemann struck me as arid, tedious academicism, no doubt valuable from a strictly educational standpoint, the kind of thing that student orchestras can do as effectively as The Boston Symphony.

As he did earlier this season, Mr. Leinsdorf conducted from the harpsichord. The overture —the word is virtually synonymous with the baroque suite — displays the pompous dotted rhythms of the French style, followed by a corresponding Lully-influenced fast movement, but the mechanical conventions of the patterns grow wearisome to the modern ear. Except for the gigue called "Ebb and Flow," which involves some interesting pictorial writing, the suite brings home the impression of Telemann implied in the quote, as "the prototype of the German composer making a business of his profession."

Brilliant Conception

The continuo, the string playing and the winds could not redeem the dutiful pedantries of these pages. That was left to Mr. Leinsdorf in a brilliant performance of "Thus Spake Zarathusthra." The truly original contribution of the conductor in this tone poem lies in his realization of the dance element. Others have done the majestic introductory sections with as sure a sense of drama; others have brought out the opulent textural detail with as much vibrance. Mr. Leinsdorf is not wanting in these respects, yet it is the Chorus continuing the Strauss centrifting rhythmic Viennese waltz dimension that affords his interpretation a sweeping freedom. It is foolish to pretend that the tone poem is a cognitive philosphy; it is bardic and fiery rhetoric, and Mr. Leinsdorf's supple pacing of the outline hails the advent of the superman as an evolution that springs from the most human of primeval instincts, the pulse of the dance.

On Holy Week next, the concerts will fall on Thursday and Saturday, with the Harvard and Radcliffe tenary in the "Tageszeiten" song cycle, Op. 76. Mr. Leisdorf has also listed Haydn's Te Deum in C, No. 2; Copland's Symphony for Organ and Orchestra, Berj Zamkochian soloist; and Wagner's Bacchanale from "Tannhauser" and Entrance of Guests into the Wartburg.

The Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf conducting, presented the 21st program of the 83rd season yesterday in Symphony Hall. Ruth Posselt, violin, was the soloist. The program will be repeated tonight at 8:30.

Overture in C — Telemann
Concerto for Violin and Orchestra — Hindemith
"Also Sprach Zarathustra" — Strauss

Ruth Posselt Soloist In Hindemith Concerto

Until a score of years ago, Georg Philipp Telemann was only a footnote in briefer musical histories. An overture of this prolix, superficial erstwhile revival of Sebastian Bach began yesterday's orchestral concert in Symphony Hall. Erich Leinsdorf, in go-for- baroque mood, conducted his attenuated Bostonian woodwinds and strings from an unobtrusive harpsichord.

To these ears this first performance at these concerts could well have been remanded to Jordan Hall's conservatorians upstreet, though the delightful fluting, expertly supported by silvery strings, calls for superlatives of praise. When Telemann composed in French or Italianate styles, his imitative flattery is merely endurable, whereas Bach's durability comes from his genius touch.

When Ruth Posselt began playing the late, great Paul Hindemith's violin concerto, one recalled Sherlock Holmes' remark anent another violin virtuosa, Mme. Norman-Neruda (Lady Halle): "Her bowing and her attack are splendid." Furthermore, her forthright style is well-suited to the recently deceased Yale professor's pungent, lithe lyricism.

A talented violinist and violist himself, Hindemith salvaged contemporary composition from its vapid contempt for virtuosity. He did this lifebuoy tossing with his "Schwanendreher," a quasiconcerto for viola, originally programmed for yesterday's concert, and the violin concerto which was substituted.

This amateur fiddler could not help but requote Bernard Shaw's Mauve Decade dictum, "I am always inclined to believe in a violinist who can play Wieniawski; Beethoven and Mendelssohn were great composers of music for the violin, but Wieniawski was a great composer of violin music. There is a world of difference between the two."

So, also, is there a world of difference between the violin concerti of Sibelius, Elgar, Walton and Hindemith, all skillful violinists, and those of Bartok, Berg, Stravinsky and Prokovieff, pianists all. He that hath an ear, let him hear.

ROLFE BOSWELL

124

CAMBRIDGE 5. THURS- SAT 22.

EIGHTY-THIRD SEASON • NINETEEN HUNDRED SIXTY-THREE–SIXTY-FOUR

Fifth Program

TUESDAY EVENING, MARCH 24, at 8:30 o'clock

ROSSINI ..... Overture to "Il Signor Bruschino"
(First performance in this series)

BEETHOVEN ..... Symphony No. 7, in A major, Op. 92
I. Poco sostenuto; Vivace
II. Allegretto
III. Presto; Assai meno presto; Tempo primo
IV. Allegro con brio

INTERMISSION

PROKOFIEV ..... Piano Concerto No. 5, in G major, Op. 55
I. Allegro con brio; Tempo meno mosso
II. Moderato ben accentuato
III. Toccata: allegro con fuoco
IV. Larghetto
V. Vivo; poco meno mosso; coda

WAGNER ..... Excerpts from "Siegfried"
Waldweben — Prelude to Act III — Siegfried's Ascent to Brünnhilde's Rock — Brünnhilde's Awakening

SOLOIST
LORIN HOLLANDER
Mr. HOLLANDER plays the Baldwin Piano

A new plan for ticket reservations is announced on page 59.

BALDWIN PIANO RCA VICTOR RECORDS

EIGHTY-THIRD SEASON • NINETEEN HUNDRED SIXTY-THREE–SIXTY-FOUR

Twenty-second Program

THURSDAY AFTERNOON, MARCH 26, at 2:00 o'clock

SATURDAY EVENING, MARCH 28, at 8:30 o'clock

HAYDN .. Te Deum in C major, No. 2, for Chorus, Orchestra and Organ
(First performance at these concerts)

COPLAND ..... Symphony for Organ and Orchestra
I. Prelude: Andante
II. Scherzo: Molto allegro
III. Finale: Lento; Allegro moderato
Organ: BERJ ZAMKOCHIAN

INTERMISSION

STRAUSS ..... "Die Tageszeiten," Song Cycle for Men's Chorus and Orchestra, Op. 76
Morning
Midday Calm
Evening
Night
(First performance in Boston)

WAGNER ..... Bacchanale from "Tannhäuser" (Act I)

WAGNER .. Entrance of the Guests into the Wartburg, from "Tannhäuser" (Act II)

HARVARD GLEE CLUB and RADCLIFFE CHORAL SOCIETY
ELLIOT FORBES, Conductor

These concerts will end about 3:50 o'clock on Thursday Afternoon; 10:20 o'clock on Saturday Evening.

BALDWIN PIANO RCA VICTOR RECORDS

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Herald
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 283,819
MAR 22 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 465,653
MAR 22 1964

Symphony Programs

Erich Leinsdorf has invited the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society, Elliot Forbes, director, to join the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its concerts ~~last~~ weekend. Because of Good Friday, the Friday afternoon concert will take place Thursday afternoon; the Saturday evening concert will take place at its regular time.

The Harvard-Radcliffe chorus will join the orchestra for the opening work of the program, Haydn's Te Deum in C major, No. 2, for chorus, orchestra and organ, which will be a first performance at these concerts. Later the Harvard Glee Club will be heard in Richard Strauss' "Die Tageszeiten," a song cycle for men's chorus and orchestra, Op. 76, which will have its first performance in Boston. Mr. Leinsdorf will present this work as part of his plan to include a Strauss composition on each of the last four Friday-Saturday programs of this season, in commemoration of the 100th anniversary of the composer's birth, which is being celebrated this year.

The weekend program will also include Aaron Copland's Symphony for Organ and Orchestra, with Berj Zamkochian at the organ, and excerpts from "Tannhauser" by Wagner.

This afternoon the orchestra will give the sixth program of the Sunday afternoon series. Mr. Leinsdorf has announced one program change in the listing published last weekend: he will close the program with "Also sprach Zarathustra" of Richard Strauss instead of the excerpts from Wagner's "Walkure" and "Siegfried."

The Wagner excerpts will appear on the program of Sunday, April 5, which has been scheduled to make up the postponed concert of Feb. 16. Today's program will also include Rossini's overture to "Il Signor Bruschino" and the Symphony No. 7 of Beethoven.

Lorin Hollander will return for Tuesday evening's "Cambridge" concert as guest soloist in the Prokofiev Piano Concerto No. 5, the same work he performed at other concerts in January. Mr. Leinsdorf will open the program with Rossini's Overture to "Il Signor Bruschino" and continue with the Beethoven Symphony No. 7. The Prokofiev concerto will follow after intermission and Mr. Leinsdorf will close the program with excerpts from Wagner's "Siegfried."

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Record-American (m) (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 531,565
MAR 28 1964

THE FASTIDIOUS FUHRER of the Boston Symphony Orchestra isn't above poking a little fun at himself. For the Easter weekend, Erich Leinsdorf loaded himself down with a program consisting of Haydn's "Te Deum," Copland's "Symphony for Organ and Orchestra," Strauss's "Die Tageszeiten," a song cycle for men's chorus and orchestra, and excerpts from Wagner's "Tannhauser." It meant he had to direct the Harvard-Radcliffe Choral Society, the Harvard Glee Club and organist Berj Zamkochian, along with his own collection of fiddlers, tootlers and bongo bangers.

Everything went so wrong at rehearsals that Leinsdorf went home discouraged. "Still, I have nobody to blame but myself," he said. "I chose the program. I'm like the man who took along peanut butter sandwiches for lunch every day and said he hated them. And when his friend asked him why he didn't have his wife make up something else, he said, 'Wife? What wife? I'm not married. I make these sandwiches myself'."

124

CAMBRIDGE 5. THURS- SAT 22.

EIGHTY-THIRD SEASON • NINETEEN HUNDRED SIXTY-THREE–SIXTY-FOUR

Fifth Program

TUESDAY EVENING, MARCH 24, at 8:30 o'clock

ROSSINI ..... Overture to "Il Signor Bruschino"
(First performance in this series)

BEETHOVEN ..... Symphony No. 7, in A major, Op. 92
I. Poco sostenuto; Vivace
II. Allegretto
III. Presto; Assai meno presto; Tempo primo
IV. Allegro con brio

INTERMISSION

PROKOFIEV ..... Piano Concerto No. 5, in G major, Op. 55
I. Allegro con brio; Tempo meno mosso
II. Moderato ben accentuato
III. Toccata: allegro con fuoco
IV. Larghetto
V. Vivo; poco meno mosso; coda

WAGNER ..... Excerpts from "Siegfried"
Waldweben — Prelude to Act III — Siegfried's Ascent to Brünnhilde's Rock — Brünnhilde's Awakening

SOLOIST
LORIN HOLLANDER
Mr. HOLLANDER plays the Baldwin Piano

A new plan for ticket reservations is announced on page 59.

BALDWIN PIANO RCA VICTOR RECORDS

EIGHTY-THIRD SEASON • NINETEEN HUNDRED SIXTY-THREE–SIXTY-FOUR

Twenty-second Program

THURSDAY AFTERNOON, MARCH 26, at 2:00 o'clock

SATURDAY EVENING, MARCH 28, at 8:30 o'clock

HAYDN .. Te Deum in C major, No. 2, for Chorus, Orchestra and Organ
(First performance at these concerts)

COPLAND ..... Symphony for Organ and Orchestra
I. Prelude: Andante
II. Scherzo: Molto allegro
III. Finale: Lento; Allegro moderato
Organ: BERJ ZAMKOCHIAN

INTERMISSION

STRAUSS ..... "Die Tageszeiten," Song Cycle for Men's Chorus and Orchestra, Op. 76
Morning
Midday Calm
Evening
Night
(First performance in Boston)

WAGNER ..... Bacchanale from "Tannhäuser" (Act I)

WAGNER ..... Entrance of the Guests into the Wartburg, from "Tannhäuser" (Act II)

HARVARD GLEE CLUB and RADCLIFFE CHORAL SOCIETY
ELLIOT FORBES, Conductor

These concerts will end about 3:50 o'clock on Thursday Afternoon; 10:20 o'clock on Saturday Evening.

BALDWIN PIANO RCA VICTOR RECORDS

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Herald
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 283,819
MAR 22 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 465,653
MAR 22 1964

Symphony Programs

Erich Leinsdorf has invited the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society, Elliot Forbes, director, to join the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its concerts this weekend. Because of Good Friday, the Friday afternoon concert will take place Thursday afternoon; the Saturday evening concert will take place at its regular time.

The Harvard-Radcliffe chorus will join the orchestra for the opening work of the program, Haydn's Te Deum in C major, No. 2, for chorus, orchestra and organ, which will be a first performance at these concerts. Later the Harvard Glee Club will be heard in Richard Strauss' "Die Tageszeiten," a song cycle for men's chorus and orchestra, Op. 76, which will have its first performance in Boston. Mr. Leinsdorf will present this work as part of his plan to include a Strauss composition on each of the last four Friday-Saturday programs of this season, in commemoration of the 100th anniversary of the composer's birth, which is being celebrated this year.

The weekend program will also include Aaron Copland's Symphony for Organ and Orchestra, with Berj Zamkochian, at the organ, and excerpts from "Tannhauser" by Wagner.

This afternoon the orchestra will give the sixth program of the Sunday afternoon series. Mr. Leinsdorf has announced one program change in the listing published last weekend: he will close the program with "Also sprach Zarathustra" of Richard Strauss instead of the excerpts from Wagner's "Walkure" and "Siegfried."

The Wagner excerpts will appear on the program of Sunday, April 5, which has been scheduled to make up the postponed concert of Feb. 16. Today's program will also include Rossini's overture to "Il Signor Bruschino" and the Symphony No. 7 of Beethoven.

Lorin Hollander will return for Tuesday evening's "Cambridge" concert as guest soloist in the Prokofiev Piano Concerto No. 5, the same work he performed at other concerts in January. Mr. Leinsdorf will open the program with Rossini's Overture to "Il Signor Bruschino" and continue with the Beethoven Symphony No. 7. The Prokofiev concerto will follow after intermission and Mr. Leinsdorf will close the program with excerpts from Wagner's "Siegfried."

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Record-American (m) (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 531,565
MAR 28 1964

THE FASTIDIOUS FUHRER of the Boston Symphony Orchestra isn't above poking a little fun at himself. For the Easter weekend, Erich Leinsdorf loaded himself down with a program consisting of Haydn's "Te Deum," Copland's "Symphony for Organ and Orchestra," Strauss's "Die Tageszeiten," a song cycle for men's chorus and orchestra, and excerpts from Wagner's "Tannhauser." It meant he had to direct the Harvard-Radcliffe Choral Society, the Harvard Glee Club and organist Berj Zamkochian, along with his own collection of fiddlers, tootlers and bongo bangers.

Everything went so wrong at rehearsals that Leinsdorf went home discouraged. "Still, I have nobody to blame but myself," he said. "I chose the program. I'm like the man who took along peanut butter sandwiches for lunch every day and said he hated them. And when his friend asked him why he didn't have his wife make up something else, he said, 'Wife? What wife? I'm not married. I make these sandwiches myself'."

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Herald (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 178,553
MAR 27

SYMPHONY

Harvard, Radcliffe Singers Create Congenial Alliance

By ROBERT TAYLOR

The congenial alliance of the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society with the Boston Symphony Orchestra has resulted in many fine concerts. Yesterday's, held by Lenten custom on Thursday, formed another felicitous rubric in the history of a happy partnership.

The program's design in general permitted the Harvard and Radcliffe singers to display the high standard of musicality and technique they have attained as an undergraduate chorus under the sympathetic direction of Elliot Forbes.

Fervent Sound

The kind of experience that one gets from this chorus is different from that of a semi-professional organization such as The Chorus Pro Musica or a New England Conservatory Chorus — the distribution wisely follows the block formation of parts rather than blending of some mixed choruses. Although the latter may be more subtle, the fervent sound of Harvard-Radcliffe (which is also admirable in terms of dynamics, flexibility and intonation) is virtually a vocalization of the intellect.

They sang very well indeed yesterday, in short. The Haydn Te Deum had a clear open texture, tehe Strauss cycle for male chorus held the freshness of a virile tone with a minimum of vibrato, and the Wagner selections would have been wanting without the exultant hues of the voices. The broad design of this concert belonged to Harvard-Radcliffe, though proceeding from top to bottom, each of its details may be described in its effect, in the manner of a Mencken Prejudice. Viz:

That Haydn's late-period Te Deum, presented for the first time at these concerts, demonstrates once again the lovely proposition that the master hardly ever penned a dull page.

Towering Merit

That Copland's Organ Symphony is not only one of the choicest works in his oeuvre, but among the few scores of towering merit from any American since the time of William Billings.

That Richard Strauss could have spared himself the trouble of putting notes on paper for "Die Tageszeiten" by simply assembling the parts for "Rosenkavalier," "Ariadne" et al, standing on the top of a staircase and throwing the pages, and collecting those that struck the tread third from the bottom into his new piece.

That the Wagner excerpts are highly inappropriate to the season and yet, given a sumptuous performance by Mr. Leinsdorf, who conducts Wagner so that the composer emerges on the heroic scale, charged by Olympian vitality and splendor, this objection fades.

The Tageszeiten cycle, heard for the first time in Boston, constitutes Strauss's setting of four execrable German verses by Joseph von Eichendorff, a master of banality of it there ever was one, and declares a fundamental truth about the composer's artistic character: he needed a librettist to fire his imagination. There are some gorgeous stretches in the cycle, attributable to the orchestration and, in large part, to Strauss's earlier collaborations with von Hoffmansthal.

Facile Response

The tonal imagination soared from a literary point of departure with Strauss, and here the eclectic sentimentality of the poems establishes an equally facile response. The treatment of the last, "Die Nacht" is noteworthy, however, for its melodic refinement; the cycle as a whole is spasmodically-knit.

Haydn's Te Deum is a stirring and ambitious score in large dimensions, his second in this form, dating from 1799 or thereabouts, and probably in honor of Lord Nelson. The composer's preoccupation with symphonic principles within traditional limits, his desire for a loud, joyful idiom, is more than evident in the writing, and the orchestral and vocal element achieved this. Similarly, the off-stage voices of the Venusberg, the stately blaze of the entrance into the Wartburg, supplied exciting good mood and movement.

I have saved the best for last. Aaron Copland later reworked his Organ Symphony into the First Symphony, without organ, but as Berj Zamkochian, the soloist, integrated the solo instrument into the pattern, this youthful composition took on a bold, vaulting rhetoric.

The tone contrasts, the tensions, weights and rhythms o this music gradually free themselves from the influence of Stravinsky to stand forth in the context of another personality.

Composer Present

The understanding of organ resources is thorough; but even more compelling is the shock of recognition as a clear and undeniably original voice sounds for the first time. The composer was in the audience, and took a bow, his lean, angular presence still the embodiment of an American master of lucid control.

After touring next week, the orchestra returns April 10-11 with Erick Friedman as soloist in Prokofiev's Violin Concerto, No. 1, Op. 19. Mr. Leinsdorf has also scheduled Schuller's Seven Studies on Themes of Paul Klee, Beethoven's Symphony No. 1, in C, Op. 21, and a waltz sequence from "Rosenkavalier".

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 194,870
MAR 27 1964

At Symphony

Leinsdorf Conducts Interesting Program

By MICHAEL STEINBERG

The relatively few persons who were unable to adjust their Symphony schedule from Friday to Thursday this week missed an exceptionally interesting program, and one, furthermore, most ably executed. Erich Leinsdorf led the Boston Symphony in Haydn's Te Deum of 1800, Aaron Copland's Symphony for Organ and Orchestra, the Richard Strauss cantata "Die Tageszeiten," and the Bacchanale and March from Wagner's "Tannhaeuser."

Haydn's Te Deum is brief, and a marvel from beginning to end. Its effect is sonority and rhetoric is so grand one can scarcely realize how economical it all is. Leinsdorf's explorations of Haydn's sacred music have previously led him to the "Missa in tempore belli," now to this Te Deum. Let us hope they will continue: that is glorious territory.

The Te Deum was sung by the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society, Elliot Forbes, conductor. Except for some excessively explosive alveolars, the singing cannot in any way be faulted.

Copland wrote his Symphony when he was 23, which was in 1924, and it is a fascinating product of a turbulent moment in musical history. Copland's interest in French music and his engagement with Stravinsky's Rite of Spring are much in evidence, but for all that, the music is full of original ideas, vigorously expressed, and lots of it is unmistakably Copland. Even the tub-thumping end is prophetic of certain areas of Copland's later manner. It's really effectively done, and it awakened the audience into quite warm applause.

Berj Zamkochian played the important, though not really concertante, organ part. The performance went well, especially in the outer movements, though my guess would be that Copland had intended for the Andante Prelude something slightly more flowing than the tempo that was set. I must report, however, that he looked happy when taking his bows.

All the books have said for so long that nothing Strauss wrote after "Der Rosenkavalier" was any good that now we must all do penance by exploring thoroughly the works of the last three and a half decades of his life. This has focussed public awareness on remarkable things, "Die Frau ohne Schatten," for example, whose interludes will be played on the season's last Symphony concerts, but "Die Tageszeiten" is not much of a find.

It is a cantata, composed in 1928, upon four poems by Eichendorff, each dealing with a different time of day, and scored for male chorus and orchestra. Perhaps it was mistaken, and certainly it was odd, to include in the program notes a rather depressed review Lawrence Gilman wrote after the New York premiere. Gilman was able to praise a few details, but on the whole he found Strauss here "a sentimentalist, obtuse, slack and heavy-handed . . . facile and obvious in quality."

It seems fair enough. The inspiration in Strauss is often a function of the medium he used, and he had little feeling for chorus. He writes capably for chorus, but so dully that he cannot begin to dispel the most obnoxious associations of the beery, brutal, sentimental German "Maennerchor" tradition. Once again, excellent work from the Harvard Glee Club.

The "Tannhaeuser" Bacchanale is a later addition, right out of Wagner's Tristan period, and one of his most gorgeous pages. It was beautiful to hear, even though for my taste in such things the Radcliffe sound is just a shade moral. The "Entrance of the Guests" is meant to raise the roof, and Leinsdorf led it so that it did. There were thousands of trumpeters off-stage all over the place. They appeared by both stage doors, in the second balcony, and in among the organ pipes, shepherded by Mr. Burgin, and they must be commended for the dispatch with which they got from post to post almost as much as for the really splendid noise they made when they arrived at their various destinations.

I don't know when I've had such a good time, and it really was a worthwhile concert all around.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Christian Science
Monitor (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 174,850
MAR 27 1964

Bacchanale at Symphony

By Harold Rogers

For his Maundy Thursday program Erich Leinsdorf cut a wide swath from the traditional — even to the point of leading his Boston Symphony players through the orgiastic measure of the Bacchanale from Wagner's "Tannhäuser."

Last season—his first as director—he played excerpts from Wagner's "Parsifal," including the Good Friday Spell. This, of course, was right in line with Easter observances that Bostonians have come to expect at Symphony Hall over the past years: Charles Munch, for instance, nearly always scheduled one of the Bach Passions.

But this spring Mr. Leinsdorf's bow to the season was but passing and slight: Haydn's Te Deum in C major, No. 2, heard in its first performance at these concerts. The choral forces were those of the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society, trained by Elliot Forbes. Mr. Leinsdorf used the comparatively short and routine Haydn work as his opening selection.

* * *

But from here onward his program pursued its profane if interesting course. Having a chorus and organist on hand, as he did for the Te Deum, he went on to give them further employment in Aaron Copland's Symphony for Organ and Orchestra, Richard Strauss's "Die Tageszeiten" (a song cycle for men's chorus and orchestra), and two scenes from "Tannhäuser" involving a chorus—the Bacchanale and Entrance of the Guests into the Wartburg.

Thus the program had a certain cohesive logic to it when considered according to the economical use of the forces on call. The mere mechanics of moving either the choristers or the brasses on or offstage, the use of closed-circuit television to keep the whole vast thing on the beat —there was no question that such logistics added considerably to the afternoon's entertainment.

And in an oblique way the Bacchanale could be thought of as being not entirely paganistic. True, Tannhäuser may have lain with his head in Venus's lap, listening to the offstage Song of the Sirens (enchantingly sung by those Radcliffe girls), but were there not some deep Christian longings stirring in his breast? Was he not seeking his own resurrection from the Venusberg?

* * *

Mr. Copland was on hand to take a bow or two after the colorful performance of his Symphony, as was Berj Zamkochian, the organist. The Scherzo was especially brilliant with its Mexican syncopations.

Strauss's "Die Tageszeiten," heard in its Boston première, was pretty music, little more—Strauss composing on a Sunday afternoon, perhaps, when he could more profitably have taken a nap.

That Mr. Leinsdorf is basically a choral conductor is to be seen in his consistently communicative way of dealing with a choir. The Haydn, the Strauss, the Wagner were all eloquently set forth under his vivid command.

WASHINGTON.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Traveler (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 164,299
MAR 11 1964

White House Concert

SOME men get to the White House on the strength of political campaigns. Some make it through military victories or backroom agreements. But the Boston Symphony is getting there via fiddles, horns and drums.

Conductor Erich Leinsdorf and his symphony crew deserve congratulations for being invited to give a special concert in the East Room on March 31. Knowing how they perform, we know they'll be a hit.

And President Johnson's family couldn't have made a happier choice for guest artistry.

Now how about inviting the Johnsons to visit Symphony Hall?

The Miami Herald
MIAMI, FLA.
D. 3[illegible]5 SUN. 410,656
APR 1 1964

Continuing Culture

IT IS good to see that the current residents of the White House are continuing the pursuit of culture in the tradition of their predecessors.

They were hosts yesterday to children from the various embassies for a concert by the Boston Symphony. Following through today they offer a students' presentation of Shakespeare's "Taming of the Shrew" for the children of congressmen.

The White House has changed much since the days of Jackson when Old Andy's followers put their muddy boots on the furniture. The last two tenants have given it new stature as the best known home in America.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Optic
LOWELL, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 4,000
MAR 21 1964

People & Places

LADY BIRD JOHNSON deserves wholehearted support in her apparent efforts to continue the artistic renaissance in Washington. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, we are now told, will appear at the White House later this month. It will be another first in the long and continuing struggle to heighten nationwide interest in the Arts.

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE
ALBANY TIMES UNION
Sunday, March 15, 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Herald (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 178,553
MAR 10 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 465,653
MAR 29 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Record-American (m) (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 531,565
MAR 24 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 194,870
MAR 10 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Traveler (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 164,299
MAR 10 1964

Boston Symphony at White House

PAGE ONE

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will play at the White House for the first time, at the invitation of Mrs. Lyndon B. Johnson, it was announced Monday night.

Under the direction of Erich Leinsdorf, the orchestra will present a special concert Mar. 31 in the East Room for more than 200 embassy children between 13 and 21.

President Johnson's daughters Lynda and Luci will act as hostesses at the afternoon performance.

The Boston Symphony will be in Washington for two concerts on Mar. 30 and 31 at Constitution Hall.

The announcement said that Leinsdorf and President Johnson have been friends for years. The relationship began in 1938 during the President's first term in Congress, when he made arrangements for extension of the conductor's visa.

During the orchestra's regular visit to Washington last year Mr. and Mrs. Johnson attended one of the concerts. Afterwards Mr. and Mrs. Leinsdorf and orchestra officials were entertained at the Johnson residence.

At the White House concert Leinsdorf has chosen to perform excerpts from Richard Strauss' orchestral suite from "Der Burger als Edelmann," based on Moliere's play "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme."

The suite received its first American performance by the Boston Symphony under Pierre Monteux in 1921, in Symphony Hall, and has been revived this year as part of the Strauss music the orchestra is performing in commemoration of the 100th anniversary of the composer's birth.

Boston Symphony Plays At White House Tuesday

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf conducting, will perform at the White House for the first time Tuesday afternoon. The invitation was extended by Mrs. Lyndon B. Johnson, and the concert will be given for 200 children of the embassy delegations to the United States.

The concert will take place during the orchestra's final tour of the season in New York's Philharmonic Hall on Wednesday and Friday evenings and at the Brooklyn Academy of Music on Thursday evening.

Soloists will be the pianist Van Cliburn and the violinist Joseph Silverstein, the orchestra's concertmaster.

The orchestra will return to Boston on Saturday and next Sunday afternoon at 3 p.m. will give the concert which was postponed Feb. 16. Rudolf Serkin will be guest artist as was scheduled Feb. 16, and he will play Mozart's Piano Concerto, K. 466. Leinsdorf will open the program with Schumann's Overture, Scherzo and Finale, Op. 52, and his closing works will be excerpts from two of Wagner's operas, "Die Walkuere" and "Siegfried."

The final concerts of the Monday evening series and Tuesday evening series will take place at Symphony Hall on Apr. 6 and 7. The next Friday-Saturday concerts will be given Apr. 10 and 11, with Erick Friedman, violinist, as guest artist.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 465,653
MAR 15 1964

B.S.O. at White House

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will play a concert for children at the White House on Mar. 31, at the invitation of Mrs. Lyndon B. Johnson. Attending the program in the East Room will be over 200 children of embassy delegations to the United States. . .

Eric Leinsdorf will conduct excerpts from Richard Straus Orchestral Suite from "Der Buerger als Edelmann," based on Moliere's play, "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme." This suite for chamber orchestra received its first American performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Pierre Monteux in 1921 at Symphony Hall. Leinsdorf has revived it this year as part of the Straus music he is performing in commemoration of the 100th anniversary of the composer's birth. Prior to the performance the music director will speak briefly to the audience about the music and the orchestra.

The afternoon concert on Mar. 31 will be the first time the Boston Symphony Orchestra has performed in the White House. During the orchestra's visit to Washington last season the then Vice-President Johnson and Mrs. Johnson attended one of the concerts at Constitution Hall. Following the performance Mr. and Mrs. Leinsdorf and officials of the orchestra were entertained at the Johnson's residence. President Johnson and Erich Leinsdorf have been friends for many years. The relationship began during the President's first term in Congress in 1938 when he made the arrangements for the extension of Mr. Leinsdorf's visa.

The daughters of President and Mrs. Johnson, Lynda and Luci, will act as hostesses for the White House concert. The orchestra will also play two concerts in the city's Constitution Hall on Mar. 30-31.

NEW YORK Herald Tribune
D. 355,898 S. 451,270
MAR 11 1964

MUSIC NOTES

Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give a special concert at the White House March 31 for children of embassy delegations to the United States. Mr. Leinsdorf and a reduced group of players will perform excerpts from Richard Strauss' "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme," which Mr. Leinsdorf will preface with remarks about the orchestra and music. About 200 children between 13 and 21 will attend the afternoon event. The orchestra is giving two concerts in Constitution Hall, March 3 and 31.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Recorder-Gazette (e)
GREENFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 13,354

MAR 12 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Hampshire Gazette (e)
NORTHAMPTON, Mass.
Circ. 13,256

MAR 10 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Eagle (e)
CLAREMONT, N. H.
Circ. 7,750

MAR 11 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Call (e)
WOONSOCKET, R. I.
Circ. 26,710

MAR 10 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Standard-Times (e)
NEW BEDFORD, Mass.
Circ. 65,046

MAR 10 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Herald News (e)
FALL RIVER, Mass.
Circ. 40,785

MAR 10 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Transcript (e)
NORTH ADAMS, Mass.
Circ. 13,209

MAR 10 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Times (e)
HARTFORD, Conn.
Circ. 126,360

MAR 1[illegible]

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Telegraph (e)
NASHUA, N. H.
Circ. 13,082

MAR 11 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

News (e)
NEWPORT, R. I.
Circ. 12,454

MAR 10 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Express (e)
PORTLAND, Me.
Circ. 28,962

MAR 10 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Times (e)
BATH, Me.
Circ. 3,119

MAR 10 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Enterprise & Times (e)
BROCKTON, Mass.
Circ. 45,777

MAR 10 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Times (e)
HARTFORD, Conn.
Circ. 126,360

MAR 18 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Transcript-Telegram (e)
HOLYOKE, Mass.
Circ. 26,214

MAR 11 1964

Boston Symphony To Give Children's White House Concert

BOSTON (AP) — The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give a concert for some 200 children at the White House on March 31 at the invitation of Mrs. Lyndon B. Johnson.

An orchestra spokesman said the concert will be its first in the White House.

The President's daughters, Lynda and Luci, will be hostesses for embassy children between the ages of 13 and 21 in the White House East Room, the spokesman said in the announcement last night.

The Boston Symphony also will give two concerts at Constitution Hall in Washington on March 30 and 31.

The announcement said President Johnson and orchestra director Erich Leinsdorf have been friends for many years.

DAILY NEWS
NEW YORK'S PICTURE NEWSPAPER
D. 2,006,983 S. 3,147,219

Mar 11 1964 Buffalo

New York Post
D. 372,879 S. 255,557

[illegible] 1964 Buffalo

New York Post
D. 372,879 S. 255,557

[illegible] 1964 Buffalo

The New York Times
D. 681,612 S. 1,304,447

[illegible] 1 1 1964 Buffalo

NEWARK EVENING NEWS
NEWARK, N.J.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Times (m)
NEW YORK, N. Y.
Circ. 681,612

[illegible] 11 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

News (e)
GARDNER, Mass.
Circ. 7,341

MAR 10 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Union (m)
SPRINGFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 83,691

MAR 10 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Christian Science Monitor (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 174,850

MAR 10 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Berkshire Eagle (e)
PITTSFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 29,087

MAR 10 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Sun (e)
ATTLEBORO, Mass.
Circ. 11,206

MAR 11 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Call (e)
WOONSOCKET, R. I.
Circ. 26,710

MAR 31 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Union (m)
SPRINGFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 83,691

MAR 11 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Sun (e)
WESTERLY, R. I.
Circ. 8,620

MAR 10 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Sunday Republican
SPRINGFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 112,302

MAR 15 1964

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

SCHENECTADY GAZETTE
Thursday, March 12, 1964

The Houston Post
D. 224,649 SUN. 250,301

APR 1 1964 Buffalo

Deseret News
Salt Lake Telegram
SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH
D. 85,795

MAR 27 1964 Buffalo

DAILY NEWS
NEW YORK'S PICTURE NEWSPAPER
D. 2,006,983 S. 3,147,219

MAR 30 1964 Buffalo

THE RICHMOND NEWS LEADER
RICHMOND, VIRGINIA
D. 120,884

MAR 14 1964 Buffalo

St. Louis
Globe-Democrat
D. 306,470 S. 375,265

MAR 14 1964 Buffalo

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Ledger-Times
BOSTON, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 12,500

MAR 19 1964

Boston Symphony Will Appear at White House

BOSTON—Members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Erich Leinsdorf will present a special concert at the White House on the 31st at the invitation of the first lady. The concert will be given in the East Room for children, between the ages of 13 and 21, of the embassy delegations to the United States. The orchestra will be in Washington for two concerts at Constitution Hall.

Mr. Leinsdorf has chosen to perform excerpts from Richard Strauss' orchestral suite from "Der Burger als Edelmann," based on Moliere's play, "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme." The delightful and humorous suite for chamber orchestra received its first American performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Pierre Monteux in 1921 at Symphony Hall. Mr. Leinsdorf has received it this year as part of the Strauss music he is performing in commemoration of the 100th anniversary of the composer's birth. Prior to the performance the music director will speak briefly to the audience about the music and the orchestra.

The afternoon concert on the 31st will be the first time the Boston Symphony Orchestra has performed in the White House. During the orchestra's regular visit to Washington last season the then Vice-President Johnson and Mrs. Johnson attended one of the concerts at Constitution Hall. Following the performance Mr. and Mrs. Leinsdorf and officials of the orchestra were entertained at the Johnson's residence. President Johnson and Leinsdorf have been friends for many years. The relationship began during the President's first term in Congress in 1938 when he made the arrangements for the extension of Mr. Leinsdorf's visa.

The daughters of President and Mrs. Johnson, Lynda and Luci, will act as hostesses for the more than 200 embassy children who will be invited to hear the White House concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The New York Times
D. 681,612 S. 1,304,447

MAR 30 1964 Buffalo

2 JOHNSON GIRLS IN CONCERT ROLES

To Be on TV Tomorrow as Hostesses at White House

By PAUL GARDNER

President Johnson's daughters, Lynda Bird and Luci Baines will be the hostesses of a White House concert to be televised tomorrow by the National Broadcasting Company.

Erich Leinsdorf and 36 members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play six excerpts from orchestral suites by Richard Strauss. The orchestra will perform in the East Room at the invitation of Mrs. Johnson.

The concert will be held from 4 to 4:30 P.M. for 200 children of embassy families. Mr. Leinsdorf will explain the music to the children. The performance will be taped and shown on N.B.C.-TV from 4:30 to 5 P.M. A spokesman for N.B.C. said yesterday that final arrangements would be worked out this morning.

The entire Boston Symphony was scheduled to give a concert in Washington's Constitution Hall tomorrow but the American Federation of Musicians told the Boston orchestra members not to perform there because of a strike by the musicians of the National Symphony Orchestra against the National Symphony Association. The concert was therefore canceled and the White House performance was substituted.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 194,870
MAR 31 1964

138

Known President Since 1938

Leinsdorf to Lead At Friend's House

By MICHAEL STEINBERG

At 9:15 this morning, 36 members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra fly to Washington for an afternoon concert at the White House. Erich Leinsdorf, the orchestra's music director, who has been in New York, will join his players in the capital.

The concert is a special one being put on for 200 embassy children. The program will contain one work only, Richard Strauss' suite, "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme," but Leinsdorf expects to make some introductory remarks. The President's daughters, Lynda Bird and Luci Baines will be the hostesses.

For a few anxious hours at the end of last week it looked as though this long-planned event would not come off.

The full Boston Symphony was scheduled to play concerts in Constitution Hall Monday night and tonight. When Washington's National Symphony Orchestra, under whose auspices the Bostonians were to have been presented, went out on strike on Mar. 23, a picket line was placed morally, if not physically, around Constitution Hall. The Boston musicians chose not to cross such a picket line, and the trip was canceled.

By Friday afternoon, however, the necessary arrangements had been made to send just the chamber orchestra required for the White House concert down for that event only.

Today's White House visit will not actually be a reunion between the Johnsons and the Leinsdorfs, who are old friends, for the President and his wife are still in Texas. Nevertheless, the event was arranged at the personal invitation of Mrs. Johnson.

It had first been suggested last year by Mrs. Kennedy that the Boston Symphony make an open-air appearance on the White House lawn in June, 1964, but that proved not practical at this end, and the invitation was regretfully declined.

After Mr. Johnson became President, Leinsdorf wrote him a letter in which he offered his services in any way the President might deem appropriate. The immediate result was the setting up in January of today's concert.

The Johnson - Leinsdorf friendship is more than a quarter century old. Leinsdorf first came to this country in 1937 with a visitor's visa and a contract as assistant conductor at the Metropolitan Opera. The ramifications of the immigration laws are complicated enough anyway, and Leinsdorf, then just 25, further imperiled his status by going ahead without benefit of legal advice. The result was that at a certain point in the Spring of 1938 he found himself with his visitor's visa about to expire and not to be renewed.

Leinsdorf then enlisted the advice of a Virginian friend, Charles Marsh, whom he had originally come to know in Salzburg, Austria. Marsh suggested that they get help from a freshman representative from Texas whom Marsh, a newspaper owner in that state, had given election support to.

A meeting was arranged in Washington among Marsh, Leinsdorf and Rep. Lyndon B. Johnson. The young congressman agreed to do what he could though he confessed later that it had been the first political favor asked of him, and he hadn't the slightest idea of how to go about it.

Evidently, however, an idea came to him, because almost at once it was arranged that Leinsdorf leave the country for Havana, whence he re-entered on May 14, 1938, as an immigrant, having received a permanent visa through the U.S. consul in Havana. Ten days later he took out his first papers, and he became a citizen on Nov. 5, 1942.

Through the years the contact was maintained and grew into a firm friendship. From time to time the two men reminisce about the origins of their acquaintance, and the conductor likes to tell a story that he thinks superbly represents the President's humor and political shrewdness.

At a recent White House state dinner in honor of Sir Alec Douglas-Home the story was being told for the benefit of other guests. When Johnson got to the part about Leinsdorf's re-entrance from the Caribbean, he turned to his friend with a smile and said, "Now, Erich, to what country shall we change that consulate when we tell the story?"

But there is a story of which Leinsdorf is much prouder. He had sent Johnson a contribution in his first Senate campaign, but later felt obliged to write the senator an extremely critical letter on a matter of political disagreement. Johnson's answer contained the sentence:

"I am proud to have had some part in the settling of a man who knows how to make such excellent use of his citizenship."

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Standard-Times (e)
NEW BEDFORD, Mass.
Circ. 65,046
APR 1 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Times (e)
GLOUCESTER, Mass.
Circ. 10,050
APR 2 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
American (e)
WATERBURY, Conn.
Circ. 41,020
APR 1 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Enterprise & Times (e)
BROCKTON, Mass.
Circ. 45,777
APR 1 1964

Luci, Lynda and Leinsdorf Share Musical Moment

WASHINGTON (UPI) — The Boston Symphony Orchestra shared the honors at a White House concert Tuesday with President Johnson's two daughters.

Conductor Erich Leinsdorf and his 36 musicians got a big round of applause from the more than 200 teen-age children of foreign diplomats invited to the concert in the East Room.

But Lynda Bird Johnson and Luci Baines Johnson got just as much attention from the spectators who besieged them with requests for autographs.

Luci, 16, greeted the young guests. Then Leinsdorf, an old friend of the President and Mrs. Johnson, introduced the program —an orchestra suite from Richard Strauss' "Der Burger als Edelmann," based on Moliere's play "Les Bourgeois Gentilhomme."

The program called for six selections but only five were played to keep within the 30 minutes of time alloted for the nationwide telecast.

After the applause at the end of the program, Luci shook hands with Leinsdorf and told him the concert "was just lovely." Lynda also walked to the platform and shook hands with the conductor.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Enterprise & Times (e)
BROCKTON, Mass.
Circ. 45,777
MAR 31 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Gazette (e)
HAVERHILL, Mass.
Circ. 17,548
MAR 31 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Times (e)
HARTFORD, Conn.
Circ. 126,360
MAR 31 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Standard-Times (e)
NEW BEDFORD, Mass.
Circ. 65,046
MAR 31 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Berkshire Eagle (e)
PITTSFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 29,087
MAR 31 1964

BSO Plays Today At White House

BOSTON (UPI) — Thirty-six principal members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra fly to Washington today to give a children's concert at the White House on the invitation of Mrs. Lyndon B. Johnson and her daughter.

Some 200 children of embassy personnel will hear Erich Leinsdorf conduct a suite of music composed by Richard Strauss after Moliere's ballet-comedy, "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme."

The concert was to be televised at 4:30 p.m.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Journal (e)
BIDDEFORD-SACO, Me.
Circ. 8,836
APR 1 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Gazette (e)
WORCESTER, Mass.
Circ. 93,580
APR 1 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Gazette (e)
TAUNTON, Mass.
Circ. 12,652
APR 1 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Transcript-Telegram (e)
HOLYOKE, Mass.
Circ. 26,214
APR 1 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Transcript (e)
NORTH ADAMS, Mass.
Circ. 13,209
APR 1 1964

Boston Musicians Play at White House

WASHINGTON (AP) —A Boston Symphony Orchestra chamber group of 36 members has entertained a White House audience of some 250 young people from foreign embassies.

Hostesses for the affira yesterday were Lynda Bird and Luci Baines Johnson, daughters of President and Mrs. Johnson.

The Boston musicians were under the baton of Conductor Erich Leinsdorf during a progrm of excerpts from Richard Strauss' orchestral suite from "Der Burger Als Edelmann."

Luci, 16, said it was "a wonderful privilege" to welcome the orchestra in its first White House appearance. The President and First Lady were in Texas.

The audience ranged in age from 13 to 21.

The complete orchestra of 136 musicians had been scheduled to play concerts Monday and Tuesday in Constitution Hall. A labor dispute involving the National Symphony Orchestra caused cancellation of those appearances by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

St. Petersburg Times
MAR 30 1964

White House Egg Roll

By MARIE SMITH
Special To The Times
From The Washington Post

WASHINGTON — Lynda Bird and Lucy Baines Johnson will be co-hostesses to some 250 children from Embassy Row Tuesday afternoon at a White House concert to be presented by Eric Leinsorf and a 36-member chamber group from the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

LONG ISLAND DAILY PRESS
Wednesday, April 1, 1964

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

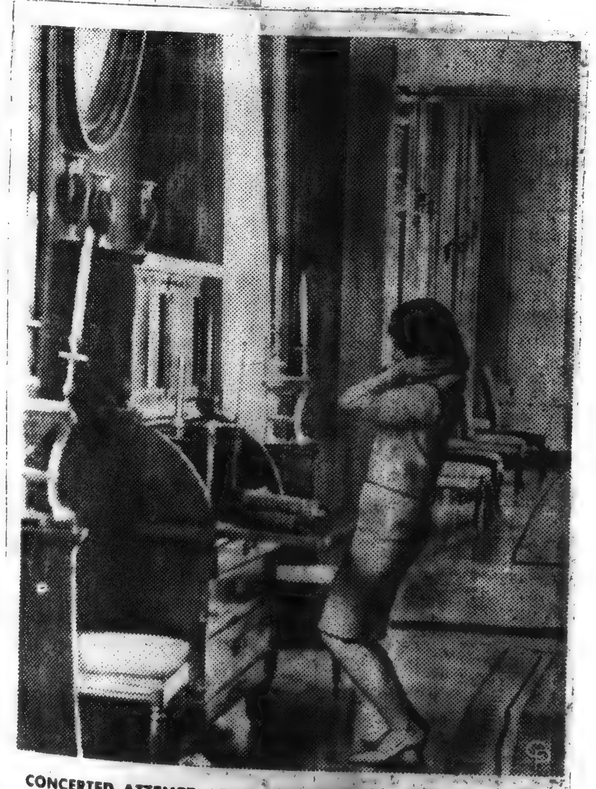
Albany Knickerbocker News
Wednesday, April 1, 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Journal (e)
HAVERHILL, Mass.
Circ. 12,291
APR 1 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Chronicle (e)
NORTH ATTLEBORO, Mass.
Circ. 3,953
APR 3 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Bulletin (e)
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
Circ. 144,028

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Enterprise (e)
LEOMINSTER, Mass.
Circ. 4,889



CONCERTED ATTEMPT AT HOSTESSING—Luci Baines Johnson, younger daughter of the President, stoops to adjust her hair in a White House mirror before acting as hostess to children of foreign embassies in Washington. Luci and her sister, Linda, welcomed the guests to a concert by the Boston Symphony.

TIME
NEW YORK, N.Y.
W. 2,904,639

APR 10 1964

She really needn't have worried, but after all, acting as official White House hostess at 16 can be slightly overwhelming. So Luci Baines Johnson primped nervously as she prepared for an East Room musicale by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. But she let it all happen naturally, and the result was as fresh as a cherry blossom. "I don't really realize that I am a President's daughter," she told reporters, "and that I represent American youth. If I did, I would go out of my mind." It is best to be yourself, she went on, even if you "sometimes make mistakes, as I may be doing right now talking to you."

Mother didn't mind talking at all. At Texas Woman's University in Denton, Lady Bird Johnson added an honorary

LUCI PRIMPING
Fresh as a cherry blossom.

New York Post
D. 372,679 S. 255,557
APR 1 1964

NEWARK STAR LEDGER
NEWARK, N. J.
APR 1 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Telegraph (e)
NASHUA, N. H.
Circ. 13,082
APR 2 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Citizen (e)
WINSTED, Conn.
Circ. 3,681
APR 2 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Transcript-Telegram (e)
HOLYOKE, Mass.
Circ. 26,214
APR 2 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sentinel (e)
KEENE, N. H.
Circ. 7,894
APR 3 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Courant (m)
HARTFORD, Conn.
Circ. 119,274
APR 1 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Call (e)
WOONSOCKET, R. I.
Circ. 26,710
APR 2 1964

LAST-MINUTE LOOK
. . . Luci Baines Johnson, 16-year-old daughter of the President, takes a last-minute look in mirror in the Red Room at the White House before going to a concert in the White House by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Luci opened the concert in the East Room by introducing the director of the orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf. (AP wirephoto).

130

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Traveler (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 164,299
APR 1 1964

(AP Wirephoto)

CONDUCTOR Eric Leinsdorf of Boston Symphony Orchestra talks with President's Johnson's daughters, Lynda (center) and Luci before concert in White House.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Herald (e)
NEW BRITAIN, Conn.
Circ. 31,006
APR 1 1964

CONCERT HOSTESSES — The President's daughters, Lynda Bird, center, and Luci Baines, served as hostesses yesterday for the Boston Symphony concert in the White House for foreign embassy children. The girls are chatting with Erich Leinsdorf, orchestra director.

(UPI Telephoto)

The Evening Star
WASHINGTON, D. C.
D. 283,075 SUN. 339,766

APR 1 1964

NEWS OF MUSIC

Boston Symphony Plays White House

By IRVING LOWENS
Star Music Critic

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf, conductor. East Room, The White House. Program: Excerpts, Suite from the Incidental Music for Moliere's "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme," Op. 60, R. Strauss.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra (or, to be more exact, an abridged version of it) did play a concert in Washington yesterday.

However, instead of 3,800 persons who had anticipated the pleasure of hearing Mr. Leinsdorf and his men, the live audience consisted of some 250 youngsters from various embassies, NBC television crews, and the members of the press.

Even though the two full-length Boston concerts which were to have been presented in Constitution Hall under the auspices of the National Symphony last night and the night before had been cancelled because of the unresolved dispute between the members of our orchestra and our Association, Mr. Leinsdorf kept his White House date.

Together with 34 members of his superb ensemble, Mr. Leinsdorf offered five of the nine numbers in the rarely performed suite of incidental music to Moliere's "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme" by Richard Strauss. Composed in 1912 (and arranged as a suite for chamber orchestra in 1918), the work was first introduced to the United States in 1921 by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Pierre Monteux.

Mr. Leinsdorf is reviving this very pleasant, characteristically Straussian score in 1964 as part of his tribute to the Austrian master, the 100th anniversary of whose birth takes place on June 11.

The performance was touched with exquisite delicacy and grace yesterday, and to judge from the rapt faces of the young people from all over the world seated in the East Room, Mr. Leinsdorf and his men succeeded in enchanting them with as much ease as he does more seasoned concertgoers.

The conductor was introduced to his listeners by Miss Luci Baines Johnson (who suffered a slight attack of mike-fright in the process), and he spoke briefly about the music between movements in his characteristically urbane and gracious manner. Although the ensemble was well up to Boston Symphony standards (which means that its playing was absolutely first-rate), concertmaster Joseph Silverstein deserves special mention for his magnificent solo in the "Entrance and Dance of the Tailors."

This was the Boston Symphony's first White House appearance — a historic occasion. President Johnson and Mr. Leinsdorf have been acquainted since 1938, when Mr. Johnson (then in his first term in Congress) arranged for the extension of the conductor's visa. Last year, the then Vice President and Mrs. Johnson attended one of the Boston Symphony Constitution Hall concerts. Following the performance, Mr. and Mrs. Leinsdorf (and officials of the orchestra) were entertained at the Johnson residence.

An economic note — if you are wondering just how much it costs to import 34 members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its conductor to Washington for a 30-minute affair you might like to know that the tab would probably run somewhere between five and seven thousand dollars, according to personnel manager Rosario Mazzeo. Good music does not come cheap, and had not the Boston Symphony been willing to pay large part of the bill, even the White House could not have afforded its services.

Nevertheless, this listener shouts "Encore!" and fervently hopes that the first White House performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will not be the last.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Herald (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 178,553
APR 1 1964

(AP Wirephoto)

BSO IN WHITE HOUSE—Eric Leinsdorf, director of Boston Symphony Orchestra rehearses in the East Room for a young people's concert.

Boston Symphony Group A Hit at the White House

By ERNEST G. WARREN

WASHINGTON—President and Mrs. Johnson's daughters, Lynda Bird and Luci Baines, were hostesses Tuesday at a White House musicale for about 250 young people from foreign embassies.

A 36-member chamber music group of the Boston Symphony Orchestra entertained with excerpts from Richard Strauss' orchestral suite from "Der Burger als Edelmann," based on Molier's comedy, "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme."

The guests, many in colorful native dress, and conductor Erich Leinsdorf and his musicians were welcomed to the famous East Room by 16-year-old Luci, wearing a light blue suit set off by a shocking pink ascot and matching shoes. Lynda Bird, 20, dressed in pink, left the formal honors to her sister.

Luci welcomed the orchestra in its first appearance in the White House, saying it was "a wonderful privilege" to do so. Her parents were in Texas.

STRIKE INTERFERES

Leinsdorf, whose full 136-piece orchestra had been scheduled for concerts Monday and Tuesday in Constitution Hall—events which were cancelled because of a strike of National Symphony Orchestra musicians—then took over.

He explained the amusing story, depicted in music, of the would-be gentleman, but more importantly for his audience, told something of the composition of the Boston Orchestra.

"Many of you come from other countries, as I did," the Viennese director commented, "and I can appreciate how significant and fortunate it is that in your youth you have an opportunity to learn about many aspects of American life."

He cited the Boston Symphony as a good example of American life, "or what the United States at its very best represents, and what it stands for."

SCREENED AUDITIONS

He noted names of many orchestra members of foreign origin, but commented "this is a great American orchestra, and I think that our musical establishment is what it is today precisely because in this country we look only to talent and ability. No candidate's name or background is known to us when he first auditions, and he plays from behind a screen."

When the orchestra had completed its half-half recital, Leinsdorf stepped down from the podium, shook hands with his hostesses and said:

"It was a great pleasure."

"Ah, it was just lovely," responded Luci Baines.

She then invited her guests, ranging from 13 to 21, to accompany her to the State Dining Room for punch and cookies.

(Associated Press)

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Traveler (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 164,299

The 36 members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra were in their usual fine form yesterday afternoon, when they played six excerpts from "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme," by Richard Strauss, for 200 embassy children at the White House.

Conductor Erich Leinsdorf's commentary was brief and bright as the cameras moved in for some excellent closeups of Symphony members.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Union (m)
SPRINGFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 83,691
APR 1 1964

Boston Symphony Group Plays at White House Fete

WASHINGTON (AP) — President and Mrs. Johnson's daughters, Lynda Bird and Luci Baines, were hostesses Tuesday at a White House musicale for about 250 young people from foreign embassies.

Welcomed by Luci

A 36-member chamber music group of the Boston Symphony Orchestra entertained with excerpts from Richard Strauss' orchestral suite from "Der Burger als Edelmann," based on Moliere's comedy, "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme."

The guests, many in colorful native dress, and conductor Erich Leinsdorf and his musicians were welcomed to the famous East Room by 16-year-old Luci, wearing a light blue suit set off by a shocking pink ascot and matching shoes. Lynda Bird, 20, dressed in pink, left the formal honors to her sister.

Leinsdorf's full 136-piece orchestra had been scheduled for concerts Monday and Tuesday in Constitution Hall — events which were canceled because of a strike of National Symphony Orchestra musicians.

Cost Put at $5000

Rosario Mazzeo, personnel director of the Boston Symphony for the past 31 years, estimated it cost between $5000 and $6000 for the afternoon concert, paid for largely by the orchestra's board of trustees and an undetermined amount from White House funds.

He declined to comment on the dispute of musicians of the National Symphony over the dismissal of several members.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Evening Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 146,915
APR 1 1964

34 Play in White House

200 Embassy Children Hear Hub Symphony Group Concert

By MICHAEL STEINBERG
Globe Music Critic

WASHINGTON—On Tuesday afternoon at 4 o'clock, 34 Boston symphony players under the direction of Erich Leinsdorf gave a brief concert in the East Room of the White House. The music was by Richard Strauss (five numbers from his suite "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme") the guests were some 200 young people from embassy families, and the hostesses were Lynda Bird and Luci Baines Johnson.

Unquestionably Leinsdorf, the symphony players, and our two young hostesses did all they could to give the afternoon warmth and charm, and to make it a success. The choice of music was ideal. "The Bourgeois Gentilhomme" requires only a chamber ensemble, which makes it right for presentation in the home, so to speak. But the writing for the ensemble is showy, and many of the superb first-desk soloists had a chance to distinguish themselves. Also, Strauss' fun and gaiety had an appeal for the young audience.

From the incidental music Strauss wrote for Moliere's comedy, Leinsdorf chose the overture, the fencing master scene, the entrance and dance of the tailors, the Lully minuet, and the table music. He prefaced each movement with a brief explanation of its place in the play and its character. Between the last two numbers, he delivered a little homily on the Boston Symphony as a symbol of the best in American life, its wonderful variety of names from so many nations, but with all its members united as musicians and Americans.

Luci Baines Johnson, 16, introduced the program Breathless, a little shy, but most appealing in a pale blue suit with fuchsia scarf, she said that it was a wonderful privilege to welcome Leinsdorf and the players. Afterwards she thanked them for coming and for their music, and all repaired to the State Dining Room for punch and cookies. Linda Bird Johnson sat near her sister, but took no active part in the proceedings.

Most of the orchestra members flew to Washington in the morning and assembled at the White House for rehearsal shortly after 2. The concert was televised by N.B.C., and the lights, cameras, and those who worked them, seemed at times almost to dominate the proceedings.

As often at such events, the flesh-and-blood audience was slightly given the feeling of being there on suffrance as props for the television show. Certainly for someone accustomed to hearing music at concerts, there was something odd about the voice which, just after the orchestra was seated, barked out, "We have two minutes 'til air tahm—will y'all please be quaht." Nor can it be said that the clutter of microphones on stage and the incessant moving about, whirring, and clicking of cameras contributed much toward the musical atmosphere.

The audience, with its variegated good looks and touching poise, was not the least part of the show. One thing they had in common with grownup audiences was the late arrival of a good many of them: a few were still on their way in when the orchestra played its last measures, about 35 minutes after the scheduled starting time.

Luci, who is musical and who plays the piano, was kept busy at the reception with signing souvenir programs and fulfilling her other duties as hostess, and it seemed ungracious to butt in with a musical interview. I did try a question about music on an amazing beauty from Pakistant who most forthrightly replied that her two favorite American composers were Elliott Carter and Roger Sessions.

The Boston visitors enjoyed their White House journey. We—the players, the manager, Thomas D. Perry Jr., and seven other members of the orchestra staff, plus one itinerant critic—were offered a special tour of the State Dining Room, and the Red, Blue and Green Rooms, under the guidance of Inspector Burke of the White House police. The beautiful flower arrangements were much admired. Most admired of all the paintings perhaps was Monet's "Morning on the Seine", given in memory of President Kennedy by members of his family.

After the concert and reception the players returned to New York where they are joined today by their 72 colleagues for concerts tonight, tomorrow, and Friday.

EVENING NEWS
PATERSON, N.J.

A President's Daughter

Luci Baines Johnson, 16-year-old daughter of President and Mrs. Johnson, was called on to act as White House hostess for a concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. She let her hair down and told reporters how she feels about being a President's daughter.

"I don't really realize I am a President's daughter and that I represent American youth," she said. "If I did, I would go out of my mind trying to represent the best of American youth."

She confessed she was not politically oriented as her father, mother and older sister are. She wants to present a good image to the public, "but not one that is so sweet and goody-goody, it isn't me."

There are good and bad points to being a President's daughter, she remarked, but the bad outweighs the good. Maybe she doesn't appreciate the good points as she may some day, but the general impression was that she felt hemmed in.

The best she can do, she said, is be herself. Which is probably the best advice to any teenager who is conscious of her place in the world and what she can do about it.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Traveler (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 164,299

APR 2 1964

Echoes Abroad

AT the source of all the troubles abroad today lies a lack of harmony and respect among men and among nations.

We have long since learned that we in the United States cannot produce the missing good will just by handing out billions of dollars to foreign treasuries. But sometimes we can plant the seeds for good will in a way that, unfortunately, escapes general attention.

A planting of that sort took place at the White House this week, made possible by a 36-member concert group from the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

On hand in the audience, as guests of President Johnson's two daughters, were some 250 young people from foreign embassies. They not only heard a fine concert, but they also heard conductor Erich Leinsdorf remind them of their good fortune in learning about "many aspects of American life"—and in meeting the Boston Symphony as an example of "what the United States at its very best stands for."

Impressions of this kind are carefully preserved by young people. Many years from now when they are back in their own countries—some of them perhaps as national leaders—they will remember the Boston Symphony and the perceptive advice of Leinsdorf. That's inevitable.

More of this sort of thing would produce more harmony among nations. The Symphony echoes will last abroad for a long, long time.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Berkshire Eagle (e)
PITTSFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 29,087

APR 1 1964

Leinsdorf Plugs the BSO In White House Appearance

Conductor Erich Leinsdorf of the Boston Symphony Orchestra called the BSO "a good example of American life" in remarks made before a concert in the East Room of the White House in Washington Tuesday afternoon.

The orchestra was invited to give this concert by Mrs. Lyndon B. Johnson for 200 children from the embassy delegations to the United States. Lynda and Luci Johnson served as hostesses. The program was viewed by the nation on NBC television.

In his remarks before the musical portion of the program Leinsdorf said:

"It was very good of President and Mrs. Johnson to make this afternoon possible. It is for us an important event for we can thus pay our respects to this great and courageous couple.

"Many of you come from other countries, as I did, and I can appreciate how significant and fortunate it is that in your youth you have an opportunity to learn about many aspects of American life.

"The Boston Symphony Orchestra offers a good example of American life, or what the United States at its very best represents, and what it stands for. You see here 36 players — a small group of the Boston Symphony, which totals 106 members. For this concert we have had to content ourselves with a chamber orchestra, due to the limitation of space here in the East Room of the White House —a magnificent mansion, but one which was not, of course, exactly designed for orchestral performances.

"There are a number of reasons why I consider the Boston Symphony Orchestra a good illustration of American life. I would like to tell you some of the names of our members — Pappoutsakis; Gino Cioffi, Kauko Kahila; Nagy; Knudsen; Zeisse, Leguia; Joseph Silverstein; Charles Smith. Some of these men were born and raised in the United States; some came here from other countries.

"This is a great American orchestra, and I think that our musical establishment is what it is today precisely because in this country we look only to talent and ability. No candidate's name or background is known to us when he first auditions, and he plays from behind a screen.

"I think that it is especially fitting that a symphony orchestra should best represent what America stands for, because music belongs to no country. It is truly an international language which each man here, through his talent, speaks and to which he contributes, no matter what his name, no matter what his cultural background."

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Press (e)
BRISTOL, Conn.
Circ. 14,439

MAR 3 1 1964

...freshments will be served." ...church or call LU 3-4220.

For Children

Boston Symphony Group At White House Concert

This afternoon at 4 p.m. members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Erich Leinsdorf, music director, presented a concert in the East Room of the White House before an invited audience of 200 children from the Embassy Delegations to the United States.

The orchestra was invited to give this special concert by the First Lady, and Lynda and Lucy Johnson acted as hostesses for the occasion.

At today's White House concert the Boston Symphony Orchestra performed excerpts from Richard Strauss' Orchestral Suite from "Der Burger als Edelmann," based on Moliere's play, "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme." This witty and amusing work was first performed in the United States in 1921 by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Pierre Monteux. Mr. Leinsdorf revived it this year as part of the celebration of the 100th anniversary of the composer's birth.

Director Speaks of Orchestra

Before the performance the audience of Embassy children, who are between the ages of 13 and 21, heard Mr. Leinsdorf speak about the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the music of Strauss. The music director and the President have enjoyed a long friendship which began in 1938 when the then Congressman Johnson undertook the arrangements necessary for the extension of Mr. Leinsdorf's visa.

The program was viewed across the nation this afternoon at 4:30 p.m. through the courtesy of the National Broadcasting Company-Television network.

Leinsdorf's Remarks

In his remarks before the musical portion of the program Mr. Leinsdorf said:

"It was very good of President and Mrs. Johnson to make this afternoon possible. It is for us an important event for we can thus pay our respects to this great and courageous couple.

"Many of you come from other countries, as I did, and I can appreciate how significant and fortunate it is that in your youth you have an opportunity to learn about many aspects of American life.

"The Boston Symphony Orchestra offers a good example of American life, or what the United States at its very best represents, and what it stands for. You see here 36 players—a small group of the Boston Symphony, which totals 106 members. For this concert we have had to content ourselves with a chamber orchestra, due to the limitation of space here in the East Room of the White House—a magnificent mansion, but one which was not, of course, exactly designed for orchestral performances.

"There are a number of reasons why I consider the Boston Symphony Orchestra a good illustration of American life. I would like to tell you some of the names of our members — Pappoutsakis; Gino Cioffi, Kauka Kahila; Nagy; Knudsen; Zeisse; Leguia; Joseph Silverstein; Charles Smith. Some of thes men were born and raised in the United States; some came here from other countries.

Great American Orchestra

"This is a great American Orchestra, and I think that our musical establishment is what it is today precisely because in this country we look only to talent and ability. No candidate's name or background is known to us when he first auditions, and he plays from behind a screen.

"I think that it is especially fitting that a symphony orchestra should best represent what America stands for, because music belongs to no country. It is truly an international language which each man here, through his talent, speaks and to which he contributes, no matter what his name, no matter what his cultural background.

"Now, after having introduced to you this group, we are going to play a few selections by a composer who was born 100 years ago in June. He wrote very gay and very fitting music to the immortal French comedy "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme" by Moliere. The composer is, of course, Richard Strauss, a man who lived through many upheavals of history. He was born before Germany became a reich; he lived through the era of the Kaiser, the Weimar Republic, and the Nazis; and he lived in the post war era. In 1949, he passed away at the age of 85.

"The selections which you are going to hear Strauss wrote when he was 48 years old. They are among the wittiest and most amusing works which this great virtuoso of instrumental and vocal music has left us. I hope that you will enjoy "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme" and that you will be as grateful as we are to our hosts, who have made this afternoon possible for us, no less than for you.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Traveler (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 164,299

MAR 3 1 1964

Leinsdorf Conducts For His Friend LBJ

WASHINGTON — Erich Leinsdorf, musical director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and 30 of his musicians, performed today at the White House at the invitation of President and Mrs. Johnson.

Youngsters from around the world, who live at the 100-plus foreign embassies here, were the special guests of the Johnsons at the concert in the formal East Room.

Leinsdorf conducted the orchesral suite from "Der Burger als Edelmann" by Strauss.

The conductor is an old friend of the President and Mrs. Johnson. They first met in 1937, the first year Johnson served in the the U. S. House. Leinsdorf was then with the Metropolitan Opera Co. and the Johnsons met him while the company was playing in Washington.

Leinsdorf complained to the young Congressman that he was being deported to his native Austria and didn't want to go back.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 194,870

IN THE EAST ROOM of the White House, Erich Leinsdorf leads the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a concert for embassy children. (AP Photo)

BEFORE THE CONCERT Leinsdorf is greeted by Lynda and Luci Johnson, daughters of the President and hostesses at the event. (AP Photo)

Embassy Sons, Daughters Revel in Music, Color

By MARJORIE W. SHERMAN

WASHINGTON—You really forget how beautiful the White House is. At the great parties of state the important faces, clothes and jewels offer such a dazzling display that the eyers are drawn from the handsome rooms.

Tuesday's concert by 36 members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for 200 sons and daughters of Washington's embassy families was a perfect time and a perfect first for the orchestra.

There wasn't any time wasted on protocol either, for Luci Baines Johnson welcomed both the orchestra and the day's guests in the name of President and Mrs. Johnson, who are in Texas at the ranch.

Composed and chic in her pale blue suit and rose-pink scarf and pumps, her dark glossy hair shoulder-length and teased a little, Luci sounded a lot calmer than she did minutes earlier when she rehearsed her brief speech for older sister Lynda.

She got a loving pat on the shoulder and a word of encouragement from Lynda who lookd just like her friendly mother as she offered to go in in Luci's place.

Lynda's rose-red dress and pearls went well with her dark good looks, and both girls were conscientious hostesses after the concert over punch and cookies in the State Dining Room.

Hester Admired

Both admired teen-age Hester Leinsdorf's waist-length fair hair, and talked to Hester and her brother Joshua about music. They showed the Leinsdorfs the nine-foot grand piano made of Hondouras mahogany to President Franklin D. Roosevelt's design. The piano, usually in the East Room, was moved to the entrance hall because of the concert, for which the stage designed by Mrs. Kennedy was used.

Dark-red screens hid some of the NBC television equipment, which also was set up behind the pale gold silk curtains braced to empty Moet and Chandon champagne cases.

Yet even with a great television camera peering down over the screens like a red-eyed grotesque puppet, the lustre of that historic and serene room was undimmed. Here had lain in State not only the nation's beloved President Kennedy, but Franklin D. Roosevelt and, a century ago, Abraham Lincoln.

Yellow forsythia and white-and-yellow chrysanthemums massed in a cloisonne jar, trembled a little with the spirit of the marvelous music that so obviously delighted a gravely attentive young audience.

Earlier in the afternoon, the Johnson staff stopped by one-by-one to enjoy a bit of the rehearsal, but present to appreciate the concert, as he has shared music in the White House for 26 years, Inspector Kenneth Burke recalled many informal evenings dating back through half a dozen presidential families.

Leinsdorf and handsome young Baron Knuth-Wurtenseldt, son of the Danish ambassador, recalled a meeting at the palace in Copenhagen, and the young Baron found his sister Isabel and brought her to meet Leinsdorf.

It was a very contemporary scene in the handsome white-and-gold room where President Adams' humble and touching prayer is inscribed just below the marble mantlepiece and the Healey portrait of Lincoln.

Girls and boys alike asked President Johnson's daughters to autograph their little blue programs, and ther was much borrowing of pens, and much laughter.

Two White House staff punch servers looked on indulgently. Both Fate Super and Eugene Allen have seen the times when 140 guests sat down to dinner in that room —"and that's a job."

Orchestra Visits

Still earlier, the orchestra went visiting with Inspector Burke, admiring the White House china neatly shelved and put on display by Mrs. Eisenhower. They also spent some time at the small South Entrance which the President and his family use along with high-echelon diplomatic guests.

Mrs. Ralph Gomberg was among the orchestra wives flying to Washington for the concert from which the players left to enplane to New York for tonight's concert there.

Mary Coleman, just back from a Boston visit which included the Ted Kennedys, is among the New England staff members at the White House, and this pleasant, pretty girl had many friends to greet her.

Many Languages

Thomas Perry and other familiar symphony faces were among the few adults invited to share the icy delicious punch and the freshly-made brownies, almond squares, chocolate and filled cookies heaped on silver and china trays on the long State Dining tables.

In many languages, teenagers of many countries talked about "the problem" of using the family car, or how many times the White House drive has to be circled when they're picked up by limousines, and how angry fathers get in the Pennsylvania av. traffic.

Vivacious, dark-haired beauties like the three Masu sisters from Pakistan, their long silk dresses the color of flowers, talked school and parties with boys from Poland such as Tadeusz Podymiak or Dukhi Kim from Korea.

Scalloped-turbanned Sarmukh Singh of India, Laos' Souvanna Boury, lovely dark-haired Belgian Cristina Funee-Noppen—who almost missed the concert because her driver missed the White House entrance—asked Youth Concert's founder and B.S.O. member Harry Dixon what music Boston boys and girls like. Friendships flourished.

It was a wonderful party.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Evening Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 146,915
MAR 31 1964

White House

Boston Symphony Makes History in

By MICHAEL STEINBERG

Thirty-six members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra flew from Logan Airport this morning for an historic appearance at the White House.

The special concert will be the first the Boston orchestra has ever played at the White House.

An invited audience of 200 children from the foreign embassies in Washington will attend the concert in the East Room.

The concert will consist of six excerpts from the chamber suite by Richard Strauss inspired by Moliere's satirical comedy, "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme."

The piece in question calls for precisely 36 musicians. Erich Leinsdorf, an old friend of President Lyndon B. Johnson, will conduct. The President, however, will not attend. He is in Texas. His daughters, Lynda Bird and Luci Baines will be the hostesses.

Plans for the full Boston Symphony to perform at Constitution Hall on the same trip were cancelled because of a musician's strike in the National Symphony Orchestra.

The Symphony players making the trip are:

Violinists: Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster, Newton Centre, Alfred Krips, Brookline, George Zazofsky, Waban, Harry E. Dickson, Brookline, Minot Beale, North Abington; Violas, Joseph de Pasquale, principal, Brookline, Jean Cauhape, South Natick, Eugen Lehner, Newton Centre, Reuben Green, Waban.

Cellos, Samuel Mayes, principal, Needham, Martin Hoherman, Chestnut Hill, Bernard Parronchi, Brookline; string bass, George Moleux, Boston; flutes, Doriot Anthony Dwyer, Chestnut Hill, James Pappoutsakis, Chestnut Hill.

Oboes, Ralph Gomberg, Newtonville, John Holmes, Needham; clarinets, Gino Cioffi, Boston, Padquale Cardillo, West Newton; bass clarinet, Rosario Mazzeo, Boston; bassoons, Ernst Panenka, Brookline, Matthew Ruggiero, Chestnut Hill; horns, James Tagliano, Boston, Harry Shapiro, Needham.

Trombone, William Gibon, Needham; timpani, Everett Firth, Dover; percussion, Charles Smith, Wellesley Hills, Harold Thompson, Quincy, Arthur Press, Natick, Thomas Gauger, Boston; piano, Bernard Zighera, Brookline; librarian, Victor Alpert.

It had first been suggested last year by Mrs. Kennedy that the Boston Symphony make an open-air appearance on the White House lawn in June, 1964, but that proved not practical at this end, and the invitation was regretfully declined.

After Mr. Johnson became President, Leinsdorf wrote him a letter in which he offered his services in any way the President might deem appropriate. The immediate result was the setting up in January of today's concert.

The Johnson - Leinsdorf friendship is more than a quarter century old. Leinsdorf first came to this country in 1937 with a visitor's visa and a contract as assistant conductor at the Metropolitan Opera. The ramifications of the immigration laws are complicated enough anyway, and Leinsdorf, then just 25, further imperiled his status by going ahead without benefit of legal advice. The result was that at a certain point in the Spring of 1938 he found himself with his visitor's visa about to expire and not to be renewed.

Leinsdorf then enlisted the advice of a Virginian friend, Charles Marsh, whom he had originally come to know in Salzburg, Austria. Marsh suggested that they get help from a freshman representative from Texas whom Marsh, a newspaper owner in that state, had given election support to.

A meeting was arranged in Washington among Marsh, Leinsdorf and Rep. Lyndon B. Johnson. The young congressman agreed to do what he could though he confessed later that it had been the first political favor asked of him, and he hadn't the slightest idea of how to go about it.

Evidently, however, an idea came to him, because almost at once it was arranged that Leinsdorf leave the country for Havana, whence he re-entered on May 14, 1938, as an immigrant, having received a permanent visa through the U.S. consul in Havana. Ten days later he took out his first papers, and he became a citizen on Nov. 5, 1942.

Through the years the contact was maintained and grew into a firm friendship. From time to time the two men reminisce about the origins of their acquaintance, and the conductor likes to tell a story that he thinks superbly represents the President's humor and political shrewdness.

At a recent White House state dinner in honor of Sir Alec Douglas-Home the story was being told for the benefit of other guests. When Johnson got to the part about Leinsdorf's re-entrance from the Caribbean, he turned to his friend with a smile and said, "Now, Erich, to what country shall we change that consulate when we tell the story?"

But there is a story of which Leinsdorf is much prouder. He had sent Johnson a contribution in his first Senate campaign, but later felt obliged to write the senator an extremely critical letter on a matter of political disagreement. Johnson's answer contained the sentence:

"I am proud to have had some part in the settling of a man who knows how to make such excellent use of his citizenship."

OFF TO WASHINGTON—Members of Boston Symphony Orchestra board plane this morning for flight to capital to give concert at the White House. In foreground is Joseph Silverstein, concert master. (Edward Carr Photo)

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Telegram
WORCESTER, Mass.
Circ. 102,270
APR 26 1964

Leinsdorf Says

In preparing an informal talk for a White House audience of young people, Boston Symphony conductor Erich Leinsdorf, recently compiled some interesting and relevant thoughts . . .

"The Boston Symphony Orchestra offers a good example of American life, or what the United States at its very best represents, and what it stands for.

"I would like to tell you some of the names of our members; Pappoutsakis, Gino Cioffi, Kauko Kahila, Nagy, Knudsen, Zeisse, Leguia, Joseph Silverstein, Charles Smith.

"This is a great American orchestra, and I think that our musical establishment is what it is today precisely because in this country we look only to talent and ability. No candidate's name or background is known to us when he first auditions, and he plays from behind a screen."

APRIL 1, 1964 THE NEW YORK TIMES, W

'PIGGY BANKS' AID BOSTON SYMPHONY

White House Concert Helped by Diverse Sources

By MARJORIE HUNTER
Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, March 31 — After digging into a variety of piggy banks to finance the trip, an abbreviated Boston Symphony Orchestra made its White House debut today.

Hostesses for the 30-minute concert, which was attended by 200 children of foreign embassy families, were the President's daughters, Lynda and Luci Johnson.

The current strike of Washington's own orchestra — the National Symphony — almost canceled the scheduled concert.

As originally planned, the entire Boston Symphony was to have presented two concerts, last night and tonight, at Constitution Hall.

Since they would be in Washington anyway, Erich Leinsdorf, the orchestra's music director, planned to take 36 members to the White House to perform for the embassy children.

With the National Symphony on strike, however, the American Federation of Musicians frowned on the Boston Symphony's performances in Constitution Hall. They were canceled late last week.

That left the problem of how to finance the trip to Washington for the White House concert.

Rosario Mazzeo, personnel manager for the Boston Symphony, said the problem had been solved when the White House "began digging around in various piggy banks. Nobody knows yet how much was found for this."

The bulk of the cost, he said, was provided by the symphony's own board of trustees. He believes that the trip, including airplane fares, cost between $5,000 and $7,000.

Mr. Mazzeo described the Boston Symphony as "the happiest orchestra in the world." He has been with the ensemble for 31 years.

It was happy music that the symphony played today in the brilliantly lighted east room. The orchestra performed five excerpts from Richard Strauss's orchestral suite from "Der Burger als Edelmann," based on Molière's play, "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme."

The performance was taped and shown on the National Broadcasting Company television network from 4:30 to 5 P.M.

Luci Johnson escorted Mr. Leinsdorf into the East Room and introduced him to the young audience, many of them wearing costumes of their native countries. Later, after the concert, Luci rushed forward to shake Mr. Leinsdorf's hand and said "Oh, it was just lovely."

Luci wore a pale blue suit with a scarf of two shades of pink. Her sister, Lynda, wore a deep pink wool dress.

After the concert, punch and cookies were served in the State Dining Room.

Cabaret Tonight

BON SOIR, 40 West Eighth Street. Marge Cameron, singer-comedienne; Jerry Collins, comedian. Held over: Karen Anders and Peggy Hadley, comedy team.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
D. 283,075 - SUN. 339,766

The Evening Star
WASHINGTON, D. C.
1 1964

Luci Baines Is Symphony Hostess

She Delights Embassy Children at White House

By DAISY CLELAND
Staff Writer

Luci Baines Johnson, younger daughter of President and Mrs. Johnson, held an impromptu press conference yesterday afternoon without even realizing it.

She admitted that she is not politically inclined.

Miss Johnson found herself surrounded by reporters in the State Dining room at a concert-tea-party planned by her mother for diplomatic children.

When asked about her present life in the White House and the implications of her father's life on her, she said: "My mother, my father, my family are politically oriented. . . . I am not."

She went on to speak about the press, saying that they were fine. . . . "Be nice to them, be natural and be yourself, and they'll be nice, too."

And for the Secret Servicemen that must now be with her all the time, she felt about the same way.

Luci explained that when she goes out on a date she must have Secret Servicemen with her but again added that if you are nice to them they will also be the same to you.

As for her present life in the "gold fish bowl," she says: "Quite frankly, sometimes the bad points thoroughly outweigh the good, but not usually."

Finally, that President's daughter said that, rather than politics, she would like to play a role in science — a laboratory technician. But she played herself down on that by saying that you have to be very good in science and in math. The science, she wasn't worried about, but the math . . . "yes."

For Embassy Children

As another observation, the 16-year-old said: "I just die when I think what I say may be history."

The party yesterday was in honor of diplomatic daughters and sons who were invited to come to the East Room of the White House and hear a concert by part of the Boston Symphony under the direction of the director, Erich Leinsdorf, and then join in an informal party of punch and cookies in the State dining room with Luci and her older sister, Lynda Bird.

There were about 200 youngsters there, with Luci acting as hostess in the absence of her mother, who was in Texas receiving a degree. (The President returned late last evening.) The program was all Strauss and the guests seemed to love every minute of it.

In greeting the guests and the conductor (the program was on live television), Luci said:

"What a wonderful privilege it is for me to welcome you to today's special 'first' concert in the White House by the Boston Symphony orchestra. My name is Luci Johnson. Mr. Erich Leinsdorf, musical director of the Boston Symphony, has planned a delightful all-Strauss concert for us."

The conductor then explained briefly what the program would be but first said: "It was very good of the President and Mrs. Johnson to make this afternoon possible. It is for us an important event, for we can pay our respects to this great and courageous couple."

During the concert, Mr. Leinsdorf, with his own accent, told the guests and his television audience that there were only 30 members of the 106-member orchestra and that many of them hailed from foreign countries, including Greece, Italy and Russia but that "they are all American citizens now and they are all speaking, rather well, the language of music. Tell your people back in your countries this."

The Boston Symphony, under the direction of Erich Leinsdorf, rehearses in the East Room of the White House before yesterday's concert for diplomatic children.

Maestro Eric Leinsdorf talks with presidential daughter Lynda in the Blue Room before the concert began.—AP Photos.

Mr. and Mrs. Leinsdorf are old friends of President and Mrs. Johnson and they dined at the White House together recently. The President, when he was a member of Congress, sponsored the conductor for citizenship.

Far From Home

The two Johnson daughters and Lynda Bird's close friend, Warrie Lynn Smith, mixed easily with the guests in the State Dining Room after the concert.

Lynda Bird in her conversation showed her interest in languages, but was also full of her family's Texas charm.

To one guest in her national dress, Lynda Bird asked where she was from. The teen-ager announced that it was the Republic of China, to which Lynda Bird replied with a grin, "I'm almost as far away from home as you are." To another from Viet Nam, she said that her family had "loved" their visit there when they were on their round-the-world trip (when the President was Vice President) and that she wished she, too, had been on the trip.

Lynda Bird, wearing a deep pink dress with a strand of pearls entwined with a gold chain and a gold Cross (the Cross was given to her by her paternal grandmother, Mrs. Samuel Ealy Johnson, when she was confirmed), did have her complaints about press reports about her romance with her Naval officer finance . . . "Why don't they let me make my own wedding plans?" she wondered.

One young guest, who was getting a special tour of the rooms of the White House was Joan Goldberg, 11. The blind youngster was with her mother, Mrs. Jerald Goldberg. She plays the piano and composes music and reportedly is the granddaughter of a close friend of Mrs. Johnson's.

Luci Baines, wearing a blue linen suit with a red and pink scarf tucked around her neck, played the perfect role of a hostess . . . she was most interested in what everyone else was wearing. But most of all she commented on the guests in their national dress.

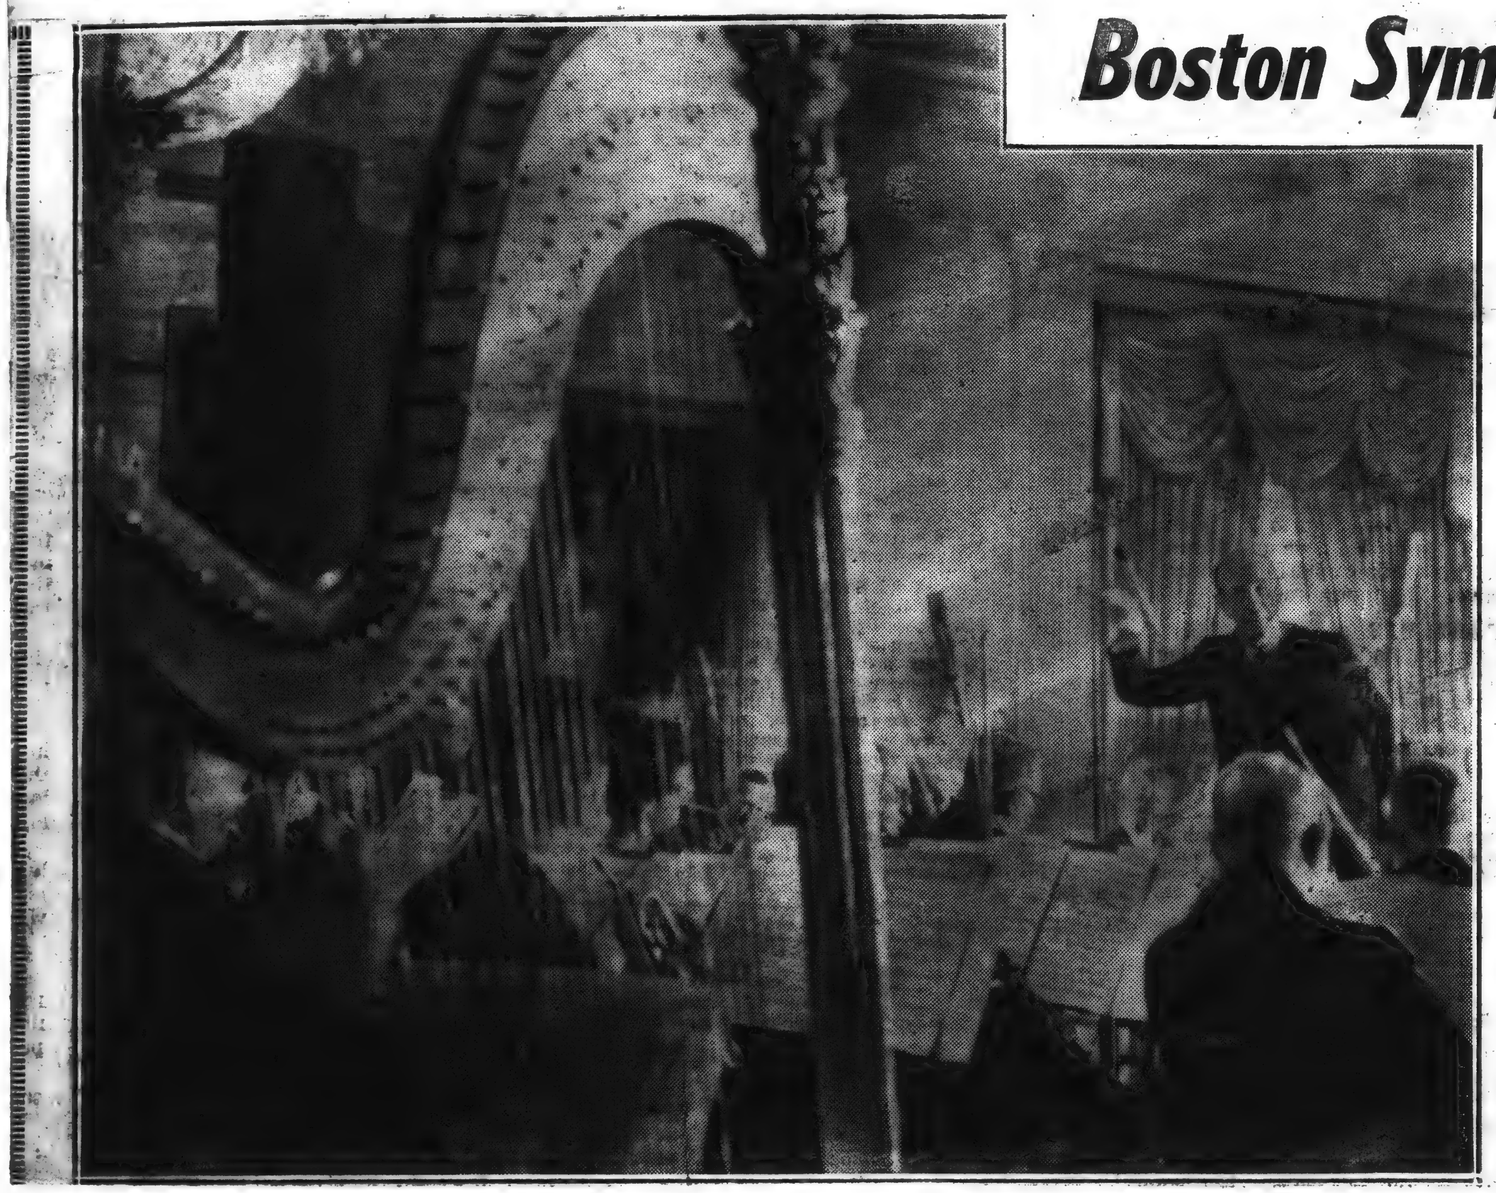
This, she exclaimed, was "the greatest."

135-

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Record-American (m) (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 531,565
APR 1 1964

B4

Boston Symphony at White House Concert



UNDER the able direction of Erich Leinsdorf, The Boston Symphony Orchestra, left, rehearses in the East Room of the White House for a concert for foreign embassy children. At right, Luci Baines Johnson, 16, the youngest daughter of the President, primps up in antique desk mirror in the Red Room before serving as hostess. She opened the concert by introducing Leinsdorf.

(AP Wirephoto and UPI Telephoto)

$50.00
IN WEEKLY PRIZES FOR NEWS,
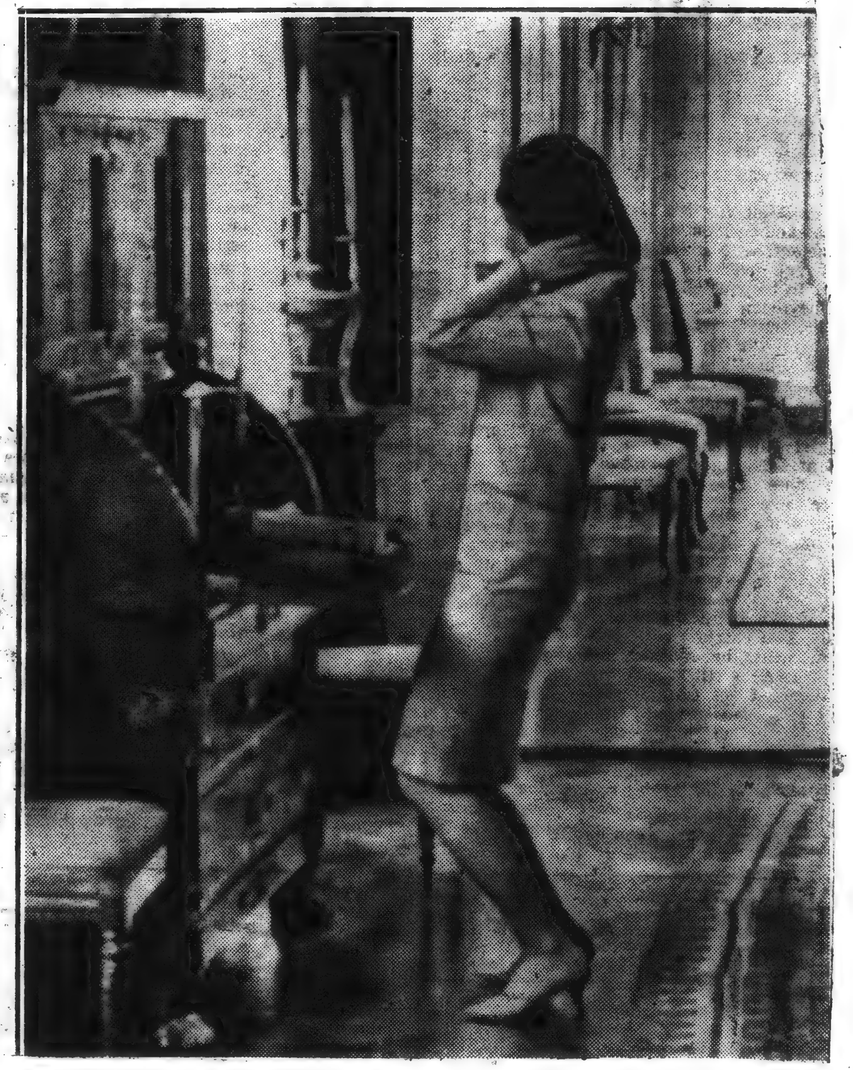
PICTURE TIPS
Call City Desk
LI 2-4000



THE WASHING
WASHIN
D. 200,5
APR 1
80—IN

FOR the first concert for ised live at t
. There were 2
people, M to 21,
an gilt chairs room. The su rich and elegan murmured gent
Suddenly a air.
"Quiet — qu minute til sie t
And the sho very unaccid and Luci! stepped forth young people concert perform bers of the B
Orchestra, cond
Leinsdorf.
President an weren't there. from Texas last
Luci and h
Lynda Bird, w
but Luci stepp
fore the camer
Afterward sh been so nervou shaking, but Lo
everyone.
"Wasn't sh she great?"
As the sisters to the State D punch and co
Luci's hand warmth.
Show Wo
THE concert and meet disappeared by slipped away
exams today.
Luci stayed 11 guests, 7
aides, 3 secr
press.
Luci explain living in the and had P Service (s but be good good to you as Secret Se ("my father,
are politicall
. . . I'm ences and nfluen larved and a hayseed
The pur turned 17 until Wed her "every Luci oriented son's best
She's earnest, int young.
The ected
Monday
the Nation

137

...N DAILY NEWS

50—WORLD OF WOMEN

Stanlee Miller

After Strauss, Luci Talked Until the Guests Had Left

FOR the first time yesterday a concert for guests was televised live at the White House.

There were 250 embassy young people, 16 to 21, seated demurely on gilt chairs in the East Room. The surroundings were cool and elegant and the voices were hushed gently.

Suddenly a shout knifed the air:

"Quiet — quiet, please, one minute til air time."

And the show was on. Four very uncandid cameras rolled and Luci Baines Johnson stepped forth to welcome the young people to an all-Strauss concert performed by 36 members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Erich Leinsdorf.

President and Mrs. Johnson weren't there. They returned from Texas last night.

Luci and her older sister, Lynda Bird, were co-hostesses, but Luci stepped out alone before the cameras.

Afterward she confessed she'd been so nervous her hands were shaking, but Lynda kept telling everyone:

"Wasn't she good?, wasn't she great?"

As the sisters led their guests to the State Dining Room for punch and cookies, Lynda took Luci's hand with affectionate warmth.

Before the concert, left to right: Erich Leinsdorf, orchestra director; Lynda Bird and Luci Baines.

—UPI Photo

Show Went On

THE concert was at 4 p. m. and most of the guests had disappeared by 5:30 when Lynda slipped away to study for two exams today.

Luci stayed on, however, with 11 guests, 7 waiters, 5 military aides, 3 secretaries and the press.

Luci explained her ideas on living in the White House (good and bad points); the Secret Service (3 on a date are rough but be good to them and they're good to you); the press (same as Secret Service); her family ("my father, mother and sister are politically oriented; I'm not . . . I'm interested in the sciences and in being a lab technician . . . but there are haves and have-nots and I'm a have-not scholastically.").

The punch fountain was turned off but Luci went on until Wendy Marcus reminded her "everybody's gone."

Luci may not be politically oriented, but she's the Johnson's best public relations aide. She's disarmingly unaffected, earnest, intent, and charmingly young.

The Boston Symphony canceled its scheduled concerts here Monday and Tuesday because the National Symphony is striking; the special White House trip from Boston cost from 5 to 7 thousand dollars.

Boston's Policy

SINCE management is a major item in the Symphony's strike, there were questions about Boston's management. Mr. Leinsdorf had Rosario Mazzeo, the Symphony's personnel manager for 31 years, explain its operation.

As Musical Director, Mr. Leinsdorf has complete musical responsibility about rearranging seating. If he wants to release a musician, and the musician objects, then committees on renewals and dismissals meet. One committee is elected from the orchestra and the other from the Symphony's trustees. The committees iron out any problem.

"It's never gotten beyond this," Mr. Mazzeo said, "and it rarely gets to that stage. It's so hard to get into our orchestra that once a man is in the chances are we want him for keeps. I'm sure we're the happiest orchestra in the world."

WASHINGTON WORLD
WASHINGTON, D. C.
W. 10,000

MAR 3 0 1964

MAKING MUSIC with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, director Eric Leinsdorf will conduct two separate programs at Constitution Hall March 30 and 31. Program of the National Symphony-sponsored concert will feature soprano Phyllis Curtin on Monday night, Beethoven's Symphony No. 7 on Tuesday.

The Evening Star
WASHINGTON, D. C.
D. 258,167 S. 313,112

MAR 2 8 1964

Musician Strike Cancels Boston Symphony Here

Effects of the National Symphony Orchestra musicians' strike are beginning to be felt in Boston and Philadelphia.

A press officer for the Boston Symphony Orchestra announced yesterday that two Constitution Hall concerts which the Boston Symphony expected to give here next Monday and Tuesday have been canceled.

In Philadelphia, a petition sympathizing with the Washington strikers was signed by 97 members of the Philadelphia Orchestra.

The two parties to the dispute here—the musicians and officials of the National Symphony Orchestra Association—have not held a joint session since Tuesday. No further talks have been arranged.

'Purge' Charged

The musicians' union, Local 161 of the American Federation of Musicians, called the strike in protest against what the union termed a "purge" of orchestra members who were active in last fall's contract dispute. They claimed that 16 musicians were involved in a series of dismissals, demotions, extended probations and other personnel shifts.

Howard Mitchell, National Symphony conductor, denied at a press conference yesterday that the non-renewal of five musicians' contracts and other personnel changes were reprisals for union activity.

Referring to the union's demand for a freeze of present positions in the orchestra, Mr. Mitchell declared: "There has never been a request like this in the history of American symphony orchestras, and the meaning of it would be that the National Symphony could never be improved."

Cancellation of the two Boston Symphony concerts will not jeopardize a special concert by a group of 36 members of the Boston orchestra at the White House on Tuesday afternoon. The concert, to be given at the invitation of Mrs. Johnson, will be for 200 children from foreign embassies in Washington.

Boston Cancels Concerts

A spokesman for the Boston orchestra said orchestra members were informed by the national office of the American Federation of Musicians that they should not perform under auspices of the National Symphony during the dispute. The two Constitution Hall concerts were to be part of a National Symphony series.

Members of the Boston orchestra voted not to cross picket lines if any are set up, and the concerts were dropped.

The petition signed by Philadelphia Orchestra requested the musicians union in Philadelphia to deny Dr. Mitchell the privilege of conducting within the jurisdiction of Local 77, the Philadelphia unit of the American Federation of Musicians.

The Philadelphians also voted to send financial aid to the National Symphony musicians.

In still another move, the Philadelphia musicians contacted the International Conference of Symphony and Opera Musicians with a request that all member orchestras be urged to take supporting actions similar to those taken by the Philadelphia musicians.

Seven weeks remain in the National Symphony's current season. Spring appearances scheduled before the strike included the Music for Young America series. Two Tiny Tots concerts which were to be given at the Sheraton-Park Hotel tomorrow afternoon under auspices of Radio Station WGMS have been canceled, as has a Fairfax Youth Concert, sponsored by Mrs. Jouett Shouse, scheduled for Tuesday.

THE WASHINGTON DAILY NEWS
WASHINGTON, D. C.
166

1 1964

50—WORLD OF WOMEN

Stanlee Miller

After Strauss, Luci Talked Until the Guests Had Left

FOR the first time yesterday a concert for guests was televised live at the White House.

There were 250 embassy young people, 16 to 21, seated demurely on gilt chairs in the East Room. The surroundings were rich and elegant and the voices murmured gently.

Suddenly a shout knifed the air:

"Quiet — quiet, please, one minute til air time."

And the show was on. Four very uncandid cameras rolled and Luci Baines Johnson stepped forth to welcome the young people to an all-Strauss concert performed by 36 members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Erich Leinsdorf.

President and Mrs. Johnson weren't there. They returned from Texas last night.

Luci and her older sister, Lynda Bird, were co-hostesses, but Luci stepped out alone before the cameras.

Afterward she confessed she'd been so nervous her hands were shaking, but Lynda kept telling everyone:

"Wasn't she good?, wasn't she great?"

As the sisters led their guests to the State Dining Room for punch and cookies, Lynda took Luci's hand with affectionate warmth.

Show Went On

THE concert was at 4 p. m. and most of the guests had disappeared by 5:30 when Lynda slipped away to study for two exams today.

Luci stayed on, however, with 11 guests, 7 waiters, 5 military aides, 3 secretaries and the press.

Luci explained her ideas on: living in the White House (good and bad points); the Secret Service (3 on a date are rough but be good to them and they're good to you); the press (same as Secret Service); her family ("my father, mother and sister are politically oriented; I'm not . . . I'm interested in the sciences and in being a lab technician . . . but there are haves and have-nots and I'm a have-not scholastically.").

The punch fountain was turned off but Luci went on until Wendy Marcus reminded her "everybody's gone."

Luci may not be politically oriented, but she's the Johnson's best public relations aide. She's disarmingly unaffected, earnest, intent, and charmingly young.

The Boston Symphony canceled its scheduled concerts here Monday and Tuesday because the National Symphony is striking; the special White House trip from Boston cost from 5 to 7 thousand dollars.

Before the concert, left to right: Erich Leinsdorf, orchestra director; Lynda Bird and Luci Baines. —UPI Photo

Boston's Policy

SINCE management is a major item in the Symphony's strike, there were questions about Boston's management. Mr. Leinsdorf had Rosario Mazzeo, the Symphony's personnel manager for 31 years, explain its operation.

As Musical Director, Mr. Leinsdorf has complete musical responsibility about rearranging seating. If he wants to release a musician, and the musician objects, then committees on renewals and dismissals meet. One committee is elected from the orchestra and the other from the Symphony's trustees. The committees iron out any problem.

"It's never gotten beyond this," Mr. Mazzeo said, "and it rarely gets to that stage. It's so hard to get into our orchestra that once a man is in the chances are we want him for keeps. I'm sure we're the happiest orchestra in the world."

WASHINGTON WORLD
WASHINGTON, D. C.
W. 10,000

MAR 3 0 1964

MAKING MUSIC with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, director Eric Leinsdorf will conduct two separate programs at Constitution Hall March 30 and 31. Program of the National Symphony-sponsored concert will feature soprano Phyllis Curtin on Monday night, Beethoven's Symphony No. 7 on Tuesday.

The Evening Star
WASHINGTON, D. C.
D. 258,167 S. 313,112

MAR 2 8 1964

Musician Strike Cancels Boston Symphony Here

Effects of the National Symphony Orchestra musicians' strike are beginning to be felt in Boston and Philadelphia.

A press officer for the Boston Symphony Orchestra announced yesterday that two Constitution Hall concerts which the Boston Symphony expected to give here next Monday and Tuesday have been canceled.

In Philadelphia, a petition sympathizing with the Washington strikers was signed by 97 members of the Philadelphia Orchestra.

The two parties to the dispute here—the musicians and officials of the National Symphony Orchestra Association—have not held a joint session since Tuesday. No further talks have been arranged.

'Purge' Charged

The musicians' union, Local 161 of the American Federation of Musicians, called the strike in protest against what the union termed a "purge" of orchestra members who were active in last fall's contract dispute. They claimed that 16 musicians were involved in a series of dismissals, demotions, extended probations and other personnel shifts.

Howard Mitchell, National Symphony conductor, denied at a press conference yesterday that the non-renewal of five musicians' contracts and other personnel changes were reprisals for union activity.

Referring to the union's demand for a freeze of present positions in the orchestra, Mr. Mitchell declared: "There has never been a request like this in the history of American symphony orchestras, and the meaning of it would be that the National Symphony could never be improved."

Cancellation of the two Boston Symphony concerts will not jeopardize a special concert by a group of 36 members of the Boston orchestra at the White House on Tuesday afternoon. The concert, to be given at the invitation of Mrs. Johnson, will be for 200 children from foreign embassies in Washington.

Boston Cancels Concerts

A spokesman for the Boston orchestra said orchestra members were informed by the national office of the American Federation of Musicians that they should not perform under auspices of the National Symphony during the dispute. The two Constitution Hall concerts were to be part of a National Symphony series.

Members of the Boston orchestra voted not to cross picket lines if any are set up and the concerts were dropped.

The petition signed by Philadelphia Orchestra requested the musicians union in Philadelphia to deny Dr. Mitchell the privilege of conducting within the jurisdiction of Local 77, the Philadelphia unit of the American Federation of Musicians.

The Philadelphians also voted to send financial aid to the National Symphony musicians.

In still another move, the Philadelphia musicians contacted the International Conference of Symphony and Opera Musicians with a request that all member orchestras be urged to take supporting actions similar to those taken by the Philadelphia musicians.

Seven weeks remain in the National Symphony's current season. Spring appearances scheduled before the strike included the Music for Young America series. Two Tiny Tots concerts which were to be given at the Sheraton-Park Hotel tomorrow afternoon under auspices of Radio Station WGMS have been canceled, as has a Fairfax Youth Concert, sponsored by Mrs. Jouett Shouse, scheduled for Tuesday.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
News (e)
SPRINGFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 101,591
MAR 30 1964

Stop the Music

Two scheduled concerts this week by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Constitution Hall, Washington, D. C., under the auspices of the National Symphony Orchestra have been canceled as the consequence of a labor dispute in the nation's capital. And that is not only a sad thing for the audiences who will be deprived of the concerts, but also a cause for distress on the part of all who love and appreciate fine music.

That an instrument of such musical perfection as the Boston Symphony should be rendered mute through no fault of its own is not a matter to be treated lightly. The labor dispute is not Boston's. It is, rather, one solely between Local 161 of the American Federation of Musicians and the National Symphony. The involvement stems from the fact that canceled concerts were to have been part of a series presented by the National Symphony and the labor union served notice on the Boston not to perform under the auspices of the National.

In what must be regarded as an euphemistic understatement, George Zazofsky, violinist and chairman of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Members' Committee, said in regard to the concert cancellations, "The musicians of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, as members of the American Federation of Musicians, elected not to cross any possible picket lines of members of the National Symphony Orchestra and to abide by the notification of the union." The fact is that the notification amounted to an edict and was accepted as such.

Whatever is at issue as regards Local 161 of the American Federation of Musicians and the National Symphony is between these two and if the local wishes to strike that is its business, but to deny Washingtonians the privilege of hearing the Boston Symphony is quite something else. This is a wrong done to culture. The opportunity to hear great music as the Boston Symphony can and does interpret it under the baton of Erich Leinsdorf is severely limited, outside of Boston and Tanglewood, by time, geography and the seating capacity of halls performed in. Only a few, relatively, among all who might be presumed to treasure the privilege, can ever see and hear on tour the Boston Symphony as presently constituted.

The American Federation of Musicians, in its notification to the Boston Symphony as an accommodation to Local 161, has cost the music world two precious concerts. Even if the audiences presently deprived are compensated later, it will probably be at the expense of concerts elsewhere for which time will not permit scheduling. This is a grevious loss, and it could happen here, or anywhere and at any time.

To do what it has done is entirely within the rights of the American Federation of Musicians, and as union members the musicians of the Boston Symphony had justification for acting in accordance with the notification they received. But should such a thing as this happen? Will the end justify the means? What can be accomplished by these cancellations that will atone in the place of the irreplaceable?

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Evening Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 146,915
MAR 28 1964

Capital Concerts Off

Picket Line Mutes Boston Symphony

WASHINGTON—The Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday announced that it has canceled two concerts here next week because Washington's own National Symphony Orchestra is out on strike.

The Boston orchestra said its members were told by the National Federation of Musicians that they should not perform at Constitution Hall here under National Symphony auspices during the present dispute.

The Boston musicians chose not to cross any possible picket lines, a spokesman for the Boston Symphony said.

Thirty-six members of the Boston Symphony still will come to Washington on Tuesday for an afternoon concert for 200 embassy children at the White House.

Lynda Bird and Luci Baines Johnson will be co-hostesses to the children from Embassy Row Tuesday.

Mrs. Johnson invited Eric Leinsdorf, an old friend of the Johnsons, to conduct the concert at the White House but she will miss is because she will still be in Texas.

Lynda and Luci will represent the first family also at the traditional Easter egg roll Monday on the South lawn of the executive mansion.

Because Lynda, a student at George Washington University, has classes on Monday morning, the two girls are expected to make their appearance or the second-floor balcony at 12:30 p.m.

While the President and Mrs. Johnson are at the LBJ ranch over the holiday, Lynda and Luci are staying at the White House chaperoned by Willie Day Taylor, a long-time member of the President's staff.

Lynda's fiance, Lt. (J.G.) Bernard Rosenbach, arrived Thursday night and is a weekend guest at the White House.

Lynda and Luci plan to attend Easter services Sunday but a spokesman said it is not known which church they will attend. The girls are Episcopalian. Rosenbach is a Catholic.

(Washington Post–L.A. Times)

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Record-American (m) (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 531,565
MAR 2[illegible] 1964

Hub Symphony Bars D.C. Date

There will be no Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts in Constitution Hall, Washington, D. C., next Monday and Tuesday.

Boston's musicians declined "to cross any possible picket lines of members of the National Symphony Orchestra," it was announced from Symphony Hall Friday.

Moreover, the players have agreed to waive their fees for one of the pair of concerts, since the corporation's receipts will be lost.

Both Henry B. Cabot, president of the orchestra trustees, and Erich Leinsdorf, BSO music director, acclaimed the musicians' forthright stand.

THE WASHINGTON DAILY NEWS
WASHINGTON, D. C.
D. 103,013 S. 156,632
PAGE ONE CERTIFIED
MAR 27 1964

Boston Symphony Won't Appear

Concerts by the Boston Symphony scheduled for Constitutional Hall on Monday and Tuesday have definitely been canceled, the National Symphony Association announced today. Single ticketholders can obtain refunds at the box office at 1108 G-st nw and subscribers will get pro rata refunds by mail. No decision has been made on the last remaining pair of National Symphony concerts on April 7 and 8 with pianist Van Cliburn as soloist.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 465,653
MAR 29 1964

Hub Symphony Still To Play At White House

Although the Boston Symphony Orchestra has cancelled its concerts in Washington Monday and Tuesday, 36 members of the orchestra will play at the White House Tuesday afternoon.

A labor dispute between Local 161 of the American Federation of Musicians and the National Symphony Orchestra of Washington caused the cancellation.

Boston musicians elected not to cross the picket lines.

At the White House concert, Lynda Bird and Luci Baines Johnson will be co-hostesses to the 200 children from Embassy Row.

Mrs. Johnson invited Erich Leinsdorf, an old friend of the family to conduct the concert. She will be unable to attend because she and the President are in Johnson City, Texas.

The New York Times
D. 681,612 S. [illegible]
MAR 28 1964

BOSTONIANS CANCEL 2 CAPITAL CONCERTS

Special to The New York Times

BOSTON, March 27—The Boston Symphony has canceled its programs scheduled for Monday and Tuesday at Constitution Hall in Washington.

Local 161 of the American Federation of Musicians is on strike against Washington's National Symphony Orchestra. The Boston Symphony said its members had been informed by the federation that they should not perform under the auspices of the National Symphony during the dispute. The Boston Symphony's two Washington concerts were to have been guest performances in the National Symphony series.

A concert for children of foreign diplomats by 36 members of the Boston Symphony will be given as planned Monday at the White House.

The Boston Symphony will give its scheduled Philharmonic Hall concert Wednesday in New York.

Boston Symphony members have voted to waive pay for one of the canceled concerts. They will be paid for the other. Erich Leinsdorf, the Boston conductor, has requested the Boston management to withhold part of his salary. Half the amount withheld will go to management, the other half to the orchestra's pension fund "in gratitude for the orchestra's stand on the matter," Mr. Leinsdorf said.

Journal American
[illegible] N.Y.
[illegible]

[illegible]
[illegible]
[illegible]
PAGE ONE

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

News (e)
GARDNER, Mass.
Circ. 7,341

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Transcript-Telegram (e)
HOLYOKE, Mass.
Circ. 26,214

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Sun (e)
LOWELL, Mass.
Circ. 45,001

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

News (e)
SPRINGFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 101,591

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Call (e)
WOONSOCKET, R. I.
Circ. 26,710

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

News-Tribune (e)
WALTHAM, Mass.
Circ. 15,819

[illegible]

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Recorder-Gazette (e)
GREENFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 13,354

MAR 28 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Enterprise & Times (e)
BROCKTON, Mass.
Circ. 45,777

28 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Standard-Times (e)
NEW BEDFORD, Mass.
Circ. 65,046

MAR 28 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Sunday Advertiser
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 448,810

MAR 29 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Gazette (e)
WORCESTER, Mass.
Circ. 93,580

MAR 28 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Express (e)
PORTLAND, Me.
Circ. 28,962

MAR 28 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Sunday Post
BRIDGEPORT, Conn.
Circ. 73,711

MAR 29 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

American (e)
WATERBURY, Conn.
Circ. 41,020

MAR 28 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Morning Eagle-Tribune
LAWRENCE, Mass.
Comb. Circ. 41,344

MAR 28 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Journal (e)
LEWISTON-AUBURN, Me.
Circ. 14,063

MAR 28 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Union (m)
SPRINGFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 83,691

MAR 28 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Journal (m)
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
Circ. 61,299

MAR 28 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Herald (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 178,553

MAR 28 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Herald News (e)
FALL RIVER, Mass.
Circ. 40,785

MAR 28 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Traveler (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 164,299

MAR 28 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Register (e)
NEW HAVEN, Conn.
Circ. 97,672

MAR 28 1964

Two Concerts Cancelled By Labor Dispute

BOSTON (AP) — The Boston Symphony Orchestra announced Friday it has withdrawn from two concerts scheduled for March 30 and 31, in Constitution Hall, Washington, because of a labor dispute between Local 161 of the American Federation of Musicians and the National Symphony Orchestra of Washington, D. C.

The Boston concerts were to have been a part of a series presented by the National Symphony.

Boston Symphony said its members were informed by the national office of the American Federation they should not perform under the auspices of National Symphony during the present dispute.

Boston Symphony musicians elected not to cross any possible picket lines and to abide by the union's notification.

Thirty-six Boston Symphony musicians will play a concert at the White House Tuesday afternoon, March 31 at the invitation of Mrs. Lyndon Johnson for an audience of 200 children of the embassy delegations to the United States.

139

140

TOUR #5

NEW YORK.

SATURDAY REVIEW
NEW YORK, N.Y.
W. 339,455

APR 18 1964

The second season of New York concerts by the Boston Symphony under Erich Leinsdorf's direction ended pretty much where the first one began. There was cleanly conscientious, unified performance from the orchestra, even more emphasis on minutiae of musical grammar and rhetoric. But too little that was either illuminating or soul-satisfying.

This applied especially to the first of the pair, in which Leinsdorf led the Fidelio Overture of Beethoven and Strauss's Also sprach Zarathustra and Van Cliburn was soloist in the D-minor Concerto of Brahms. One can only imagine how long a performance of Fidelio might take if prefaced by such a playing of the overture, so deliberately did it go. Perhaps Leinsdorf was pacing it to cover the dilatory arrival of his soloist at the hall (a bit of non-professionalism that has become something of a habit with Cliburn). Unfortunately the mood carried over into the concerto, which had two tempi: slow and slower. The soloist picked up the pace for the finale, where he has the opening to himself; but it was disjointed, non-embracing Brahms that came to hearing. Even Cliburn's sizable pianistic power was not applied to the most useful result. Zarathustra was articulated with care, and to a high order of exactitude, but with rather more calculation than conviction.

—IRVING KOLODIN.

New York Post
D. 372,679 S. 255,557

APR 1 1964

Music Tonight...

Boston Symphony, Erich Leinsdorf conducting, Van Cliburn, pianist, in Brahms D Minor Concerto, No. 1; Strauss' "Also sprach Zarathustra," Philharmonic Hall, 8:30.

NEW YORKER
NEW YORK, N.Y.
W. 468,419

APR 11 1964

ON Wednesday and Friday evenings, I attended the Philharmonic Hall concerts of the Boston Symphony, under Erich Leinsdorf. Wednesday night brought forth one of the most brilliant virtuoso performances of Strauss's "Thus Spake Zarathustra" I have ever heard—one that might almost have convinced me that the superman philosophy of Nietzsche, which inspired the work, had something to it after all. Earlier in the evening, Van Cliburn appeared as soloist in Brahms' First Piano Concerto. He turned a rather nice Romantic phrase here and there, but neither he nor Mr. Leinsdorf seemed able to project the oceanic surge of tone and feeling that this wonderful concerto contains. On Friday night, there were two contemporary works of interest: Aaron Copland's very early Symphony for Organ and Orchestra, and Stravinsky's Concerto in D for Violin and Orchestra. Neither had been heard hereabouts for some time. The symphony is one of Copland's more attractive compositions, being essentially Impressionistic—despite a great deal of thematic to-do, which I would have missed if the program notes had not called my attention to it—and pleasing in its complex contrasts of color, and capable of conveying mood. The Stravinsky concerto, whose solo part was meticulously played by Joseph Silverstein, dates from a time when there was a close kinship between the styles of Stravinsky and Prokofieff. It is basically a satirical composition, slyly caricaturing the clichés of second-rate violin music and reflecting the idiom of everybody from Bach to Saint-Saëns. It was a lot of fun. Mr. Leinsdorf followed it with a rather brisk performance of Beethoven's Seventh Symphony. —WINTHROP SARGEANT

MUSICAL AMERICA
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 15,900

MAY 1964

Boston Symphony

Erich Leinsdorf's Teutonic orientation was in full display in the program he led with the Boston Symphony at Philharmonic Hall on April 1: Beethoven's "Fidelio" Overture, Brahms' Piano Concerto No. 1, with Van Cliburn as soloist, and Strauss' "Also sprach Zarathustra."

The winds in the Beethoven—especially the horns—were flabby, but elsewhere the orchestral performances were firm and virile. Mr. Leinsdorf approached the Brahms as if it were a contemporary work, emphasizing its compositional elements rather than its romanticism, its rude strength over its lyricism. Though he comes from a more recent generation, Mr. Cliburn is a much more romantic musician than Mr. Leinsdorf, and gave a more traditionally 19th-century performance, paying close attention to the work's melodic content and employing an extensive dynamic vocabulary and mostly well-chosen rubatos. The difference between his approach and Leinsdorf's made the piece an exciting combat—not the unanimous collaboration that is usually strived for, but nonetheless a valid interpretation.

Mr. Leinsdorf put the orchestra through its paces in "Zarathustra." A shade of the possible excitement was wanting, but for the most part the piece crashed along in grand fashion.

M.B.

The New York Times
D. 680,265 S. 1,306,418

APR 2, 1964

Music: 'Zarathustra'

Whitestone

Van Cliburn at piano in rehearsal with Erich Leinsdorf

Leinsdorf Leads Tone Poem by Strauss

By HAROLD C. SCHONBERG

IN a way, the Richard Strauss symphonic poem, "Also sprach Zarathustra," belongs to the Boston Symphony. It was that orchestra which, under Serge Koussevitzky, made the first great recording of the work. That was in the middle nineteen-thirties, and many of us grew up on it. Of course, it takes no less than an orchestra the caliber of the Boston Symphony to engage "Also sprach Zarathustra." Not only is it one of the most overscored pieces in musical history. It also is one of the more difficult.

Erich Leinsdorf conducted it last night in Philharmonic Hall. He conducted from memory, quite a feat in itself. And it was apparent that he really had it memorized, for he indicated not only the big contours of the work but also everything in between. Mr. Leinsdorf has an analytical mind, and one guesses that "Also sprach Zarathustra" delights him the way situs analysis delights a certain type of mathematical mind.

●

Koussevitzky used to make a big, colorful splurge out of "Zarathustra." There was plenty of color in Mr. Leinsdorf's work last night, but that was not the prevailing impression his performance left. What he strove for was logic, clarity, relationships, architecture. He also favored a tight rhythmic scheme. Even in the beginning, where the temptation must be irresistible to broaden out, Mr. Leinsdorf was almost metronome-like in his insistence on a steady meter. In short, he immediately established what he was going to do.

One could not recollect, when it was all over, having heard a more precise performance, and that includes the work of Fritz Reiner. One could recollect, though, more songful performance. The last part of the score is full of anticipation of "Rosenkavalier," and it would have been rewarding had Mr. Leinsdorf relaxed a bit. But one cannot have everything, and Mr. Leinsdorf's most musi-cianly ideas, plus some remarkable playing from the orchestra, were enough of a reward.

If memory serves, Van Cliburn had not previously played the Brahms D minor Concerto in New York, though he had been heard in the B flat. His performance was on the careful side, with tempos just a shade slow and with a lack of spontaneity. Mr. Cliburn has not yet made this concerto his own. His lack of identification showed up most in the slow movement, which was very much on the surface. The notes were played with accuracy, but they seemed to be disconnected, and the big sweep of song was lacking.

●

In the outer movements Mr. Cliburn and Mr. Leinsdorf kept things moving in a steady manner, though here again there was little imagination or flair. The technique gave the pianist no trouble. He wrapped his big hands around the writing, and many of those awkward left-hand stretches just rolled over and played dead for him. Sometimes being able to take a 12th has its advantages. With this kind of control over the mechanics, there is no reason to doubt that Mr. Cliburn will eventually work his way into the musical part of the concerto.

Beethoven's "Fidelio" Overture opened the program. Some of the players had not yet warmed up, and there were some very un-Boston bobbles. Then everybody settled down to do justice to Mr. Leinsdorf's conception of Beethoven.

The Program

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Erich Leinsdorf, conductor, with Van Cliburn, pianist. At Philharmonic Hall.

Overture to Fidelio.....Beethoven
Piano Concerto No. 1 in D minor.Brahms
Also sprach Zarathustra.....Strauss

140

TOUR #5

NEW YORK.

SATURDAY REVIEW
NEW YORK, N.Y.
W. 339,455

APR 18 1964

The second season of New York concerts by the Boston Symphony under Erich Leinsdorf's direction ended pretty much where the first one began. There was cleanly conscientious, unified performance from the orchestra, even more emphasis on minutiae of musical grammar and rhetoric. But too little that was either illuminating or soul-satisfying.

This applied especially to the first of the pair, in which Leinsdorf led the Fidelio Overture of Beethoven and Strauss's Also sprach Zarathustra and Van Cliburn was soloist in the D-minor Concerto of Brahms. One can only imagine how long a performance of Fidelio might take if prefaced by such a playing of the overture, so deliberately did it go. Perhaps Leinsdorf was pacing it to cover the dilatory arrival of his soloist at the hall (a bit of non-professionalism that has become something of a habit with Cliburn). Unfortunately the mood carried over into the concerto, which had two tempi slow and slower. The soloist picked up the pace for the finale, where he has the opening to himself; but it was disjointed, non-embracing Brahms that came to hearing. Even Cliburn's sizable pianistic power was not applied to the most useful result. Zarathustra was articulated with care, and to a high order of exactitude, but with rather more calculation than conviction.

—IRVING KOLODIN.

New York Post
D. 372,679 S. 255,557

APR 1 1964

Music Tonight . . .

Boston Symphony, Erich Leinsdorf conducting, Van Cliburn, pianist, in Brahms' D Minor Concerto, No. 1; Strauss' "Also sprach Zarathustra," Philharmonic Hall, 8:30.

NEW YORKER
NEW YORK, N.Y.
W. 488,418

APR 11 1964

ON Wednesday and Friday evenings, I attended the Philharmonic Hall concerts of the Boston Symphony, under Erich Leinsdorf. Wednesday night brought forth one of the most brilliant virtuoso performances of Strauss's "Thus Spake Zarathustra" I have ever heard—one that might almost have convinced me that the superman philosophy of Nietzsche, which inspired the work, had something to it after all. Earlier in the evening, Van Cliburn appeared as soloist in Brahms' First Piano Concerto. He turned a rather nice Romantic phrase here and there, but neither he nor Mr. Leinsdorf seemed able to project the oceanic surge of tone and feeling that this wonderful concerto contains. On Friday night, there were two contemporary works of interest: Aaron Copland's very early Symphony for Organ and Orchestra, and Stravinsky's Concerto in D for Violin and Orchestra. Neither had been heard hereabouts for some time. The symphony is one of Copland's more attractive compositions, being essentially Impressionistic—despite a great deal of thematic to-do, which I would have missed if the program notes had not called my attention to it—and pleasing in its complex contrasts of color, and capable of conveying mood. The Stravinsky concerto, whose solo part was meticulously played by Joseph Silverstein, dates from a time when there was a close kinship between the styles of Stravinsky and Prokofieff. It is basically a satirical composition, slyly caricaturing the clichés of second-rate violin music and reflecting the idiom of everybody from Bach to Saint-Saëns. It was a lot of fun. Mr. Leinsdorf followed it with a rather brisk performance of Beethoven's Seventh Symphony. —WINTHROP SARGEANT

The New York Times
D. 660,265 S. 1,306,418

APR 2 1964

Music: 'Zarathustra'

Whitestone
Van Cliburn at piano in rehearsal with Erich Leinsdorf

Leinsdorf Leads Tone Poem by Strauss

By HAROLD C. SCHONBERG

IN a way, the Richard Strauss symphonic poem, "Also sprach Zarathustra," belongs to the Boston Symphony. It was that orchestra which, under Serge Koussevitzky, made the first great recording of the work. That was in the middle nineteen-thirties, and many of us grew up on it. Of course, it takes no less than an orchestra the caliber of the Boston Symphony to engage "Also sprach Zarathustra." Not only is it one of the most overscored pieces in musical history. It also is one of the more difficult.

Erich Leinsdorf conducted it last night in Philharmonic Hall. He conducted from memory, quite a feat in itself. And it was apparent that he really had it memorized, for he indicated not only the big contours of the work but also everything in between. Mr. Leinsdorf has an analytical mind, and one guesses that "Also sprach Zarathustra" delights him, the way situs analysis delights a certain type of mathematical mind.

●

Koussevitzky used to make a big, colorful splurge out of "Zarathustra." There was plenty of color in Mr. Leinsdorf's work last night, but that was not the prevailing impression his performance left. What he strove for was logic, clarity, relationships, architecture. He also favored a tight rhythmic scheme. Even in the beginning, where the temptation must be irresistible to broaden out, Mr. Leinsdorf was almost metronome-like in his insistence on a steady meter. In short, he immediately established what he was going to do.

One could not recollect when it was all over, having heard a more precise performance, and that includes the work of Fritz Reiner. One could recollect, though, more songful performance. The last part of the score is full of anticipation of "Rosenkavalier," and it would have been rewarding had Mr. Leinsdorf relaxed a bit. But one cannot have everything, and Mr.

The Program

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Erich Leinsdorf, conductor, with Van Cliburn, pianist. At Philharmonic Hall.

Overture to Fidelio.....Beethoven
Piano Concerto No. 1 in D minor.Brahms
Also sprach Zarathustra.....Strauss

cianly ideas, plus some remarkable playing from the orchestra, were enough of a reward.

If memory serves, Van Cliburn had not previously played the Brahms D minor Concerto in New York, though he had been heard in the B flat. His performance was on the careful side, with tempos just a shade slow and with a lack of spontaneity. Mr. Cliburn has not yet made this concerto his own. His lack of identification showed up most in the slow movement, which was very much on the surface. The notes were played with accuracy, but they seemed to be disconnected, and the big sweep of song was lacking.

●

In the outer movements Mr. Cliburn and Mr. Leinsdorf kept things moving in a steady manner, though here again there was little imagination or flair. The technique gave the pianist no trouble. He wrapped his big hands around the writing, and many of those awkward left-hand stretches just rolled over and played dead for him. Sometimes being able to take a 12th has its advantages. With this kind of control over the mechanics, there is no reason to doubt that Mr. Cliburn will eventually work his way into the musical part of the concerto.

Beethoven's "Fidelio" Overture opened the program. Some of the players had not yet warmed up, and there were some very un-Boston bobbles. Then everybody settled down to do justice to Mr. Leinsdorf's conception of Beethoven.

MUSICAL AMERICA
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 15,900

MAY 1964

Boston Symphony

Erich Leinsdorf's Teutonic orientation was in full display in the program he led with the Boston Symphony at Philharmonic Hall on April 1: Beethoven's "Fidelio" Overture, Brahms' Piano Concerto No. 1, with Van Cliburn as soloist, and Strauss' "Also sprach Zarathustra."

The winds in the Beethoven—especially the horns—were flabby, but elsewhere the orchestral performances were firm and virile. Mr. Leinsdorf approached the Brahms as if it were a contemporary work, emphasizing its compositional elements rather than its romanticism, its rude strength over its lyricism. Though he comes from a more recent generation, Mr. Cliburn is a much more romantic musician than Mr. Leinsdorf, and gave a more traditionally 19th-century performance, paying close attention to the work's melodic content and employing an extensive dynamic vocabulary and mostly well-chosen rubatos. The difference between his approach and Leinsdorf's made the piece an exciting combat—not the unanimous collaboration that is usually strived for, but nonetheless a valid interpretation.

Mr. Leinsdorf put the orchestra through its paces in "Zarathustra." A shade of the possible excitement was wanting, but for the most part the piece crashed along in grand fashion.

M.B.

NewYorkWorld-Telegram
and
The Sun
D 463,041 SAT. 175,139

APR 2 1964

einsdorf, Cliburn Strike Notable Key

By LOUIS BIANCOLLI

These are great days for the orchestras, the latest of them being the Boston Symphony—Erich Leinsdorf conducting—in Philharmonic Hall last night.

Louis Biancolli

These are also great days for American pianists, the latest being Van Cliburn who, appeared as soloist with the visiting group. They were worthy of one another.

They were also worthy of the rousing ovation the huge crowd gave one and all. Last, and most important of all, they were worthy of Brahms' D[illegible] Piano Concerto.

[illegible] far from an easy [illegible] piece right. Its [illegible] section lunges five [illegible] into the 20th [illegible] The concerto began [illegible] and often sounds like one. And the work is one more problem in integration.

* * *

That is where Leinsdorf applied a master hand last night. Dynamics and design were perfect for the accommodation of the piano into a scheme in which it served and was served equally.

Cliburn continues to develop and mature. Here was the encompassing technique, the well-molded tone that ranged from whispered intimacy to resounding brilliance.

But here, too, were complete personal involvement and a lyric breadth that was the essence of poetry. Cliburn always knew what was going on about him and that he was just one part of it.

After listening repeatedly to "Don Juan" and "Death and Transfiguration," I was doubly happy to hear last night's performance of Strauss' "Thus Spake Zarathustra." It had almost the freshness of novelty.

* * *

Whatever ne may think of Nietzsche's ecstatic prose poem, Strauss was evidently moved by it. The music gleams and shimmers and exults with its rhapsodic theme. Nowhere is Strauss a better master of the orchestra.

It is idle to seek philosophy in this music, as it is unfair —Thomas Mann long insisted on this — to blame Nietzsche for the way his cult of the Superman was later twisted into race myth and genocide. But he cannot be wholly absolved.

Strauss' tone-poem stands or falls on its music—not on Nietzsche's cosmic ravings. As such, it was quite an experience of excited sound last night. Leinsdorf could not have led it better had he written it.

The program opened with a brisk and compact reading of Beethoven's "Fidelio" overture—one of the four he wrote for his one opera and the best of them as an overture, if not as music.

NEW YORK
Journal American
[illegible] SUN. 640,586

APR 2 1964

AT PHILHARMONIC HALL

Leinsdorf at Best in Tone Poem

By MILES KASTENDIECK

ERICH LEINSDORF'S affinity for Strauss gave the Boston Symphony's final Wednesday night audience something to remember as he unfolded the grandiose score of "Thus Spake Zarathustra" in Philharmonic Hall last night.

This culmination of the concert not only showed off Mr. Leinsdorf at his best, but allowed the orchestra to prove its greatness conclusively.

Just as one never ceases to wonder at Strauss' orchestration, so one willingly indulges in the effulgence of sound it generates in such a body of musicians. The glorification was mutual.

★

IN THIS centennial year it is good to hear "Zarathustra" again. Strauss' romantic outpouring about man's eternal quest of abstract concerts simply reveals the young man of 32 still adhering to his hero worshiping.

At times he may falter in sustaining his enthusiasm, but his creation of this large-scaled tone poem bears the heroic stamp in taking human evolution as his province.

The impact of the mountain sunrise lights up the whole work, while the melodic sweep carries the listener on waves of orchestral sound to the dawn of "otherworldliness" in the dual nature of a pianissimo ending.

The music may not run deep, but it describes colorfully. Mr. Leinsdorf knew just how to highlight it impressively.

★

PLAYING THE Brahms D Minor Concerto with Van Cliburn as soloist became quite a different matter. In this performance the emotional impulse at the heart of this exceptional piece remained locked in the score.

Both conductor and soloist disclosed notable technical resourcefulness, but this did not expose the essence of Brahms. There was plenty of bigness but it was primarily surface attraction.

Mr. Cliburn grew expressive rather than communicative. The surge of the music especially the maestoso inflection escaped him.

He had more than enough power, but a hard touch brought percussive tone not suitable for Brahms. The adagio sounded unusually long. Not until the finale did he adjust comfortably. He won admiration as usual.

The program began with a well-disciplined, forthright, business-like presentation of Beethoven's "Fidelio" overture.

Herald NEW YORK Tribune
D. 355,898 S. 451,270

APR 2 1964

Cliburn With the Philharmonic

PHILHARMONIC HALL
Lincoln Center

Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Erich Leinsdorf; soloist: Van Cliburn. The program:
Overture to "Fidelio".....Beethoven
Piano Concerto No. 1, in D minor, Op. 15.....Brahms
"Also sprach Zarathustra".....Strauss

LEINSDORF CONDUCTING

By Alan Rich

Richard Strauss wrote worse scores than "Also sprach Zarathustra," including the one that immediately precedes it in alphabetical listing (look it up), but that does not take off the curse. Let us only hope that Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony plan to observe the Strauss centennial in forward alphabetical order.

Mr. Leinsdorf's performance at Philharmonic Hall last night did about all that can be done for the music. It was swiftly paced, tightly controlled and wonderfully performed by the orchestra. The harsh edge of Philharmonic Hall's own tone seemed to help unravel the work's murky textures somewhat. But nothing can really cover the basic emptiness and pretentiousness of this music, its absurd vocabulary of wearisome gestures, its lack of shape. Its persistence in the repertory does little credit to the memory of a composer who, while not supremely gifted by any possible standards, at least created better scores than this one.

But "Zarathustra" came at the end of the concert, and there had been much to enjoy before it. The program began with a considerate, somewhat leisurely but communicative performance of Beethoven's "Fidelio" Overture, and went on to an uneven but fascinating reading of Brahm's D minor Piano Concerto with Van Cliburn as the soloist.

Mr. Cliburn continues to grow. His way with this concerto is not yet completely thought out, but it is well on its way. His phrasing of the second theme of the first movement, for example, seemed a little laggard, somewhat inclined to fall apart into separate measures rather than ideas. Some of the arabesque passages in the slow movement seemed just a shade on the surface, uninflected and a trifle cold

But these were momentary lapses in what was, on the whole, a strong, poetic performance by a brilliant young musician. Mr. Cliburn does have poetry in his soul; he proved that by the beautiful articulation of his opening theme. He also has individuality and imagination, as witness the wonderful flexibility he displayed in the finale. His finger work was awesomely accurate, and the murderous octave passage midway in the first movement came off marvelously. (For the statisticians, however, it should be noticed that he did miss a note—one note—in a much easier passage about ten bars later.)

If there is anything sure in this world, it is that Van Cliburn will perform this concerto even better a few years from now; that performance, judging from its seeds that are imbedded in the present one, could easily be the wonders of the age. Mr. Cliburn and the Boston Symphony recorded the work in Symphony Hall last week, by the way, so that in the years to come we will have a yardstick to measure his growth.

The orchestra provided magnificent collaboration in the concerto. Mr. Leinsdorf is, as many record collectors know all too well, a superb partner in concerto performances. In the case of the Brahms, that is no mean accomplishment.

142

BROOKLYN

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

BROOKLYN HEIGHTS PRESS
Thursday, March 26, 1964

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

BROOKLYN DAILY
Wednesday, March 25, 1964

NEW YORK AND BROOKLYN DAILY
D. 40,130 S. 40,130

MAR 25 1964

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
BROOKLYN HEIGHTS PRESS-
W. 4,200

APR 2 1964

Academy Features Symphony, Recital by Pianist Van Cliburn

Erick Leinsdorf, Music Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will conduct works by Beethoven, Stravinsky, and Wagner tonight at 8:30 in the Opera House of the Brooklyn Academy of Music.

The program will consist of Beethoven's Symphony No. 7 in A Major, Stravinsky's Violin Concerto in D, and excerpts from Wagner's opera "Seigfried."

Soloist of the concert will be Joseph Silverstein, performing Stravinsky's concerto. The concert is the last in a series of five presented during the 1963-64 season. Tickets range from $3.50 to $6.00.

On Apr. 4 at the Academy, Van Cliburn, in a return engagement, will perform a solo recital at 8:30 p.m. The program will include Four Intermezzi, Opus 4, by Schumann; Sonata in C Minor, Opus 13, by Beethoven; Sonata, Opus 26, by Samuel Barber, and Sonata in B Minor, Opus 58, by Chopin. Tickets are priced from $4.50 to $5.50.

NEW YORK
Journal American
D. CO. SUN. 640,586

APR 4 1964

AT PHILHARMONIC HALL

Nice Farewell By Bostonians

By MILES KASTENDIECK

ERICH LEINSDORF SUBJECTED his audience to a trial by ostinato in the first half of the Boston Symphony's final concert in Philharmonic Hall last night.

Both Copland's Symphony for Organ and Orchestra and Stravinsky's Violin Concerto featured this compositional device.

Whereas the ritual became monotonous in Copland, it established identity in Stravinsky. Nonetheless the impression lingers that because of it both composed by the yard, measure for measure.

Forty years do not deal kindly with this early Copland work. It does, however, foreshadow his style in the scherzo through the jaunty rhythms and a touch of syncopation, the use of the trumpet and raucous brasses, and a penchant for lean orchestration.

★

STRAVINSKY FARES much better. Some 30 years later, his neoclassicism gives the concerto character, its second "aria" sounds almost seductive, and the finale highlights a fun element unusual in his music. Only the opening toccata suggests how dry Stravinsky can get.

As soloist Joseph Silverstein played skilfully and knowingly his tone may be somewhat small to do full justice to the work! But his idiomatic grasp serves him well. The applause was well deserved.

Mr. Leinsdorf was, of course, in his element in these pieces, for his style of conducting fits them perfectly.

Shrewdly concluding with Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, he left the audience with truly substantial music to remember.

NEW YORK.

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 603,574 SUN. 1,283,785

APR 4 1964

Music: By Aaron Copland, Vintage '24

The Boston Performs His First Symphony

By HAROLD C. SCHONBERG

ONE of Aaron Copland's earliest works turned up last night at the Boston Symphony concert in Philharmonic Hall. It was his First Symphony, for organ and orchestra. Composed in 1924, it seldom is heard these days, though a revised version, without organ, turned up a few years ago.

It is a pleasing and interesting score. The "Rondes de Printemps" section of Stravinsky's "Sacre du Printemps" must have been running through Copland's head at the time (as it was running through the head of virtually every composer in the nineteen-twenties), and the opening theme is an unconscious echo of the Stravinsky.

●

But the orchestration and the subsequent treatment have nothing to do with Stravinsky. In evidence are Copland's clean-cut patterns (not as spare and condensed as they were to be), complicated rhythms, logic of thought and clarity of workmanship. The organ part in this symphony is not a virtuoso piece of writing. Copland conceived of the organ as another instrument in the fabric, and its contribution is for the most part coloristic.

Berj Zamkochian was the capable organist, and his performance, as that of the orchestra conducted by Erich Leinsdorf, sounded firm and secure. Mr. Copland came to the stage for several bows.

The Stravinsky Violin Concerto of 1931 is completely neoclassic. The four movements are Toccata, Aria I, Aria II and Capriccio. Even in the names of the movements Stravinsky looked back to old forms. Aria II is the very evocation of the baroque—a Bach lyric movement, ornamentations and all, seen through the sharp eyes of Stravinsky.

This concerto is not heard enough. Its precise and condensed forms, the wit of the treatment, the virtuoso but nonexhibitionistic violin writing (very difficult, it might be added), the sheer point of the orchestration—all these contribute to an exhilarating experience in musical logic.

●

Joseph Silverstein, the soloist, is concertmaster of the Boston Symphony. He played the concerto with great skill but with something less than identification with the spirit of the music. For one thing, he employed a very rapid vibrato more suited to a romantic concerto. A drier sound was needed. For another, he could have marked off his rhythms with more strength.

In the Beethoven Seventh Symphony, Mr. Leinsdorf did something no conductor within memory has done, and that is to take every single repeat in the score. One was almost startled when the music came to the development section and suddenly switched back to the exposition, so unexpected was the effect.

Mr. Leinsdorf always has been a great one for taking all repeats. Whether or not he is on firm historical ground in so doing is another question. There is plenty of evidence that even in Beethoven's day musicians ignored the repeats. Presumably Mr. Leinsdorf wishes to carry through the extreme letter of music. And some scholars believe there is good structural reason to take all repeats.

●

Musicological considerations aside, it was a rattling good Beethoven Seventh that Mr. Leinsdorf conducted—strong, buoyant, precise but not rigid, governed by an impeccable sense of orchestral finesse. The only unconventional moments came in the second movement, where Mr. Leinsdorf, a child of the Toscanini school, took an extremely fast tempo. It was unusually so, but it was in line with Mr. Leinsdorf's conception, and it must be said that he managed it extremely well. It also must be said that the Boston Symphony really is playing for him these days.

Joseph Silverstein

The Program

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Erich Leinsdorf, conductor, with Berj Zamkochian, organist, and Joseph Silverstein, violinist. At Philharmonic Hall. Symphony for Organ and

Orchestra No. 1	Copland
Violin Concerto	Stravinsky
Symphony No. 7	Beethoven

Stravinsky Inspiration Is Seen in Score

MUSICAL AMERICA
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 15,900

MAY. 1964

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY program of April 3 featured two works unfamiliar to concert goers and a third which most of us could whistle in our sleep. The first half of the evening was devoted to Copland's Symphony for Organ and Orchestra, with Berj Zamkochian as soloist, and Stravinsky's Concerto in D for Violin, with Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster of the band, in charge of the principal role. After the intermission, Mr. Leinsdorf was back with Beethoven's Seventh Symphony in a full-blooded performance whose Allegretto was infinitely too fast but which otherwise clung to the score's shape like a stocking.

But the first news of the event was Mr. Copland's Symphony No. 1, written when he was 24 and dedicated "in gratitude" to his teacher, Nadia Boulanger who played the premiere. It is an uneven work but a lovely one and everywhere it makes handsome sounds. The organ is not really a solo instrument in the most aggressive sense, since its texture is laid over the instrumental coating; but its function is not minimal. At the start it interchanges ideas with the orchestra—somewhat repetitiously, perhaps—though when the second movement scherzo gets underway it turns lively as a menacing kitten. The instrument is still integrated as a part of the orchestra and is left to its own devices only on rare occasions. The symphony, which uses a motto structure to perpetrate its movement, closes with a Lento-cum-Allegro which kicks up quite a fuss in reliance on the three-note sequence which is at the center of its design. But whatever its procedures it is not the usual work of a 24-year-old boy. It is a strong and manly piece, thoughtfully conceived and handsomely tooled. And there was perfection to its playing.

The Stravinsky concerto is something else again. It is a work of his middle age and incredible in every way. The invention, imagination and spirit of the piece are beyond immediate reckoning and its ability to rec[illegible]ture Bachian strategies is a subject f[illegible]wonder. For one thing, its rhythmic propulsion never lets up for as ma[illegible]s a moment and its sparseness of t[illegible]e is never a hindrance. It is neoclassicism in the highest sense of the term, [illegible]with poetic melismatic phrases an[illegible]y turns of tune. And its slow [illegible]ment's eloquence of nuance is [illegible]bable.

Joseph Silverstein [illegible]ist, understands all of this, e[illegible]gh his vibrato was a bit heav[illegible] in terms of a score so pure a[illegible]. All the same, his rendition [illegible]s an opportunity to hear a [illegible]f prime importance to our [illegible]one we come across too in[illegible] for anybody's good.

EIGHTY-THIRD
BEETHOVEN
BEETHOVEN
I. P
II. A
III. P
IV. A STRAUSS
BALDWIN PIANO
EIGHTY-THIRD BEETHOVEN
BEETHOVEN
I.
II.
III.
IV.
STRAUSS
BALDWIN PIANO

142

BROOKLYN

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

BROOKLYN HEIGHTS PRESS
Thursday, March 26, 1964

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

BROOKLYN DAILY
Wednesday, March 25, 1964

NEW YORK AND BROOKLYN DAILY
D. 40,130 S. 40,130

MAR 25 1964

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
BROOKLYN HEIGHTS PRESS-
W. 4,200

APR 2 1964

Academy Features Symphony, Recital by Pianist Van Cliburn

Erick Leinsdorf, Music Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will conduct works by Beethoven, Stravinsky, and Wagner tonight at 8:30 in the Opera House of the Brooklyn Academy of Music.

The program will consist of Beethoven's Symphony No. 7 in A Major, Stravinsky's Violin Concerto in D, and excerpts from Wagner's opera "Seigfried."

Soloist of the concert will be Joseph Silverstein, performing Stravinsky's concerto. The concert is the last in a series of five presented during the 1963-64 season. Tickets range from $3.50 to $6.00.

On Apr. 4 at the Academy, Van Cliburn, in a return engagement, will perform a solo recital at 8:30 p.m. The program will include Four Intermezzi, Opus 4, by Schumann; Sonata in C Minor, Opus 13, by Beethoven; Sonata, Opus 26, by Samuel Barber, and Sonata in B Minor, Opus 58, by Chopin. Tickets are priced from $4.50 to $5.50.

NEW YORK
Journal American
D. 506,746 SUN. 640,586

APR 4 1964

AT PHILHARMONIC HALL

Nice Farewell By Bostonians

By MILES KASTENDIECK

ERICH LEINSDORF SUBJECTED his audience to a trial by ostinato in the first half of the Boston Symphony's final concert in Philharmonic Hall last night.

Both Copland's Symphony for Organ and Orchestra and Stravinsky's Violin Concerto featured this compositional device.

Whereas the ritual became monotonous in Copland, it established identity in Stravinsky. Nonetheless the impression lingers that because of it both composed by the yard, measure for measure.

Forty years do not deal kindly with this early Copland work. It does, however, foreshadow his style in the scherzo through the jaunty rhythms and a touch of syncopation, the use of the trumpet and raucous brasses, and a penchant for lean orchestration.

STRAVINSKY FARES much better. Some 30 years later, his neoclassicism gives the concerto character, its second "aria" sounds almost seductive, and the finale highlights a fun element unusual in his music. Only the opening toccata suggests how dry Stravinsky can get.

As soloist Joseph Silverstein played skilfully and knowingly his tone may be somewhat small to do full justice to the work! But his idiomatic grasp serves him well. The applause was well deserved.

Mr. Leinsdorf was, of course, in his element in these pieces, for his style of conducting fits them perfectly.

Shrewdly concluding with Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, he left the audience with truly substantial music to remember.

NEW YORK.

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 603,574 SUN. 1,283,785

APR 4 1964

Music: By Aaron Copland, Vintage '24

The Boston Performs His First Symphony

By HAROLD C. SCHONBERG

ONE of Aaron Copland's earliest works turned up last night at the Boston Symphony concert in Philharmonic Hall. It was his First Symphony, for organ and orchestra. Composed in 1924, it seldom is heard these days, though a revised version, without organ, turned up a few years ago.

It is a pleasing and interesting score. The "Rondes de Printemps" section of Stravinsky's "Sacre du Printemps" must have been running through Copland's head at the time (as it was running through the head of virtually every composer in the nineteen-twenties), and the opening theme is an unconscious echo of the Stravinsky.

●

But the orchestration and the subsequent treatment have nothing to do with Stravinsky. In evidence are Copland's clean-cut patterns (not as spare and condensed as they were to be), complicated rhythms, logic of thought and clarity of workmanship. The organ part in this symphony is not a virtuoso piece of writing. Copland conceived of the organ as another instrument in the fabric, and its contribution is for the most part coloristic.

Berj Zamkochian was the capable organist, and his performance, as that of the orchestra conducted by Erich Leinsdorf, sounded firm and secure. Mr. Copland came to the stage for several bows.

The Stravinsky Violin Concerto of 1931 is completely neoclassic. The four movements are Toccata, Aria I, Aria II and Capriccio. Even in the names of the movements Stravinsky looked back to old forms. Aria II is the very evocation of the baroque—a Bach lyric movement, ornamentations and all, seen through the sharp eyes of Stravinsky.

This concerto is not heard enough. Its precise and condensed forms, the wit of the treatment, the virtuoso but nonexhibitionistic violin writing (very difficult, it might be added), the sheer point of the orchestration—all these contribute to an exhilarating experience in musical logic.

●

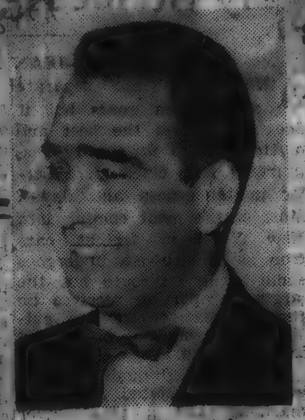
Joseph Silverstein, the soloist, is concertmaster of the Boston Symphony. He played the concerto with great skill but with something less than identification with the spirit of the music. For one thing, he employed a very rapid vibrato more suited to a romantic concerto. A drier sound was needed. For another, he could have marked off his rhythms with more strength.

In the Beethoven Seventh Symphony, Mr. Leinsdorf did something no conductor within memory has done, and that is to take every single repeat in the score. One was almost startled when the music came to the development section and suddenly switched back to the exposition, so unexpected was the effect.

Mr. Leinsdorf always has been a great one for taking all repeats. Whether or not he is on firm historical ground in so doing is another question. There is plenty of evidence that even in Beethoven's day musicians ignored the repeats. Presumably Mr. Leinsdorf wishes to carry through the extreme letter of music. And some scholars believe there is good structural reason to take all repeats.

●

Musicological considerations aside, it was a rattling good Beethoven Seventh that Mr. Leinsdorf conducted—strong, buoyant, precise but not rigid, governed by an impeccable sense of orchestral finesse. The only unconventional moments came in the second movement, where Mr. Leinsdorf, a child of the Toscanini school, took an extremely fast tempo. It was unusually so, but it was in line with Mr. Leinsdorf's conception, and it must be said that he managed it extremely well. It also must be said that the Boston Symphony really is playing for him these days.



Joseph Silverstein

The Program

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Erich Leinsdorf, conductor, with Berj Zamkochian, organist, and Joseph Silverstein, violinist, at Philharmonic Hall.

Symphony for Organ and Orchestra ..... Copland
Violin Concerto ..... Stravinsky
Symphony No. 7 ..... Beethoven

Stravinsky Inspiration Is Seen in Score

MUSICAL AMERICA
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 15,900

MAY 1964

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY program of April 3 featured two works unfamiliar to concert goers and a third which most of us could whistle in our sleep. The first half of the evening was devoted to Copland's Symphony for Organ and Orchestra, with Berj Zamkochian as soloist, and Stravinsky's Concerto in D for Violin, with Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster of the band, in charge of the principal role. After the intermission, Mr. Leinsdorf was back with Beethoven's Seventh Symphony in a full-blooded performance whose Allegretto was infinitely too fast but which otherwise clung to the score's shape like a stocking.

But the first news of the event was Mr. Copland's Symphony No. 1, written when he was 24 and dedicated "in gratitude" to his teacher, Nadia Boulanger, who played the premiere. It is an uneven work but a lovely one and everywhere it makes handsome sounds. The organ is not really a solo instrument in the most aggressive sense, since its texture is laid over the instrumental coating; but its function is not minimal. At the start it interchanges ideas with the orchestra—somewhat repetitiously, perhaps—though when the second movement scherzo gets underway it turns lively as a menacing kitten. The instrument is still integrated as a part of the orchestra and is left to its own devices only on rare occasions. The symphony, which uses a motto structure to perpetrate its movement, closes with a Lento-cum-Allegro which kicks up quite a fuss in reliance on the three-note sequence which is at the center of its design. But whatever its procedures it is not the usual work of a 24-year-old boy. It is a strong and manly piece, thoughtfully conceived and handsomely tooled. And there was perfection to its playing.

The Stravinsky concerto is something else again. It is a work of his middle age and incredible in every way. The invention, imagination and spirit of the piece are beyond immediate reckoning and its ability to recapture Bachian strategies is a subject for wonder. For one thing, its rhythmic propulsion never lets up for as much as a moment and its sparseness of texture is never a hindrance. It is neoclassic in the highest sense of the term, filled with poetic melismatic phrases and lovely turns of tune. And its slow movement's eloquence of nuance is indescribable.

Joseph Silverstein, the soloist, understands all of this, even though his vibrato was a bit heavy [illegible] of a score so pure and noble. All the same, his rendition provided us an opportunity to hear a number of prime importance to our time and one we come across too infrequently for anybody's good.

MONDAY # 6. TUESDAY # 10. FRI.-SAT. 23

143

Sixth Program

EVENING, APRIL 6, at 8:30 o'clock

BEETHOVEN ..... Overture to "Fidelio," Op. 72

BEETHOVEN ..... Symphony No. 7, in A major, Op. 92

I. Poco sostenuto: Vivace
II. Allegretto
III. Presto; Assai meno presto; Tempo primo
IV. Allegro con brio

INTERMISSION

STRAUSS ..... "Also sprach Zarathustra," Tone Poem
(Freely after Friedrich Nietzsche)

BALDWIN PIANO RCA VICTOR RECORDS

Tenth Program

TUESDAY EVENING, APRIL 7, at 8:30 o'clock

BEETHOVEN ..... Overture to "Fidelio," Op. 72

..... Symphony No. 7, in A major, Op. 92

...o sostenuto: Vivace
...gretto
...to: Assai meno presto; Tempo primo
...egro con brio

INTERMISSION

"Also sprach Zarathustra," Tone Poem
(Freely after Friedrich Nietzsche)

BALDWIN PIANO RCA VICTOR RECORDS

Twenty-third Program

FRIDAY AFTERNOON, APRIL 10, at 2:00 o'clock

SATURDAY EVENING, APRIL 11, at 8:30 o'clock

BEETHOVEN ..... Symphony No. 1, in C major, Op. 21

I. Adagio molto; Allegro con brio
II. Andante cantabile con moto
III. Minuetto: Allegro molto e vivace
IV. Finale: Adagio; Allegro molto vivace

PROKOFIEV ..... Violin Concerto No. 1, Op. 19

I. Andantino
II. Scherzo
III. Moderato

INTERMISSION

SCHULLER ..... Seven Studies on Themes of Paul Klee

I. Antike Harmonien (Antique Harmonies)
II. Abstraktes Terzett (Abstract Trio)
III. Kleiner Blauer Teufel (Little Blue Devil)
IV. Die Zwitschermaschine (The Twittering Machine)
V. Arabische Stadt (Arabian Town)
VI. Ein Unheimlicher Moment (An Eerie Moment)
VII. Pastorale

(First performance in Boston)

STRAUSS ..... Prelude and Waltz Sequence from "Der Rosenkavalier"

SOLOIST
ERICK FRIEDMAN

These concerts will end about 3:50 o'clock on Friday Afternoon;
10:20 o'clock on Saturday Evening.

BALDWIN PIANO RCA VICTOR RECORDS

SUNDAY AFTERNOON, APRIL 5, at 3:00 o'clock
(POSTPONED CONCERT) See Page 101

Program

SCHUMANN ..... Overture, Op. 52

BEETHOVEN ..... Piano Concerto No. 3, in C minor, Op. 37

I. Allegro con brio
II. Largo
III. Rondo: Allegro

INTERMISSION

WAGNER ..... Excerpts from "Die Walküre," Act III
Ride of the Valkyries — Magic Fire Music

WAGNER ..... Excerpts from "Siegfried"
Waldweben — Prelude to Act III —
Siegfried's Ascent to Brünnhilde's Rock — Brünnhilde's Awakening

SOLOIST
GRANT JOHANNESSEN
Mr. JOHANNESSEN plays the Steinway Piano

BALDWIN PIANO RCA VICTOR RECORDS

MONDAY #6. TUESDAY #10. FRI.-SAT. 23

143

Sixth Program

MONDAY EVENING, APRIL 6, at 8:30 o'clock

BEETHOVEN ..... Overture to "Fidelio," Op. 72

BEETHOVEN ..... Symphony No. 7, in A major, Op. 92

I. Poco sostenuto; Vivace
II. Allegretto
III. Presto; Assai meno presto; Tempo primo
IV. Allegro con brio

INTERMISSION

STRAUSS ..... "Also sprach Zarathustra," Tone Poem
(Freely after Friedrich Nietzsche)

BALDWIN PIANO — RCA VICTOR RECORDS

EIGHTY-THIRD SEASON • NINETEEN HUNDRED SIXTY-THREE–SIXTY-FOUR

Tenth Program

TUESDAY EVENING, APRIL 7, at 8:30 o'clock

BE[illegible] ..... Overture to "Fidelio," Op. 72

BE[illegible] ..... Symphony No. 7, in A major, Op. 92

[illegible]co sostenuto; Vivace
[illegible]legretto
[illegible]resto; Assai meno presto; Tempo primo
Allegro con brio

INTERMISSION

STRAUSS ..... "Also sprach Zarathustra," Tone Poem
(Freely after Friedrich Nietzsche)

BALDWIN PIANO — RCA VICTOR RECORDS

EIGHTY-THIRD SEASON • NINETEEN HUNDRED SIXTY-THREE–SIXTY-FOUR

Twenty-third Program

FRIDAY AFTERNOON, APRIL 10, at 2:00 o'clock

SATURDAY EVENING, APRIL 11, at 8:30 o'clock

BEETHOVEN ..... Symphony No. 1, in C major, Op. 21

I. Adagio molto; Allegro con brio
II. Andante cantabile con moto
III. Minuetto: Allegro molto e vivace
IV. Finale: Adagio; Allegro molto vivace

PROKOFIEV ..... Violin Concerto No. 1, Op. 19

I. Andantino
II. Scherzo
III. Moderato

INTERMISSION

SCHULLER ..... Seven Studies on Themes of Paul Klee

I. Antike Harmonien (Antique Harmonies)
II. Abstraktes Terzett (Abstract Trio)
III. Kleiner Blauer Teufel (Little Blue Devil)
IV. Die Zwitschermaschine (The Twittering Machine)
V. Arabische Stadt (Arabian Town)
VI. Ein Unheimlicher Moment (An Eerie Moment)
VII. Pastorale

(First performance in Boston)

STRAUSS ..... Prelude and Waltz Sequence from "Der Rosenkavalier"

SOLOIST
ERICK FRIEDMAN

These concerts will end about 3:50 o'clock on Friday Afternoon; 10:20 o'clock on Saturday Evening.

BALDWIN PIANO — RCA VICTOR RECORDS

EIGHTY-THIRD SEASON • NINETEEN HUNDRED SIXTY-THREE–SIXTY-FOUR

SUNDAY AFTERNOON, APRIL 5, at 3:00 o'clock
(POSTPONED CONCERT) See Page 101

Program

SCHUMANN ..... Overture, Op. 52

BEETHOVEN ..... Piano Concerto No. 3, in C minor, Op. 37

I. Allegro con brio
II. Largo
III. Rondo: Allegro

INTERMISSION

WAGNER ..... Excerpts from "Die Walküre," Act III
Ride of the Valkyries — Magic Fire Music

WAGNER ..... Excerpts from "Siegfried"
Waldweben — Prelude to Act III —
Siegfried's Ascent to Brünnhilde's Rock — Brünnhilde's Awakening

SOLOIST
GRANT JOHANNESSEN
MR. JOHANNESSEN plays the Steinway Piano

BALDWIN PIANO — RCA VICTOR RECORDS

144

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Herald (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 178,553
APR 3 1964

Johannesen to Play At Sunday Symphony

Grant Johannesen, well-know American pianist, will be gues soloist with Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony Orchestr at the Symphony Hall concer Sunday afternoon.

He will take the place of Rudolf Serkin, who was forced to cancel his scheduled appearance because of illness, and will play the Beethoven Piano Concerto No. 3. Tickets for the postponed Feb. 16 concert will be honored Sunday afternoon.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 194,870
APR 2 1964

Serkin Cancels; Johannesen Is His Replacement

Grant Johannesen, American pianist, will be guest soloist with Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Symphony Hall concert Sunday afternoon at 3. He will take the place of Rudolf Serkin, who was forced to cancel his appearance because of illness, and will play the Beethoven Piano Concerto No. 3.

The Apr. 5 concert will be given for regular Sunday Afternoon Series subscibers to make up the Feb. 16 program which was postponed because of a snowstorm. Tickets for the Feb. 16 concert will be honored Sunday afternoon.

Leinsdorf will begin the concert with Schumann's Overture, Scherzo and Finale, Op. 52, and conclude with excerpts from two Wagner operas, "Die Walkure" and "Siegfried."

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 194,870
APR 6 1964

At Symphony

Grant Johannessen Plays Beethoven

By MICHAEL STEINBERG

Every phrase in Grant Johannessen's performance of the Beethoven C minor Concerto was testimony to how good an artist he is. It is ironic that our hearing him with the Boston Symphony at all this season had to depend on the unlucky accident of Rudolf Serkin's illness.

Sunday afternoon's concert has quite a history. It was first scheduled for Sunday, Feb. 16, and Serkin was to play Mozart in F, K.459. When it became evident there would be no time to prepare the work, it was announced that Serkin would repeat the Reger Concerto he had already played the preceding two days. That Sunday brought a tremendous snowstorm, the concert as such was canceled, and for the benefit of the 800 people who had made it to Symphony, an open rehearsal was held. The Mozart was prepared, and Serkin played it as scheduled on the following Tuesday. Meanwhile, Sunday was announced as the new date for the snowed out Sunday concert, still with Serkin, but with Mozart in D minor, K.466, on the program instead. Then last week Serkin had to cancel, and we wound up, and very happily, with Mr. Johannessen and Beethoven No. 3.

All around, it was as fine a performance of the work as I have heard. Some pianists have played it more analytically, several more subjectively. What made this so good was Johannessen's sympathy for the sense of theatre in the classical concerto style. His opening scales shot up, rocket-like, practically into and across the last chord of the orchestral ritornello. The impetuosity and personal force of the gesture was so right, his establishment of himself as protagonist so complete, that he held the at tention in the firmest possibl grasp from then on.

Beethoven's own first move ment cadenza is quite poor though most pianists play i anyway out of piety. Johan nessen rightly did not, and of fered instead a most effective one by Robert Casadesus, one that both structurally and imaginatively prepared superbly well the tensions of the exciting coda.

At the very end of the concerto, Johannessen again showed his feeling for the dramatic essence by joining with the orchestra in the final C major flourishes. There is nothing written for the soloist just there, but what is required seems so obvious, and I am sure as possible that Beethoven himself didn't just sit there with his hands in his lap.

Leinsdorf's orchestral collaboration was strong and lively, though not at the beginning ideally careful—for instance, I never did get to hear the upbeats in the first movement's second theme very well. It was, however, really responsive, and there was a sense of excitement and participation that made it all add up to a real concerto performance. Leinsdorf used his fine assistant wind principals, and by bringing into the limelight some people not usually in it, let us hear some nice solo bits from the Messrs. Pappoutsakis, Holmes, Valerio, and Panenka.

The concert began with Schumann's Overture, Opus 52, which is the first part of the Overture, Scherzo, and Finale, that were played on the Friday-Saturday series in late February, a charming piece, and this time around very attractively played. After the intermission there were excerpts from Wagner's "Die Walkuere" and "Siegfried."

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 465,653
APR 5 1964

Violinist Making Debut With Boston Symphony

Erick Friedman, 24-year old American violinist, will make his first appearances with the Boston Symphony at the orchestra's concerts Friday afternoon at 2 and Saturday evening at 8:30. He will play the Prokofiev Violin Concerto No. 1.

Erich Leinsdorf will open the programs with Beethoven's Symphony No.1. Following the concerto he will conduct Seven Studies on Themes of Paul Klee by Gunther Schuller. The concerts will close with a waltz sequence from Richard Strauss' "Der Rosenkavalier," continuing Leinsdorf's plan to include a Strauss work on each of the last four weekend programs of this season, in observance of the 100th anniversary celebration of the composer's birth (June 11, 1864).

Erick Friedman is a native of New Jersey and has studied principally with Ivan Galamian and Jascha Heifetz. In 1956, the year of his Carnegie Hall debut, the critics unanimously agreed that a major talent had emerged. In this country, in addition to invariably sold-out recitals, he has appeared with the United States orchestras of San Antonio, Baltimore, Toronto, Chicago, Detroit, Denver, Washington and New York, and in Europe with the London Philharmonic, Orchestre National de Paris, and with the orchestras of Liverpool, Oslo, Madrid, Cologne.

This afternoon the orchestra will play the concert which was postponed Feb. 16 by a snowstorm. Tickets for the Feb. 16 concert will be honored this afternoon. Rudolf Serkin, who was scheduled to be soloist has been forced to cancel his appearance because of illness. Grant Johannesen, well-known American pianist, will be guest soloist. He will play the Beethoven Piano Concerto No. 3. Leinsdorf will begin the concert with Schumann's Overture, Scherzo and Finale, Op. 52, and conclude with excerpts from two Wagner operas, "Die Walkure" and "Siegfried."

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Christian Science Monitor (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 174,850
APR 6 1964

Total involvement

Johannessen soloist

By William Saunders

Playing Beethoven's Third Piano Concerto with the Boston Symphony on Sunday afternoon, Grant Johannessen presented a deeply satisfying display of intellectual and emotional control. He dramatized the music without becoming flamboyant and projected it with imagination and sound musical understanding.

Mr. Johannessen's tone embraces a wide palette of colors; his articulation ranges from a singing legato to a peppery staccato. His crescendos build with excitement and taper off with a pleasing sense of symmetry. His fortissimos resound but do not rumble. His pianissimos are delicate but not kittenish.

♪ ♪ ♪

He infused the opening Allegro with power and energy, never becoming crudely percussive. His technique responded to the movement's broad range of impassioned expression. In the slow movement Mr. Johannessen plumbed depths of poetry with supple phrasing, and he attacked the final Rondo incisively, underlining its jaunty humor.

He seemed totally involved in the music, giving the concerto a performance admirable for its taste and refinement as well as for its boldness and conviction. He was warmly applauded by both the audience and orchestra.

Erich Leinsdorf's accompaniment was sturdy and forthright, maintaining a tension between the work's simplicity and grandeur. Details were clearly wrought; piano and orchestra were deftly balanced, particularly in the slow movement when the woodwinds intoned a melody as the piano spun a delicate filigree.

The curtain-raiser for Sunday's program was Schumann's Overture, Opus 52, companion to the Scherzo and Finale. This work is a melancholy essay, interspersed with a few smiles. It was played with spontaneity and grace.

In view of the luxuriant tonal fabric of the entire program, it would not have been amiss had Mr. Leinsdorf chosen as his curtain-raiser a transparent baroque work or something slightly acid from the pen of a contemporary.

Nonetheless, Mr. Leinsdorf has been conscientious about serving a balanced musical diet at this shorter series of concerts. And Sunday's program did give a compelling picture of what took place in music between 1800 and 1871 (including the orchestra's growth in size), with Beethoven and Wagner at either end, and Schumann roughly in the middle.

♪ ♪ ♪

Mr. Leinsdorf closed the program with excerpts from "Die Walküre" and "Siegfried." In contrast to the balanced structure of the Beethoven concerto, the Wagner excerpts derived their coherence from an inner logic. Melodies flowed on endlessly. Motives wove in and out in changing patterns.

Though Wagner's subject was Nordic mythology, his music evokes very human emotions of yearning and aspiration in cascades of tone and startling harmonic progressions. Mr. Leinsdorf, attuned to the sweep and opulence of the excerpts, gave powerful impetus to their long lines.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Record-American (m) (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 531,565

Johanssen Plays Beethoven Concerto at Symphony Hall

Robert Schumann's "Overture, Scherzo and Finale" be[illegible] Sunday's afternoon at Symphony here. Had he been French rather than a German composer, this 52d opus probably woul dhave been classed as a symphony, for it manifestly foreshadows Cesar Franck's thieycelical format of half a century later. Erich Leinsdorf, intense but not tense, and the Boston Symphony players had this [illegible] music under their expert control.

Interpolated, performed, this [illegible] sweetness and grace than any other Schumann work for full orchestra. The prelude has greater equinocturnal qualities than the introduction to the same composer's "Spring" symphony, the scherzo more obvious charms than the equvalent segment of any of his symphonies and the finale vouchsafes the powerful climax of the so-called "Cologne" symphony. Dr. Leinsforf approached his exposition with a mellow viewpoint, evoking colorful orchestral sonics.

Grant Johanssen, a Salt Lake City native who has attained special identity with the French school of piano playing, substituted for the ailing Rudolf Serkin, offering Beethoven's third (C-minor) concerto, Opus 37. With this conecrted work, the Teutonic titan came into his own piano forte.

Your annotator's introduction to this masterwork came two-score years ago at a New York orchestral concert, with Sergei Rachmaninoff as piano soloist in Beethoven's rather than his own even more rambunctious C-minor concerto. Another performance of long remembrance was at a London appearance of British-born Solomon Cutner. Johanssen's interpretation with the BSO Sunday did not give the solo instrument Rachmaninoff's incisiveness nor have the Briton's indefinable rapport with this great music. Those two set impeccably precise standards for any pianist to achieve.

The first movement's opening theme, announced powerfully by unison strings, was in clearly and boldly etched phrases, but the hair-raising, Beethovenish conclusion elicited from the piano no three upward rushes with the machine-gun volley we anticipated. Instead, there were three broad scales, deficient in sparkle; vigorous, but short in sensitivity. This imbalance in style and effect between the somewhat overdriven orchestral tuttis and piano parts continued, except in the largo's solos.

After the interval, orchestral excerpts from two of Wagner's "Ring" music-dramas were played stunningly, but rather unconvincingly, since there were no Valkyries or warhorses in "Die Walkuere," nor a Heldentenor to personate "Siegfried." Lacking the vocal parts specified by the composer, the inevitable "Ride of the Valkyries" gave this concert warhorse a brisk workout.

ROLFE BOSWELL

[illegible]
PATRIOT LEDGER
D. 44,100

[illegible] 8 1964

The Sound of Music

Beethoven, Strauss Share BSO Program

By Peter M. Knapp

It took a while for the Boston Symphony to work its kinks out, but, when it did, there were rewards for last night's Symphony Hall audience.

Fortunately, the orchestra left its roughness behind after the opening work — Beethoven's Overture to "Fidelio," Op. 72— for music director Erich Leinsdorf had chosen an ambitious pair of compositions for the remainder of the program: Beethoven's Symphony No. 7 in A, Op. 92, and Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Also Sprach Zarathustra." Neither are suitable endeavors for a cold orchestra and warm conductor.

For Mr. Leinsdorf, the evening was a triumph. The Beethoven symphony—a study in rhythms, some have called it—in particular, was a superb example of the conductor as a creator. Mr. Leinsdorf is noted for his meticulous approach to a score, his insistence upon clean playing, on details and on control.

Some have found his musical discipline a trifle cool, and have felt a little relaxation might not, after all, be a bad thing. This reviewer does not share this opinion. The orchestra is playing better than it has in years; it is also working harder.

Mr. Leinsdorf's reading of the Beethoven symphony was anything but cool. At times, it was earthy, exuding a raw energy. In other moments, there was the elegance and liquid flow of tone that is another Leinsdorf hallmark — particularly in the dissection of the allegretto.

What gave the performance its motile force more than anything was the inspiration the conductor kindled in his musicians. Mr. Leinsdorf generally appears placid, suave, unruffled. Last night, he was a flash in music, completely involved, a great exhorter who did just about everything to inspire his men but put the tails on the eighth notes.

The musicians responded. The celli twanged under fierce bow attacks. The wind choir melted into a creamy tone. In the scherzo movement, the brisk theme bounded from section to section with a joyous springiness. And the final movement simply burst with unleashed power.

Part of this visceral excitement, it is true, was generated by brisk tempi—particularly in the second movement. It is marked allegretto, but most conductors take it at a more leisurely andante pace.

Mr. Leinsdorf also had his musicians play the famous theme with a marked accent and a nearly staccato detachment of the notes. Usually, the notes are held longer, with little accent. In addition, he departed from tradition by taking the repeats, which cost him a loss of momentum in the trio of the scherzo.

Despite the quick tempi and the rhythmic drive, everything was kept under control. At the end, the conductor was understandably winded by his exertions.

Precision, detail, control were the elements brought to the Strauss work. Strauss' tone poem, loosely based on the writings of the German philosopher, Friedrich Nietzsche, is not supposed to be philosophy set to music, but it may be music set to philosophy. The composer's intentions were "to convey by means of music an idea of the development of the human race from its origin, through the various phases of development, religious as well as scientific, up to Nietzsche's idea of the superman."

This kind of task seemed to appeal to Strauss, never one to duck his cosmic responsibilities. In musical terms, however, "Also Sprach Zarathustra" ("Thus Spake Zarathustra") is an overblown work with passages of rhapsodic beauty encountered between the opening humming pedal point and the quiet dissonances that complete the composition in irresolution.

If it pretends to depict a "soul's adventure," or the duality of man and nature, or the quest of the artist for the ideal, "Zarathustra" is also an anguished odyssey of sound—some of it magnificent, the remainder merely bearable.

In everything he touched, though, Strauss was a master orchestrator. "Zarathustra" is a showpiece for orchestra, a brilliant score in which much of its philosophic claptrap can be forgotten by the kind of dazzling performance Mr. Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony gave it last night. While all sections were eloquent and secure, the strings were especially fine—the celli in the early melodic section of almost quartet transparency, and the violins in their great, curving melodic slashes.

The overture to Beethoven's "Fidelio" which began the program was marred by some ragged playing. The strings were edgy and the solo horn cracked. The overture, the fourth and last written by Beethoven for his only opera, did have considerable drive and exuberance, though.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Jewish Advocate
BOSTON, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 35,304
APR 16 1964

BSO's 23rd Program

Contains Wide Range of Music

By ALLAN SLY

Recent concert reviews have gone into logistics — the economics of concert planning. Not to be outdone, let's give due credit to Mr. Leinsdorf for ingeniously planning, in the BSO's 23rd program last week, to hold the interest of every kind of listener at some point or other. Some may even have reveled in all of it, as I did, gladly. In fact I cannot recall a more fascinating evening.

For Mr. Leinsdorf the BSO's playing is meticulously tidy and to observe his scrupulosity in action is bracing. His self-effacement with the classics earns deep respect; and it inspires one to reflect on how thoroughly he does his homework — for the many new scores he undertakes have been made part of himself.

How delightful to hear the Beethoven First again in these terms, and to relive, as with the freshness of a new spring, the simple faith of one's own first youth, for most of us have that association with the work.

This element of youth permeated the next work, Prokofiev's first violin concerto (1915-17). The soloist, Erick Friedman, also in his middle twenties, American, tall, articulate, prompts the reflection that new violin virtuosi now come but rarely. Excellent players, yes, but how few come trailing clouds of glory as did Heifetz, Francescatti, Isaac Stern, when they were 25? Pianists, conductors, composers, yes. But the particular Satânic seduction of the violin is nowadays heard but rarely, come to think of it, and Mr. Friedman comes in the nick of time. Further, Prokofiev's youthful genius informs every turn of phrase in this concerto, every piquancy of tone coloring, every evocative sally. Thanks to an excellent performance, one could meet the work on its own terms.

Everyone reading this must have heard of the huge success d'occasion — Gunther Schuller's Paul Klee studies, seven of them, and by some sleight-of-hand the BSO management actually had the seven pictures on exhibit for us to see. Was it going Klee one better to hang them high, close together, in the dark, and in a corner? At least one doesn't often spend an intermission putting to work one's MTA and Filene's Basement techniques! Someone was ribbing someboy, but at least we returned to our seats in a quizzical mood.

For entertainment, the Schuller pieces outdo anything else one is likely to hear in a concert hall. But they spring to life with all the manifold graces of the legitimate muse and reveal many of her rarer moods to superlative effect. The little blue devil was unforgettable, likewise the peripatetic flute player in the Arabian town; and of course the twittering machine. While uncannily paralleling Klee, they succeed in remaining viable as music. Mr. Leinsdorf, please do them again!

The Rosenkavalier waltzes sent us home replete with the glamour that only such music can evoke and convey. What better way to conclude the week that was?

Next week's program (the 24th) opens with late Mozart — the G minor symphony — and interludes from another Strauss opera (iDe Frau ohne Schatten); early Webern — Passacaglia, opus 1, and the ballet suite "Fire Bird" (Stravinsky).

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 194,870

APR 11 1964

Klee and Schuller: An Entertaining Pair

By MICHAEL STEINBERG

Gunther Schuller's "Seven Studies on Themes of Paul Klee" is an entertaining and provocative composition, and one which Friday's Symphony audience seemed to enjoy hearing. Departing from seven pictures by Klee, Schuller has worked out seven modes of, as it were, translating visual images into musical ones. It is sometimes almost an act of re-translation, for Klee's work is often very musical, and not only in the famous "Twittering-machines."

The more abstract studies work beautifully. "Antique Harmonies" piles up bare fifths into gentle but strong dissonances, and with no sense of body rhythms. That one did not quite go in performances: Leinsdorf began it just a moment too soon while there was still a lot of page-flipping and coughing and whispering going on, and since, except for the one startling patch of bright yellow trumpets, it is all very muted, the atmosphere didn't catch hold.

"Abstract Trio," a series of trios really, is sinuously, nervously witty.

"An Eerie Moment" is effective, and the ticking glockenspiel is as "unheimlich" (eerie, ominous) as a thing can be, but that piece is not quite weaned from Webern's Opus 6, No. 4. In spite of the sensitively imagined ending, it doesn't quite stand on its own feet, doesn't quite make its own effect.

Schuller's "Twittering-machine" is ingenious and amusing. He himself writes "it should . . . do primarily one thing, namely: twitter." Twitter it does. I don't suppose it can be done better than Schuller has done it: it's just that no one's real machine, not even a serial one, can do it as well as Klee's mad little aviary.

If that one is too difficult, some of the others are in a sense too easy. "Little Blue Devil" (a jazzy demon) and "Arab Village" are fun to hear, but neither conveys to me anything at all of the special Klee vision of their subject matter.

The "Seven Studies" are basically a light and clever entertainment That is meant as no disparagement, and neither is my prediction that they will not be long in finding their way onto children's and pops concerts. Indeed, when they do, that will add one more to their composer's many services on behalf of bringing the 20th century and the world in touch with one another. And for now, with their minor and eclectric but together.

Assured mastery, they fill a niche of their own with vitality, imagination, and charm.

Prokofiev's D major Violin Concerto is for me his best work. It contains the best of his lyricism as well as wit and a fastidious facture. There is no trace of the grossness and the tractor-loving that disfigure so much of his later music. Erick Friedman played its friendishly difficult notes in time and in tune, but he made no further progress towards a satisfying interpretation.

His expressive playing consists of nasty little wailing swoons, his dynamic and coloristic range is painfully restricted, and almost as though on principle he under-articulates and minimizes accent. In music that demands the last word in elegant vocalism and biting humor, Friedman played as though the only idea in his head was to avoid making disagreeable sounds. For me, the most interesting aspect of his appearance was the way it raised the extremely serious question as to the extent to which the fortunes of the Boston Symphony are a function of its recording contract.

Leinsdof began the concert with a performance of the Beethoven First Symphony, which for interpretive clarity, the smoothest sore of Bostonian execution, and sheer high spirits, was an unequalified delight.

He ended with a sequence of waltzes from Strauss' "Rosenkavalier," tne put together by the composer in 1946. Some of the harmonies are out-and-out bad in this version: there is at the end a sort of mindless complication, a desire to do something involved and different, and I really don't like having that sore of intellectuality interfere with my hedonistic enjoyment. Leinsdorf doesn't plumb this music for its innate indecencies quite as much as ome other conductor, but still his reading had sufficient erotic enthusiasm, and most of us left Symphony Hall smiling.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Herald (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 178,553

APR 11 1964

SYMPHONY — By ROBERT TAYLOR

Violin Soloist Provides Bright Spot of Concert

By ROBERT TAYLOR

The apprenticeship of Beethoven and of Prokofiev, a derivative new work and a confection of waltzes from "Rosenkavalier" make a sapless spring symphony program.

Save for the gifts of Erick Friedman, the 24-year-old violinist, stepping forth in his Boston Symphony debut with the youthful Prokofiev Violin Concerto in D, I'm afraid I found little to admire in yesterday's concert; and the closely-woven music, in which Mr. Friedman appeared, does not set off a soloist to advantage.

The Less Eloquent Prokofiev Concerto

Prokofiev wrote two concertos for violin, and the second in G minor is usually selected by virtuosi. This preference is understandable; not only in terms of display of instrumental capacity but in terms of eloquence. The D major mingles the plaintive and the violent in its emotional moods, yet there is only random tension among its diffuse forces, and the orchestra often covers the soloist. There is a fair amount of ricochet bow, double-stops, trills and spiccato embroidered into the pattern. The concerto, however, expresses a sobriety that proves all the more pronounced because of the lyric element: the earnest tokens of a young man unwilling to acknowledge the romanticism which continually wars with a classical sense of form in this music.

Clearly, Mr. Friedman is a talent to watch. His performance, cautiously understated, is not all that it can and will be, for in his approach he avoids excess overscrupulously. His bowing control is first-rate as is his negotiation of the problems of the fingerboard: intonation, accuracy of stoppings, rhythmic accent. He seems determined not to surrender to stylistic coarseness, which imposes further restraint on an already restrained concerto; but a little more liberty for a born virtuosic temperament need not imply that tone production and lushness will prevail. Mr. Leinsdorf's role in this symphonic unit is less that of accompanist than of a full-fledged partnership. Once he and Mr. Friedman integrate their aims to a less modest scale of values than yesterday's, the work should attain a freer rhapsodic flow.

Gunter Schuller's 'Seven Studies on Themes of Paul Klee" displays a superficial contemporary texture, but in fact is nothing more than bright old-fashioned program music decked out with devices borrowed from Webern, Berg, et al. Indeed the most striking aspect is its lack of modernity. Mr. Schuller's tonal portraits represent a kind of interdiscipline of the arts that wafts one right back into the scented pages of "A Rebours," whose hero, you may recall, laved his senses with a color organ, and tasted poetry.

In any case, the atonal idiom and vivid timbres of the work seek to convey the experience of Klee's painting. In this regard it fails. The visual wit of Klee, "taking a walk with a line," defies the composer's procedures. Without the pictures in mind, what is left is a tissue of sound effects, an exotic and interesting section based on Arab melodies, and a rarified pointillism of jazz, medievalism and Webernesque sonorities. Mr. Schuller came onstage for a bow and was greeted cordially.

The severe classicism of Beethoven's First received a cogent and coherently straightforward reading from Mr. Leinsdorf. The lines were not shaped for a broad, emotional flow, but adequately defined the crisp proportioned statement, employing full orchestra and eliciting a precise string inflection. This symphony is hardly in the same class with the late Haydn and Mozart, and its jaded charms depend on graceful balance, which was attained for the most part, save in the sturdy, earthbound minuet. On the whole I would call it a respectable account of a minor score, repeats and all, but no revelation.

"Rosenkavalier's" waltzes, on the other hand, without "Rosenkavalier" are a revelation of the wrong things about the opera, which is sentimental and delicate, rather than schmaltzy. I had the curious feeling that I was going down for the third time in a vat of marshmallow. The performance was hearty enough to thrill a congress of waltzers, and I regret that I found its sugared sweep a saccharine letdown.

Next weekend Mr. Leinsdorf completes the season with Mozart's Symphony in G minor, K.550; Interludes from Strauss's "Die Frau ohne Schatten"; Webern's Passacaglia, Op. 1, and Stravinsky's suite from "The Firebird".

The Program

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf conducting, presented the 23rd program of the 83rd season yesterday in Symphony Hall. Erick Freidman, violin, was the soloist. The program will be repeated tonight at 8:30.

Symphony No. 1, in C major, Op. 21 ..... Beethoven
Violin Concerto No. 1, Op. 19 . Prokofiev
Seven Studies on Themes of Paul Klee ..... Schuller
Prelude and Waltz Sequence from "Der Rosenkavalier" ..... Strauss

147

Schuller's studies on Klee

The twittering machine

By Harold Rogers

Humor in music is not easily achieved—not when one is composing in a contemporary idiom for the serious field. But Gunther Schuller is the man who can do it. He has an inventive mind, a sensitive ear, a twinkling eye. When his "Seven Studies on Themes of Paul Klee" were heard in their Boston premiere Friday afternoon, people laughed.

And not at the music, mind you but with it. Take "The Twittering Machine," for instance. Here Mr. Schuller managed a variety of witty bird noises, set them in motion by a serial arrangement, then let the cheeps fall where they may. Twitters in the orchestra were matched by titters from the listeners as the machine ground out its peeps, chirps, trills, rattles—the whole running down and then starting up again as some invisible hand wound up the spring. When it was over, hearty laughter gushed forth.

Not all of his studies, of course, were funny, but they were fascinatingly clever. "The Abstract Trio" was a skillfully wrought fabric of fragmentary statements, generally uttered by instruments in threes. His "Arabian Town" was evocatively Oriental in an authentic way. No Orientalisms here.

* * *

But the "Little Blue Devil" took the prize. Here we heard the Boston Symphony is one of its rare forays into jazz. The music was too intellectualized, of course, to compete with a New Orleans jam session, but one wonders how much money could be raised for the Pension Fund if this combo were sent out on the jazz circuit under the name of Erich Leinsdorf and his Blue Devils. . . .

There was nothing devilish about Eric Friedman, whose publicists would like to present him as a second Paganini. (There were those who actually believed that Paganini, like Faust, had sold his soul to the devil.) And there is little about Mr. Friedman's playing—at least as heard in the Prokofiev Violin Concerto No. 1—that would appear to compete with the illustrious Italian virtuoso. Of course there are no ears today who can bear witness as to just how Paganini did play, but there are volumes written about the way he fired the public's imagination and inflamed their emotions.

Perhaps Mr. Friedman will be able to set something on fire when essaying a work that calls for a sweeping line, but the Prokofiev First is not the most gracious piece of writing whereby a listener may render an accurate judgment of a fiddler's talent. Largely expostulatory, with great staccato down-bowings of often raucous sound, the work left one marveling only at Mr. Friedman's success in portraying the grotesque.

* * *

Yet it is obvious that this very tall and very handsome young man has a fine sense of style, a clean tone, a skillful technique. Perhaps the Paganini likeness will emerge more clearly as years go on.

Mr. Leinsdorf opened with a nicely thought-out reading of the Beethoven Symphony No. 1 that began to take on an emotional glow only in the last movement. This has been typical of Mr. Leinsdorf's way with symphonic works during his first two seasons as music director—three movements to warm up, the fourth for a little excitement.

But when he closed with the Prelude and Waltz Sequence from "Der Rosenkavalier," his Austrian heart was bursting with Viennese glory. He has it, and it can come forth.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Record-American (m) (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 531,565
APR 11 1964

Erick Friedman Makes BSO Debut

Two Erics starred in Symphony Hall here Friday afternoon. Erich Leinsdorf conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Beethoven's first symphony with much understanding and great verve. Erick Friedman made his debut with this orchestra, playing Prokovieff's first violin concerto with much verve and rare understanding.

In the curtain-raising Opus 21, Beethoven's earlier Haydensity was turned toi different ends, opening with unorthodox dissonance. The songful slow movement is followed by a scherzolike minuet wherein the chain-bursting composer makes aristocratic courtliness trip to a sprightlier tune. Though the final movement is conventionally Mozartistic, the lively ending almost foreshadows the taut energy of Beethoven's later symphonies.

The luxuriant string quality vouchsafed for the latter three movements surely is attributable to the gifted guidance of Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster. Never have these strings sounded brighter or silkier.

Young Friedman's bowanship is superb and his technical proficiency not only reflects the tutelage of his mentor, Jascha Heifetz, but also manifests inherent security. Spiccato, that bouncy bowing so difficult to control, enabled him to traverse tricky passages with virtuosice aplomb. Here was wizard fiddlestickery indeed.

This earlier Prokovieff violin concerto melds long, melodic passages as in the opening, with mordant, Prokofieverish whimsy, as in the scherzo, but it is essentially a work of great lyricism, with more than one introspective passage. Opening and concluding with the same subject, a slow theme of gentle charm, the entire finale is an expansive melody of deep feeling. Erick Friedman played from frog to point with wit, distinction and rhythmic flexibility.

ROLFE BOSWELL

148

CAMBRIDGE #6. FRI. SAT # 24.

EIGHTY-THIRD SEASON • NINETEEN HUNDRED SIXTY-THREE–SIXTY-FOUR

Sixth Program

TUESDAY EVENING, APRIL 14, at 8:30 o'clock

HAYDN . . . . . Te Deum in C major, No. 2, for Chorus and Orchestra
(First performance in this series)

COPLAND . . . . . Symphony for Organ and Orchestra
I. Prelude: Andante
II. Scherzo: Molto allegro
III. Finale: Lento; Allegro moderato
Organ: BERJ ZAMKOCHIAN

INTERMISSION

STRAUSS . . . . . "Die Tageszeiten," Song Cycle for Men's Chorus and Orchestra, Op. 76
Morning
Midday Calm
Evening
Night
(First performance in this series)

STRAUSS . . . . . "Also sprach Zarathustra," Tone Poem (Freely after Friedrich Nietzsche)

HARVARD GLEE CLUB and RADCLIFFE CHORAL SOCIETY
ELLIOT FORBES, Conductor

BALDWIN PIANO RCA VICTOR RECORDS

EIGHTY-THIRD SEASON • NINETEEN HUNDRED SIXTY-THREE–SIXTY-FOUR

Twenty-fourth Program

FRIDAY AFTERNOON, APRIL 17, at 2:00 o'clock

SATURDAY EVENING, APRIL 18, at 8:30 o'clock

MOZART . . . . . Symphony in G minor, K. 550
I. Molto allegro
II. Andante
III. Menuetto: Allegretto
IV. Allegro assai

STRAUSS . . . . . Interludes from the Opera "Die Frau ohne Schatten"

INTERMISSION

WEBERN . . . . . Passacaglia, Op. 1
(First performance at these concerts)

STRAVINSKY . . . . . Suite from the Ballet, "L'Oiseau de feu"
Introduction: Jardin enchanté de Katschei et danse de l'oiseau de feu
Supplications de l'oiseau de feu
Jeu de princesses avec les pommes d'or
Ronde des princesses
Danse infernale de tous les sujets de Katschei
Berceuse
Finale

These concerts will end about 3:50 o'clock on Friday Afternoon; 10:20 o'clock on Saturday Evening.

BALDWIN PIANO RCA VICTOR RECORDS

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Sunday Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 465,653

APR 12 1964

Boston Symphony Ends Season

Five concerts this week will conclude the 83d season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Erich Leinsdorf, music director, will conduct the three subscription concerts, the open rehearsal and the pension fund concert.

Tuesday evning at 8:30 will bring the final "Cambridge" concert of the season, which will be televised as usual by WGBH-TV, Channel 2. Leinsdorf has invited the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society, Elliot Forbes, director, to join the orchestra for the first work on the program, Haydn's Te Deum. He will then conduct Aaron Copland's Symphony for Organ and Orchestra, with Berj Zamkochian at the organ. The Harvard Glee Club will return to perform "Die Tageszeiten," Song Cycle for Men's Chorus and Orchestra by Richard Strauss which Leinsdorf introduced to Boston recently. The concert will close with the tone poem "Also sprach Zarathustra by Strauss.

At the final Friday-Saturday programs Leinsdorf will open the concert with Mozart's Symphony in G minor, K. 550. He will then conduct Interludes from "Die Frau ohne Schatten" by Richard Strauss, concluding his plan to play a Strauss work on each of the final four week-end programs in recognition of the 100th anniversary celebration of the composer's birth (June 11, 1864). After the intermission the orchestra will play Webern's Passacaglia, Op. 1 and the program will close with the "Firebird" Suite by Stravinsky.

The eighth and last open rehearsal of the season, the proceeds from which benefit the orchestra's pension fund, will take place Thursday evening at 7:30, at which time the orchestra will prepare for the Friday-Saturday program.

On Sunday evening at 8:30 Artur Rubinstein will be guest artist for the second consecutive year at the orchestra's pension fund concert. He will play Beethoven's Piano Concerto No. 4 and the Rhapsody on a theme of Paganini by Rachmannoff. The program will begin with Beethoven's Overture to "Fidelio" and include excerpts from "Die Walkure" by Wagner.

The net proceeds from this concert, for which Leinsdorf and the members of the orchestra donate their services, will go to the pension fund, which in 1963 paid $210,000 to 92 Boston Symphony Orchestra pensioners and widows.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Sunday Herald
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 283,819

APR 12 1964

Symphony's Final Week Is Ahead

Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will enter the final week of Symphony Hall concerts for the 1963-64 season this week, playing three subscription concerts, an open rehearsal and the special Pension Fund concert.

Tuesday evening will bring the final "Cambridge" concert of the season. Mr. Leinsdorf has invited the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society, Elliot Forbes, director, to join the orchestra for the first work on the program, Haydn's Te Deum. He will then conduct Aaron Copland's Symphony for Organ and Orchestra, with Berj Zamkochian at the organ. The Harvard Glee Club will return to perform "Die Tageszeiten," Song Cycle for Men's Chorus and Orchestra by Richard Strauss, which Mr. Leinsdorf introduced to Boston recently. The concert will close with the tone poem "Also sprach Zarathustra," by Strauss.

At the final Friday - Saturday programs Mr. Leinsdorf will open with Mozart's Symphony in G minor, K. 558, following with Interludes from "Die Frau ohne Schatten" by Richard Strauss After intermission the orchestra will play Webern's Passacaglia. Op. 1 and the program will close with the "Firebird" Suite by Stravinsky.

The eighth and last open rehearsal of the season will take place Thursday evening at 7:30, at which time the orchestra will prepare for the Friday-Saturday program.

Next Sunday evening Arthur Rubinstein will be guest artist for the second consecutive year at the orchestra's Pension Fund concert. He will play Beethoven's Piano Concerto No. 4 and the Rhapsody on a Theme of Paganini by Rachmaninoff. Mr. Leinsdorf and the orchestra will open the program with Beethoven's Overture to "Fidelio" and later present excerpts from "Die Walkure" by Wagner.

Some tickets for the Pension Fund Concert are still available at the Symphony Hall Box Office.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Sun (e)
LOWELL, Mass.
Circ. 45,001

APR 11 19[illegible]

Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony orchestra will enter the final week of symphony hall concerts for the 1963-64 season next week. There will be three regular concerts, an open rehearsal and a special Pension Fund concert.

The Pension Fund concert will be held next Sunday evening and Dr. Leinsdorf has invited Artur Rubinstein to appear as guest artist with the orchestra. This will mark Mr. Rubinstein's second appearance with the orchestra in the Pension Fund series. For this concert the celebrated pianist will play the Beethoven Piano Concerto No. 4 and the Rhapsody on a Theme of Paganini by Rachmaninoff. Opening the program will be the Beethoven Overture to "Fidelio", and following the Concerto, Excerpts from Wagner's "Die Walkure."

148 CAMBRIDGE #6. FRI. SAT #24.

EIGHTY-THIRD SEASON • NINETEEN HUNDRED SIXTY-THREE–SIXTY-FOUR

Sixth Program

TUESDAY EVENING, APRIL 14, at 8:30 o'clock

HAYDN.....Te Deum in C major, No. 2, for Chorus and Orchestra
(First performance in this series)

COPLAND.....Symphony for Organ and Orchestra
I. Prelude: Andante
II. Scherzo: Molto allegro
III. Finale: Lento; Allegro moderato
Organ: BERJ ZAMKOCHIAN

INTERMISSION

STRAUSS.....“Die Tageszeiten,” Song Cycle for Men’s Chorus and Orchestra, Op. 76
Morning
Midday Calm
Evening
Night
(First performance in this series)

STRAUSS.....“Also sprach Zarathustra,” Tone Poem (Freely after Friedrich Nietzsche)

HARVARD GLEE CLUB and RADCLIFFE CHORAL SOCIETY
ELLIOT FORBES, Conductor

BALDWIN PIANO RCA VICTOR RECORDS

EIGHTY-THIRD SEASON • NINETEEN HUNDRED SIXTY-THREE–SIXTY-FOUR

Twenty-fourth Program

FRIDAY AFTERNOON, APRIL 17, at 2:00 o'clock

SATURDAY EVENING, APRIL 18, at 8:30 o'clock

MOZART.....Symphony in G minor, K. 550
I. Molto allegro
II. Andante
III. Menuetto: Allegretto
IV. Allegro assai

STRAUSS.....Interludes from the Opera “Die Frau ohne Schatten”

INTERMISSION

WEBERN.....Passacaglia, Op. 1
(First performance at these concerts)

STRAVINSKY.....Suite from the Ballet, “L’Oiseau de feu”
Introduction: Jardin enchanté de Katschei et danse de l’oiseau de feu
Supplications de l’oiseau de feu
Jeu de princesses avec les pommes d’or
Ronde des princesses
Danse infernale de tous les sujets de Katschei
Berceuse
Finale

These concerts will end about 3:50 o’clock on Friday Afternoon; 10:20 o’clock on Saturday Evening.

BALDWIN PIANO RCA VICTOR RECORDS

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 465,653
APR 12 1964

Boston Symphony Ends Season

Five concerts this week will conclude the 83d season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Erich Leinsdorf, music director, will conduct the three subscription concerts, the open rehearsal and the pension fund concert.

Tuesday evning at 8:30 will bring the final “Cambridge” concert of the season, which will be televised as usual by WGBH-TV, Channel 2. Leinsdorf has invited the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society, Elliot Forbes, director, to join the orchestra for the first work on the program, Haydn’s Te Deum. He will then conduct Aaron Copland’s Symphony for Organ and Orchestra, with Berj Zamkochian at the organ. The Harvard Glee Club will return to perform “Die Tageszeiten,” Song Cycle for Men’s Chorus and Orchestra by Richard Strauss which Leinsdorf introduced to Boston recently. The concert will close with the tone poem “Also sprach Zarathustra by Strauss.

At the final Friday-Saturday programs Leinsdorf will open the concert with Mozart’s Symphony in G minor, K. 550. He will then conduct Interludes from “Die Frau ohne Schatten” by Richard Strauss, concluding his plan to play a Strauss work on each of the final four week-end programs in recognition of the 100th anniversary celebration of the composer’s birth (June 11, 1864). After the intermission the orchestra will play Webern’s Passacaglia, Op. 1 and the program will close with the “Firebird” Suite by Stravinsky.

The eighth and last open rehearsal of the season, the proceeds from which benefit the orchestra’s pension fund, will take place Thursday evening at 7:30, at which time the orchestra will prepare for the Friday-Saturday program.

On Sunday evening at 8:30 Artur Rubinstein will be guest artist for the second consecutive year at the orchestra’s pension fund concert. He will play Beethoven’s Piano Concerto No. 4 and the Rhapsody on a theme of Paganini by Rachmaninoff. The program will begin with Beethoven’s Overture to “Fidelio” and include excerpts from “Die Walkure” by Wagner.

The net proceeds from this concert, for which Leinsdorf and the members of the orchestra donate their services, will go to the pension fund, which in 1963 paid $210,000 to 92 Boston Symphony Orchestra pensioners and widows.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Herald
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 283,819
APR 12 1964

Symphony's Final Week Is Ahead

Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will enter the final week of Symphony Hall concerts for the 1963-64 season this week, playing three subscription concerts, an open rehearsal and the special Pension Fund concert.

Tuesday evening will bring the final “Cambridge” concert of the season. Mr. Leinsdorf has invited the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society, Elliot Forbes, director, to join the orchestra for the first work on the program, Haydn’s Te Deum. He will then conduct Aaron Copland’s Symphony for Organ and Orchestra, with Berj Zamkochian at the organ. The Harvard Glee Club will return to perform “Die Tageszeiten,” Song Cycle for Men’s Chorus and Orchestra by Richard Strauss, which Mr. Leinsdorf introduced to Boston recently. The concert will close with the tone poem “Also sprach Zarathustra,” by Strauss.

At the final Friday-Saturday programs Mr. Leinsdorf will open with Mozart’s Symphony in G minor, K. 550, following with Interludes from “Die Frau ohne Schatten” by Richard Strauss. After intermission the orchestra will play Webern’s Passacaglia, Op. 1 and the program will close with the “Firebird” Suite by Stravinsky.

The eighth and last open rehearsal of the season will take place Thursday evening at 7:30, at which time the orchestra will prepare for the Friday-Saturday program.

Next Sunday evening Arthur Rubinstein will be guest artist for the second consecutive year at the orchestra’s Pension Fund concert. He will play Beethoven’s Piano Concerto No. 4 and the Rhapsody on a Theme of Paganini by Rachmaninoff. Mr. Leinsdorf and the orchestra will open the program with Beethoven’s Overture to “Fidelio” and later present excerpts from “Die Walkure” by Wagner.

Some tickets for the Pension Fund Concert are still available at the Symphony Hall Box Office.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sun (e)
LOWELL, Mass.
Circ. 45,001
APR 11 1964

Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony orchestra will enter the final week of symphony hall concerts for the 1963-64 season next week. There will be three regular concerts, an open rehearsal and a special Pension Fund concert.

The Pension Fund concert will be held next Sunday evening and Dr. Leinsdorf has invited Artur Rubinstein to appear as guest artist with the orchestra. This will mark Mr. Rubinstein's second appearance with the orchestra in the Pension Fund series. For this concert the celebrated pianist will play the Beethoven Piano Concerto No. 4 and the Rhapsody on a Theme of Paganini by Rachmaninoff. Opening the program will be the Beethoven Overture to “Fidelio”, and following the Concerto, Excerpts from Wagner's “Die Walkure.”

Union (m)
SPRINGFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 83,691

APR 18

Regional Roundup

Boston Orchestra's 83d Season Marked by Achievements

Tribute to Kennedy, Honor for Leinsdorf, World Premieres Among Highlights

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's 83d winter season closes tonight at Symphony Hall, Boston, with a concert conducted by its music director, Erich Leinsdorf, bringing to a conclusion a season marked by notable musical and historical achievements. The season included 116 performances in Symphony Hall and on tour.

The six series of concerts in Symphony Hall and the two series in Philharmonic Hall, New York, were sold out by season subscription.

Trip to Montreal

Oct. 1 the orchestra made a trip to Montreal to participate in the opening concerts of the new Place des Arts. This was the orchestra's first visit to Montreal in 16 years. Later in October Leinsdorf conducted the first Boston and New York performances of Benjamin Britten's War Requiem, which received its American premiere by the orchestra at the 1963 Berkshire Festival.

A regular Friday afternoon concert had just begun when the tragic news of the assassination of President Kennedy reached Symphony Hall. Leinsdorf made a moving announcement to the stunned audience and then conducted the "Marcia funebre" from Beethoven's Symphony No. 3. The audience stood throughout this movement.

Leinsdorf's announcement to the audience was broadcast across the nation on a special NBC radio program the following day and has since been incorporated in an RCA recording, "A Time to Keep: 1963." The American Broadcasting Co. telecast portions of the Nov. 23 concert in memory of John F. Kennedy.

Services Offered

Immediately following the death of the President, Henry B. Cabot, president of the orchestra's trustees, offered the services of the orchestra to the Kennedy family. As the funeral was held in Washington, Cabot suggested to Richard Cardinal Cushing, archbishop of Boston, that a memorial service be held in Boston. The cardinal agreed and proposed to celebrate a solemn pontifical mass of requiem in conjunction with Mozart's Requiem to be performed by the orchestra.

This service was held in the Cathedral of the Holy Cross in Boston Jan. 19 with Mrs. John F. Kennedy, other members of the Kennedy family, and guests in attendance and was televised and broadcast in the United States by the National Broadcasting Co.

A recording of the service was made by RCA Victor Co. This recording was released two weeks after the memorial mass, and the orchestra's royalties and RCA's normal proceeds are being contributed to the John F. Kennedy Memorial Library in Boston.

Musician of Year

For his contributions to the musical world Leinsdorf was elected musician of the year by the nation's music critics and editors, and he appeared on the cover of the December, 1963, issue of Musical America. In March Leinsdorf was honored by the Commonwealth of Massachusetts and Gov. Endicott Peabody at a reception held in Doric Hall of the State House.

This was the first occasion a governor's reception honoring an individual had been held in Doric Hall since Gen. Grant was so honored soon after the Civil War. The entire orchestra was honored by the commonwealth and the city of Boston when March 2 to 12 was designated by proclamations as Symphony Week.

During the 83d season Leinsdorf conducted the world premieres of two works: William Sydeman's Study for Orchestra No. 2 and Ernst Toch's Fifth Symphony. In addition to Britten's War Requiem, a number of compositions were performed for the first time in Boston. Throughout the season 80 works by 47 composers were performed.

Guest Conductors

Guest conductors who appeared during the season included Richard Burgin, the orchestra's associate conductor, and two former music directors, Charles Munch and Pierre Monteux. Dr. Munch conducted the American premiere of Leonard Bernstein's "Kaddish" in January. This work was commissioned by the orchestra and by the Koussevitzky Music Foundation for the orchestra's 75th anniversary season.

In March Leopold Stokowski conducted the orchestra for the first time. The Turkish pianist Idil Biret made her American debut with the orchestra Nov. 22, and the American violinist Erick Friedman was heard with the orchestra for the first time April 10. Twelve other soloists appeared with the orchestra during the season.

In mid-March at the annual meeting of the Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra a special surprise program, suggested by orchestra members, was given: 20 members of the orchestra dressed in 18th century costume, gave a performance of Mozart's "A Musical Joke."

White House Concert

A stage setting with candlelight suggested an 18th century drawing room. On the last day of March 36 members of the orchestra conducted by Leinsdorf gave a concert in the East Room of the White House at the invitation of Mrs. Lyndon B. Johnson. The audience consisted of 250 children of the embassy delegations to the United States. The White House concert was televised and broadcast nationally by the National Broadcasting Co.

An exhibition of the orchestra's Casadesus collection of old musical instruments at the IBM Gallery of Arts and Sciences in New York achieved wide acclaim. This was the first time the collection has been loaned outside of Symphony Hall.

Portions of it were shown on two television programs after the New York exhibit, and in June much of the collection will be on view at the music manufacturer's national convention in Chicago. The instruments will be shown in July and August at the Berkshire Museum in Pittsfield during the Berkshire Festival at nearby Tanglewood.

Television Concerts

The orchestra concluded arrangements with Seven Arts Associated for the distribution of a second series of 13 one-hour television concerts. These programs are shown in about 30 cities in this country including New York, Washington, and Los Angeles. The Boston Symphony Transcription Trust continued to distribute radio broadcasts of the orchestra's concerts to about 35 cities.

Continuing the season, the Boston Pops concerts will open in Symphony Hall April 28 with Arthur Fiedler, conductor. The Pops season will continue for nine weeks, closing June 27.

Leinsdorf will conduct the opening concert of the Berkshire Festival at the orchestra's summer home at Tanglewood in Lenox, July 3. At this summer's festival the first two weeks (six concerts) will be devoted to music by a chamber orchestra composed of members of the orchestra and the last six weeks will include 18 concerts by the full orchestra.

The orchestra's 83d season will close with the final Berkshire Festival concert Aug. 23.

* * *

Regional Contest For Twirlers In E. Longmeadow

EAST LONGMEADOW—The Western Massachusetts Baton Twirling Festival today at 1 p. m. in the Birchland Park School is sponsored by the Student Council of the school and will be directed by Philip Jennison. More than 400 contestants will compete in the various events and the highlight will be a twirl-off among first place winners in the advanced solo classes for the Birchland Park Golden Victory Trophy. East Longmeadow groups participating will be from Mapleshade Elementary School, Mountain View Elementary School, Birchland Park sixth grade, Birchland Park Junior High School and East Longmeadow High School.

Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 194,870

APR 18 1964

149

At Symphony

Webern Passacaglia On Final Program

By MICHAEL STEINBERG

The Friday afternoon series of Boston Symphony concerts came to an end with Erich Leinsdorf conducting a program of Mozart's Symphony No. 40 in G minor, a suite of excerpts frm Richard Strauss' "Die Frau ohne Schatten," the Webern Passacaglia, and the suite from Stravinsky's "Firebird."

Leinsdorf appears to be in a phase of taking classical allegros rather slowly—the first movement of his "Eroica," for example—and I doubt that the first and last movements of the symphony weer taken at tempi Mozart had in mind when he asked for "molto allegro" and "allegro assai." These are indications that are sometimes nearly synonymous with "presto," and the approach Friday was quite leisurely.

Leinsdorf also conceives the music quite broadly as to rhythm—which is a pleasure, because too many conductors make one to conscious of too many metric subdivisions—and the overall mood became one of a subdued melancholy rathe than the more turbulent passion others find here.

On its own terms, the performance was very beautiful. Leinsdorf stresses the sensuous, Italianate side of this music, and the orchestra sounded just ravishing. The interpretation was full of good things musically: all exposition repeated (though Leinsdorf no longer repeats the second part of the finale as he used to), and with the repeats creatively done, not mechanically. Also, Leinsdorf is good with the upbeats, so important in all four movements: especially the pulsating series of two eighths and a quarter in the first movement were realized with a fine sense of how music breathes.

There were some odd details, like a few ornaments before the beat which I find it hard to believe should not be on the beat, the finale's second theme, for instance. And there was one note inaudible all three times it should have occurred, the bassoon's crucial G when the woodwinds take over in the last seven bars of the Mennet. All in all, it was good Mozart, and just the antidote needed after the nightmare of Rosenstock's "Don Gionvanni" the night before.

Anton Webern's Passacaglia, Opus 1, composed in 1908, hovers between Brahms and, well, Webern. It begins by beto Bach's organ Passacaglia, but on the whole Humphrey Searle, quoted in the program notes, is quite right in associating it with "the Brahmsian side of early Schoenberg."

Like much of early Schoenberg, the Passacaglia is densely elaborate, busy, apt to be thick in texture, almost feverish in the rapidity of its mood changes. But it ise also the music of a young man aware of the limitations and the eventual dangers of that manner, and so the Passacaglia is marked by an ecoonmy almost miraculous for the time. And already theer is the delicious and fastidious ear to create one touch after another of orchestral magic.

In performance, the Passacaglia calls above all for that which Leinsdorf seems least good at, the maintenance of continuity across constantly fluctuating tempi. Webern sets up three basic speeds for the varieties, and these have to be kept in most careful balance against each other, but beyond that much of the time the music is not so much in a tempo as enroute from one another. I found it hard, in this performance, to get the ides of a plastic flow. The sound at any given moment was well projected, and there was some fine solo playing....

Leinsdorf also led a series of excertps, not quite accurately described in the program as "Interludes" from "Die Frau ohne Schatten." The opera is full of interest and beauty, but not of the sort whose characteristics are readily conveyed in a series of orchestral "highlights."

Christian Science
Monitor (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 174,850

APR 18 1964

The Leinsdorf touch

Shaping a program

By Roland Nadeau

Not enough has been said yet about Erich Leinsdorf's programing with the Boston Symphony. There is more to it than first meets the ear.

By programing we do not mean the kind of music chosen—on this count there has been some carping because of a conservative slant in his programs—but rather the way that he harmonizes different musical idioms and establishes emotional continuity from beginning to end within a complete concert.

There have been many times, among them Friday's concert, when organic wholeness and balance has been superb. This last concert held together and built to a climax as do the movements of a Beethoven sonata.

* * *

Mozart, probably the composer best understood and interpreted by Mr. Leinsdorf, began. The Symphony No. 40 in G minor, because of its romantic leanings, can easily and naturally be followed by almost any other work, from Beethoven right on through Mahler and Strauss, without fear of stripping emotional gears. By placing next in order Strauss's Interludes from the Opera "Die Frau ohne Schatten" Mr. Leinsdorf showed how far the thread of German symphonic writing had been spun out in 129 years.

Despite the fact that the Mozart is deftness incarnate while the Strauss is densely bombastic the conductor's cogent drawing out closely knit musical ideas and shapes proved that both works possess common harmonic and formal blood.

Showing how the German symphonic tradition has been pushed even further into the very vortex of contemporary musical thought, he chose for his next item the Passacaglia, Op. 1 by Webern. Though this piece is as neatly organized motivically as a Bach fugue, it has one added element: that of color for color's sake, in the sense that Debussy or Ravel used it.

* * *

Thus the Webern, a hybrid stylistically, led naturally to the concluding selection for the day, the Suite from "L'Oiseau de feu" by Stravinsky—itself a hybrid of a different sort.

The suite is two parts Russian nationalistic and three parts French impressionistic. It smacks so much of early Debussy that I kept thinking over and over again while listening, "l'après-midi d'un oiseau de feu."

Whatever the aesthetic or idiomatic bent of the piece, it is ravishing to the heart and ears. Mr. Leinsdorf, having carried the program through its well-modulated and neatly paced journey, now closed the program and season series with a stunning and totally persuasive reading of the score.

130

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Jewish Advocate
BOSTON, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 35,304

APR 23 1964

MUSIC IN REVIEW

By GERALD A. BERLIN

B.S.O.: 1963 - 1964 VALEDICTORY

The 83rd Symphony season didn't conclude, it just more or less ground to a halt. The fault lay not in the stars but in the program and in the performance thereof.

There were two thrice-familiar works, Mozart's G minor Symphony and Stravinsky's "Firebird" Suite, together with Mr. Leinsdorf's arrangements of Interludes from Strauss' opera, "Die Frau ohne Schatten" and the first performance of Webern's Passacaglia, Opus 1.

The G minor Symphony and the "Firebird" are each in their own way very great music. But any music played as frequently as these two runs the risk of partaking more of the quality of an overroasted chestnut than of incandescent genius. The only thing that will preserve the quality, other than a prolonged sabbatical, is a powerful, fresh, arresting performance. This neither work got. An inventory of the virtues of their reading — clarity, balance ,tempi, proportion, attack and the like — would have found both coming out passing well. Only at that intangible point where there must be something more was there failure. Though it is hard to put one's finger upon the root cause, there was a flaccidness which permeated the performance, and which only induced torpor where there should have been excitement.

Since the Pops season opening was yet some days to go, the question arises, Why would two such redoubtables show up on one program? Almost like a page out of Karl Marx, economic determinism yet again supplies the answer. The G minor Symphony has to be prepared for the forthcoming Mozart series at Tanglewood, the "Firebird" for the forthcoming RCA recording session. The somewhat exploited masses are the Symphony Hall subscription audiences.

As for the other two pieces, their problem was purely and simply that they are undistinguished. This characterization is not wholly fair for the Webern Passacaglia, which at least commands a profound interest for archivists concerned with finding out all they can as to how Webern came upon his metier. There are evident suggestions of the compression, subtlety and pointillistic style that was so soon to follow, but the work comes down heavily on the rather conventional turn-of-the-century richness and sweep a la Richard Strauss. It is not the Webern in sum who is indisputably one of the most profound influences upon the music of our day. That Webern, the immensity of his contribution to twentieth century composition notwithstanding, is almost never performed at Symphony, and that is my complaint.

Redeeming words for the "Die Frau ohne Schatten" concoction are less easily come by. I am most fond of Strauss, but to me this lush and creamy outpouring often sounds like the composer's parody of himself. When Mr. Leinsdorf introduced the work as guest three years ago, it was the novelty of hearing a virtually unknown major effort of Strauss' late middle period, the opportunity to measure Mr. Leinsdorf's way with him, and his capacities as an arranger. Once the novelty evaporated, so too did any real reason for reviving the piece.

Yet withal, the 83rd season was a good one. The orchestra has become an even finer, more sensitive instrument than ever. Mr. Leinsdorf, I once again assert, is well on his way to becoming one of the most respected of contemporary conductors. Like the economy, the esteem in which both the orchestra and its conductor are held, at least with out-of-town critics, somehow manages continuously to expand. Local audiences seem rather less adulatory. Indeed, the applause volume is sometimes light to the point of coolness. Perhaps Mr. Leinsdorf's nononsense podium manner contributes as much to this as anything else, although logically speaking, this would apply equally as much abroad as at home.

It was a season of rather a considerable number of peaks. One recalls with a special pleasure the white-hot reading of Mahler's Fifth Symphony, of Strauss' "Zarathustra" and of Britten's "War Requiem"; the probing interpretations of Bruckner's and Beethoven's Seventh Symphonies; the ingratiating quality of Dvorak's Sixth Symphony; the adept collaboration in Brahms' D Minor Piano Concerto; and the artistry of Joseph Silverstein in Bartok's Violin Concerto and Samuel Mayes in the "Don Quixote' of Strauss. The valleys were there, too, and one recollects rather painfully Samuel Barber's First Symphony Rimsky-Korsakov's 'Le Coq d'Or", and oh, so very much Wagner. In between the orchestra operated upon a consistently high plateau and for more than this we ought not ask.

MIDWEST NEWSCLIP, INC.
Box 1359, Chicago 90, WEbster 9-5497

Sunday Tribune
Chicago, Ill.
Circ. 1,229,396

APR 19 1964

Winter Season at Boston Ends

Orchestras have to call their seasons nowadays. The Boston Symphony orchestra reports that it ended its 83d winter season last night in Boston's Symphony hall with a concert conducted by Erich Leinsdorf. But the orchestra's 83d season continues for nine weeks of' Boston Pops concerts opening April 28 under Arthur Fiedler's direction, and moves to the Berkshire Festival July 3 thru Aug. 23, again under Mr. Leinsdorf's direction. X-27

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Herald (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 178,553

APR 18 1964

Last Concert Rises to Glittering Greatness

By ROBERT TAYLOR

The final concert in the 83rd season of The Boston Symphony Orchestra began ominously yesterday with a gelid performance of Mozart's emotionally-lambent Symphony No. 40, in G minor. From this disastrous start, however, Mr. Leinsdorf proceeded to unfold a fine Strauss suite, a superior Webern Passacaglia, and finally, a Firebird that blazed and glittered like the phoenix of a resurrected program.

His choice of a Mozart orchestra was logical, although last week he chose to present Beethoven's First with full forces. The G minor symphony achieves magnificence through the precise symmetry of restrictive means. The composer dispenses with trumpets and timpani, and among the woodwinds only the clarinets have a noticeable accent. So the symphony really aims at emotional impact through economy and understatement; and it isn't a musicologist's notion of "historical purity" that determines the organization here.

The balances of the opening movement were delicately-calibrated in the violins and violas, and the phrasing exhibited a poignant cantabile tenderness. Mr. Leinsdorf, after such a promising molto allegro, then paced the andante as though the direction read "Allegro ma non troppo," with the result that the gently-murmering figures vanished in a crisp, mechanical momentum.

This reflected its propulsion in the Minuet, which is undeniably stern and angular by contrast. Unfortunately, there wasn't much contrast, save for the landler-like Trio, and the weaving, swift counterpoint of the allegro assai received an impetus that was all of a piece with the rest. The reading lacked variety, and its idiom was streamlined and chill. Mr. Leinsdorf, who is ordinarily completely in accord with the proportions of the classical symphony, yesterday sculpted his pattern with a riveter's gun.

The interludes from Strauss's opera, "The Woman Without A Shadow," which has recently been revived in New York, sounded resplendent, though, and Mr. Leinsdorf drew from the orchestra nately moving and dramatic, one suspects a certain detachment lies in this music, despite its lushly - tooled Straussiana. The composer's initial reservations about Hofmannsthal's libretto (he complained at first about the dehumanized and abstract characters) strike one as commonsensical, and though Strauss later warmed to the task, the work seems more the product of professionalism than of commitment.

Nevertheless, there are in it admirably - crafted melodies. Joseph Silverstein played the sweet and haunting solo violin dialogue with admirable mysticism, and the dynamic richness of the suite associated us in performance with Mr. Leinsdorf's first appearance here, when he provided the first of these two excellent accounts.

ERICH LEINSDORF

Webern's Opus 1 is a wonderful score, though rarely played, and Mr. Leinsdorf made the most of its enormously subtle style. Because the music says so much about Webern, the post-romantic period and the composer's later evoluton, we are apt to think of it, normally enough, in historical terms. Seldom has an Opus 1 so completely shattered an environment, and for precedent one must go to the work of Schumann or Chopin (the Opus 1 of Strauss, Mozart, Wagner et al is undistinguished, while Bach and Handel were already matured by the time theirs were published).

Yet if it is possible to consider the Passacaglia as sheer music rather than as prophecy, one may hear in it a terse, epigrammatic and clear process or composition: in yesterday's rendering the transparent and energetic synthesis of Brahms and an astringent classicism was brilliantly expounded.

From these triumphs, Mr. Leinsdorf capped the season with a memorable "Firebird," a concert cliche ordinarily, but yesterday, thanks to a relaxed tempo and a leisurely, firm ordering of the elements, the suite radiated a captivating glamor. It was enchanting from beginning to end, a spellbound note on which to hail conductor and orchestra for the experience of another season, to bid farewell to Messrs. Mays and de Pasquale who have entranced us by their art, and to thank all who make the musical future week by week in Boston the noble heritage of a great world orchestra and its audience.

The Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf conducting, presented the 24th program of the 83rd season yesterday in Symphony Hall. The program will be repeated tonight at 8:30.
Symphony in G minor, K 550 .. Mozart
Interludes from the opera, "Die Frau ohne Schatten" ... Strauss
Passacaglia, Op. 1 ... Webern
Suite from the ballet "L'Oiseau de feu" ... Stravinsky

130

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Jewish Advocate
BOSTON, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 35,304

APR 23 1964

MUSIC IN REVIEW

By GERALD A. BERLIN

B.S.O.: 1963 - 1964 VALEDICTORY

The 83rd Symphony season didn't conclude, it just more or less ground to a halt. The fault lay not in the stars but in the program and in the performance thereof.

There were two thrice-familiar works, Mozart's G minor Symphony and Stravinsky's "Firebird" Suite, together with Mr. Leinsdorf's arrangements of Interludes from Strauss' opera, "Die Frau ohne Schatten" and the first performance of Webern's Passacaglia, Opus 1.

The G minor Symphony and the "Firebird" are each in their own way very great music. But any music played as frequently as these two runs the risk of partaking more of the quality of an overroasted chestnut than of incandescent genius. The only thing that will preserve the quality, other than a prolonged sabbatical, is a powerful, fresh, arresting performance. This neither work got. An inventory of the virtues of their reading — clarity, balance ,tempi, proportion, attack and the like — would have found both coming out passing well. Only at that intangible point where there must be something more was there failure. Though it is hard to put one's finger upon the root cause, there was a flaccidness which permeated the performance, and which only induced torpor where there should have been excitement.

Since the Pops season opening was yet some days to go, the question arises, Why would two such redoubtables show up on one program? Almost like a page out of Karl Marx, economic determinism yet again supplies the answer. The G minor Symphony has to be prepared for the forthcoming Mozart series at Tanglewood, the "Firebird" for the forthcoming RCA recording session. The somewhat exploited masses are the Symphony Hall subscription audiences.

As for the other two pieces, their problem was purely and simply that they are undistinguished. This characterization is not wholly fair for the Webern Passacaglia, which at least commands a profound interest for archivists concerned with finding out all they can as to how Webern came upon his metier. There are evident suggestions of the compression, subtlety and pointillistic style that was so soon to follow, but the work comes down heavily on the rather conventional turn-of-the-century richness and sweep a la Richard Strauss. It is not the Webern in sum who is indisputably one of the most profound influences upon the music of our day. That Webern, the immensity of his contribution to twentieth century composition notwithstanding, is almost never performed at Symphony, and that is my complaint.

Redeeming words for the "Die Frau ohne Schatten" concoction are less easily come by. I am most fond of Strauss, but to me this lush and creamy outpouring often sounds like the composer's parody of himself. When Mr. Leinsdorf introduced the work as guest three years ago, it was the novelty of hearing a virtually unknown major effort of Strauss' late middle period, the opportunity to measure Mr. Leinsdorf's way with him, and his capacities as an arranger. Once the novelty evaporated, so too did any real reason for reviving the piece.

MIDWEST NEWSCLIP, INC.
Box 1359, Chicago 90, WEbster 9-5497

Sunday Tribune
Chicago, Ill.
Circ. 1,229,396

APR 19 1964

Winter Season at Boston Ends

Orchestras have to call their seasons nowadays. The Boston Symphony orchestra reports that it ended its 83d winter season last night in Boston's Symphony hall with a concert conducted by Erich Leinsdorf. But the orchestra's 83d season continues for nine weeks of Boston Pops concerts opening April 28 under Arthur Fiedler's direction, and moves to the Berkshire Festival July 3 thru Aug. 23, again under Mr. Leinsdorf's direction. X-27

Yet withal, the 83rd season was a good one. The orchestra has become an even finer, more sensitive instrument than ever. Mr. Leinsdorf, I once again assert, is well on his way to becoming one of the most respected of contemporary conductors. Like the economy, the esteem in which both the orchestra and its conductor are held, at least with out-of-town critics, somehow manages continuously to expand. Local audiences seem rather less adulatory. Indeed, the applause volume is sometimes light to the point of coolness. Perhaps Mr. Leinsdorf's no-nonsense podium manner contributes as much to this as anything else, although logically speaking, this would apply equally as much abroad as at home.

It was a season of rather a considerable number of peaks. One recalls with a special pleasure the white-hot reading of Mahler's Fifth Symphony, of Strauss' "Zarathustra" and of Britten's "War Requiem"; the probing interpretations of Bruckner's and Beethoven's Seventh Symphonies; the ingratiating quality of Dvorak's Sixth Symphony; the adept collaboration in Brahms' D Minor Piano Concerto; and the artistry of Joseph Silverstein in Bartok's Violin Concerto and Samuel Mayes in the "Don Quixote" of Strauss. The valleys were there, too, and one recollects rather painfully Samuel Barber's First Symphony, Rimsky-Korsakov's 'Le Coq d'Or", and oh, so very much Wagner. In between the orchestra operated upon a consistently high plateau and for more than this we ought not ask.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Herald (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 178,553

APR 18 1964

Last Concert Rises to Glittering Greatness

By ROBERT TAYLOR

The final concert in the 83rd season of The Boston Symphony Orchestra began ominously yesterday with a gelid performance of Mozart's emotionally-lambent Symphony No. 40, in G minor. From this disastrous start, however, Mr. Leinsdorf proceeded to unfold a fine Strauss suite, a superior Webern Passacaglia, and finally, a Firebird that blazed and glittered like the phoenix of a resurrected program.

His choice of a Mozart orchestra was logical, although last week he chose to present Beethoven's First with full forces. The G minor symphony achieves magnificence through the precise symmetry of restrictive means. The composer dispenses with trumpets and timpani, and among the woodwinds only the clarinets have a noticeable accent. So the symphony really aims at emotional impact through economy and understatement; and it isn't a musicologist's notion of "historical purity" that determines the organization here.

The balances of the opening movement were delicately-calibrated in the violins and violas, and the phrasing exhibited a poignant cantabile tenderness. Mr. Leinsdorf, after such a promising molto allegro, then paced the andante as though the direction read "Allegro ma non troppo," with the result that the gently-murmering figures vanished in a crisp, mechanical momentum.

This reflected its propulsion in the Minuet, which is undeniably stern and angular by contrast. Unfortunately, there wasn't much contrast, save for the landler-like Trio, and the weaving, swift counterpoint of the allegro assai received an impetus that was all of a piece with the rest. The reading lacked variety, and its idiom was streamlined and chill. Mr. Leinsdorf, who is ordinarily completely in accord with the proportions of the classical symphony, yesterday sculpted his pattern with a riveter's gun.

The interludes from Strauss's opera, "The Woman Without A Shadow," which has recently been revived in New York, sounded resplendent, though, and Mr. Leinsdorf drew from the orchestra nately moving and dramatic, one suspects a certain detachment lies in this music, despite its lushly - tooled Straussiana. The composer's initial reservations about Hofmannsthal's libretto (he complained at first about the dehumanized and abstract characters) strike one as commonsensical, and though Strauss later warmed to the task, the work seems more the product of professionalism than of commitment.

Nevertheless, there are in it admirably - crafted melodies. Joseph Silverstein played the sweet and haunting solo violin dialogue with admirable mysticism, and the dynamic richness of the suite associated us in performance with Mr. Leinsdorf's first appearance here, when he tra a glowing textural opulence. Unlike the Mozart symphony, in- provided the first of these two excellent accounts.

ERICH LEINSDORF

Webern's Opus 1 is a wonderful score, though rarely played, and Mr. Leinsdorf made the most of its enormously subtle style. Because the music says so much about Webern, the post-romantic period and the composer's later evoluton, we are apt to think of it, normally enough, in historical terms. Seldom has an Opus 1 so completely shattered an environment, and for precedent one must go to the work of Schumann or Chopin (the Opus 1 of Strauss, Mozart, Wagner et al is undistinguished, while Bach and Handel were already matured by the time theirs were published).

Yet if it is possible to consider the Passacaglia as sheer music rather than as prophecy, one may hear in it a terse, epigrammatic and clear process or composition: in yesterday's rendering the transparent and energetic synthesis of Brahms and an astringent classicism was brilliantly expounded.

From these triumphs, Mr. Leinsdorf capped the season with a memorable "Firebird," a concert cliche ordinarily, but yesterday, thanks to a relaxed tempo and a leisurely, firm ordering of the elements, the suite radiated a captivating glamor. It was enchanting from beginning to end, a spellbound note on which to hail conductor and orchestra for the experience of another season, to bid farewell to Messrs. Mays and de Pasquale who have entranced us by their art, and to thank all who make the musical future week by week in Boston the noble heritage of a great world orchestra and its audience.

The Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf conducting, presented the 24th program of the 83rd season yesterday in Symphony Hall. The program will be repeated tonight at 8:30.
Symphony in G minor, K. 550 .. Mozart
Interludes from the opera, "Die Frau ohne Schatten" ... Strauss
Passacaglia, Op. 1 ... Webern
Suite from the ballet "L'Oiseau de feu" ... Stravinsky

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Courant
HARTFORD, Conn.
Circ. 161,020

151

The Lively Arts —

Busy Bostonians

By T. H. Parker

For those who wondered how Erich Leinsdorf and audiences of the Boston Symphony Orchestra were going to get on together, the answer seems to be that they are making out just great.

For his contributions to the musical world last season, Mr. Leinsdorf was named Musician of the Year by the country's critics and editors, and his picture appeared on the cover of Musical America for December 1963.

Then in March Mr. Leinsdorf was honored by the Commonwealth of Massachusetts and Governor Endicott Peabody at a reception held in Doric Hall of the State House. This was the first occasion a Governor's reception honoring an individual had been held in Doric Hall since General Grant was so honored shortly after the Civil War. And the entire orchestra was honored by the Commonwealth and the City of Boston when March 2 to 12 was designated by proclamations as Symphony Week.

During the 83rd winter season just concluded, Mr. Leinsdorf conducted the world premiere of two works, William Sydeman's "Study for Orchestra No. 2," and Ernst Toch's "Fifth Symphony." In addition to Benjamin Britten's War Requiem which had been given its American premiere at Tanglewood by Mr. Leinsdorf and the Boston Orchestra, a number of compositions were performed for the first time in Boston. Throughout the season 80 works by 47 composers were performed.

★

Guest conductors who appeared during the season included Richard Burgin who is the orchestra's associate conductor, and two former music directors, Charles Munch and Pierre Monteux. Mr. Munch conducted the American premier of Leonard Bernstein's "Kaddish" in January. The work had been commissioned by the orchestra and the Koussevitzky Music Foundation.

In March, Leopold Stokowski conducted the Boston Symphony for the first time. The Turkish pianist Idil Biret made her American debut with the orchestra in November, and the American violinist Erick Freidman was heard with the orchestra for the first time April 10. Twelve other soloists appeared with the orchestra during the winter season.

A memorable if sad event on the schedule of Mr. Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony took place in January. Immediately following the death of President Kennedy, Henry B. Cabot, president of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, offered the orchestra's services to the Kennedy family. As the funeral was held in Washington, Mr. Cabot suggested to Richard Cardinal Cushing, Archbishop of Boston, that a memorial service be held in the Massachusetts capital. The Cardinal agreed and proposed to celebrate a Solemn Pontifical Mass of Requiem in conjunction with Mozart's "Requiem" to be performed by the Boston Symphony. The service was held in the Cathedral of the Holy Cross, with Mrs. John F. Kennedy, other members of the Kennedy family, and invited guests in attendance. A recording of the service as made by RCA Victor, and the Boston Symphony's royalties and RCA normal proceeds are being contributed to the Kennedy Memorial Library, Boston.

★

An exhibition of the Boston Symphony's Casadesus Collection of Old Musical instruments at the IBM Gallery of Arts and Sciences in New York achieved wide acclaim. This was the first time the collection had been loaned from its home base in Symphony Hall. Portions of it were shown on two television programs after the New York exhibit, and in June much of the collection will be on view at the Music Manufacturers' national convention in Chicago. The instruments will be shown in July and August at the Berkshire Museum, Pittsfield, Massachusetts, during the Tanglewood festival.

All told, the orchestra's winter season, which began in September, included a total 116 performances in Boston and on tour. The six series of concerts in Symphony Hall and the two series in Philharmonic Hall, New York, were completely sold out by season subscription. In October the orchestra made a special trip to Montreal to take part in the opening concerts of the new Place des Arts. This was the orchestra's first trip to Montreal in ten years.

Continuing the present season, the Boston Pops concert will open in Symphony Hall on April 28, with Arthur Fiedler conducting. The Pops season will last nine weeks, closing June 27. Mr. Leinsdorf will conduct the opening concert of the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood on July 3. The first two weeks of six concerts will be devoted to music by a chamber orchestra drawn from the Boston Symphony, and the last six weeks will offer 18 concerts by the full orchestra.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Republican
SPRINGFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 112,302
APR 19 1964

BSO COMPLETES WINTER SEASON

Many Notable Events Are Recorded

BOSTON — The Boston Symphony Orchestra closed its 83d winter season last night in Symphony Hall under the direction of Erich Leinsdorf. The season was marked by many notable musical and historical achievements. Under the baton of Mr. Leinsdorf the BSO will appear in a Junior League concert in Springfield's Municipal Auditorium Tuesday at 8.30 p. m.

The orchestra's winter season, which began Sept. 27, included a total of 116 performances in Symphony Hall, Boston, and on tour. The six series of concerts in Symphony Hall and the two series in Philharmonic Hall, New York, were completely sold out by season subscription.

Special Program

On Oct. 1 the Boston Symphony Orchestra made a special trip to Montreal to participate in the opening concerts of the new Place des Arts in that city. This was the orchestra's first visit to Montreal in 10 years. Later in October Mr. Leinsdorf conducted the first Boston and New York performances of Benjamin Britten's "War Requiem," which received its American premiere by the orchestra at the 1963 Berkshire Festival.

A regular Friday afternoon concert had just begun when the tragic news of the assassination of President Kennedy reached Symphony Hall. Mr. Leinsdorf made a moving announcement to the stunned audience and then conducted the "Marckefunebre" from Beethoven's Symphony No. 3. The entire audience stood throughout this movement.

Immediately following the death of the President, Henry B. Cabot, president of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's trustees, offered the services of the orchestra to the Kennedy Family. Mr. Cabot suggested to Richard Cardinal Cushing, archbishop of Boston, that a memorial service to be held in Boston. The cardinal agreed and proposed to celebrate a Solemn Pontifical Mass of Requiem in conjunction with Mozart's Requiem to be performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The service was held in the Cathedral of the Holy Cross, Jan. 19 with Mrs. John F. Kennedy, other members of the Kennedy family, and invited guests in attendance and was televised and broadcast in the United States by the National Broadcasting Company.

Musician of Year

For his contributions to the musical world Mr. Leinsdorf was elected musician of the year by the nation's music critics and editors, and he appeared on the cover of the December issue of Musical America. In March Mr. Leinsdorf was honored by the Commonwealth of Massachusetts and Gov. Endicott Peabody at a reception held in Doric Hall of the State House. This was the first occasion a governor's reception honoring an individual had been held in Doric Hall since Gen. Grant was so honored soon after the Civil War. The entire orchestra was honored by the commonwealth and the City of Boston when March 2-12 was designated by proclamations as "Symphony Week."

During the 83d season Mr. Leinsdorf conducted the world premieres of two works: William Sydeman's Study for Orchestra No. 2 and Ernst Toch's Fifth Symphony.

Continuing the 83d season, the Boston Pops concerts will open in Symphony Hall on the 28th with Arthur Fiedler, conductor. The pops season will continue for nine weeks, closing June 27. Erich Leinsdorf will conduct the opening concert of the Berkshire Festival at the orchestra's summer home, Tanglewood, Lenox, July 3.

152

NewEngland Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Sunday Herald
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 283,819

APR 19 1964

Robert Taylor's Notes

IT WAS A LEINSDORF YEAR—AND GOOD

By ROBERT TAYLOR

The 83rd season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been magnificent at its very best and abysmal at its worst, and there seems to be little middle ground. But it has never been less than stimulating, and it is a season, I think, in which Erich Leinsdorf established himself more firmly than ever in the forefront of world conductors.

He has received all sorts of public relations commendations, and these, aside from their tokens of goodwill, are relatively meaningless. What is truly significant about the season just past is that Mr. Leinsdorf has moulded the Boston Symphony Orchestra into his aesthetic ideal. More and more the concerts are taking on his artistic signature.

THE IDENTTIY of a Leinsdorf performance emphasizes clarity, articulation, ensemble and proportion. It has been said by his critics, and sometimes with justice, that his work does not "soar." Such are the limitations of a classical mind. When a Leinsdorf performance does soar, its perfectly poised elements constitute a miraculous organic unity that has far more persuasiveness than the style of conducting that waits on sheer inspiration.

He is not a limited conductor, restricted by school, nationality or public favor; he recognizes the role of the symphony orchestra as the transmitter of heritage, the standard by which traditions are judged and inherited, and yet he isn't bound by a stock repertory and exhibits a willingness to keep symphony concerts alive with new music, the neglected compositions of masters, the worthy obscurities of the literature.

HE CONDUCTED at least one definitive performance last season in his reading of Bruckner's Seventh, and it is saying a great deal, since interpretations of this noble order are infrequently encountered in a lifetime. His performance of the Seventh disclosed a majestic long-breathed drama that slowly evolved into a seraphic and glorious realm beyond speech.

In the works of the classicists he has been equally convincing, and just last week his Beethoven First radiated the burnish of superb pacing, though I have little taste for the symphony itself. Other Leinsdorf interpretations that one recalls without consulting the official listing of BSO scores are his Beethoven Seventh, with all the repeats, his Brahm's First and his Schubert Third.

Of late Mr. Leinsdorf shows a disposition toward the orchestral arrangement of operatic music, no surprise considering his sources and long association with the lyric theater. Objections to these collections are virtually a cliche, and they have been reiterated by many, including myself. Lately, however, I find myself agreeing with the Leisndorfian approach, for if the engagement of The Metropolitan last week is any criterion, we shall next hear Wagner in the opera house as a novelty. It is odd that the master, who revolutionized the conception of opera, should in the end be preserved in the concert hall.

THE ORCHESTRA'S winter season, which began last September 27, included a total of 116 performances. There were unforgettable occasions including the macabre and awful afternoon of the presidential assassination, the subsequent memorial Mozart Requiem at Holy Cross Cathedral.

The Chorus Pro Musica sang in Britten's War Requiem as it had at Tanglewood, and covered itself with merited praise. The Britten did not attain the unalloyed raptures that had greeted the American premiere, nevertheless emerged as a considerable addition to the body of 20th century music.

Leonard Bernstein's "Kaddish" Symphony proved the most controversial new piece offered this season, with criticism levelled at its literary merits: I myself think it exciting and expressive music. But it was not, on the whole, a season for new scores. William Sydeman's Study for Orchestra No. 2 and Ernst Toch's Fifth Symphony were of negligible consequence.

EIGHTY works by 47 composers were given; Leopold Stokowski made his overdue debut; Pierre Monteau returned, and so did Charles Munch. The peaks of performance towered, then plunged, the season had enormous variety, and the Boston Symphony once more was brant and dynamic force. It a Leinsdorf year

PENSION FUND CONCERT.

153

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Sunday Advertiser
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 448,810

2 2 1964

TICKETS for the 131st Pension Fund concert that the Boston Symphony will give April 19th come a little high, but lovers of the musical classics will pay any price to get in. The attraction, aside from batoneer Erich Leinsdorf and the orchestra, is venerable pianist Arthur Rubinstein. This will be his second successive appearance as soloist for the concert. His performance last year was so magnificent that the Friends of the symphony prevailed on him to return this year. He'll play Beethoven's Fourth Piano Concerto and Rachmaninoff's "Rhapsody on a Theme of Paganini." The rest of the program consists of Beethoven's overture to "Fidelio" and excerpts from Wagner's "Die Walkure."

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Sunday Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 465,653

MAR 29 1964

Rubinstein Soloist for BSO Pension

Artur Rubinstein will play two works with the Boston Symphony at a concert Sunday evening, Apr. 19, to benefit the orchestra's pension fund. Erich Leinsdorf will conduct.

The program comprises Beethoven's Overture to "Fidelio" and the Fourth Piano Concerto, Rachmaninoff's Rhapsody on a Theme of Paganini, and excerpts from "Die Walkure" by Wagner.

Rubinstein was guest artist at the orchestra's Pension Fund Concert last season.

His association with the orchestra goes back many years: his first guest appearance was in 1921, with Pierre Monteux conducting; and in 1919, 14 years before Serge Koussevitzky came to Boston, Rubinstein was soloist for Koussevitzky in St. Petersburg.

For the pension fund concert the members of the orchestra and Leinsdorf will donate their services, and the net proceeds will go to the pension fund, which in 1963 paid $210,000 to 92 Boston Symphony Orchestra pensioners and widows.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Sunday Herald
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 283,819

MAR 29 1964

Pension Fund Concert

Arthur Rubinstein Symphony Soloist

Erich Leinsdorf and the members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have invited Arthur Rubinstein to be soloists at the orchestra's Pension Fund concert on Sunday evening, April 19, at 8:30.

Mr. Rubinstein will play Beethoven's Piano Concerto No. 4 and the Rhapsody on a Theme of Paganini, by Rachmaninoff. Mr. Leinsdorf and the orchestra will open the program with Beethoven's Overture to "Fidelio" and later present excerpts from Die Walkure" by Wagner.

The public sale of tickets for the Pension Fund Concert will begin tomorrow morning at 10 at the Symphony Hall box office.

THE SYMPHONY will be on its final tour of the season this week, presenting two concerts in Washington on Monday and Tuesday, programs in New York's Philharmonic Hall on Wednesday and Friday evenings and at the Brooklyn Academy of Music on Thursday evening.

During the orchestra's two-day visit in Washington members of the orchestra under the direction of Erich Leinsdorf will present a special concert at the White House on Tuesday afternoon, at the invitation of the First Lady, for children of the Embassy delegations to the United States.

It will be the first time the Boston Symphony has performed at the White House.

THE ORCHESTRA will return to Boston next Saturday and on Sunday afternoon will give the concert which was postponed from Feb. 16. Rudolf Serkin will be guest artist playing Mozart's Piano Concerto, K. 466. Leinsdorf will open the program with Schumann's Overture, Scherzo and Finale, Op. 52, and his closing works will be Excerpts from two of Wagner's operas, "Die Walkure" and "Siegfried."

The final concerts of the Monday Evening Series and Tuesday Evenings Series will take place at Symphony Hall on April 6 and 7. The next Friday-Saturday concerts will be given April 10 and 11, with Erick Friedman, violinist, as guest artist.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Christian Science
Monitor (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 174,850

APR 17 1964

Artur Rubinstein will be piano soloist with the Boston Symphony for its Pension Fund concert Sunday night in Symphony Hall at 8:30.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Herald (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 178,553

APR 17 1964

ARTUR RUBINSTEIN will play Beethoven's 4th Piano Concerto and Rachmaninoff's Paganini Variations at the Boston Symphony Pension Fund Concert Sunday night at Symphony Hall.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Herald (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 178,553

APR 8 1964

Pension Concert Tickets Available

A limited number of tickets is available for the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Pension Fund Concert of Sunday evening, April 19, at 8:30. Erich Leinsdorf and the orchestra, who will contribute their services on this occasion, have invited Artur Rubinstein to return for the second consecutive Fund Concert.

Mr. Rubinstein will play Beethoven's Piano Concerto No. 4 and "Variations on a Theme of Paganini," by Rachmaninoff. Mr. Leinsdorf will also conduct Beethoven's Overture to "Fidelio" and Excerpts from "Die Walkure" by Wagner.

year as guest artist at the Pension

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Christian Science
Monitor (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 174,850

APR 1 7 1964

Pension fund concert tickets

Tickets are still available at the box office for the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Pension Fund concert Sunday evening, April 19, at 8:30, in Symphony Hall. Erich Leinsdorf and the orchestra will have Artur Rubinstein as guest artist at the concert. Music by Beethoven, Rachmaninoff, and Wagner will be heard.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 194,870

APR 17 1964

Piano Soloist

Artur Rubinstein will appear with Boston Symphony Orchestra Sunday evening at 8:30. For annual Pension Fund concert he will play Beethoven's Concerto No. 4 and the Rhapsody on a Theme of Paganini by Rachmaninoff.

154

PENSION FUND CONCERT

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR 4/20/64
ts—Entertainment THE CHRIST

Pension Fund Concert

Rubinstein acclaimed

By Godfrey John

Artur Rubinstein, that living legend of the keyboard, had Symphony Hall's Sunday night audience on its feet at the conclusion of Beethoven's Concerto No, 4. This tumultuous applause was for the generosity of spirit that had moved his hands to another musical triumph.

But while triumph is a familiar face to Rubinstein, you felt it was one he had not taken for granted in this 131st Pension Fund Concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

With the first touch of his fingers his youth was "renewed like the eagle's." Yet the large sweeps and cascades of sound that reached us held the detached force of the poet and mystic rather than the pulsing of the dramatist.

Not that Rubinstein is in the least removed from all the drama that is Beethoven. But it was the difference between emotion contemplated and emotion felt. Not for a moment did the distinguished soloist lose his contact with his 20th-century instrument in all his respect for Germanic fire and freedom.

Beethoven, that giant of the pianoforte — is unquestionably a force to be reckoned with whenever he is heard. And Rubinstein reckoned. He played with the self-forgetfulness that betokens the power of embodying a composer's conception and intention. Here was the astonishment of a March wind rather than the throb of arterial blood.

* * *

In both Rubinstein's Beethoven and Rachmaninoff, a certain improvisational quality to his execution was paralleled by an ever present grace of touch. Here was both a fire and fluency that shaped his rhythms into meaning like the combined strength and beauty of Pegasus in flight.

His phrasing was impeccable, his descending leaps — unerring. Each run sparkled with its own brightness. And his sforzandos were exquisite, enunciated with the clarity of distant bells. But with every swell, from pianissimo to fortissimo, Rubinstein was never out of touch with the natural subdued and restrained feeling of his instrument.

* * *

It was to be expected that Beethoven's voice would overshadow Rachmaninoff's in such a context. Yet in Rubinstein's rendering of the Rhapsody on a Theme of Paganini, the chords still came with the strength of a blow, and the subtle nuances of tone gradation fell butterfly - light in their pursuit. So much so, that the familiar Paganini melody broke upon us with the explosive power of escaping thistledown.

But the evening had the pulse of Beethoven. Our ears still thrilled to all his intensity and distance, impetuous flights and stillnesses—caught and translated in the pianist's silver touch. Rubinstein's fingers brought us the rush of each crescendo with the single resonance and despatch of released bowstrings. At the same time in his sustained tones moved the solemnity and gratitude that was witness to Beethoven's deeply religious spirit.

Erich Leinsdorf quite distinguished himself as an accompanist.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Herald (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 178,553
APR 20 1964

MUSIC

Rubinstein and Symphony Great

By ELINOR HUGHES

As a fitting climax to an extraordinary week of music in Boston, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Artur Rubinstein as soloist, gave the orchestra's 131st Pension Fund concert at Symphony Hall and very nearly brought down the roof.

Mr. Rubinstein, in magificent fettle, was soloist in the Beethoven oncerto No. 4 and in the Rachmanioff Rhapsody on a Theme by Paganini, and at the close of this demanding program looked as though he were quite capable of performing it all over again.

The capacity audience, which gave him a standing ovation, would probably not have minded in the least.

It was an evening of classics, not novelties, unless it ranks as a novelty to hear great music so superbly played, but in fairness both to the orchestra and to the soloist this is what they have led us to expect, let us leave the matter of novelty aside, and say that it was a fine occasion.

Beethoven First

Mr. Leinsdorf opened the program with a performance of the "Fidelio" overture, the one now usually played before the opera. Less well known in the concert hall, than the three "Leonore" overtures that preceded it chronologically, it has its own excellence, of which it is well to be reminded.

The Program

Last night at Symphony Hall, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf musical director, with Arthur Rubinstein as soloist, presented the 131st Pension Fund Concert. The program was as follows:

Beethoven: Overture to "Fidelio," Op 72
Beethoven: Piano Concerto No 4 in G major, Op 58
Wagner: Excerpts from "Die Walkuere"
Rachmaninoff: Rhapsody on a Theme of Paganini, for Piano and Orchestra O. 43.

The Concerto No. 4, usual in that the piano is the first instrument heard, giving out the first four measures of the first theme, asks the best that pianist and orchestra can provide, technically and from an interpretive standpoint as well. Mr. Rubinstein, equally at ease in lyrical as well as the more dramatic and positive pasages, gave a performance of such beauty and such superlative musicianship that it is no wonder the audience cheered him and the orchestra at the close.

Wagner Rachmaninoff

Following the intermission Mr. Leinsdorf led the orchestra in a carefully considered and intelligent rendering of the Ride of the Valkyries and the Magic Fire Music from "Die Walkuere," which seemed a trifle restrained in mood, but was a model of clarity.

Then Mr. Rubinstein returned for the fireworks, the romanticism and the melodies of the Rachmaninoff-Paganini Rhapsody, which never quite lets you forget its origin as a work for the Paganini "Caprices" and gave a brilliant and poetic rendering of the solo part without miling the opportunities for technical display.

Familiar? Yes, it was familiar, but how joyful an experience it is to greet old friends at their very best. The orchestra, feeling that this really was a pretty special evening, played splendidly; Mr. Leinsdorf beamed at everyone, and Mr. Rubinstein—well, there were moments when he appeared to be wearing a halo, though on strictly intended for use on earth.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 194,870
APR 20 1964

At Symphony

Rubinstein Soloist For Pension Fund

By MARGO MILLER

Until you've heard Artur Rubinstein play a piano concerto with an orchestra you haven't heard an orchestra. There are certain artists—like clarinetist Harold Wright with the Budapest Quartet or Rubinstein with the Boston Symphony—whose own instrument defines the textures of the others about him.

Strings are more stringy, woodwinds reedier, brass more brassy, when Rubinstein plays the piano. He is many pianos but never, as some pianists are, an orchestra unto himself.

The occasion for Rubinstein's return to Boston Sunday evening with the Boston Symphony's 131st Pension Fund Concert.

Last year the orchestra distributed $210,000 to 92 retried players and widows. Part of this figure comes from the annual Pension Fund Concert, part from the series of Thursday Open Rehearsals, part from resale of tickets, to list but three sources.

Rubinsten, the orchestra's junior by 13 years, was also last year's attraction.

It's pleasant to report that a standing ovation greeted his playing of the final work, Rachmaninoff's Rhapsody on a Theme of Paganini. There had been a warm-up demonstration following the Fourth Concerto of Beethoven just before intermission. And, to tell the whole story, the hand he got on his entrance was unmistakably a Rubinstein sound as well. The audience really plays for him, and he for them.

Erich Leinsdorf made the orchestra a model of accompaniment and added for the concert Beethoven's Overture to "Fidelio," which began well but then tended toward the perfunctory, and two excerpts from Wagner's "Die Walkuere," which turned out not the sum of their parts, although everybody played well.

Of the two piano works, the easier - to - plan Rachmaninoff came off better, its energy carrying the whole. In the Beethoven the interest was more the sound of the pianist and his ideas than particularly a performance worked out between conductor and soloist. This is not to say that Rubinstein was any kind of tyrant but that Leinsdorf didn't keep his end up.

Still, there was a good deal to like. Of the Beethoven: the rightness of the piano's first statement, the soloist's round tone throughout, the musing commentary in the andante, the elegance of the rondo. Of the Wagner: a splendid woodwind dialogue, later the organ tones of the brass, intermittently the richness of high cellos: Of the Rachmaninoff: the quite different piano textures, some pounding fortes which sunk into nothing as though a skater had come onto a felt pond, the unforced sentiment, the ripe fun of the final bars. That's what all the noise was about Sunday at Symphony.

SPRINGFIELD

155

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Republican
SPRINGFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 112,302

Junior League Concert Series

The Junior League Concert Series is beginning its 30th year of introducing internationally-known artists to Springfield audiences. Proceeds from the sale of tickets help to support the Junior Workshop, a pre-school for physically handicapped children.

The artists to appear in the 1963-64 season includ the Royal Philharmonic Orchestra of London England; Byron Janis, a brilliant young America pianist, and the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Ticket for the Concert Series are currently available

This is a preview of how the stage of the Municipal Auditorium will look when the Boston Symphony Orchestra consludes the Concert Series on April 21. The symphony's new director, Erich Leinsdorf, occupies podium at center.

Here, Erich Leinsdorf (left), director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducts a rehearsal session of the symphony. The appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will conclude the concert Series with a performance scheduled for April 21.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Union (m)
SPRINGFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 83,691

APR 21 1964

Seats Available For League Concert Tonight

Mrs. Evelyn Macaulay, ticket manager for the Junior League Concert series, reports tickets are available in all price locations for the performance of Boston Symphony Orchestra tonight. Erich Leinsdorf will conduct the concert beginning 8.30 at the Springfield Municipal Auditorium.

Although the orchestra has been a frequent visitor, Erich Leinsdorf, music director, will be conducting here for the first time. Leinsdorf succeeded Charles Munch, who directed the orchestra during its last appearance in 1961 just before his retirement.

The program is: Beethoven's overture to "Fidelio," Beethoven's Symphony No. 7 in A major, Bartok's Concerto No. 2 for violin and Rimsky-Korsakov's suite from "Le Coq d'Or." Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster, will perform the solo in the concerto.

During intermission, Mrs. Bradford M. Cogswell, president of the Junior League of Springfield, will announce the guest artists for the 1964-1965 series. Pledge cards will be available for those wishing to reserve subscriptions for the new season.

Tickets for tonight's concert will be on sale at the Forbes & Wallace box office this afternoon and at the Auditorium tonight.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
News (e)
SPRINGFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 101,591
APR 21 1964

Boston Symphony Tonight

Erich Leinsdorf, who has just completed his second winter season as music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will conduct that organization in a concert tonight at the Municipal Auditorium.

This will be his first appearance in Springfield, although the orchestra has been a frequent visitor under the batons of Serge Koussevitzky and Charles Munch.

The program to be performed tonight includes Beethoven's overture to "Fidelio" and Symphony No. 7, in A major; Bartok's Concerto No. 2 for violin and orchestra; and Rimsky-Korsakov's Suite from "Le Coq d'Or." Soloist will be Joseph Silverstein who succeeded Richard Burgin as concertmaster this season.

This will be the final program of the Junior League concert series for this season. During intermission, the guest artists for the 1964-1965 series will be announced and there will be an opportunity to reserve subscriptions for the new series.

Tickets will be avaiable at the Auditorium box office just prior to the concert, and should be obtained early to assure desirable seating.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Sunday Republican
SPRINGFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 112,302

APR 12 1964

JUNIOR LEAGUE WILL ANNOUNCE SERIES ON 21ST

Boston Symphony Here To Climax Current Season

Thirty years of visits by outstanding musical artists will be climaxed here when the Boston Symphony Orchestra presents the final program of the current Junior League Concert Series. Erich Leinsdorf will direct the world-famous orchestra, a favorite of local audiences, in the Municipal Auditorium on Tuesday evening, the 21st, at 8.30.

During intermission, the 1964-65 series will be announced by the president of the Junior League of Springfield, Inc., Mrs. Bradford M. Cogswell, and the president of the Concert Association of Greater Springfield, Dr. Leonard E. Anderson, joint sponsors of the series.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has had a long and brilliant history. A young Yankee, Bostonian Henry L. Higginson wrote from Vienna in 1857, "As every one has some particular object of supreme interest to himself, so I have music. It is almost my inner world; without it, I miss much, and with it I am happier and better. Twenty-four years later his supreme interest in music took unique form: he founded the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The first concert was held in the Boston Music Hall Oct. 22, 1881. Twenty concerts and 20 public rehearsals of the first season were attended by 83,359 persons, causing Mr. Higginson to write "When last spring the general scheme for concerts of the Boston Symphony was put forth, the grave doubt in my mind was whether they were wanted. This doubt has been dispelled by a most kindly and courteous public, and therefore the scheme will stand."

Wilhelm Gericke succeeded George Henschel as conductor, then Artur Nikisch, Emil Paur, Karl Muck, Max Fielder and Hanri Rabaud before the procession of titans: Pierre Monteux, Serge Koussevitsky, Charles Munch and Erich Leinsdorf. Mr. Higginson's scheme has stood well for the last 83 years.

Since that first season of 20 concerts in 1881, the BSO has grown to have one of the longest seasons and to present more concerts than any privately supported orchestra in the world. Its season starts in the fall with the regularly scheduled series at Symphony Hall, followed by tours in April, the springtime pops, the early summer Esplanade concerts and the summer Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, all of which carries the orchestra through 50 weeks of each year.

Mr. Leinsdorf will present the following program for his first appearance in Springfield:

Overture to "Fidelio," Op. 72—Beethoven
Symphony No. 7, in A major, Op. 92—Beethoven
I. Poco sostenuto; Vivace
II. Allegretto
III. Presto; Assai meno presto; Tempo primo
IV. Allegro con brio
Concert No. 2 for Violin and Orchestra—Bartok
I. Allegro non troppo
II. Andante tranquillo
III. Allegro molto
Suite from "Le Coq d'Or"—Rimsky-korsakov
I. King Dodon in his palace
II. King Dodon in the country
III. King Dodon with the Queen of Shemakha
IV. Wedding March and lamentable end of King Dodon

Mail and phone reservations may be made at the Forbes and Wallace box office which will be open during store hours starting Monday.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

News (e)
SPRINGFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 101,591

APR 7 1964

LEINSDORF TO CONDUCT ON THE 21ST

Boston Symphony Orchestra To Conclude Junior League Concert Series

Erich Leinsdorf, music director, will make his Springfield debut on the 21st, at 8.30 p. m. when he will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Municipal Auditorium.

This will be the concluding program of the current Junior League Concert Series which also brought the Royal Philharmonic Orchestra of London, conducted by Sir Malcolm Sargent, and pianist Byron Janis.

16th Appearance

Always a favorite with local audiences, this will be the 16th appearance of the Boston Symphony to be sponsored by the Junior League since the series started in 1933.

The first part of the program on the 21st will feature two well-known works by Beethoven: The Overture to "Fidelio," Op. 72, and Symphony No. 7, in A major, Op. 2. After intermission, contemporary composer Bela Bartok's Concerto No. 2 for Violin and Orchestra will be performed, followed by Rimski-korsakov's Suite from "Le Coq d'Or."

During the 1962-1963 music season, his first as music director for the Boston Symphony, Mr. Leinsdorf introduced the world premiere of Samuel Barber's Piano Concerto, the world premiere of Benjamin Lees Violin Concerto, and the American premiere of Benjamin Britten's "War Requiem."

He led the orchestra in all 11 concerts of its transcontinental tour in April.

In July, he began his first

ERICH LEINSDORF

summer of directing the orchestra in its Berkshire festival programs at Tanglewood, conducting 18 of the 24 concerts. At the same time he began his duties as director of the Berkshire Music Center, taking an especially active part with his seminars for conductors.

His success with these many activities was so remarkable that he was recently elected "musician of the year" through a poll of the nation's top music critics and editors.

Projects Helped

Proceeds from the concert series help support the Junior Workshop a preschool for physically handicapped mentally-alert children, founded by the Junior League nine years ago and recently annexed by the Springfield Day Nursery, a United Fund agency, when the need for such a facility had been proven.

The series has not only brought outstanding music to the city of Springfield, it has also helped these children to better enjoy life.

The box office at Forbes & Wallace will be open during store hours starting on the 13th. Prior to that date, mail orders may be sent to that address. Reservations should be made early to assure the best seating location.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Union (m)
SPRINGFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 83,691

APR 22 1964

PAGE ONE

Boston Symphony Closes Junior League Season

By R. C. HAMMERICH

That special sound made only by the famous string section of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was heard once again in the Municipal Auditorium Tuesday night.

Last of Season

The orchestra played for about 2800 at the final concert sponsored this season by the Junior League of Springfield, Inc.

The program opened with the overture to Beethoven's opera, "Fidelio," a seven-minute hors d'oeuvre that dressed the walls of the Auditorium with tones of gleaming silk and velvet and set the stage for a sublime musical experience—one of Beethoven's greatest symphonies, the seventh, played by one of the world's great orchestras.

The opening movement was unhurried and solid as rock. It seemed to say that nothing can go wrong anywhere. The second movement, which is, perhaps, the most popular movement in all of Beethoven's music, was offered with the same solidity and with the rich tones of mahogany and walnut.

The third movement presented its alternating passages of somber stateliness and sprightly gaiety without the slightest suggestion of contradiction, and the swoops and swirls in the fourth movement contained the spontaneity and freedom of first-rate jazz.

Erich Leinsdorf set tempos for the symphony that were generally orthodox, but he infused more than the usual measure of sparkle by stretching the range of volumes and speeds slightly farther than many other conductors.

The orchestra was a little louder and a little softer and a little faster and a little slower. It was a lively seventh, a test of orchestral virtuosity because even with the demand of constantly shifting speeds and volumes, the 100-plus musicians moved together without flaw.

Discipline Required

The kind of ensemble unity and discipline evident in the smoothness of the Beethoven symphony appeared to be a basic requirement for even routine success with the piece that followed intermission, Bartok's Concerto No. 2 for Violin and Orchestra, yet the orchestra seemed to handle that incredibly complex music with ease, also.

The soloist played hundreds of thousands of notes with a speed requiring nearly absolute control of the mechanics of the violin with an expression of melancholy nonchalance.

He was Joseph Silverstein, the orchestra's concertmaster, and the apparent ease with which he presented this very difficult concerto was a result of his superior musicianship.

Complex Concerto

The melancholy expression was appropriate to the music and the nonchalance was characteristic of the player. His usual platform manner is undemonstrative, especially while he is playing as spectacularly as he did Tuesday night.

The Bartok concerto is a craggy thicket of complexity, full of suggestions of dissonance, of unexpected shifts and twists, of emotional intensity, of tranquil sadness matched with fierce agitation. It is music one has to live with to begin to hear. There is too much in it for one hearing.

Those in the audience who wish to hear Silverstein and the orchestra do it again may attend another performance scheduled Aug. 2 in the Shed at Tanglewood.

The Rimsky-Korsakov suite from "Le Coq d'Or" which ended the program, played with bright colors and verve, seemed like a vacation after the Bartok.

Leinsdorf in Finale

The Boston Symphony Orchestra presented the final program of the Junior League Concert Series Tuesday night in the Municipal Auditorium. Erich Leinsdorf, music director, conducted a program of music which included selections by Beethoven, Bartok and Rimsky-Korsakov. It was Mr. Leinsdorf's first appearance in the Springfield area since becoming conductor of the Boston Symphony in September, 1962. Discussing the program are, left to right: Leinsdorf, Mrs. Bradford M. Cogswell, president of the Junior League, Inc., and Dr. Leonard E. Anderson, president of the Concert Association of Greater Springfield.

2 OPEN REHEARSALS.

137

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Christian Science Montor (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 174,850

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Record-American (m) (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 452,333

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Patriot-Ledger (e)
QUINCY, Mass.
Circ. 44,413

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Herald (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 178,553

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Herald (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 178,553

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Berkshire Eagle (e)
PITTSFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 29,084

BSO Plans Eight Open Rehearsals

BOSTON — The Boston Symphony Orchestra will continue to present a series of eight open rehearsals this season. Erich Leinsdorf, music director, will conduct the majority of the open rehearsals with Pierre Monteux, Charles Munch and eminent soloists among those to be heard.

Originated by Doctor Munch in 1950 primarily for students in the Boston area, the open rehearsals are a preview of the orchestra's weekend concerts. Many school and college students studying in the Boston area are unable to hear the orchestra because of the sold-out situation in the Boston Symphony Orchestra's regular concert series. Offered at a lower rate with all seats unreserved, the open rehearsals provide a unique opportunity to see and hear the orchestra, conductors, and soloists as they perfect their programs. Last season the series was sold out by subscription.

Season tickets are now available for the eight open rehearsals at the Symphony Hall box office. Proceeds from this series benefit the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Pension Fund. Mr. Leinsdorf will conduct the first open rehearsal of the season on October 10. The remaining open rehearsals will take place on Nov. 14, Dec. 19, Jan. 16, Feb. 6, Feb. 13, March 19, and April 16. All rehearsals will begin promptly at 7:30 p.m., and the doors will be opened at 6:45 p.m.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 194,870
OCT 12 1963

Today in Society

Students, Parents Jam B.S.O. Rehearsal Opener

By MARJORIE W. SHERMAN

A sell-out for the second year in a row, the Boston Symphony Orchestra's open rehearsals got off to a challenging start this week with the monumental Mahler Fifth Symphony and the C Major Symphony which Mozart wrote at 17.

The open-rehearsals are a social success, as well as a musical one, for students who meet afterwards at 9 o'clock.

Some traveled by bus. Three loads came from Wellesley. Weston's Cambridge School students were shepherded by Mrs. Natalie Coleman. Wheaton students were marshaled by Jill Jepson, Ruth Casdin and Joyce Bornwen. Chandler students arrived with Mrs. Olga Guild.

Symphonygoers like Mrs. J. Sidney Stillman heard both rehearsal and performance with young guests.

For students here from overseas such as H. L. Ukinosaki from Japan, the rehearsals offer the best chance of hearing the B. S. O. Conductor Charles Munch 13 years ago answered the appeal of students, whom the Friday afternoon rush seats could not accommodate, by making the series open rehearsals instead of regular concerts. Now the overflow audience is overflowing again.

M.I.T. students got their tickets from Donald Nelson and Andrew Brown. Radcliffe visitors, and students from a dozen other colleges and many more schools had series blocks of tickets.

They were all on time for Harry Ellis Dickson's welcoming speech at 7:25 and cheered when he announced an extra open rehearsal on Oct. 17 of Benjamin Britten's "War Requiem." Nov. 14 will be the next regular open rehearsal.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Record-American (m) (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 452,333
SEP 19 1963

★ ★ ★

ERICH LEINSDORF, Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will conduct the first in a series of eight Open Rehearsals (preview of the Orchestra's weekend concerts) on Oct. 10 at Symphony Hall. Season tickets are now available for the series of rehearsals which benefit Boston Symphony Orchestra's Pension Fund. Pierre Monteux, Charles Munch and eminent soloists will be among those heard during the season.

International Musician Dec 1963

The Boston Symphony is continuing to present a SERIES series of eight Open Rehearsals this season, previews of the orchestra's weekend concerts. These rehearsals begin at 7:30 P. M. Proceeds (the series costs $15) go to the orchestra's Pension Fund . . . The Cincinnati Symphony has a new "Pops" series—the 8 o'Clock Pop Concerts—with this year's attractions pianist Peter Nero, conductor Andre Kostelanetz, ballet stars Patricia Klekovic and Kenneth Johnson, and singer Marian Spelman.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 194,870
DEC 20 1963

Today in Society

Students and Old Friends Greet Maestro Monteux

By MARJORIE W. SHERMAN

Because students at M.I.T. and Harvard asked so often for a concert series of their own at Symphony Hall, and because this was impossible for the over-busy B.S.O. to arrange, Charles Munch established the policy of a certain number of "open rehearsals" during each Winter season.

Although these were never announced, they were immediately—and perpetually—over subscribed, and remain after more than a decade, one of the rare chances to see the world's most wonderful orchestra "at work." Dress is strictly informal, both on stage and off, but though there were flannel shirts and sweaters on both sides of guest conductor Pierre Monteux last night, there was a complete and refreshing absence of the late arriver and the early departer, so often the bane of the renowned Friday concerts.

Students of all ages and parts of the world were joined for this special occasion by old friends of Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony from 1919 to 1924, who was 89 this year, and made director of the London Symphony Orchestra.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Record-American (m) (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 531,565
FEB 3 1964

OPEN REHEARSAL

Boston's fifth Open Rehearsal of the season will take place in Symphony Hall Thursday at 7:30 p.m. when Charles Munch, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra from 1949-62, will make final preparations for his program of the coming weekend.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Christian Science Monitor (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 174,850
FEB 12 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 194,870
FEB 12 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Herald (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 178,553
FEB 12 1964

Rehearsal Postponed

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's sixth open rehearsal of the season, scheduled for tomorrow evening at 7:30, has been postponed for one week. It will take place Thursday evening, Feb. 20, beginning at 7:30. Mr. Leinsdorf will conduct the rehearsal. Tickets for the Feb. 13 open rehearsal will be honored on Feb. 20.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Record-American (m) (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 531,565
FEB 19 1964

BOSTON SYMPHONY OPEN REHEARSAL THURSDAY

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's sixth Open Rehearsal of the season, which was postponed last Thursday, will be held this Thursday at Symphony Hall, with Erich Leinsdorf making final preparations for the weekend program. The Open Rehearsals are held each season for the benefit of the Orchestra's Pension Fund. At the Friday-Saturday programs Phyllis Curtin, soprano, will be soloist in excerpts from the opera, "Wozzeck," by Alban Berg. Mr. Leinsdorf will open the concerts with Schumann's Overture, Scherzo, and Finale, Op. 52, and will conclude with the Beethoven Symphony No. 7.

158

Youth Concerts.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Norfolk County Free Press
NORWOOD, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 4,810
SEP 10 1963

DISCUSS YOUTH CONCERTS — Local residents were among the committee heads who met recently to discuss the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Youth Concert Series with Eric Leinsdorf, Symphony conductor, and Harry Ellis Dickson, Youth Concert conductor. Shown above are Mrs. Harry Brenner, Walpole; Mrs. Ralph Pope, Jr., Milton; Mr. Leinsdorf, Mrs. Frederick White, Framingham; Mrs. Max Hershman, Norwood; Mrs. Abbot Rand, Weston; Mrs. Ernest Jardine, Framingham; Mr. Dickson, Mrs. John Sweeney, Newton.

Symphony Youth Concert Heads Discuss Series

Mrs. Max Hershman, Norwood ticket chairman and Mrs. Harry Brenner, Walpole chairman, met recently with other area members to discuss the forthcoming Youth Concerts by sixty members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, planned in two series of three programs.

Meeting with the chairmen were Boston Symphony Orchestra conductor, Eric Leinsdrof, and Harry Ellis Dickson, assistant conductor of the Boston "Pops", who will again conduct the Youth Concerts.

The Youth Concerts, especially planned to stimulate the interest of young people in good music, have been sold out each year, attracting an audience of young people from all over the state. Series tickets are $4.00, for three concerts.

In Norwood, notices will once again be distributed in public school and St. Catherine's. Parents are asked to return signed slips as soon as possible, to insure the request for good seats. Checks may be made payable to Youth Concerts at Symphony Hall. Students from the fifth grade through twelfth are eligible to attend.

For further information, call Mrs. Hershman, 762-0998.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
News (e)
MALDEN, Mass.
Circ. 10,537
OCT 7 1963

Mrs. Rice Youth Concert Chmn.

Mrs. Nathan Rice of 63 Porter st., Malden, is serving as local ticket chairman for the fifth season of Youth Concerts scheduled for Boston's Symphony Hall Nov. 2 through March 7.

Harry Ellis Dickson, a member of the Boston Symphony and assistant conductor of the Boston "Pops" Orchestra, will again conduct 60 members of the Boston Symphony in two series of three programs.

Planned to stimulate the interest of young people in good music, the concerts will be held on Nov. 2, Dec. 14 and Feb. 8, in the first series; and Nov. 9, Jan. 11 and March 7 in the second series.

The one-hour, Saturday concerts begin at 11 a.m.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Item (e)
LYNN, Mass.
Circ. 33,194
SEP 18 1963

Harry Ellis Dickson, a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and assistant conductor of the Boston "Pop," will again conduct 60 members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the two series of three programs. Series one will be presented on Nov. 2, Dec. 14 and Feb. 8, and series two on Nov. 9, Jan. 11, and March 2.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Herald
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 283,819
SEP 8 1963

Youth Concerts Return

A word of friendly counsel is offered by conductor Harry Ellis Dickson about the approaching fifth season of his Youth Concerts at Symphony Hall, played by fellow members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

"Those who intend to subscribe should do so early in the school year," he says, "because in the past two seasons the tickets were sold out in advance of the first concert. Our committee thought this was a wonderful response to the appeal of our programs. But on the other hand, late comers were annoyed in no uncertain terms when they couldn't get in at the last minute."

As before, all seats are reserved, and obtained by subscription to either of two series of three concerts each, played on Saturday mornings from eleven o'clock until noon.

Three programs are presented in the first series, and these are repeated for the second. Previously, each program was repeated on the following Saturday. This season, however, the second and third programs will be repeated at wider intervals.

It is Mr. Dickson's hope that this innovation will prove advantageous to those making plans for the transportation of groups of young people to attend the second series.

Schedule Announced

Subscriptions are being received at Symphony Hall, in care of Youth Concerts Committee, and are filled in the order of receipt, at four dollars for either series of three concerts. The schedule follows:

First series: Nov. 2, Dec. 14, Feb. 8.

Second series: Nov. 9, Jan. 11, March 7.

The music serves as an introduction to standard works, past and present, with brief and unpretentious comments by Mr. Dickson.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Chronicle
NEEDHAM, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 5,632
SEP 19 1963

Tickets For Youth Concerts Now Available

Mrs. William Gibson, 342 Hillcrest road, is the local representative selling tickets for the fifth season of the Youth Concerts at Symphony Hall in Boston.

Harry Ellis Dickson, a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and assistant conductor of the Boston Pops, will again conduct 60 members of the Boston Symphony in two series of programs.

The first series takes place Nov. 2, Dec. 14 and Feb. 8. The second is set for Nov. 9, Jan. 11 and Mar. 7. All concerts take place at 11 a.m. on Saturday mornings and last approximately one hour each.

Ticket orders and additional information is available from Mrs. Gibson at HI 4-6080.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Patriot-Ledger (e)
QUINCY, Mass.
Circ. 44,419
SEP 13 196

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Chronicle-Citizen
BROOKLINE, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 8,562
SEP 19 1963

Youth Concert Tickets Now Available

Only 1000 tickets remain to be sold for the fifth season of Youth Concerts at Symphony Hall, Mrs. David M. Davis, Town Chairman, announced today. She suggests that anyone wishing tickets call her as soon as possible to avoid disappointment, at HO 9-9185.

These concerts, especially planned to stimulate the interest of young people in good music, have been sold out each year, attracting an audience of young people from all over the State. Tickets, sold for the series only, are $4 for three concerts.

Harry Ellis Dickson, a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and assistant conductor of the Boston "Pops" will again conduct 60 members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a series of three programs: Saturday, Nov. 9; Saturday, Jan. 11; and Saturday, March 7. All concerts will be held at Symphony Hall at 11 a.m. and will last approximately one hour. Parents are also invited to attend the concerts. Adult prices are the same — $4 for three concerts.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Messenger
AVON, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 1,325
SEP 26 1963

PUPILS INVITED TO SYMPHONY CONCERTS

An invitation has again been extended to members of the Avon High School Senior Class to attend concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at Symphony Hall, as guests of Atty. and Mrs. Leslie Gold.

Concerts are scheduled for Tuesday evenings and the orchestra will be under the direction of Erich Leinsdorf. Guest conductors during the concert season will be Leopold Stokowski, Dr. Charles Munch and Richard Burgin. Guest pianists will include Rudolph Serkin and Idil Biret.

Students are requested to leave their names at the office of the High School principal and will be notified as to the concert date. There is no charge for tickets or transportation.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Herald
RANDOLPH, Mass.
Weekly 2,125
OCT 24 1963

YOUTH CONCERTS

Tickets are on sale for the fifth season of Youth Concerts at Symphony Hall and may be obtained from the local chairman, Mrs. Owen Brooks, 236 Chestnut street, Randolph.

Harry Ellis Dickson, a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and assistant conductor of the Boston "Pops" will again conduct 60 members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in two series of three programs. Series No. 1 will be presented Nov. 2; Saturday, Dec. 14, and Saturday, Feb. 8. Series 2, Nov. 19; Jan. 1, and Saturday, March 7.

All concerts will be held at Symphony Hall and will last approximately one hour.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Transcript
DEDHAM, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 5,756
SEP 26 196

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Times
NEEDHAM, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 3,021
SEP 19 1963

Few Tickets Remain For Youth Concerts

Only a few tickets remain to be sold for the fifth season of Youth Concerts at Symphony Hall, Mrs. William Gibson, 342 Hillcrest road, announced today. She suggests that anyone wishing tickets call her as soon as possible to avoid disappointment.

These concerts, especially planned to stimulate the interest of young people in good music, have been sold out each year, attracting an audience of young people from all over the State. Tickets are sold for the series only.

Harry Ellis Dickson, a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and assistant conductor of the Boston "Pops" will again conduct 60 members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in two series of three programs; Series No. 1 to be presented Saturday, November 2; Saturday, December 14; and Saturday, February 8. Series No. 2, Saturday, November 9; Saturday, January 11; and Saturday, March 7. All concerts will be held at Symphony Hall at 11:00 A.M. and will last approximately one hour.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Herald (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 178,553

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Traveler (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 164,299

OCT 20 1963

Youth Concerts All Sold Out

The Boston Symphony Orchestra announces that both series of this season's Youth Concerts at Symphony Hall have been completely subscribed, and that no more tickets are available. Harry Ellis Dickson will conduct members of the Boston Symphony in the first Youth Concert at 11 a.m. on Saturday, Nov. 2.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Traveler (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 164,299

OCT 16 1963

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 465,653

OCT 1963

Youth Concert On Saturday

The fifth season of Youth Concerts at Symphony Hall will begin with a program Saturday morning illustrating "What Is a Symphony." Mozart's "Haffner" will inaugurate the one-hour concert, beginning at 11.

Harry Ellis Dickson will also conduct Boston Symphony colleagues in a "Composite Symphony." Each of its five movements will be by a different composer: the first, from Beethoven's Eighth Symphony; the second from Piston's Sixth; the third from Brahms' Third; the fourth from Mendelssohn's Fourth ("Italian") and the fifth from berlioz' Symphonie Fantastique.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Christian Science
Montor (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 174,850

APR 7 1963

Youth Concerts

A new season of Youth Concerts, conducted by Harry Ellis Dickson, and played by members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will open at Symphony Hall Nov. 2. As in the past there will be two series of programs, the second being a repetition of the first. The first series will take place Nov. 2, Dec. 14, and Feb. 8; the second will be held Nov. 9, Jan. 11, and March 7.

Students who wish to attend these concerts should make their reservations early in the school year, Mr. Dickson urges, "because in the past two seasons the tickets were sold out in advance of the first concert."

Sunday Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 465,653
OCT 20 1963

Saturday Mornings At Symphony Hall

By MARGO MILLER

MILLER

The only concession to children he makes is in the length of the programs. Harry Ellis Dickson, founder and conductor of the Youth Concerts at Symphony Hall, finds his Saturday morning audiences more sophisticated than their parents in one respect.

"Kids have no preconceived notions about music. They'll listen to anything once. The danger is in playing down to them."

As a violinist beginning his 26th season with the Boston Symphony, Dickson has watched many a parade out of Symphony Hall when unfamiliar music was on a program. But conductor Dickson's audiences sit quite enthralled during one of Webern's Six Pieces, for example, then write letters telling what they saw in the music.

Dickson is quite adept himself in suggesting what the audience might want to listen for. "I don't like to stress the word 'educational' when I talk about the Youth Concerts, but I always plot each program to show something about music —the form of composition, the role of instruments. We illustrate all this before the piece begins. I don't want music to seem formidable."

Erich Leinsdorf once protested to Dickson that music was indeed formidable. They eventually settled on approachable" as the quality to be sought Saturday mornings.

The fifth season of Youth Concerts offers two series. The program Nov. 2 (repeated Nov. 9) will be on the Symphony. Program Music is the topic Dec. 14 (repeated Jan. 11). The 400th anniversary of Shakespeare's birth is observed in a concert Feb. 8 (repeated Mar. 7). A few subscriptions remain for the first series only. Concerts last about an hour. Adults will be admitted only with a child. Some grown-ups complain to Dickson's committee that lack of an escort would prohibit their attending a concert "just their speed." Resourceful adults, however, should be able to find companions in Grades 4 to 12.

The "Symphony" program will open with Mozart's "Haffner" as an example of a classical work. Then will come a rather spectacular hybrid consisting of five movements from five different symphonies. The plot will not be revealed at this time, but audiences may expect something from Beethoven, Piston, Brahms, Mendelssohn and Berlioz.

The pair of concerts on "Program Music" lists a section of Strauss' "Le Bourgois Gentilhomme." Kodaly's "Hary Janos Suite," Rimsky-Korsakov's "Flight of the Bumble Bee" (introduced to the U.S. in 1924 by Serge Koussevitzky) and "The Sorcerer's Apprentice" by Dukas. Dickson now knows better than to gloss over an unpleasant tale in program music. He once told the children the story of Til Eulenspiegel, urging them to follow the prankster's steps up the gallows through the notes of the flute and piccolo. Then the music would show Til running and running until he disappeared into thin air. "And," Dickson added reassuringly, "for all we know they are still looking for him." From the audience rose a 10-year-old boy to inform the conductor that his version was nonsense: Til was hanged.

Additional Concert

Probably the most popular program with Dickson's Boston Symphony colleagues, who make up his Saturday orchestra, is the one in which the Greater Boston Youth Symphony Orchestra joins the B. S. O. The students, moreover, are assigned to the first desks. This season the combined effort will be the finale of Brahms' First Symphony The program will also include a composition by a Newton High School student, chosen by Newton teacher Harry Lasker and Walter Piston. Shakespeare's birthday brings the "Romeo and Juliet" ballet music by Prokofiev and Mendelssohn's Incidental Music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream." Participating in the Mendelssohn will be the girls' chorus of the Lincoln-Sudbury Regional High School, prepared by Robert Wentworth.

Dickson conducts one non-subscription Youth Concert, subsidized by the Lincoln and Therese Filene Foundation for underprivileged, crippled, blind and deaf children. The Boston police help them into seats and in and out of special buses.

Otherwise, a committee headed by Mrs. E. Anthony Kutten and Mrs. Manuel P. Kurland organizes Greater Boston communities in selling subscriptions and providing transportation. The Boston Symphony trustees give their blessing to the Youth Concerts but no financial aid. They allow the use, howeevr, of what Dickson feels is an essential part of his program. It is Symphony Hall.

For, says the conductor, however, instructive concerts in schools may be, there is something important about the atmosphere of Symphony Hall, of coming to a place where music is played. Pilfrimage would be too formidable a term. Anyway, once inside, it's Dickson's pleasant task to make music approachable.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 194,870

NOV 4 1963

159

Youth Concert

Musical Anatomy At Symphony Hall

By MARGO MILLER

There were as many conductors in the audience Saturday morning as musicians on the stage. Harry Ellis Dickson was directing 60 members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a program opening the fifth season of Youth Concerts at Symphony Hall. Most of the conducting aspirants confined their activities to toe tapping or program whacking. One splendid little fellow, however, had seen Leonard Bernstein on television, and went at the music with both arms and as much body English as a seat in Symphony Hall allows and his mother permitted.

On the podium, Dickson was a model of the conductor who gives all the cues and shapes the music with little regard for the flamboyant. This in itself was a fine corrective to the young viewer. But, alas, propriety is not a substitute for exciting performances. The problem seems to be in the didactic nature of these programs. Make no mistake, Dickson is on the right track in the way he explains the workings of a symphony as a form of music. Before each movement he had the first violins play the first and second subjects. And by using the formal term, "subject," he indicated to young minds that the word can mean something beside a course in school or one important noun in a sentence.

The program opened, thus, with Mozart's "Haffner" Symphony. Dickson explained that the nickname referred to the commissioner of the work, that a contemporary parallel might come if Gov. Peabody requested a symphony for a Commonwealth occasion. So the soicial aspect of composition was neatly set forth, as were the Symphony's subjects. For an adult, however, the stopping and starting between movements gets in the way of the music One wonders if the attention span of younger listeners is as short as the conductor maintains. And one wonders further if the order of the program might not have better been reversed.

The major offering was a "Composite" Symphony. It was made up of the first movement from Beethoven's Eighth, the second from Piston's Sixth, the third from the Brahms Third, the fourth from the Mendelssohn Fourth ("Italian") and the fifth from Berlioz' Symphonie Fantastique (the Witches' Sabbath portion). By implication, Dickson hoped to show moods, use of various instruments, form—sonata-form or dances—and other materials from which composers draw.

Had this reviewer planned the program, the "Composite" Symphony would have come first, with the Mozart following and played without interruption.

Symphonies are more than the sum of their parts. The 20-minute "Haffner" is this. While it is easy to show its anatomy, Dickson discussed and conducted it as if the Symphony were that ditty about the "shoulder bone connected to the arm bone." Any audience deserves the spirit which moves.

This program will be repeated Saturday morning at 11 for subscribers to the second series.

160

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Chronicle-Citizen
BROOKLINE, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 8,562
OCT 10 1963

Youth Concerts

Youth Concerts-An Effort Worthy Of Support

In a world of tensions, wars hot and cold, over emphasis on things material, the children of Brookline are fortunate in having the unique opportunity of hearing orchestral music of high quality performed by members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

These concerts were founded 13 years ago by the late Harry Dubbs, violinist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and have been conducted for the past 10 years by Harry Ellis Dickson, assistant conductor of the Boston Pops Orchestra, and a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The Brookline Youth Concerts Committee with the cooperation of the Brookline public schools has presented three concerts annually.

During this time more than 50,000 children and parents have enjoyed classical, contemporary, and folk music, along with dancing, ballet and modern, puppetry and opera. In addition our students have had the opportunity of participation as soloists, as members of choral groups with the orchestra on stage.

The committee has also made a valuable contribution by inspiring many neighboring communities to offer their residents music series of their own.

The price of admission has remained nominal so that these concerts could be within the reach of every Brookline family. As a result a deficit is incurred at each concert even when there is a capacity audience.

The Brookline Youth Concerts Committee is currently appealing to residents of our town to help them continue in this worthwhile cultural activity. You can help by joining the distinguished group of "Friends" of the Brookline Youth Concerts. Send your contribution, large or small, payable to Brookline Youth Concerts Committee, 1341 Beacon St., Brookline.

We feel that the Committee deserves your support so that these concerts can continue to be a cultural inspiration in our community.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Christian Science
Monitor (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 174,850
NOV 4 1963

Youth symphony

Little ones listen

By John Marshall Cuno

How do the youth of Boston spend Saturday morning? Watching television? Not last Saturday.

Battalions of children advanced upon Symphony Hall. They looked happy in the rain. School buses halted and discharged their juvenile cargoes. Youthful crowds clustered outside in multicolored raincoats. Slowly they filtered into the lobbies, which grew noisy with the excited chatter of hundreds of young symphony-goers.

It was the opening of the fifth season of Youth Concerts at Symphony Hall.

* * *

Founder - conductor Harry Ellis Dickson directed members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a program designed to illustrate to young eyes and ears what a symphony is and what it can do. Many children were attending such a performance for the first time. How many of these perhaps would someday be drawing crowds like themselves to listen and be inspired at their performances?

One could not help wondering.

And thinking: It is a solemn charge—the care and feeding of young musical talent.

Mr. Dickson showed that he is aware of this adult responsibility. He chose a program lively enough to enthrall young listeners and interesting enough to provide instruction for them.

* * *

Mozart's Symphony in D major (Haffner) was first. Mr. Dickson introduced this work with remarks on "what is a symphony?" He did not "talk down" to his audience. If anything, he took too much for granted in their as yet sketchy musical backgrounds.

Each movement he introduced by having certain instruments play a few bars of the theme (or themes), interrupting these with verbal comments. Then the rest of the movement was unbroken by further explanation.

After having the well-behaved audience "stand up and stretch," he played for the final portion of the program what he calls a "composite" symphony. This one was made up of five movements from works of different composers: Beethoven, Piston, Brahms, Mendelssohn, and Berlioz.

The occasion was proof that the most classic of classical music can be youthfully entertaining.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Herald
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 283,819
NOV 3 1963

Youth Concerts Open Fifth Season at Symphony

By ELINOR HUGHES

The fifth season of Youth Concerts at Symphony Hall opened yesterday morning to a packed and attentive audience of young people—from about seven up to 15, with a sprinkling of adults, nominally on escort duty but quite possibly there because they knew that they, too, would have a splendid time.

Harry Ellis Dickson, conductor of the orchestra of Boston Symphony Players, opened the concert by telling the audience that because last year they had asked him for more substantial programs — "a whole symphony, please"—that he was giving them just that—Mozart's 'Haffner.'

Charming 'Haffner'

He explained briefly the history of the symphonic form, gave the themes from each movement, said that it was all right on these Saturday mornings to applaud between movements but not to do it at regular concerts, and then began the music.

The exquisite, classically designed "Haffner" Symphony provided great delight, and the listeners enjoyed Mr. Dickson's description of how it came by its name. Then came the novelty of the program: A 'Composite' Symphony, which the conductor said had never been done before.

This consisted of five movements: the Allegro Vivace from Beethoven's Symphony No. 8; the second movement from Walter Piston's Symphony No. 6 (this proved a delightful novelty, much appreciated by the listeners); the third movement from Brahms' Symphony No. 3 (this on request of Eric Leinsdorff, who said that his five children loved it); the fourth movement from Mendelssohn's Symphony No. 4; and the fifth movement from Berlioz's "Fantastic" Symphony—the Witches' Sabbath.

If the auditors wanted more substance to their concerts, they had it, and there was every evidence that they liked it. The applause was genuine, the attention unwavering. The experiment appears to have been a success, and the program will be repeated on Saturday morning, Nov. 9.

The second pair of concerts, "What Is Program Music?," will be given on Dec. 14 and Jan. 11; and the third and final pair, a Festival Program commemorating the 400th anniversary of Shakespeare's birthday, will be held on Saturday mornings, Feb. 8 and March 7.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Herald
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 283,819

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 465,653
DEC 8 1963

Youth Concert

The answer to "What is program music?" will be given to 2600 boys and girls when Harry Ellis Dickson and Boston Symphony Orchestra musicians give the second Youth Concert at Symphony Hall on Saturday morning from 11 to 12 noon.

As is true of the adult symphony concerts, this series is fully subscribed for the season. Subscribers unable to attend a Youth Concert are asked, as is customary with the other series, to turn in their ticket for re-sale, both to enable someone else to enjoy the concert, and also to help the treasury. This should be done through the ticket chairman, Mrs. Manuel P. Kurland, 129 Payson rd., Brookline.

Saturday's program, to be repeated Jan. 11, consists of "The Dinner" excerpt from Strauss' "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme," Kodaly's "Hary Janos" suite, "The Flight of the Bumble Bee" by Rimsky-Korsakov and "The Sorcerer's Apprentice" by Dukas.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Clipper
DUXBURY, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 3,111
DEC 12 1963

Second Youth Concert Sat.

The second youth concert in a series of three will be held at 11 a.m. this Saturday, Dec. 14, at Symphony Hall. Once again, 120 Duxbury youngsters will attend the performance.

THE PROGRAM

"What Is Program Music?" is the title of this concert. Such works as "Flight of the Bumblebees" and "Sorcerer's Apprentice," will be featured.

Harry Ellis Dickson will conduct the orchestra of 60 Boston Symphony members. Miss Mary Jane Smith, Elementary Music Supervisor, is town chairman of the project, assisted by Mrs. Freeman Boynton.

Any student unable to use his ticket should notify Miss Smith or Mrs. Boynton.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Times (e)
GLOUCESTER, Mass.
Circ. 10,050
JAN 25 1964

Students attend youth concert

A group of Gloucester High School students attended the second of the Youth Symphony Concert series held annually at Symphony Hall in Boston. Conducted by Harry Ellis Dickerson, the Boston Symphony Orchestra played selections by Strauss, Rimsky - Korsakov, Kodaly, and Dukas. The concert was entitled "What Is Program Music?"

The pieces played exemplified efforts by the composers to add pictorial and historical suggestions to their music. The first selection was Richard Strauss' music to "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme" ("The Would-be Gentleman") by Moliere. In the Hungarian composer Kodaly's folk opera, Harry Janos, a teller of exaggerated stories, rambles on about his adventures.

Rimsky - Korsakov's "The Flight of the Bumble Bee," from his opera "Tsar Sultan," is an example of the excellence with which music can imitate natural sounds. In this case, Rimsky - Korsakov simulates the buzzing of a bee.

"The Sorcerer's Apprentice" is a tone poem by Paul Dukas, a Frenchman. The music tells the story of an apprentice who magically causes a broom to carry water for him while the magician is away. He forgets the enchantment for stopping his helper, however, and the house is flooded by the time the master returns.

The final concert in this school year's series will be held on Saturday morning, February 8. The program is to be a musical celebration of the 400th anniversary of William Shakespeare's birth. Shakespeare's plays and poems have provided subject matter for such famous composers as Mendelssohn, Prokofiev, Bulioz, Tchaikovsky, Purcell, Haydn, Schumann, and Schubert.

The symphony program will open with a suite from the ballet "Romeo and Juliet" by Serge Prokofiev. With Patricia Peardon, a guest artist from Stratford, Conn., by permission of the American Shakespeare Festival, as narrator, excerpts from Mendelssohn's incidental music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream" will be played. The Lincoln - Sudbury Regional High School Girls' Chorus, conducted by Robert Wentworth, will also be featured.

An original compostion by a student of the Theory Class of Newton High School will be directed by Henry Tasker.

The concert will end with the finale of Brahm's "Symphony Number One," played by the musicians of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and of the Greater Boston Youth Symphony Orchestra. This will be directed by Marvin Rabin.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Fence Viewer
SUDBURY, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 1,981
NOV 28 1963

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Citizen
SUDBURY, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 1,525
FEB 6 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Enterprise (e)
MARLBORO, Mass.
Circ. 5,720
DEC 5 1963

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Lincoln Citizen
SUDBURY, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 1,525
NOV 27 1963

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Enterprise
MAYNARD, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 1,965
DEC 5 1963

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Citizen
SUDBURY, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 1,525
NOV 27 1963

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sun (e)
HUDSON, Mass.
Circ. 2,550
DEC 5 1963

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
News (e)
FRAMINGHAM, Mass.
Circ. 14,205
FEB 4 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sun (e)
HUDSON, Mass.
Circ. 2,550
FEB 8 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Enterprise (e)
MARLBORO, Mass.
Circ. 5,720
FEB 8 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Citizen
SUDBURY, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 1,525
FEB 6 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Herald
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 283,819
DEC 1 1963

Girls Chosen To Sing With Symphony

SUDBURY—Robert G. Wentworth, director of music at the Lincoln - Sudbury Regional High School, has selected 75 girls in the school to sing with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on next Feb. 8 and March 7.

They will sing in a chorus part for Mendelssohn's "Incidental Music to a Midsummer Night's Dream," at a concert to be conducted by Harry Ellis Dickson, assistant conductor for the Boston Pops, at Symphony Hall, Boston.

The girls selected became Symphony Chorus members automatically. They were chosen on the basis of their audition rating in tryouts for mixed chorus. Rehearsals have already started.

The girls representing the four classes of the school include: Nancy Adams, Sarah Adamson, Nancy Allen, Donna Briggs, Janet Buerger, Pamela Chase, Joanna Child, Barbara Chipman, Betsy Clark, Suzanne Fedock, Sandra MacFarland, Deborah Martin, Heidi Scholz, Margaret Siegars, Jane Spiller, Carol Tonseth, Mary Lee Tonseth, Marcia Troisi, Laurie Trees, Lyndia Donaldson, Barbara Fagerlund, Mary Lou Foley, Carol Garavano, Martha Henry, Louise Hendrick, Barbara Jagger, Electa Kane, Marcia Little, Lynn Plumley, Kristin Reidsteck, Barbara Sampson, Diane Woods, Nancy Chase, Janet Gayer, Jill Frye, Marley Meyer, Judith Child, Robyn Dermon, Heidi Grey, Mary Ann Houghten, Gretchen Mertz, Amy Carroll, Cheryl James, Mary Greene, Paula Black, Janet Hankey, Beverly Haskell, Elizabeth Taylor, Christine King, Tina Dobye, Dana Haden, Rebecca Livengood, Martha Curran, Anne Bobroff, Joanne Dickey, Rosemary Debye, Carolyn Filbin, Anne Clippinger, Marilyn Chase, Ebe Emmons, Sally Goodwin, Kathleen Hagerty, Anne Jameson, Sue Resi, Lanni Sheets, Pat Davis, Andrea Ericson, Elizabeth Newton, Jane Anderson, Susan Cariman, Edith Garrison, Judith Perry, Patricia Anderson, Carolyn Cutler, Cynthia Davis.

162

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 465,653
DEC 22 1963

ABSORBED FACES of Mrs. H. C. Egar and her 3-year-old son, Steven, turn to the stage as the concert begins.

SHARING A SCORE before the Youth Concert, founder conductor Harry Ellis Dickson explains a point to an interested foursome from Acton—Shirley Mulvey, Margaret Springer, Martha Gates and Karen Doyle.

AN ANCIENT INSTRUMENT, explained by Symphony's Laning Humphrey, fascinates young concert patrons from Burlington—Michael Scanlon, Joseph Homer and James Lawrence.

An early Christmas treat for hundreds of boys and girls, the Youth Concert at Symphony Hall made a memorable start for the holidays. These concerts, for which Erich Leinsdorf and Henry Cabot share an able chairmanship, along with Dean John Burchards, John Thorndike, Mrs. Anthony Kutten, John Burk, Benjamin Lacy and conductor Harry Dickson, offer the wonderful world of Symphony to a young audience that comes many miles from all over New England.

Globe Photos by Edison Farrand

Youth Concert

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Herald
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 283,819
FEB 2 1964

By Marjorie W. Sherman

STUDYING HIS PROGRAM as he waits for the concert to start is Cliff Lobar of Brookline.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Journal
HINGHAM, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 2,600
FEB 6 1964

Last Youth Concert This Saturday

The final Youth Concert of the current season will be held at Boston's Symphony Hall on Saturday, Feb. 8th. It will mark the annual Festival Program in Commemoration of the birth of Britain's celebrated William Shakespeare.

A soloist will be chosen by competition from high school students throughout Massachusetts, and an original composition, written by a Newton High School student, will be played.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will be joined by the Greater Boston Youth Symphony Orchestra on this occasion.

Buses will leave the auditorium side of the Hingham High School at 9:15 A. M. on Saturday. Chaperones will be Miss Carolyn Wentworth, teacher of music in the public schools, and Mrs. Everett Leonard.

Those desiring further information in regards to the concert may call Mrs. S. Edward Eaton, 100 Otis street at RI 9-1292.

Saturday Concert Due For Youth

Outstanding high school musical talent will join forces with Boston Symphony Orchestra musicians at the Youth Concert at Symphony Hall conducted by Harry Ellis Dickson this Saturday forenoon from 11 to 12.

The greater part of the program will commemorate the 400th anniversary of the birth of Shakespeare, in tribute to the dramatist's far-reaching influence on composers. This is the program:

Suite from the Ballet, "Romeo and Juliet" ..... Prokofiev
Excerpts, Incidental Music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream" ..... Mendelssohn
Patricia Peardon, narrator
Lincoln-Sudbury Regional H.S. Girls' Chorus
(Robert Wentworth, conductor)
Soloists: Ann Marie Obressa, first soprano
Ellen Cooke, second soprano
Finale, Concerto for Violin and Orchestra ..... Mendelssohn
Soloist: Yasuoki Tanaka
(Winner of All-State competition)
Toccata ..... Claire Rubin
Episode ..... Michael Bielski
(These two works were composed and orchestrated by members of the Theory Classes at Newton High School, directed by Henry Lasker—James H. Remley, music supervisor)
Finale, Symphony No. 1 ..... Brahms
(Played jointly by musicians of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Greater Boston Youth Symphony Orchestra, Marvin Rabin, director).

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
News-Tribune (e)
WALTHAM, Mass.
Circ. 15,819
FEB 7 1964

Yasuoki Tanaka

Claire Rubin

Michael Bielski

3 Young Newton Musicians To Play at Symphony Hall

Youth concerts at Symphony Hall Feb. 8 and March 7 will feature compositions written and orchestrated by Claire Rubin, Newton High School Class of 1963, and Michael Bielski, member of the senior class.

Both studied theory of music under Henry Lasker of the high school faculty. Conductor Harry Ellis Dickson and members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will perform the original pieces.

Also on the program will be a violin solo by Yasuoki Tanaka of Tokyo, Japan, who will perform the last movement from Concerto for Violin and Orchestra by Mendelssohn.

Claire Rubin, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Herbert Rubin of 25 Manor House Rd., Newton Centre, is a freshman at Bryn Mawr. Michael Bielski, son of Mr. and Mrs. Noah Bielski of 11 Loring Rd., Newton Centre, is a member of the Theory of Music II and Music Appreciation classes, as well as the Newton High School Symphony Orchestra in which he plays first clarinet.

All high schools in the New England area were asked by Mr. Dickson to submit student orchestral scores. Newton High School responded with many scores composed by the theory students from which these two pieces were chosen by a board of examiners which included Walter Piston, internationally distingiushed composer and professor emeritus of music at Harvard University.

Violinist Yasuoki Tanaka of Tokyo, Japan, recently was the winner in a competition of 18 young instrumentalists from the New England area. He will perform the last movement of the Concerto for Violin and Orchestra by Felix Mendelssohn. Yasuoki is a member of the Theory of Music I and Music Appreciation classes and plays with the Newton High School Symphony Orchestra. He resides with Mr. and Mrs. Charles Olton of 17 Mayflower Ter. in Newton Highlands.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Graphic
NEWTON, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 9,568
FEB 6 1964

MICHAEL BIELSKI

CLAIRE RUBIN

YASUOKI TANAKA

Young Musicians In Hub Event

The creative and performing talents of students at Newton High School will be very much in evidence at the final series of youth concerts at Symphony Hall, Boston, on Saturday mornings, February 8 and March 7th.

Conductor Harry Ellis Dickson and members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will perform compositions written and orchestrated by Claire Rubin, Class of 1963, and Michael Bielski, Class of 1964, students of Henry Lasker's theory of music classes.

Mr. Dickson has included pieces written by students of Newton High School on his youth programs in the past.

Claire Rubin, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Herbert Rubin, 25 Manor House Rd., Newton Centre is a freshman at Bryn Mawr. Michael Bielski son of Mr. and Mrs. Noah Bielski, 11 Loring Rd. Newton Centre, is a member of the theory of music and music appreciation classes, and the Newton High School symphony orchestra in which he is first clarinetist.

All high schools in the New England area were asked by Mr. Dickson to submit original orchestral scores by students. The two Newton selections were picked by a board of examiners which included Walter Piston, internationally famous composer and professor emeritus of music at Harvard University.

Violinist Yasuoki Tanaka of Tokyo, recently was the winner in a competition for eighteen young instrumentalists from New England. He will perform the last movement of Mendelssohn's Concerto for violin in the Boston series.

He also is a member of the theory of music and music appreciation classes at Newton High School and plays in the Newton High Symphony Orchestra. He resides with Mr. and Mrs. Charles Olton of 17 Mayflower Terrace, Newton Highlands.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Herald
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 283,819
FEB 9 1964

Music

CONCERT HONORS SHAKESPEARE

By McLAREN HARRIS

While a steady flurry of snow dampened the streets of greater Boston yesterday morning, spirits were warmed inside Symphony Hall by the third program of this season's Youth Concerts.

For the annual Festival Concert, this year commemorating the 400th anniversary of William Shakespeare's birth, conductor Harry Ellis Dickson had at his command an extraordinary number of highly-trained musicians of practically all ages. The familiar contingent of Boston Symphony instrumentalists was augmented by the Girls' Chorus of Lincoln-Sudbury Regional High School, two soprano soloists, violinist Yasuoki Tanaka of Newton High School, members of the Greater Boston Youth Symphony, and composers Claire Rubin and Michael Bielski, both from Newton High.

PROKOFIEV BALLET

The senior Symphony players opened the anniversary tribute with a four-movement suite from Prokofiev's ballet, "Romeo and Juliet," depicting the feuding families, young Juliet, Friar Laurence and the "Dance of the Five Couples." Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" incidental music followed, featuring the Lincoln-Sudbury chorus, well-prepared by Robert Wentworth, soloists Ann Marie Obressa and Ellen Cooke, with narrator Patricia Peardon from the Stratford Festival, adding a regal touch with her flowing yellow gown. Professionals or not, they came up with a per-

...nce truly blessed with ...Shakespearean enchantment.

Next came violinist Tanaka, ...ner of an all-state competi..., polishing off the finale of ...delssohn's Violin Concerto ...verve and secure tech-nique. Two works by members of Henry Lasker's theory class at Newton High were given public hearing: Claire Rubin's "Toccata," an orchestral essay with robust sonorities reminiscent of Prokofiev, and Michael Bielski's "Episode," containing melodic charm and wit characteristic of Grieg — both works exhibiting strong understanding of some advanced theoretical practices.

Finally the Youth Symphony members appeared, occupying the principal seats, to give a full - bodied and formidable aural image to the finale of Brahms' Symphony No. 1—pure credit to regular conductor Marvin Rabin.

The program will be repeated on March 7, and hopefully all seats will be filled; young people make perhaps the most important audiences, for the world of music they hear today is the one they will inherit tomorrow.

The Program

The third program of this season's Youth Concerts was performed yesterday at Symphony Hall. Harry Ellis Dickson conducted members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the Greater Boston Youth Symphony, and the Girls' Chorus of Lincoln-Sudbury Regional High School. Ann Marie Obressa and Ellen Cooke were soloists for the "Midsummer Night's Dream" music and Patricia Peardon narrated.

Suite from "Romeo and Juliet" ..... Prokofiev
Incidental Music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream" ... Mendelssohn
Violin Concerto, finale ... Mendelssohn
Soloist: Yasuoki Tanaka
Toccata ..... Claire Rubin
Episode ..... Michael Bielski
Symphony No. 1, finale .... Brahms

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Traveler (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 164,299
FEB 7 1964

Encouraging Young Composers

Newton High Trio 'Cashes In' With Symphony

By JANET SNOWDON

You too can win the Boston Symphony music competition—if you go to Newton High, that is.

SYMPHONY BOARD WOULD DECIDE

In an effort to encourage young composers, last fall conductor Erich Leinsdorf invited high schools from all over New England to submit student's scores.

The Symphony's Board of Examiners headed by renowned composer Walter Piston planned to make the final decisions. Winners would hear their works performed by the Symphony in the annual Youth Concerts.

CLAIRE RUBIN
Whips Up Musical

Came December and there were 18 ambitious entries—all from Newton High School.

Slightly mystified, the board went ahead and selected winners anyway. They are Claire Rubin, 18, 25 Manor House Road, and Michael Bielski, 16, 11 Loring Street.

They will hear their compositions at tomorrow's 11 a.m. concert at Symphony Hall.

In speaking to the Traveler, Claire cleared up the contest riddle somewhat. "Newton High is probably the only school that gives courses enabling students to do something like this," she said.

Now a freshman at Bryn Mawr, Claire studied under Newton High music director Henry Lasker last year. His full-time music theory courses teach the rudiments of composition and orchestration, areas usually reserved for the college level.

Lasker explained that most of his students go on to advanced training in college.

Claire, whose composition "Toccata" was her first effort, is now busy whipping up a college musical for the freshman class. She's also a folk music addict and plays guitar, piano and saxophone.

COMPETITION WINNERS Yashuoki Tanaka, violin soloist, and composer Michael Bielski will participate in the Boston Symphony Youth Concert on Saturday. Both are studying under Newton High Music Director Henry Lasker.

Michael Bielski's "Episode" was also his first composition. The piece is in the romantic idiom a la Tchaikovsky, Michael explained.

Son of Boston Symphony violinist Noah Bielski, Michael is first desk clarinet for the Newton High band and plans to make music his career.

A third Newtonian on tomorrow's program will be violin soloist Yashuoki Tanaka, 18, private pupil of concertmaster Joseph Silverstein.

Yashuoki came to the U.S. last year from Japan to continue his music studies and is completing high school at Newton.

He lives with the Charles Olton family at 17 Mayflower Ter., Newton Highlands.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 465,653
FEB 2 1964

High Schools To Honor Bard Through Music

High school musicians from the Greater Boston Youth Symphony Orchestra will join their elders in the Boston Symphony on Saturday morning. The greater part of the program will commemorate the 400th anniversary of the birth of Shakespeare, in tribute to his influence on composers.

Harry Ellis Dickson, founder and conductor of the Youth Concerts at Symphony Hall, will direct the concert, beginning at 11 and lasting an hour.

The program, to be repeated Mar. 7, will include two works written and orchestrated by Newton High School students in the theory classes of Henry Lasker. To be heard are Claire Rubin's Toccata and Episode by Michael Bielski.

The concert will open with the Suite from Prokofiev's ballet, "Romeo and Juliet." In the excerpts from Mendelssohn's Incidental Music for "A Midsummer Night's Dream," the narrator will be Patricia Peardon. The Lincoln-Sudbury Regional High School Girls' Chorus has been prepared by its director, Robert Wentworth, and the two soprano soloists will be Ann Marie Obressa and Ellen Cook.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Reporter
FOXBORO, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 3,397
FEB 20 1964

Governor's Wife Gives Autographs To Local Students At Youth Concert

Foxboro students attending Saturday's Youth Concert at Symphony Hall received a special thrill when requests for autographs were graciously granted by the Governor's wife, Toni Peabody.

The third and last Youth Concert of the series at Symphony Hall was attended by the following students and chaperones: Susan Barnes, John Barros, Kristin Belko, Robin Brooks, Sherrie Brooks, Nancy R. Baker, John Boynton, Susan Chase, Stephen Chase, Margaret Conboy, James Conboy, Rani Croft, Paul Clement, Deborah A. Driscoll, Pamela Dupree, Margaret Forrest, Esther Hammer, Barbara A. Kennedy, William Owen Jr., Robert Hunt, Mary Barros, Marie Owen, Jessie Miller, Linda Owen, Donna Meisner, Laurel Moltedo, Ronald Mendell, Richard Nudd, Lisa Nilsen, David E. Rice, Christine Rice, Dianne Spier, Linda C. Stewart, Sandra Sycafoose, David Sepe, Wayne Webber, Scott Webber, Bradford Kennedy, Cynthia Webber, Mrs. Angelo Sepe, Mr. Ralph E. Brooks, Mrs. Richard P. Webber and Mrs. William K. Owen.

Harry Ellis Dickson conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the "Suite from a Ballet", "Romeo and Juliet" by Prokofiev, "Excerpts, Incidental Music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream" by Mendelssohn and "Finale of Symphony No 1 by Brahms as well as two original compositions by students of the Theory Class of Newton High School.

Plans for ticket subscriptions for next year's concerts will be announced by Mrs. Richard P. Webber and Mrs. William K. Owen, Co-Chairmen for Foxboro.

England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
ord-American (m) (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 531,565

ELLIOT NORTON WRITES:

Talented Young Artists In Final Youth Concert

Although it was a little too long and too crowded, the Festival program of the Youth Concerts at Symphony Hall was admirable in most ways and stimulating in many. Saturday's concert-goers, who were generally attentive and responsive, recognized and endorsed in their usual exuberant way all of its wonders, and so proved that Conductor Harry Ellis Dickson, his musicians, singers, soloists and composers, some of them very young, had achieved what they had in mind.

What they had in mind was, first of all, to demonstrate in this anniversary of Shakespear's birth how men like Prokofiev and Mendelssohn have matched the magic of the great dramatist's plays with music which is magical in its own right.

Elliot Norton

To make this point, Mr. Dickson and the Boston Symphony Orchestra played some parts of Prokofiev's almost incredibly lovely Ballet Suite from "Romeo and Juliet."

CHARMING NARRATOR

Then, using Patricia Peardon as a professional narrator of singular charm and the fresh young voices of the Lincoln-Sudbury Regional High School Girl's Chorus, they played excerpts from Mendelssohn's incidental music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream."

In both instances, musicians, singers and the speaker contributed something fine. In the Prokofiev especially, the great orchestra gave the crowded congregation of boys and girls an astonishing demonstration of the pure lyrical tone which the music requires and which nobody but this magnificent team can produce.

Speaking Shakespeare's lines, as Puck, or as Titania, Miss Peardon looked as lovely as any of Shakespeare's most exquisite heroines, and read with a proper sense of exultation.

FINE YOUNG TALENT

In the background, under the huge pipes of the organ, looking very grave, the Lincoln-Sudbury singers produced a sweet tone of their own, fresh as May, clear and true.

In a subsequent part of the program, Conductor Dickson, presented a young violinist of Newton High School, then conducted composition written by two other high schoolers in an impressive demonstration of promising young talent.

The violinist, Yasuoki Tanaka, whose parents live in Japan, fiddled at high speed through the finale of Mendelssohn's Concerto for Violin and Orchestra, accompanied by the orchestra. That he is talented is certain; that he is still very young, with a long way to go, is also apparent.

Perhaps the most remarkable part of the Saturday program was the presentation by the orchestra of compositions written by students of the Newton High School as members of a class in music theory conducted by Henry Lasker of that school's faculty.

Without attempting to analyze or evaluate fully either the "Toccata" of Claire Rubin, or the "Episode" of Michael Bielski, it may be ventured that each is a commendably rich and mature work. For a further point, to be stated much more forcefully, the fact that these original pieces were given this public hearing before their peers by our orchestra is something to cheer about.

What greater stimulus to young composers could there possibly be than the knowledge that the Boston symphony orchestra is ready, on such occasions, to play their music?

YOUTH UNIT WELCOMED

In the final part of Saturday's program, the orchestra welcomed the young men and women of Marvin Rabin's Greater Boston Youth Symphony Orchestra, as they have in the past.

The Symphony men abandoned all the first chairs to the visitors, then played with them, as equal partners, the finale of Brahms' first symphony.

From any point of view, that was something to see and hear in a concert which was most certainly a credit to everyone involved on or off the stage. Of Youth Concerts at Symphony Hall, we can all be proud.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 194,870
FEB 10 1964

Youth Concert

Shakespeare and Others Contribute to Festival

Like a true festival, the Youth Concert at Symphony Hall Saturday morning had a theme (Shakespeare), a speech (by Mrs. Endicott Peabody), an ovation (for a new violinist) and lots of music, by old and new composers.

An ordinary Youth Concert lasts an hour, from 11 a.m. to noon, but as Harry Ellis Dickson, founder and conductor, told the audience, enthusiasm dictated another 40 minutes. Nobody seemed to mind.

If the 400th anniversary of Shakespeare's birth provided the festival theme, in music of Prokofiev and Mendelssohn, the focus of the program was also in equal part music for and by youth.

From the Newton High School theory classes, directed by Henry Lasker, came two works composed and orchestrated by students. Both the Toccata by Claire Rubin and the Episode by Michael Bielski showed a competent working out of forms and an appreciation of melody. Both composers were on hand for bows. Bielski's father, Noah, a violinist, was among the Boston Symphony musicians who played the new works.

Saturday's instrumental soloist was Yasuoki Tanaka who, as winner of the All-State Competition, played the finale from Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto. A student at Newton High School and a pupil of the Boston Symphony concertmaster, Joseph Silverstein, Tanaka has his teacher's regard for sweet tone and a sense of the sweep of the music. Tanaka's performance was taped for his parents in Tokyo.

The program, to be repeated Saturday, Mar. 7, opened with two settings of Shakespeare's plays. Dickson conducted a Suite from Prokofiev's ballet, "Romeo and Juliet," and excerpts from Mendelssohn's Incidental Music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream."

Participating in the Mendelssohn were narrator Patricia Peardon, from the American Shakespeare Festival, Stratford, Ct., who spoke the verses "tripplingly on the tongue," and the Girls Chorus from the Lincoln - Sudbury Regional High School, superbly prepared by Robert Wentworth. Anne Marie Obressa and Ellen Cooke were the pleasing sopranos in the fairy duets.

As is customary at the final Youth Concert programs, the Boston Symphony is joined by members of the Greater Boston Youth Symphony Orchestra. Marvin Rabin's teen-agers took over first desk duties and the outside seats, contributing to the robust reading of the finale of Brahms' First Symphony. M. M.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Traveler (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 164,299
FEB 6 1964

HARRY ELLIS DICKSON conducts 75-girl symphony chorus at Lincoln-Sudbury Regional High School. Group will perform with Boston Symphony on Saturday.

"DON'T SING 'SING'." Penciling in some score suggestions is Harry Ellis Dickson, conductor of Boston Symphony Youth Concerts. With him are music director of Lincoln-Sudbury Regional, Robert Wentworth, and students, Judith King and Louise Hendrick.

TIGHT BINDING

166

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 465,653
FEB 2 1964

This church serpent, played by trombonist Josef Orosz, is an ancestor of the bass tuba. Although the serpent was made of leather-covered wood, it equaled the low brass tones but with a woodier quality in sound.

Violist George Humphrey [illegible]s a dancing-master's fiddle. The tiny instr[illegible]nt fitted nicely into a man's great-coat pocke[illegible] French called the fiddle a "pochette." The p[illegible]ait is of Henry Lee Higginson, founder of the [illegible]ston Symphony.

Youth Concerts Hon[illegible]r Sh[illegible]

By MARGO MILLER

In Beethoven and Shakespeare, wrote Brahms, youth has the whole world.

No other playwright has so inspired composers as the Bard of Stratford-on-Avon. What better occasion for a celebration of his 400th birthday than the Youth Concerts at Symphony Hall.

Next Saturday forenoon, Harry Ellis Dickson will conduct two musical settings of Shakespeare. Dickson's colleagues in the Boston Symphony will play the suite from the ballet, "Romeo and Juliet," by Prokofiev.

Here, in purely orchestral language, the tragic romance unfolds. We hear the feuding families—Montagues and Capulets—depicted in stately themes underlined by harsh brass. Juliet has music which combines the happiness of childhood with the awakening ardor of womanhood. The mood in the Friar Laurence section suggests the solemnity of marriage, as he weds the pair, and his role as peacemaker.

In contrast to dark Verona is the enchanted forest sketched by Mendelssohn in his Incidental Music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream." Bewitchment falls alike on the King and Queen of the Fairies and the comic bumpkins who stray into their schemes. Singing Shakespeare's fairy songs will be the light, young voices of the Lincoln-Sudbury High School Girls' Chorus, prepared by Robert Wentworth. Patricia Peardon of the American Stratford Festival will recite Puck's lines.

Brahms, who also set Shakespeare to music, will be represented in the concert by the finale of his First Symphony. As has become tradition at the last pair of each season's Youth Concerts at Symphony Hall, members of the Greater Boston Youth Symphony Orchestra share desks with Boston Symphony players in one ambitious selection on the program.

The Youth Orchestra was founded five years ago by its conductor Marvin Rabin. Its young musicians come from 60 public, private and parochial schools, and spend Saturday mornings in rehearsal at Boston University's School of Fine and Applied Arts, sponsors of the orchestra. In the Brahms movement, Boston Symphony principals will turn first [illegible] duties over to the teen-agers.

The list of compositions [illegible] Shakespeare's mighty poetry and her[illegible] Verdi's "Falstaff" is perhaps th[illegible] popular, example in opera. Th[illegible] of Romeo and Juliet brought [illegible] symphony from Berlioz; he knew [illegible] lish but had first heard Juliet [illegible] by the Irish actress, Henriett[illegible] later became his wife. Compos[illegible] tion and age have set Shak[illegible] speeches and Sonnets.

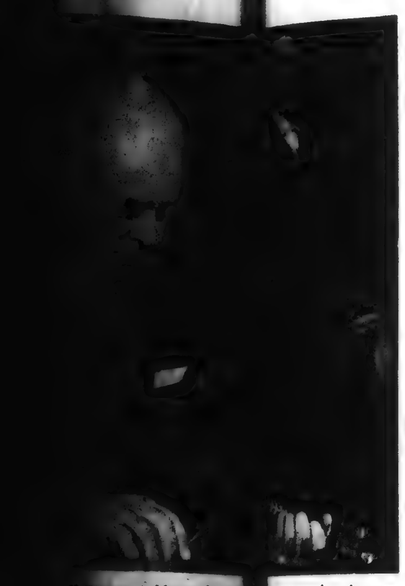
Visitors to the Casadesus C[illegible] Instruments in Symphony Hall [illegible] instruments known to Shakes[illegible] tioned in his plays. Photograph[illegible] show members of the Boston Sy[illegible] ancestors of their modern co[illegible] ments.

How Elizabeth ladies may [illegible] companying a ballad is illustr[illegible] University music students on [illegible]

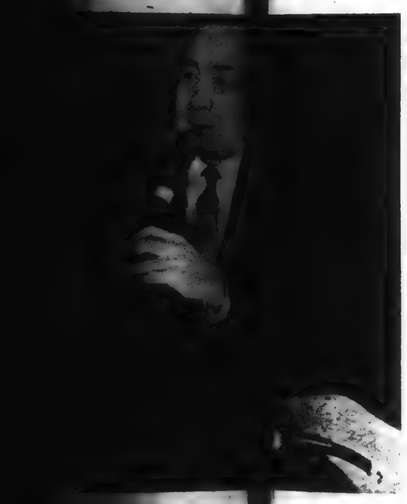
BOSTON SUNDAY GLOBE, FEBRUARY 2, 1964

TIGHT BINDING

167



...orge Humphrey ...n a dancing-
...iddle. The tiny th... ...ent fitted nicely
...n's great-coat poc... ...e French called
...a "pochette." The ...rait is of Henry
...son, founder of t... ...ston Symphony.



Greater Boston Youth Symphony players join the Boston Symphony once a season. The teen-agers draw the choice outside chairs and duties of the various principals.

Oboist Louis Speyer blows a cromorne. Inside the cylinder beneath the mouthpiece are two reeds which vibrate when the player's breath fills the cylinder. The cromorne belongs to the family of reed instruments known to Shakespeare as shawms.

Forerunner of the bass viol was this monochord, played by contra-bassist Georges Moleux. By stopping the string at different points, a wide range of tones was produced. It could sound rather like a cello, or rather like a trumpet, hence, the alternate name, marine trumpet.

...lor Shakespeare

...r duties over

...d on Shake-
...is a long one.
...est, and most
...pealing story
... a dramatic
...most no Eng-
...le declaimed
...thson, who
...in every na-
...eare's lyrics,

...ection of Old
...d see various
...e and men-
...these pages
...ony playing
...stral instru-

...ve looked ac-
...ted by Boston
...e cover of today's Sunday Globe Magazine. Barbara Bowen of Lyme, N.H., left, plays a dulcimer, while Patricia Humphrey of Waban, center, has a short archlute, or theorbo. Jean Chapple of Newton Highlands holds an ivory transverse flute; a smaller version was called a "wrynecked flute," in "The Merchant of Venice," because of the twist of the player's head.

Biographical facts about Shakespeare are so skimpy that we do not know if he played a musical instrument. Informal concerts were a popular pasttime of his day. Barbershops kept instruments for the amusement of waiting customers. Royal and noble households maintained orchestras and bands. Henry VIII was a composer, Elizabeth I was an accomplished performer on the virginals.

Musician or not, Shakespeare knew its worth. In "As You Like It," he warned:

The man that hath no music in himself,
Nor is not moved with concord of sweet sounds,
Is fit for treasons, stratagems and spoils.

...will turn fir...
...ers.
...of compositions ...
...hty poetry and h...
...Falstaff" is perhaps ...
...example in opera. T...
...and Juliet brought ...
...from Berlioz; he kn...
...first heard Juli...
...tress, Henriet...
...his wife. Comp...
...have set Sha...
...Sonnets.

...to the Casadesus ...
...in Symphony H...
...known to Shak...
...plays. Photogra...
...ers of the Boston ...
...their modern ...

...abeth ladies ma...
...a ballad is illu...
...music students o...

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 194,870
APR 13 1964

Today in Society

Magic Day at Symphony For Handicapped Children

By MARJORIE W. SHERMAN

Green and white programs went under many a pillow this week-end, a reminder of a wonderful day for more than 2000 boys and girls. Some of them had never been to Boston before, and most of them couldn't have come to Symphony Hall for the concert Saturday if it hadn't been for the Lincoln and Therese Filene Foundation, and the generous help of the Youth Concerts committee, the orchestra and the staff at Symphony Hall, and off-duty time given by a dozen Boston police officers.

Some of the youngsters, like six-year-old Joe, who can't walk, had never seen a horse before except on TV, and so mounted officer Ben Donahue brought "Domino," who's brown and handsome and very smart, right over to Joe's wheelchair to say hello. Other officers, like John Collins and Zenon Pieculenicz and Jerry Ciriello helped carry the wheel chairs in from the buses, and it was surprising how much candy those policemen happened to have in their pockets to help with the long trip up the steps and down the corridor to the front row of Symphony Hall.

Here, with lots of fascinating musical things to show them, waited Youth Concerts founder-director Harry Ellis Dickson. More buses, 20 or 30 of them, brought hundreds more, many on crutches, proud of being able to help the children who are blind, but however pale or pinched with pain these young faces might be, the minute the music began, the smiles came too, and that audience became one of the most rewarding sights any orchestra could ever hope to see.

A lot of credit belongs to Mr. Leinsdorf, Mr. Dickson, Henry Cabot, Mrs. Anthony Kutten, Mrs. Albert C. Titcomb, Mrs. Harry Bremner (the day's chairman) Mrs. Manuel Kurland, and all the other devoted people who made this miraculous day possible for children from more than 50 hospitals and institutions.

THE FINE WORK of the North Bennet Street Industrial School in counselling boys in constructive trade courses will be aided by a program Apr. 21 at Cortwright House. The speaker will be Miss Mary Crosby, a graduate of the Rhode Island School of Design and an accomplished consultant on historical buildings in New England. Mrs. Ernest Jacoby, whose husband is director of the Industrial School, will have as hostess chairmen Mrs. Bayard Henry, Mrs. Freeman Hill, Mrs. Henry Goodwin and others.

A FAVORITE with the youngsters attending Saturday's Lincoln and Therese Filene Foundation Youth Conference at Symphony Hall was Domino. Station 16 officers gave youngster at right a lift.
(Photo by Joseph Dennehy)

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Record-American (m) (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 531,565
APR 10 1964

SMART SET — By ROSE WAL.

Tribute to Mrs. Lincoln Filene

A project very dear to the heart of the late Mrs. Lincoln Filene was making good music available to all young people as a vital enrichment of their lives. She provided opportunities for them to hear and perform music. Those who knew her will recall the time and energy she freely gave towards the development of the Boston Music School Settlement.

As a tribute to the great lady, a special concert sponsored by the Filene Foundation will be held Saturday at 11 a. m. in Symphony Hall where Harry Ellis Dickson will conduct members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Guests will be boys and girls unable to attend the regular Youth Concerts in Symphony Hall. The artists, five youthful soloists, will offer classical selections.

John Romanovich III, (clarinet) will play the "Concerto for Clarinet and Orchestra" by Mozart; Paul Britton, (flute), and Ellen Rubin, (harp), will offer the "Serenade for Flute, Harp and Strings" by Hanson; John B. Kelly, (trombone), has chosen "Concerto for Trombone" by Norman Layden; Robert Markow, (French horn), will play Mozart's "Concerto No. I in D major for French Horn and Orchestra".

An added pleasure will be the Girl's Chorus of the Lincoln-Sudbury Regional High School in excerpts from Mendelssohn's Incidental Music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream", to the accompaniment of the orchestra; Ann Maria Obressa and Ellen Cooke, guest soloists.

★ ★ ★

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Herald (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 178,553
APR 10 1964

Youth Concert

Tomorrow morning at 11 the Filene Foundation invites underprivileged young people to attend a special program by members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Harry Ellis Dickson at Symphony Hall. Five high school instrumentalists, chosen by competition, will be featured as soloists; in addition, the Girl's Chorus of Lincoln-Sudbury Regional High School will sing excerpts from Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream." Remaining works will be by Mozart, Wagner and Hanson.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Gazette (e)
TAUNTON, Mass.
Circ. 12,652
APR 10 1964

Norton

Ellen Rubin In Boston Concert

Ellen Rubin, 17-year-old daughter of Atty. and Mrs. Lewis S. Rubin of 94 Taunton Ave., and a senior at Norton High School, will be one of five soloists appearing with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a special youth concert, in Symphony Hall, Saturday at 11 a. m.

The concert, sponsored by the Filene Foundation, will be conducted by Harry Ellis Dickson.

Miss Rubin will be heard with Paul Brittan, flutist, in Howard Hanson's Serenade for Flute and Harp.

She is a member of the Greater Boston Youth Symphony Orchestra and of the Massachusetts All-State Orchestra.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Recorder-Gazette (e)
GREENFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 13,354
APR 11 1964

Students To Hear Boston Concert

A contingent of 20 Greenfield High School students will travel to Boston today to hear a Boston Symphony Orchestra concert. They will be accompanied by Mrs. Merritt Garland, Mrs. Knowlton Stone, and Mr. and Mrs. Gerard Perry.

John Romanovich, III, president of the GHS Senior Class, will appear as soloist with the orchestra. Romanovich has distinguished himself frequently in local music circles, and was recently accepted for study at the School of Fine and Applied Arts at Boston University.

Locally he has studied the clarinet with Chester Hazelett of Gill, now retired after a distinguished career including tenure with the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra and the Paul Whiteman Orchestra.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 194,870
APR 10 1964

Filene Foundation Concert Tomorrow

A special concert for boys and girls unable to attend the regular Youth Concerts at Symphony Hall, will be held Saturday morning at 11 o'clock with Harry Ellis Dickson conducting Boston Symphony members.

Sponsored by the Filene Foundation, the concert will be in memory of Mrs. Lincoln Filene. A gifted musician herself who played violin, piano and organ, Mrs. Filene is being honored for her lifetime devotion to good music and to making it available to all young people as a vital enrichment of their lives.

Among her accomplishments was the development of the Boston Music School Settlement.

Five youthful soloists will play classical selections to the accompaniment of the orchestra. They are John Romanovich 3d, clarinet, playing Mozart's "Concerto for Clarinet and Orchestra"; John D. Kelly, trombone, playing the first movement of Leyden's "Concerto for Trombone;" Robert Markow, French horn, playing Mozart's "Concerto No. 1 in D major for French Horn and Orchestra;" Paul Britten, flute, and Ellen Rubin, harp, playing the "Serenade for Flute, Harp and Strings," by Hanson.

In addition, the Girls' Chorus of the Lincoln-Sudbury Regional High School will sing excerpts from Mendelssohn's Incidental Music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream," to the accompaniment of the orchestra, with Ann Marie Obressa and Ellen Cooke at guest soloists.

ORGAN CONCERTS

First Concert . . . SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 10

Marilyn Mason

GEORGE FRIDERIC HANDEL (1685–1759).....Concerto in F major, Op. 4, No. 5
Larghetto — Allegro — Alla siciliana — Presto

JEAN LANGLAIS (1907–).....Miniature (1958)
Epilogue, for Pedal Solo

JOHANN SEBASTIAN BACH (1685–1750).....Prelude and Fugue in D major

ARNOLD SCHOENBERG (1874–1951).....Variations on a Recitative, Op. 40

MAURICE DURUFLÉ (1902–).....Scherzo, Op. 2

JOHN COOK.....Flourish and Fugue (1957)

Second Concert . . . SUNDAY, DECEMBER 8

Fernando Germani

JOHANN SEBASTIAN BACH (1685–1750)...Toccata, Adagio and Fugue in C Major

LOUIS-CLAUDE DAQUIN (1694–1772).....Noël en Musette en Dialogue

LEO SOWERBY (1895–).....Pageant

MARCEL DUPRÉ (1886–).....Variations sur un vieux Noël

MAX REGER (1873–1916).....Fantasia Op. 52, No. 3 on the Chorale
"Halleluja, Gott zu loben"

MARILYN MASON heads the Organ Department at the University of Michigan. She studied in Paris with Nadia Boulanger and Maurice Duruflé, and later in this country with Arnold Schoenberg. A native of Oklahoma, she graduated from the New England Conservatory of Music. She has traveled extensively as a concert artist.

FERNANDO GERMANI, born and trained in Rome, studied with Respighi and has been especially active as teacher and performer in his native city. Coming to this country, he was head of the Organ Department at the Curtis Institute for two years. He has revised and edited the complete organ works of Frescobaldi.

Third Concert . . . SUNDAY, JANUARY 26

John Ferris

PIERRE DU MAGE (17th century).....Grand Jeu

FRANÇOIS COUPERIN (1668–1733).....Récit de Cornet
Benedictus
Dialogue sur les Grands Jeux from the Mass for Parishes

WOLFGANG AMADEUS MOZART (1756–1791).....Fantaisie in F minor, K. 608

DANIEL PINKHAM (1923–) Concertante for Organ, Celesta and Percussion (1962)
(Commissioned by the Boston Chapter of the American Guild of Organists)
Timpani: EVERETT FIRTH
Celesta: MARTIN HOHERMAN
Percussion: CHARLES SMITH

CÉSAR FRANCK (1822–1890).....Chorale in E major

HENK BADINGS (1907–).....Passacaglia for Timpani and Organ
Timpani: EVERETT FIRTH

Fourth Concert . . . SUNDAY, FEBRUARY 16

Robert Town

DIETRICH BUXTEHUDE (1637–1707).....Ciacona in E minor Organ Chorales
"Nun komm, der Heiden Heiland" — "Von Gott will ich nicht lassen"
Fugue in C major (à la Gigue)

JOHANN SEBASTIAN BACH (1685–1750).....Passacaglia and Fugue in C minor

JEHAN ALAIN (1911–1940).....Trois Danses
Joies (Joys) — Deuils (Sorrows) — Luttes (Conflicts)

MARCEL DUPRÉ (1886–).....Triptyque, Opus 51 (1957)
Chaconne — Musette — Dithyrambe

JOHN FERRIS is a graduate of the University of Michigan, having studied with Marcel Dupré in Chicago. Since 1958 he has been the Organist and Choirmaster of Harvard University. He played at the Symphony Hall Organ Recitals in their first year (1960–1961).

ROBERT TOWN, born in Wisconsin, attended the Eastman School of Music and later studied with Arthur Poister at Syracuse University. He is organist and choirmaster at St. John's Episcopal Church at Plymouth, Michigan.

Fifth Concert . . . SUNDAY, MARCH 1

John Weaver

GEORGE FRIDERIC HANDEL (1685–1759).....Concerto No. 4 in F major—Allegro
(Cadenza by Weaver)

JOHANN SEBASTIAN BACH (1685–1750)....Trio Sonata No. 5 in C major—Allegro
Chorale-Prelude — "Jesu, Joy of Man's Desiring"
Fugue in E-flat major — (St. Anne Fugue)

FRANZ LISZT (1811–1886).....Prelude and Fugue on B.A.C.H.

MARCO ENRICO BOSSI (1861–1925).....Giga

OLIVIER MESSIAEN (1908–).....The Ascension
"Serene Alleluias"

JOHN WEAVER (1937–).....Toccata

Sixth Concert . . . SUNDAY, APRIL 5

E. Power Biggs

GIROLAMO FRESCOBALDI (1583–1643).....Toccata in D minor
Canzona Prima

HENRY PURCELL (1659–1695).....Fanfare in C major Trumpet Tune, "Bonduca"
Ayre for Organ
Trumpet Tune, "Cebell"

JOHANN SEBASTIAN BACH (1685–1750)..... My Spirit be Joyful — Duet from the Easter Cantata, No. 146

WOLFGANG AMADEUS MOZART (1756–1791).....Adagio, originally for a Glass Armonica — Prelude and Fugue in C minor

JAN KOETSIER.....Partita for English Horn and Organ (1958)
Liberamente — Allegro — Larghetto — Vivace — Organo solo — Andante sostenuto

GEORG PHILIPP TELEMANN (1681–1767).....Overture from "Der getreue Musikmeister"
Heroic Music: Honor — Charm — Bravery
Quietness — Vigor — Love
Vigilance — Playfulness — Gentleness
Generosity — Hope — Joy
Trumpets: ROGER VOISIN and ANDRÉ COME
English Horn: LOUIS SPEYER
Timpani: EVERETT FIRTH

JOHN WEAVER first studied at the Peabody Conservatory in Baltimore, and later at the Curtis Institute. He is now Organist and Choir Director of the Lutheran Church of the Holy Trinity in New York City.

E. POWER BIGGS, born in England, and an honor graduate of the Royal Academy of Music in London, has lived here since 1929 and made this country his own. He is known by his tours of this country and Europe, by his numerous recordings and broadcasts.

170

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Herald
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 283,819
OCT 13 1963

Symphony Will Sponsor Fourth Organ Series

Following three successful seasons of Symphony Hall Organ Concerts, the Boston Symphony Orchestra announces that the fourth season of organ recitals in Symphony Hall will begin on Sunday, Nov. 10 with a concert by Marilyn Mason, a member of the music faculty of the University of Michigan. Fernando Germani Italian organist, will be heard in the second concert of the series on Sunday, Dec. 8.

Remaining artists in the six-recital series include John Ferris, organist and choirmaster at Harvard University; Robert Lloyd Town, winner of the Young Artists Competition co-sponsored by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the American Guild of Organists; the young organist John Weaver; and E. Power Biggs, internationally famous concert organist.

Concerts will be held on Sundays at 6 p.m. Season tickets are available at $6 from the Symphony Hall box office. Single concert admission is $1.50, and all seats are unreserved.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Herald
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 283,819
NOV 3 1963

Organ Series Tickets Are Available

The Boston Symphony Orchestra announces that tickets for the Symphony Hall Organ Concerts are now available at the Symphony Hall Box Office. Season subscriptions are $6 for the six programs in this series.

Recitalists to be heard include Marilyn Mason, Nov. 10; Fernando Germani, Dec. 8; John Ferris, Jan. 26; Robert Lloyd Town, Feb. 16; John Weaver, March 1; and E. Power Biggs, April 5. Members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will join Mr. Ferris and Mr. Biggs for their recitals.

The Symphony Hall Organ Concerts will be held on Sundays at 6 p.m. and all seats are unreserved.

Marilyn Mason, to be heard next Sunday, is a member of the faculty of the University of Michigan where she had studied previously with Palmer Christian.

Her program will consist of Handel's Concerto in F major; two works by Jean Langlais, Miniature (1958) and Epilogue, for pedal sool; J.S Bach's Prelude and Fugue in D major; Variations, in a Recitative, Op. 40, by Arnold Schoenberg; Scherzo, Op. 2, by Maurice Duruflé; and Flourish and Fugue (1957) by John Cook.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Christian Science
Monitor (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 174,850
OCT 11 1963

Symphony Hall organ concerts

Six Symphony Hall organ concerts will be given this season. They will open Nov. 10 with Marilyn Mason at the console, and are presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Subsequent artists to be heard will be Fernando Germani from Italy, Dec. 8; John Ferris of Harvard University, Jan. 26; Robert Lloyd Town, winner of the Young Artist Competition co-sponsored by Boston Symphony and the Boston Chapter of the American Guild of Organists, Feb. 16; John Weaver March 1; E. Power Biggs, April 5.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 465,653
DEC 8 1963

Symphony Hall Organ Has Own Audiences

One man, standing on the stage of Symphony Hall, in front of 104 Boston Symphony Orchestra musicians, can draw from them, seemingly, every possible variety of tone, from a wall-shaking torrent to a singing whisper.

But also, one man seated alone tonight on the same stage, can produce a kaleidoscope of tone in all degrees of power or delicacy. This man would be playing the great Symphony Hall organ of 4800 pipes, in one of the annual series of organ recitals which four years ago began attracting a new audience to Symphony Hall.

The president of the orchestra's trustees, Henry B. Cabot, had said: "We have a wonderful organ, very elaborate and very costly, which is heard on a few scattered occasions—generally in combination with the orchestra. Why not let the public hear what it really can do, in a whole series of organ concerts?"

As an experiment, the plan was inaugurated in Jan. 1961. Four one-nour recitals by noted organists were presented on Sunday a t6 o'clock. So well did the venture succeed, that this year six recitals were announced. The second one, by the European soloist, Fernando Germani, takes place tonight.

Composers of symphonies and the development of the requisite orchestra came late upon the musical scene—in the late 1700's—whereas music for the organ had been composed as early as 1325.

The oldest master represented is Girolamo Frescobaldi, born 102 years before Johann Sebastian Bach, who studied his works. This influence may be traced in some of Bach's music in this series. Running down the list chronologically, we find that these additional early masters of organ composition will be heard:

Dietrich Buxtehude. Johann Sebastian Bach traveled 200 miles on foot, from Arnstadt to Luebeck, in 1705, to hear him play. As virtuoso organist and composer, Buxtehude left strong influence on Bach.

George Frideric Handel. As organ virtuoso he was a close rival to his contemporary, J. S. Bach, whom he never met. He wrote 18 organ concertos.

Johann Sebastian Bach. Rivaling Handel as greatest organ virtuoso of his time, he is rated by various authorities as the greatest composer of all times.

Louis-Claude Daquin. Celebrated French organist and composer for organ and clavichord.

Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart. Perhaps the greatest pianist of his day, he also played the violin and organ with distinction.

Soloists for this season's recitals on the Symphony Hall organ are Marilyn Mason, Fernando Germani, John Ferris, Robert Town, John Weaver, and E. Power Biggs.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Herald
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 283,819
FEB 16 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Christian Science
Monitor (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 174,850
FEB 19 1964

DIAPASON
CHICAGO, ILL.
MONNTHLY 22,500
MAR 1964

Third Boston Competition

The Boston Chapter announces its third annual Young Artists' competition, sponsored in collaboration with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The contest carries an award of $500 as well as an appearance in the Symphony Hall organ recital series in the 1964-65 season.

The competition is open to organists living or working in New England, New York, New Jersey or Pennsylvania. Applicants must be between 25 and 35 as of the March 31 deadline for initial eliminations.

Write: Jack Fisher, Emmanuel Church, 15 Newbury St. Boston 02116.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 465,653
OCT 13 1963

Organists

Marilyn Mason of the University of Michigan music faculty will give the opening recital in the Symphony Hall Organ Series Sunday, Nov. 10.

The series was initiated four years ago at the suggestion of Henry B. Cabot, president of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Trustees, to enable the public to hear the concert organ in Symphony Hall. This season there will be six recitals rather than four as in the past.

Fernando Germani, Italian organist, will be heard in the second concert of the series on Dec. 8. John Ferris, organist and choirmaster at Harvard University, will be heard on Jan. 26; and Robert Lloyd Town, winner of the Young Artists Competition co-sponsored by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Boston Chapter of the American Guild of Organists, will give a recital on Feb. 16. On March 1 the young organist John Weaver will make his first Symphony Hall appearance. The series will conclude on Apr. 15 with a recital by E. Power Biggs.

The concerts will be held on Sundays at 6 p.m. without intermission. Season tickets for the series of six recitals are available at the Symphony Hall Box Office. Single concert admission will be available. All seats are unreserved.

Mason at console

CSM 11/2/63

By William Saunders

Opening the fourth season of Symphony Hall organ concerts, Marilyn Mason displayed that virtuoso flair that puts the frosting on the musical cake. It is the ability to set forth each composition in its best light, and it lends excitement even to the more subdued works.

Miss Mason proved that skipping around the centuries can provide a refreshing, absorbing program. A crisp, starched traversal of Handel's Concerto in F was followed by the plaintive, nostalgic "Miniature" by Jean Langlais, composed in 1958. The same composer's "Epilogue" offered a dazzling display of pedal acrobatics.

* * *

Bach's spirited Prelude and Fugue in D, which followed, was precise and carefully phrased; the bold modulations and grinding dissonances were not overly dramatized.

Miss Mason next presented an incisive performance of Arnold Schoenberg's haunting and truculent "Variations on a Recitative." Though based on a 12-tone theme, the work's harmonic structure centers around D minor. Imaginative registrations clarified the work's design and underlined its remarkable workmanship.

* * *

Miss Mason wove a tuneful and intricate web of sound in the Scherzo by Maurice Duruflé—like Langlais, a pupil of Paul Dukas. The recital, except for encores, closed with the pomp and pageantry of "Flourish and Fugue" by John Cook, organist of Boston's Church of the Advent.

According to the printed program, we shall have to wait at least another year to hear any of the sonatas of Hindemith and Mendelssohn. Nonetheless, these Symphony Hall concerts are a milestone in the new growth of interest in "Bach's royal instrument." Those who pass up the opportunity to hear the entire series (perhaps because some of the recitalists are unfamiliar to them) miss some of the best playing.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Christian Science
Monitor (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 174,850
NOV 4 1963

Mason at console

Marilyn Mason will give an organ recital at Symphony Hall on Sunday evening, Nov. 10, at 6 o'clock, presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

170

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Herald
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 283,819
OCT 13 1963

Symphony Will Sponsor Fourth Organ Series

Following three successful seasons of Symphony Hall Organ Concerts, the Boston Symphony Orchestra announces that the fourth season of organ recitals in Symphony Hall will begin on Sunday, Nov. 10 with a concert by Marilyn Mason, a member of the music faculty of the University of Michigan. Fernando Germani, Italian organist, will be heard in the second concert of the series on Sunday, Dec. 8.

Remaining artists in the six-recital series include John Ferris, organist and choirmaster at Harvard University; Robert Lloyd Town, winner of the Young Artists Competition co-sponsored by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the American Guild of Organists; the young organist John Weaver; and E. Power Biggs, internationally famous concert organist.

Concerts will be held on Sundays at 6 p.m. Season tickets are available at $6 from the Symphony Hall box office. Single concert admission is $1.50, and all seats are unreserved.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Herald
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 283,819
NOV 3 1963

Organ Series Tickets Are Available

The Boston Symphony Orchestra announces that tickets for the Symphony Hall Organ Concerts are now available at the Symphony Hall Box Office. Season subscriptions are $6 for the six programs in this series.

Recitalists to be heard include Marilyn Mason, Nov. 10; Fernando Germani, Dec. 8; John Ferris, Jan. 26; Robert Lloyd Town, Feb. 16; John Weaver, March 1; and E. Power Biggs, April 5. Members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will join Mr. Ferris and Mr. Biggs for their recitals.

The Symphony Hall Organ Concerts will be held on Sundays at 6 p.m. and all seats are unreserved.

Marilyn Mason, to be heard next Sunday, is a member of the faculty of the University of Michigan where she had studied previously with Palmer Christian.

Her program will consist of Handel's Concerto in F major, two works by Jean Langlais, Miniature (1958) and Epilogue, for modal soul; J.S Bach's Prelude and Fugue in D major; Variations on a Recitative, Op. 40, by Arnold Schoenberg; Scherzo, Op. 2, by Maurice Durufle; and Flourish and Fugue (1957) by John Cook.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Christian Science
Monitor (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 174,850
OCT 11 1963

Symphony Hall organ concerts

Six Symphony Hall organ concerts will be given this season. They will open Nov. 10 with Marilyn Mason at the console, and are presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Subsequent artists to be heard will be Fernando Germani from Italy, Dec. 8; John Ferris of Harvard University, Jan. 26; Robert Lloyd Town, winner of the Young Artist Competition co-sponsored by Boston Symphony and the Boston Chapter of the American Guild of Organists, Feb. 16; John Weaver March 1; E. Power Biggs, April 5.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 465,653
DEC 8 1963

Symphony Hall Organ Has Own Audiences

One man, standing on the stage of Symphony Hall, in front of 104 Boston Symphony Orchestra musicians, can draw from them, seemingly, every possible variety of tone, from a wall-shaking torrent to a singing whisper.

But also, one man seated alone tonight on the same stage, can produce a kaleidoscope of tone in all degrees of power or delicacy. This man would be playing the great Symphony Hall organ of 4800 pipes, in one of the annual series of organ recitals which four years ago began attracting a new audience to Symphony Hall.

The president of the orchestra's trustees, Henry B. Cabot, had said: "We have a wonderful organ, very elaborate and very costly, which is heard on a few scattered occasions—generally in combination with the orchestra. Why not let the public hear what it really can do, in a whole series of organ concerts?"

As an experiment, the plan was inaugurated in Jan. 1961. Four one-hour recitals by noted organists were presented on Sunday a t6 o'clock. So well did the venture succeed, that this year six recitals were announced. The second one, by the European soloist, Fernando Germani, takes place tonight.

Composers of symphonies and the development of the requisite orchestra came late upon the musical scene—in the late 1700's—whereas music for the organ had been composed as early as 1325.

The oldest master represented is Girolamo Frescobaldi, born 102 years before Johann Sebastian Bach, who studied his works. This influence may be traced in some of Bach's music in this series. Running down the list chronologically, we find that these additional early masters of organ composition will be heard:

Dietrich Buxtehude. Johann Sebastian Bach traveled 200 miles on foot, from Arnstadt to Luebeck, in 1705, to hear him play. As virtuoso organist and composer, Buxtehude left strong influence on Bach.

George Frideric Handel. As organ virtuoso he was a close rival to his contemporary, J. S. Bach, whom he never met. He wrote 18 organ concertos.

Johann Sebastian Bach. Rivaling Handel as greatest organ virtuoso of his time, he is rated by various authorities as the greatest composer of all times.

Louis-Claude Daquin. Celebrated French organist and composer for organ and clavichord.

Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart. Perhaps the greatest pianist of his day, he also played the violin and organ with distinction.

Soloists for this season's recitals on the Symphony Hall organ are Marilyn Mason, Fernando Germani, John Ferris, Robert Town, John Weaver, and E. Power Biggs.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Herald
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 283,819
FEB 16 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Christian Science
Monitor (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 174,850
FEB 19 1964

DIAPASON
CHICAGO, ILL.
MONNTHLY 22,500
MAR 1964

Third Boston Competition

The Boston Chapter announces its third annual Young Artists' competition, sponsored in collaboration with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The contest carries an award of $500 as well as an appearance in the Symphony Hall organ recital series in the 1964-65 season.

The competition is open to organists living or working in New England, New York, New Jersey or Pennsylvania. Applicants must be between 25 and 35 as of the March 31 deadline for initial eliminations.

Write: Jack Fisher, Emmanuel Church, 15 Newbury St. Boston 02116.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 465,653
OCT 13 1963

Organists

Marilyn Mason of the University of Michigan music faculty will give the opening recital in the Symphony Hall Organ Series Sunday, Nov. 10.

The series was initiated four years ago at the suggestion of Henry B. Cabot, president of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Trustees, to enable the public to hear the concert organ in Symphony Hall. This season there will be six recitals rather than four as in the past.

Fernando Germani, Italian organist, will be heard in the second concert of the series on Dec. 8. John Ferris, organist and choirmaster at Harvard University, will be heard on Jan. 26; and Robert Lloyd Town, winner of the Young Artists Competition co-sponsored by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Boston Chapter of the American Guild of Organists, will give a recital on Feb. 16. On March 1 the young organist John Weaver will make his first Symphony Hall appearance. The series will conclude on Apr. 15 with a recital by E. Power Biggs.

The concerts will be held on Sundays at 6 p.m. without intermission. Season tickets for the series of six recitals are available at the Symphony Hall Box Office. Single concert admission will be available. All seats are unreserved.

Mason at console

By William Saunders

Opening the fourth season of Symphony Hall organ concerts, Marilyn Mason displayed that virtuoso flair that puts the frosting on the musical cake. It is the ability to set forth each composition in its best light, and it lends excitement even to the more subdued works.

Miss Mason proved that skipping around the centuries can provide a refreshing, absorbing program. A crisp, starched traversal of Handel's Concerto in F was followed by the plaintive, nostalgic "Miniature" by Jean Langlais, composed in 1958. The same composer's "Epilogue" offered a dazzling display of pedal acrobatics.

Bach's spirited Prelude and Fugue in D, which followed, was precise and carefully phrased; the bold modulations and grinding dissonances were not overly dramatized.

Miss Mason next presented an incisive performance of Arnold Schoenberg's haunting and truculent "Variations on a Recitative." Though based on a 12-tone theme, the work's harmonic structure centers around D minor. Imaginative registrations clarified the work's design and underlined its remarkable workmanship.

Miss Mason wove a tuneful and intricate web of sound in the Scherzo by Maurice Durufle—like Langlais, a pupil of Paul Dukas. The recital, except for encores, closed with the pomp and pageantry of "Flourish and Fugue" by John Cook, organist of Boston's Church of the Advent.

According to the printed program, we shall have to wait at least another year to hear any of the sonatas of Hindemith and Mendelssohn. Nonetheless, these Symphony Hall concerts are a milestone in the new growth of interest in "Bach's royal instrument." Those who pass up the opportunity to hear the entire series (perhaps because some of the recitalists are unfamiliar to them) miss some of the best playing.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Christian Science
Monitor (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 174,850
NOV 4 1963

Mason at console

Marilyn Mason will give an organ recital at Symphony Hall on Sunday evening, Nov. 10, at 6 o'clock, presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Herald 12/11/63

Music

Symphony Organ Series Opened by Miss Mason

By McLAREN HARRIS

In the opening recital of the Symphony Hall organ series last night, Marilyn Mason's performance identified her as a member of a certain classic strain of organists.

This is not an indication of her selection of music, which ranged from Bach to the present, or of any restricted temperament; rather, Miss Mason's judicious choice of registration and dynamics revealed a well-conceived and finely wrought balance between emotion and idealism.

Where the music does not call for a cascading curtain of sound, Miss Mason's registrations tend toward conservatism. For the tuttis and solos of Handel's F major Concerto, Op. 4, No. 5 she provided tasteful contrasts, never startling, and set a flute above mellowed strings in the Siciliana. Bach's Prelude and Fugue in D major displayed its bombard pedals, but the organist still avoided great pyramids of sound, picking up the notes to give the counterpoint a clear outline.

But conservatism is not Miss Mason's only device. In the Variations on a Recitative, Op. 40 of Arnold Schoenberg, she explored the possibilities of timbre from contras to clarinos—fortunately, not all at once. Yet the ten variations remain classic (for Schoenberg): the composer largely abandoned functional harmonic progression but not harmony altogether, as melodic lines and chordal combinations retain their points points of restlessness and resolution.

And lest anyone continue to believe that a classicist lacks a virtuoso's touch, be assured that Miss Mason is at no loss for technique, as the Bach fugue and Langlais' "Epilogue" for pedal solo amply proved.

The organist concluded the regular program with Maurice Durufle's Scherzo, Op. 2, which borders on up-dated impressionism, and with the fanfares and squared harmonies of John Cook's "Flourish and Fugue," the latter composer being in attendance. It was a welcome recital, exhibiting Symphony's organ not in frightening aspect, but in most musical perspective.

The Program

Marilyn Mason, organist, gave the first recital of this season's Symphony Hall organ concerts last night. The program consisted of works of Handel, Langlais, Bach Schoenberg, Durufle and John Cook.

Herald 12/11/63

Germani Recitalist In 2d Organ Concert

Fernando Germani, organ professor and teacher of organ composition at the State Conservatory of Music in Rome and member of the St. Cecilia Academy of Music, will give the second program of the 1963-64 Symphony Hall Organ Concert Series next Sunday at six p.m. in Symphony Hall.

Mr. Germani will open the program with J. S. Bach's Toccata, Adagio and Fugue in C Major. This will be followed by Louis-Claude Daquin's "Noel en Musette en Dialogue" and "Pageant" by Leo Sowerby. Mr. Germani will continue with "Variations sur un vieux Noel" by Marcel Dupre and conclude the program with Max Reger's Fantasia Op. 52, No. 3 on the Chorale "Halleluja, Gott zu loben."

Organist 12/1/63

Fernando Germani, organ professor and teacher of organ composition at the State Conservatory of Music in Rome and member of the St. Cecilia Academy of Music, will give the second program of the 1963-'64 Symphony Hall Organ Concert series next Sunday, Dec. 8, at 6 p.m. in Symphony Hall.

The recitalist will open the program with J. S. Bach's Toccata, Adagio and Fugue in C Major. This will be followed by Louis-Claude Daquin's "Noel en Musette en Dialogue" and "Pageant" by Leo Sowerby. Germani will continue with "Variations sur un vieux Noel" by Marcel Dupre and conclude the program with Max Reger's Fantasia Op. 52, No. 3 on the Chorale "Halleluja, Gott zu loben."

CSM 12/9/63

Germani at console

By William Saunders

It was apparent from Fernando Germani's organ recital at Symphony Hall Sunday evening that one reason for his worldwide reputation is his mastery of musical architecture.

The music does not ramble. Dottor Germani constructs each work, brick upon brick, with a sure grasp of its overall design.

Bach's Toccata, Adagio, and Fugue in C, which opened the program, comprises many sections varying in texture, rhythm, and mood. Yet it was projected as a logical whole, emphasizing its long lines, its balance and proportion.

* * *

A richly ornamented Noël by Daquin likewise flowed along with a pleasing sense of direction. Dottor Germani's sensitive blending of the organ's varied hues clarified the work's structure.

Sowerby's "Pageant" provided a brilliant display of technical fireworks. Essentially a 10-minute pedal cadenza, it boasts a heroic theme and powerful rhythms.

Again, in Dupré's "Variations on an Old Noël," Dottor Germani made the listener aware that a wealth of ideas had been knitted into a consistent whole by the composer's adroit craftsmanship. The audience was swept along with the increasing momentum.

Reger's massive Fantasia on the Chorale "Halleluja, Gott zu loben" is constructed on a sturdy frame and bound together by a mood of affirmation. Impetuous and turbulent, it grew with increasing intensity to a triumphant climax.

* * *

This Italian organist has a keen sense of style and mood. The Bach Toccata was joyous flourish, the Fugue animated and unconstrained. Daquin's Noël came forth meditative and tender; Dupré's Variations were spun like gossamer.

On the debit side, Dottor Germani occasionally paced his Bach a shade too fast for the details to be clear.

In his encores — another Daquin Noël and Bach's Passacaglia and Fugue in C minor — the same insight into musical structure molded the individual phrases into a coherent whole.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Sunday Herald
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 283,819

JAN 19 1964

John Ferris Is Next in Organ Series

John Ferris, Harvard University organist and choirmaster, will give the next Symphony Hall organ concert on Sunday, Jan. 26, at 6 p. m. This will be Mr. Ferris' second appearance on the series of organ recitals, presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the fourth season.

Mr. Ferris will begin with two 17th century composers playing the "Grand Jeux," of Pierre du Mage and three works by Francois Couperin; "Recit de Cornet," "Benedictus," and "Dialogues sur les Grands Jeux" from the Mass for Parishes. The program will continue with Mozart's Fantaisie in F minor, K. 608, commissioned for performance on a mechanical organ actuated by a clock.

Joining Mr. Ferris for a performance of Daniel Pinkham's Concertante for Organ, Celesta and Percussion will be Everett Firth, timpani; Martin Hoherman, celesta; and Charles Smith, percussion. Mr. Firth will assist Mr. Ferris in the final work, Henk Badings' Passacaglia for Timpani and Organ. Before the Badings, Mr. Ferris will play the Cesar Franck Chorale in E major.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Sunday Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 465,653

JAN 12 1964

New Organ Work At Symphony Hall

John Ferris, Harvard University organist and choirmaster, will give the next Symphony Hall Organ Concert on Jan. 26, at 6 p.m. This will be Ferris' second appearance on the series of organ recitals which are being presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the fourth season.

The recitalist will begin with two 17th century composers who were forerunners of J. S. Bach, playing the "Grand Jeu," of iPerre du Mage and three works by Francois Couperin: "Recit de Cornet," "Benedictus," and "Dialogues sur les Grands Jeux" from the Mass for Parishes. The program will continue with Mozart's Fantaisie in F minor, K. 608, which was commissioned for performance on a mechanical organ activated by a clock.

Three members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will join Ferris for a performance of Daniel Pinkham's Concertante for Organ, Celesta and Percussion, composed in 1962 and commissioned by the Boston Chapter of the American Guild of Organists. The instrumentalists will be Everett Firth, timpani; Martin Hoherman, celesta; and Charles Smith, percussion. Firth will also assist Ferris in the final work on the program, Henk Badings' Passacaglia for Timpani and Organ. Before the Badings composition Ferris will play the Cesar Franck Chorale in E major.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Record-American (m) (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 531,565

JAN 20 1964

FERRIS ORGAN CONCERT

John Ferris, Harvard University organist and choirmaster, will give the next Symphony Hall Organ Concert on Sunday, Jan. 26, at 6 p. m. This will be Mr. Ferris' second appearance on the series of organ recitals which are being presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the fourth season. BSO members will assist in the program.

BMI
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY-CIRC. N. AVAIL.

FEB 1964

PINKHAM DAY IN BOSTON

Composer DANIEL PINKHAM heard his works performed at four different events on the same day in Greater Boston.

Three members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra joined organist John Ferris in the first performance of Pinkham's Concertante for Organ, Celesta and Percussion at Symphony Hall. The work, composed in 1962, was commissioned by the Boston Chapter of the American Guild of Organists.

Ferris concluded the concert with HENK BADINGS' Passacaglia for Timpani and Organ. He was assisted by timpanist Everett Firth, with Martin Hoherman (celesta) and Charles Smith (percussion).

Also on this date: Mr. Pinkham's Motet No. 3 was performed by the King's Chapel Choir of Greater Boston on the CBS radio network program, Church of the Air; his Wedding Cantata was sung by the Old South Church Choir; and a Gardner Museum recital, given by Helen Keaney, harpsichordist, included the composer's Partita for Harpsichord.

Herald 11/11/63

Music

Symphony Organ Series Opened by Miss Mason

By McLAREN HARRIS

In the opening recital of the Symphony Hall organ series last night, Marilyn Mason's performance identified her as a member of a certain classic strain of organists.

This is not an indication of her selection of music, which ranged from Bach to the present, or of any restricted temperament; rather, Miss Mason's judicious choice of registration and dynamics revealed a well-conceived and finely wrought balance between emotion and idealism.

Where the music does not call for a cascading curtain of sound, Miss Mason's registrations tend toward conservatism. For the tutti and solos of Handel's F major Concerto, Op. 4, No. 5 she provided tasteful contrasts, never startling, and set a flute above mellowed strings in the Siciliana. Bach's Prelude and Fugue in D major displayed its bombard pedals, but the organist still avoided great pyramids of sound, picking up the notes to give the counterpoint a clear outline.

But conservatism is not Miss Mason's only device. In the Variations on a Recitative, Op. 40 of Arnold Schoenberg, she explored the possibilities of timbre from contras to clarinos—fortunately, not all at once. Yet the ten variations remain classic (for Schoenberg): the composer largely abandoned functional harmonic progression but not harmony altogether, as melodic lines and chordal combinations retain their points points of restlessness and resolution.

And lest anyone continue to believe that a classicist lacks a virtuoso's touch, be assured that Miss Mason is at no loss for technique, as the Bach fugue and Langlais' "Epilogue" for pedal solo amply proved.

The organist concluded the regular program with Maurice Durufle's Scherzo, Op. 2, which borders on up-dated impressionism, and with the fanfares and squared harmonies of John Cook's "Flourish and Fugue," the latter composer being in attendance. It was a welcome recital, exhibiting Symphony's organ not in frightening aspect, but in most musical perspective.

The Program

Marilyn Mason, organist, gave the first recital of this season's Symphony Hall organ concerts last night. The program consisted of works of Handel, Langlais, Bach Schoenberg, Durufle and John Cook.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Sunday Herald
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 283,819

JAN 19 1964

John Ferris Is Next in Organ Series

John Ferris, Harvard University organist and choirmaster, will give the next Symphony Hall organ concert on Sunday, Jan. 26, at 6 p. m. This will be Mr. Ferris' second appearance on the series of organ recitals, presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the fourth season.

Mr. Ferris will begin with two 17th century composers playing the "Grand Jeux." of Pierre du Mage and three works by Francois Couperin; "Recit de Cornet," "Benedictus," and "Dialogues sur les Grands Jeux" from the Mass for Parishes. The program will continue with Mozart's Fantaisie in F minor, K. 608, commissioned for performance on a mechanical organ actuated by a clock.

Joining Mr. Ferris for a performance of Daniel Pinkham's Concertante for Organ, Celesta and Percussion will be Everett Firth, timpani; Martin Hoherman, celesta; and Charles Smith, percussion. Mr. Firth will assist Mr. Ferris in the final work, Henk Badings' Passacaglia for Timpani and Organ. Before the Badings, Mr. Ferris will play the Cesar Franck Chorale in E major.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Sunday Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 465,653

JAN 12 1964

New Organ Work At Symphony Hall

John Ferris, Harvard University organist and choirmaster, will give the next Symphony Hall Organ Concert on Jan. 26, at 6 p.m. This will be Ferris' second appearance on the series of organ recitals which are being presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the fourth season.

The recitalist will begin with two 17th century composers who were forerunners of J. S. Bach, playing the "Grand Jeu," of iPerre du Mage and three works by Francois Couperin: "Recit de Cornet," "Benedictus," and "Dialogues sur les Grands Jeux" from the Mass for Parishes. The program will continue with Mozart's Fantaisie in F minor, K. 608, which was commissioned for performance on a mechanical organ activated by a clock.

Three members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will join Ferris for a performance of Daniel Pinkham's Concertante for Organ, Celesta and Percussion, composed in 1962 and commissioned by the Boston Chapter of the American Guild of Organists. The instrumentalists will be Everett Firth, timpani; Martin Hoherman, celesta; and Charles Smith, percussion. Firth will also assist Ferris in the final work on the program, Henk Badings' Passacaglia for Timpani and Organ. Before the Badings composition Ferris will play the Cesar Franck Chorale in E major.

Herald 12/11/63

Germani Recitalist In 2d Organ Concert

Fernando Germani, organ professor and teacher of organ composition at the State Conservatory of Music in Rome and member of the St. Cecilia Academy of Music, will give the second program of the 1963-64 Symphony Hall Organ Concert Series next Sunday at six p.m. in Symphony Hall.

Mr. Germani will open the program with J. S. Bach's Toccata, Adagio and Fugue in C Major. This will be followed by Louis Claude Daquin's "Noel en Musette en Dialogue" and "Pageant" by Leo Sowerby. Mr. Germani will continue with "Variations sur un vieux Noel" by Marcel Dupre and conclude the program with Max Reger's Fantasia Op. 52, No. 3 on the Chorale "Halleluja, Gott zu loben."

Germani at console

By William Saunders

It was apparent from Fernando Germani's organ recital at Symphony Hall Sunday evening that one reason for his worldwide reputation is his mastery of musical architecture.

The music does not ramble. Dottor Germani constructs each work, brick upon brick, with a sure grasp of its overall design.

Bach's Toccata, Adagio, and Fugue in C, which opened the program, comprises many sections varying in texture, rhythm, and mood. Yet it was projected as a logical whole, emphasizing its long lines, its balance and proportion.

A richly ornamented Noël by Daquin likewise flowed along with a pleasing sense of direction. Dottor Germani's sensitive blending of the organ's varied hues clarified the work's structure.

Sowerby's "Pageant" provided a brilliant display of technical fireworks. Essentially a 10-minute pedal cadenza, it boasts a heroic theme and powerful rhythms.

Again, in Dupré's "Variations on an Old Noël," Dottor Germani made the listener aware that a wealth of ideas had been knitted into a consistent whole by the composer's adroit craftsmanship. The audience was swept along with the increasing momentum.

Reger's massive Fantasia on the Chorale "Halleluja, Gott zu loben" is constructed on a sturdy frame and bound together by a mood of affirmation. Impetuous and turbulent, it grew with increasing intensity to a triumphant climax.

This Italian organist has a keen sense of style and mood. The Bach Toccata was joyous flourish, the Fugue animated and unconstrained. Daquin's Noël came forth meditative and tender; Dupré's Variations were spun like gossamer.

On the debit side, Dottor Germani occasionally paced his Bach a shade too fast for the details to be clear.

In his encores — another Daquin Noël and Bach's Passacaglia and Fugue in C minor — the same insight into musical structure molded the individual phrases into a coherent whole.

Organist 12/11/63

Fernando Germani, organ professor and teacher of organ composition at the State Conservatory of Music in Rome and member of the St. Cecilia Academy of Music, will give the second program of the 1963-'64 Symphony Hall Organ Concert series next Sunday, Dec. 8, at 6 p.m. in Symphony Hall.

The recitalist will open the program with J. S. Bach's Toccata, Adagio and Fugue in C Major. This will be followed by Louis-Claude Daquin's "Noel en Musette en Dialogue" and "Pageant" by Leo Sowerby. Germani will continue with "Variations sur un vieux Noel" by Marcel Dupre and conclude the program with Max Reger's Fantasia Op. 52, No. 3 on the Chorale "Halleluja, Gott zu loben."

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Record-American (m) (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 531,565

JAN 20 1964

FERRIS ORGAN CONCERT

John Ferris, Harvard University organist and choirmaster, will give the next Symphony Hall Organ Concert on Sunday, Jan. 26, at 6 p. m. This will be Mr. Ferris' second appearance on the series of organ recitals which are being presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the fourth season. BSO members will assist in the program.

BMI
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY-CIRC. N. AVAIL.

FEB 1964

PINKHAM DAY IN BOSTON

Composer DANIEL PINKHAM heard his works performed at four different events on the same day in Greater Boston.

Three members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra joined organist John Ferris in the first performance of Pinkham's Concertante for Organ, Celesta and Percussion at Symphony Hall. The work, composed in 1962, was commissioned by the Boston Chapter of the American Guild of Organists.

Ferris concluded the concert with HENK BADINGS' Passacaglia for Timpani and Organ. He was assisted by timpanist Everett Firth, with Martin Hoherman (celesta) and Charles Smith (percussion).

Also on this date: Mr. Pinkham's Motet No. 3 was performed by the King's Chapel Choir of Greater Boston on the CBS radio network program, Church of the Air; his Wedding Cantata was sung by the Old South Church Choir; and a Gardner Museum recital, given by Helen Keaney, harpsichordist, included the composer's Partita for Harpsichord.

172

THE CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR, MONDAY, JA

1/27/64

Pinkham's new piece

By William Saunders

Sunday evening's Symphony Hall organ concert by John Ferris featured two fresh and stimulating contemporary works.

Daniel Pinkham's Concertante for Organ, Celesta, and Percussion proved to be a forward-looking piece brimming with lively invention. Composed in 1962 under a commission from the Boston Chapter, American Guild of Organists, it assigns distinctive melodic and rhythmic material to the various instruments, while a prevailing mood knits together each of its sections.

By turns haunting, witty, and plaintive, it is propelled by powerful rhythms to gripping climaxes. The work has a patrician cast and is likable at first hearing. With the composer conducting, Martin Hoherman, Everett Beal, and Charles Smith played, respectively, the celesta, timpani, and percussion with singleness of purpose and mutual understanding.

* * *

The second contemporary work, a Passacaglia for Timpani and Organ by the Dutchman Henk Badings, was more angular and aggressive. Its rhythmic tension churned up cascades of grinding dissonances. It is the effort of a distinct musical personality, though its sound and fury left this listener impressed rather than deeply moved.

Mr. Beal took in stride the demands imposed on a timpanist by the 12-tone idiom.

* * *

Mr. Ferris opened the program with an incisive performance of "Grand Jeu" by du Mage. He projected a poetic mood in serene, contemplative excerpts from Couperin's Mass for Parishes. Mozart's vehement Fantasia in F minor (K. 608) was played with a romantic brio that generated intense emotional heat, but at the expense of the work's breadth and grandeur.

Franck's Chorale in E major was infused with suppleness and grace, growing from a broad, calm opening to a triumphant, affirmative conclusion.

Mr. Ferris, organist of Harvard University, demonstrated the ability to discern and communicate the feelings of a wide range of composers. His virtuosity was always within the bounds of good taste; and as he played, the listener was conscious not of the performer, but of the music's meaning.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Sunday Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 465,653

FEB 2 1964

Organist Robert Town

The Symphony Hall organ concerts will present Robert Town in recital on Sunday, Feb. 16. Town was the winner of the 1963 Young Artists Competition, sponsored by the Boston chapter of the American Guild of Organists with the cooperation of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The annual competition, which was begun in 1962, is designed to help the young professional organist between the age of 25 and 35 who has finished his formal training but is not yet established in his field. The Boston competition is open to organists whose residential or professional address is in the New England states, New York or New Jersey. Two eliminations take place before the final decision, and the finalists appear in public concert before the Boston chapter of the A.G.O. in the Spring. In addition to to a cash prize which is contributed by the A.G.O. and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the winner of the Boston Young Artists Competition presents an organ recital in the following season of Symphony Hall organ concerts.

Town was a graduate student at Syracuse University when he entered the competition. He is now engaged in doctoral studies at the University of Michigan with Marilyn Mason, who was heard in the Symphony Hall organ concert of Nov. 10, 1963, and he holds positions at St. John's Episcopal Church in Plymouth, Mich., and at Eastern Michigan University. He has given recitals in New York, Pennsylvania, Maryland, Connecticut, Massachusetts, Michigan, and Canada.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Herald (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 178,553

MAR 20 1964

Symphony Members To Assist Organist

Members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will assist E. Power Biggs in his Symphony Hall organ recital on Sunday, April 5, in a program placing emphasis on early masters. Louis Speyer, retiring from the orchestra at season's end, will be soloist with Mr. Biggs in Jan Koetsier's Partita for English Horn and Organ, the sole contemporary work on the program. Trumpeters Armando Ghitalla and Andre Come will be heard in Frescobaldi's "Canzona Prima," Purcell's Fanfare in C major and Trumpet Tune, "Cebell," and Telemann's overture from "Der getreue Musikmesiter." Everett Firth, timpanist, will join the group for Purcell's trumpet tune, "Bonduca," and the Heroic Music from Telemann's opera, "Melante."

CSM Arts—Entertainment

3/2/64

Symmetry and logic

Weaver at console

By William Saunders

In Sunday evening's Symphony Hall organ concert, the audience was made very much aware of John Weaver's polished technique and mature sense of style.

A genial and melodious allegro from Handel's Concerto No. 4 in F included a cadenza by Mr. Weaver that kept within the bounds of Handel's style, and was projected with crisp precision. Then a sparkling allegro from Bach's Trio Sonata No. 5—a hard nut to crack technically—flowed along with unflagging pulse, its interlacing strands of polyphony being clearly set forth.

Mr. Weaver drew on the instrument's romantic hues for Bach's "Jesu, Joy of Man's Desiring"—a bold gesture in this age of fastidious tracker organs—and he infused the work with noticeable suppleness and grace. At the same time, Bach's Fugue in E flat grew from a broad, calm opening to a heroic climax. Mr. Weaver successfully underlined the symmetry and logic of the Fugue's architecture.

* * *

Next came a sharply etched performance of Liszt's Prelude and Fugue on B.A.C.H. With his daring harmonies and chromatic declamations, Liszt brought more drama to organ literature than it had known since Bach's time. Indeed, the Fugue on B.A.C.H. is so chromatic in spots as to be almost atonal. And Mr. Weaver conveyed to us all its mystery and surging grandeur.

A deft traversal of Bossi's vivacious "Giga" was followed by Messiaen's "Serene Alleluias" from "The Ascension." In this highly original work, Messiaen weaves haunting melodies and intricate rhythms into a fascinating labyrinth of sound.

* * *

The scheduled program closed with Mr. Weaver's own Toccata—a fresh, jubilant work whose wit is reminiscent of Percy Grainger.

As his second encore Mr. Weaver offered a buoyant reading of Bach's high-spirited Fugue in D major. It swept toward its climax with increasing intensity, and everyone breathed a sigh of relief after that final challenging scamper up the pedal board.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Sunday Herald
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 283,819

MAR 29 1964

Biggs Organ Concert Is Next Sunday

E. Power Biggs' Symphony Hall Organ Concert next Sunday at 6 p.m., which will consist predominantly of the music of early masters, will also place emphasis on music for trumpet and organ, in some instances combined with timpani. The one contemporary work, by the Dutch composer Jan Koetsier, is for English Horn and Organ. Members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will assist Mr. Biggs in these works.

Louis Speyer, who retires this season from the orchestra, will be soloist with Mr. Biggs in Koetsier's Partita for English Horn and Organ, written in 1958.

Armando Ghitalla and Andre Come, trumpeters, will be heard in four works: Frescobaldi's "Canzona Prima"; Purcell's Fanfare in C major, and Trumpet Tune, "Cebell"; and Telemann's Overture from "Der getreue Musikmeister." Everett Firth, timpanist, will join Messrs. Briggs, Ghitalla and Come in Purcell's Trumpet Tune, "Bonduca" and the Heroic Music from Telemann's opera "Melante."

Roger Voisin, principal trumpet of the orchestra, and his young son Peter will appear with Mr. Biggs in a trumpet duet, "My Spirit Be Joyful," from J. S. Bach's Easter Cantata, No. 146.

This evening at 6 E. Power Biggs will be guest artist in a Symphony Hall Organ Recital. His one-hour program, entirely of the early masters with one exception, will place emphasis on music for organ, trumpets and timpani, with assisting artists Armando Ghitalla, Andre Come, Roger Voisin and Everett Firth of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Voisin's son Peter who will join him in a trumpet duet. One of the interesting highlights will be Jan Koetsier's Partita for the rare combination of English Horn and organ, with soloist Louis Speyer, who is retiring as the orchestra's English horn player at the end of this season after 46 years' service. Composed in 1958, the work received its U.S. premiere by Biggs and Speyer over the CBS Radio Network.

The final concerts of the Monday Evening and Tuesday Evening series will take place this week, both at 8:30. At each program Leinsdorf will conduct the orchestra in Beethoven's Overture to "Fidelio," the Symphony No. 7 of Beethoven and Richard Strauss' "Also sprach Zarathustra."

GLOBE APR 5th 1964

MUSIC

Biggs Organ, Pealing Brass Fitting Close to Concert Series

By McLAREN HARRIS

E. Power Biggs' recital last night heralded the close of this season's original Symphony Hall Organ Concerts schedule (though Robert Town's recital was postponed from Feb. 16 to April 19)—almost literally a herald, for the bulk of the program was given to music for organ and trumpets.

One Major Work

Indeed, the concert was far from a true solo recital, for only one of the four works for organ alone was of major consequence: Mozart's Prelude and Fugue in C minor. As for the other three, Frescobaldi's D minor Toccata spins some technical flourishes over sustained pedals, Purcell's "Ayre for Organ" served as a songful interlude between two trumpet tunes, and Mozart's Adagio and Rondo for a Glass Armonica was most interesting when one remembers the now-extinct instrument — a row of rotating glass cones, sounded by the fingertips; in terms of a serious effort, its composition probably required less time than the performance.

Mr. Biggs applied the conservative touch to registration for these works, turning to flutes and krummhorns for the solo lines while avoiding strings; meters were kept in tight focus and dynamic variation evolved from linear combinations.

Symphony member Louis Speyer assisted in Dutch composer Jan Koetsier's Partita for English Horn and Organ (1958), five movements in conventional harmonic idiom, one for organ solo. Guided expertly by Mr. Speyer, the English horn progressed through a variety of activity, now agile, now sustained, and concluded by intoning the chorale, "Wie leuchtet schoen der Morgenstern," over more energetic organ lines.

Trumpets held forth in the remaining works. Roger Voisin and his young son Peter joined Mr. Biggs for a duet from Bach's Cantata 146, and a happy combination it was in terms of strength, tone and technique; so it goes for the Voisins—like grandfather, like father, like son.

Brilliant Trumpets

Trumpeters Armando Ghitalla and Andre Come provided brilliance for Frescobaldi's Canzona Prima and a Purcell fanfare, plus two trumpet tunes, "Bonduca" and "Cebell," with timpanist Everett Firth, and the organ-brass-percussion quartet finished with Telemann's overture to "Der getreue Musikmeister." The latter is a series of instructional examples illustrating musical traits of heroism: honor, charm, love, vigilance and others — even generosity. Alternating bombast with tenderness, it served up a vigorous conclusion to a program containing little hard core for the organ, but drawing a cordial response nonetheless.

The Program

E. Power Biggs organist, presented a recital last night in the Symphony Hall Organ Concerts series, assisted by Armand Ghitalia, Andre Come, Roger Voisin and Peter, Voisin, trumpets, Louis Speyer English horn, and Everett Firth, timpanist. The program consisted of works by Frescobaldi, Purcell, Bach, Mozart, Koetsier and Telemann.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Sunday Herald
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 283,819

MAR 8 1964

Robert Taylor's Notes

Symphony Hall Organ Recitals Of Double Value

By ROBERT TAYLOR

The unreserved Symphony Hall organ recitals at a dollar-and-a-half constitute one of the best musical values in town. These concerts have been exceedingly popular and have served to make widely-known an instrument employed sporadically during the regular subscription season.

(The next in a series of six is a program — Frescobaldi, Purcell, J. S. Bach, Mozart, Jan Koetsier, Telemann —by E. Power Biggs on Sunday, April 5.)

Organ building is such an intricate and highly-structured activity that even its professionals are often at odds. Symphony Hall's organ, relatively new, was designed by G. Donald Harrison and installed under the supervision of Joseph S. Whiteford in the summer of 1949.

It was commissioned by the Trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for a coincident anniversary of the bicentennial of the death of Johann Sebastian Bach and the 50th year of the Hall itself.

The Aeolian-Skinner firm of Boston, who built the organ, strove for an all-round instrument, eclectic in character, embodying features of 19th Century English and French organ building as well as of the Middle European baroque.

IN SHORT, the Symphony Hall Aeolian-Skinner organ is adaptable to virtually every condition from the stops and voicing of the pre-Bach era, through the current literature.

The advantages of the installation include a frontal location across the auditorium (and, not least, a brilliant architectural feature of the Hall), while the 4,802 pipes and 67 stops — according to Johnson's "Symphony Hall-Boston," — are "All adjustable at the console either by hand, by eight combination pistons for each department of the organ, or by 12 general pistons controlling the entire instrumental resources."

This kind of instrument is known as "American Classic," to distinguish it from the "Classic" organ for which Bach wrote. And it evolved in response to the ideas of Albert Schweitzer and other organ reformers, who felt that the 'modern' organ (which is to say, the organ of the late romantic period, the years of the fin-de-siecle) had lost much of its quality through orchestral mimicry.

"We are all familiar with the dense symphonic sound of the organs in movie houses, which rose from the pit in a crescendo of thunder and convulsion, with an organist whose dreams of glory, apparently, included being The Phantom of the Opera.

DEBATES BETWEEN organ-builders once revolved around 'purity' or lack of it, what was meant by 'classic" or 'romantic' in terms of tonal palette, and the 'real' nature of the instrument.

The latest technical wrinkle and the return to older principles inspire a continuous dialogue in the field, which has produced impressive results. The current prime topic among organists and the builders of organs involves once again the quintessential concept of what an organ should be.

A correspondent, Frank W. Kimball of Dedham, has written to us about the issue, concerning some of Metropolitan Boston's chief organs:

"Probably you are aware of the controversy in the pipe organ building trade and art, between those who use the electro-pneumatic action and those who favor direct (technically 'tracker') connection between keys and pipes. In Boston, this has boiled over, I understand, because of the replacement of the Aeolian-Skinner electro-pneumatic organ in The Harvard Memorial Church with a tracker by Fisk of Gloucester, an ardent tracker-only builder.

"There is considerable shaking of heads among Boston organists, as a result. The new organ at King's Chapel, by Fisk, is on the tracker side; we have a Casavant electro-pneumatic in Marsh Chapel at Boston University."

TO THE PUBLIC this may seem an abstruse point; but among Boston organists, it is a divisive and passionate question. Personally, we lean toward the electro-pneumatic because of past favorable experience with the instruments of Aeolian-Skinner, particularly the Symphony Hall organ.

On the other hand, it strikes us that the growing influence of the 'tracker' style cannot help but be beneficial, for once again we are confronted with the fundamental problem of the nature, the musical reality of organs themselves.

174

Council Of Friends

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 194,870
SEP 27 1963

Today in Society

Opening Day Reception For Friends of Symphony

By MARJORIE W. SHERMAN

A memorable part of a memorable day will be this afternoon's reception in the ancient instruments room at Symphony Hall which conductor Erich Leinsdorf is giving for the Council of Friends of the Boston Symphony to mark the symphony's 83d season opening. This year the Friday afternoon concerts begin at 1:45.

Mrs. Leinsdorf, an honorary member of the council, and Pres. Henry Cabot of the trustees and Mrs. Cabot and orchestra Mgr. Thomas Perry and Mrs. Perry also will be present to greet the council, whose chairmen are Mrs. Louis Cabot of Wenham and Mrs. Norman Cahners of Brookline.

Mr. Leinsdorf's invitation also will include council members Mrs. James Perkins of Westwood, only woman trustee of the orchestra; Mrs. Richard Higgins of Dedham, Mrs. Charles Lyman of Canton, Mrs. Irving Rabb of Newton, Mrs. Harris Fahnestock of Concord, Mrs. Robert Hopkins of Brookline, Mrs. Charles Hovey and Mrs. Charles Mason of Chestnut Hill, Mrs. Benjamin Tilghman of Cambridge, Mrs. Neil Ayer and others of the board.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Herald (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 178,553
SEP 27 1963

Reception For Friends Of Orchestra

Many social events have been planned around the opening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, today. A special treat is in store for the Council of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Erich Leinsdorf has invited members of the executive committee to a small reception immediately after the concert. It will be held in the Ancient Instruments Room at Symphony Hall.

Receiving with Mr. Leinsdorf will be Mrs. Leinsdorf, who is an honorary member of the Council. Also present will be Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees, and Mrs. Cabot, and Thomas D. Perry, manager of the orchestra, and Mrs. Perry.

Greeting Council members at their first get-together of the season will be Mrs. Louis W. Cabot of Wenham and Mrs. Norman L. Cahners of Brookline, chairmen of the Council.

Among those who have accepted Mr. Leinsdorf's invitation are Mrs. Neil Ayer, Mrs. Howard C. Dickinson and Mrs. Erick Kauders, Mrs. Benjamin G. Tilghman, Mrs. George Parson, Mrs. William Vogler, Mrs. Robert Wiese, Charles Lyman, Mrs. Roger Voisin and Mrs. Hans Kroto.

Also, Mrs. Robert M. P. Kennard, Mrs. Irving Rabb, Mrs. Harris Fahnestock, Mrs. James H. Perkins, Mrs. Richard Higgins, Mrs. Robert Hopkins, Mrs. Charles F. Hovey and Mrs. Charles E. Mason, Jr.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Herald (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 178,553
NOV 18 1963

Social Chatter

So. Shore Symphony Friends Plan Series of Activities

PARTIES GALORE are being planned by the Council of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The Council has been divided into geographical units, and plans are under way for a series of activities involving the Concert Subscribers from each area.

The first contingent to complete their arrangements are the South Shore Council Members, under the chairmanship of Mrs. G. Lincoln Dow Jr. of Duxbury. On Tuesday evening, Nov. 19, a Dutch Treat Dinner will be held in the Old Instrument Room of Symphony Hall, before the Concert that evening.

Hostesses for the evening with Mrs. Dow will be Mrs. Frank S. Christian, Mrs. Charles Devens, Mrs. Atherton Loring, Mrs. H. Whitin Brewer and Mrs. Mayo Shattuck.

The guest of honor will be E. Morton Jennings Jr., a trustee of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who will give a short talk to the group during supper. Among the guests will be Mrs. Jennings, the George C. Whitings, Mr. and Mrs. Charles G. Carleton, Mr. and Mrs. John E. Andres, the Winthrop Clarkes and Mr. and Mrs. C. L. Emerson Jr.

Others will be Mr. and Mrs. Robert Zildgian, Atherton Loring, the G. Eliot Robinsons, Mr. and Mrs. C. Russell Eddy, Mr. and Mrs. Malcolm Newell, the John Brewers, Mr. and Mrs. Frederick Lane, the Joseph Bowens, Mr. and Mrs. Donald Evans, Dr. and Mrs. Edward Woods, Dr. and Mrs. G. Richard Dickerson, Mrs. Sydney C. Graves, and the John Noxons.

Other parties planned by this enthusiastic group are a luncheon on Wednesday, Nov. 20, at the home of Mrs. Mayo Shattuck in Hingham; a morning coffee on Thursday, Nov. 21, at Mrs. H. Whitin Brewer's house in Cohasset, and tea on Dec. 4 to be given by Mrs. James B. Henry of Duxbury.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 194,870
NOV 20 1963

Through a Looking Glass :Ancient Instruments and Modern Concert Goers

Council of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra held a Dutch Treat dinner in the Ancient Instruments Room of Symphony Hall before Tuesday night's performance. (Photo by Ollie Noonan Jr.)

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 465,653
NOV 24 1963

175

Dinner at Symphony Hall

By Marjorie W. Sherman

Adding another dimension to Boston's wonderful Symphony Hall, the newly-organized Council of Friends of the B.S.O. held a Dutch Treat Dinner in the Ancient Instruments Room. Dining together before going downstairs to enjoy the second of this season's "Cambridge" concerts were music-minded neighbors from Hingham, Cohasset, Milton, Norwell and Duxbury. Orchestra Trustee E. Morton Jennings Jr. was guest of honor.

FAMILIAR FACES at the Council dinner party—Manager Thomas D. Perry Jr. of the B.S.O., Council co-chairmen Mrs. Norman Cahners (left), Mrs. Louis Cabot (right) and Mrs. Perry.

FAMED CONDUCTOR Gustav Henschel looks out on a music-minded foursome—Atherton Loring, Mrs. Frank Christian, Mrs. Charles Devens and Mr. Christian.

BENEATH THE PORTRAIT of Symphony's great founder Henry Lee Higginson, Friends of the Orchestra dine together before the "Cambridge" concert, so named because the series was held for many years in Sanders Theater.

Globe Photos by Ollie Noonan Jr.

TREASURED INSTRUMENTS of other centuries offer a unique background for the pleasant dinner party before the concert.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Clipper
DUXBURY, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 3,111
NOV 28 1963

DINNER SYMPHONY

The newly-organized Council of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra held a Dutch Treat dinner in the Ancient Instruments Room before going downstairs for the second of this season's "Cambridge" concerts. Orchestra Trustee E. Morton Jennings of Chestnut Hill and Duxbury was guest of honor, and many music-minded residents of Duxbury, Norwell, Milton, Hingham and Cohasset attended the fair. Shown on the left are, l to r, Atherton Loring, Jr., and Mrs. Frank Christian, both of Duxbury; Mrs. Charles Devens, Milton, and Frank Christian. In the rear you see a portrait of Gustav Henschel, the famed conductor.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Clipper
DUXBURY, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 3,111
NOV 21 1963

around town

Last Sunday evening, nearly 150 persons were thrilled by a Thanksgiving Concert of "Songs of Love," rendered by Paul Warren Wiggin at the Elder Brewster Parish House of the First Parish Church. The romantic Songs of Love were selections from Handel, Ralph Vaughn Williams, Bohm and Rachmaninoff. The "love of nature" songs were from Rachmaninoff, Tschaikowsky and Dvorak; the "love of God" selections from Handel, Dvorak and Clarke.

Several parties are planned by the Council of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The council is divided into geographical units, and plans are underway for a series of activities involving concert subscribers from each area. The first contingent to complete arrangements are the South Shore Council members under the chairmanship of Mrs. G. Lincoln Dow of Duxbury. On Tuesday night a Dutch Treat dinner was held in the Old Instrument Room before the concert. Hostesses for the evening with Mrs. Dow were Mrs. Frank Christian, Mrs. Charles Devens, Mrs. Atherton Loring, Jr., and Mrs. Mayo Shattuck. Guest of honor was E. Morton Jennings, Jr., of Chestnut Hill and Duxbury, a trustee of the Boston Symphony Orcestra. He spoke briefly. Among guests were Atherton Loring, the Winthrop Clarkes and the Russell Eddys. One of the parties planned is a tea to be given on Dec. 4 by Mrs. James Henry of King Caesar Rd.

There will be an antique sale from 11 a.m. to 10 p.m. on Friday and Saturday, Nov. 29-30, at the Janet Smith auction galleries, center of Kingston. On the committee from Duxbury are Mrs. William Montgomery and Mrs. George McLaughlin.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Clipper
DUXBURY, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 3,111
NOV 21 1963

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 194,870
NOV 18 1963

Today in Society

Boston Symphony Friends Plan Dutch Treat Fete

By MARJORIE W. SHERMAN

Founded to share new ideas, the Council of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra already has thought up a new and delightful addition to tomorrow's concert.

Council members from the South Shore area will have a Dutch Treat Dinner in the Ancient Instruments Room at Symphony Hall before the concert, with B.S.O. Trustee E. Morton Jennings Jr. as their dinner speaker and guest of honor.

Dining with Mr. and Mrs. Jennings will be Mr. and Mrs. Malcolm Newell, Mr. and Mrs. C. Russell Eddy, Mr. and Mrs. John Brewer, Mr. and Mrs. Donald Evans, Dr. and Mrs. Edward Woods, Dr. and Mrs. G. Richard Dickerson, Mr. and Mrs. John Andrews, Mr. and Mrs. George Whiting, Mr. and Mrs. Winthrop Clarke, Mr. and Mrs. Frederick Lane, Mr. and Mrs. Charles Carleton and many more.

Mrs. G. Lincoln Dow Jr. is chairman. Mrs. Atherton Loring, Mrs. Charles Devens, Mrs. H. Whitin Brewer, and Mrs. Mayo Shattuck are committee members.

Still other projects planned by the south area group of the Council include a luncheon on Wednesday at Mrs. Shattuck's, in Hingham, a morning coffee Thursday at Mrs. Brewer's in Cohasset, and a tea Dec. 4 at Mrs. James Henry's in Duxbury.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Herald (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 178,553
DEC 18 1963

Coffee Held By Friends Of Symphony

The Council of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra met for a morning coffee yesterday at the home of Mrs. Hugh Harwood of Waban. Hostesses who are members of the council were Mrs. Edward A. Caredis, Mrs. Stephen B. Wellington, Mrs. Lucius E. Thayer and Mrs. Miles N. Clair.

Members of the council's executive committee who were present included Mrs. Norman L. Cahners, who spoke on the activities of the Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mrs. Robert M. P. Kennard and Mrs. Samuel A. Levine.

Others present were Mrs. David O. Wicks, Mrs. Edward C. Uehlein, Mrs. Richard M. Millard, Mrs. E. D. Locke, Mrs. Watson G. Cutter, Mrs. Norman McCutcheon, Mrs. L. James Nagy, Mrs. Warren G. Reed, Mrs. Daniel M. Brande and Mrs. William Knickerbocker.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Clipper
DUXBURY, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 3,111
DEC 5 1963

WANT TO JOIN?

Mrs. Thomas Perry, wife of the manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be guest of honor at a Tea, to be given by the Council of Friends, on Dec. 10 at the home of Mrs. James B. Henry of King Caesar Rd.

Mrs. G. Lincoln Dow, Jr., is chairman for the South Shore area. Her committee includes Mrs. Atherton Loring, Mrs. C. Russell Eddy, Mrs. Frank Christian, and Mrs. James Henry.

Mrs. Perry will outline the needs of the Orchestra and will invite all to become Friends. Only one in six of the total audience of 12,900 subscribers became Friends last year.

YOU ARE INVITED

If you are interested in the future of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and in having it maintain its position as the number one orchestra in the nation, and have not received an invitation, please call Mrs. Dow at 934-2576.

TORN PAGE

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Traveler (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 164,299

JAN 9 1964

177

First Post Symphony Party Set

By PEGGY BROWN, Society Editor

Pre-Symphony luncheons are not new to Friday afternoon Symphony.

The Chilton Club had them way back when—with pre-luncheon lectures to boot.

Of late the Council of Friends of the Boston Symphony has scheduled pre-concert luncheons.

But now the Friends have scheduled some other delightful "little" events. They're post-Symphony champagne parties for subscribers. And the first of these is scheduled for this Friday at 4 p.m. in the Ancient Instruments Room.

Conductor Erich Leinsdorf and Mrs. Leinsdorf will be on hand to greet the 100-125 expected guests. Of course, Trustees President Henry B. Cabot will be there, too. And the guest artist of the day, 20-year-old pianist Lorin Hollander.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 194,870

JAN 9 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Herald (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 178,553

JAN 10 1964

Symphony Friends Luncheon Today

THE COUNCIL OF FRIENDS of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is continuing its series of get-togethers for concert subscribers. Cambridge subscribers to the Friday afternoon series will lunch together today at 12:30, in the Old Instruments Room at Symphony Hall. Co-chairmen for this group are Mrs. John C. Coolidge, Mrs. Benjamin Tilghman and Mrs. Charles Gessner.

Guests of honor at the luncheon, both of whom will speak, will be Henry Cabot, president of the Trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Rosario Mazzio, bass clarinetist and personnel manager of the orchestra.

Several events are planned for Boston subscribers. One of these, for Back Bay residents, will be a champagne reception in honor of Mr. and Mrs. Erich Leinsdorf, in the Old Instruments Room, after this afternoon's concert. Special guests at the reception will be Loren Hollander, piano soloist, and Mr. and Mrs. Henry Cabot.

More than 200 acceptances have been received for the reception. Among those planning to attend are Gov. and Mrs. Endicott Peabody, Mrs. Arthur Allen, Mr. and Mrs. Albert Creighton, Mrs. Douglas Crocker, Mrs. Alfred Donovan, Mrs. F. Murray Forbes Jr., and Mrs. Robert Steinert.

Mrs. Michael White heads the Boston group. On her committee are Mrs. Sidney Rabb, Mrs. S. Abbot Smith, Mrs. Richard Solomon, Mrs. Lewis Cabot and Mrs. Arthur Livingston.

* * *

Today in Society

Reception For Leinsdorf At Symphony Tomorrow

By MARJORIE SHERMAN

The great men who made Symphony history will look down from their gold frames in the Ancient Instrument Room at Symphony Hall tomorrow on two contemporary scenes that will add a pleasant luster to the present season.

At 12:30 p.m., Cambridge subscribers who are members of the enterprising Council Friends of the B.S.O. will lunch together in front of the glass cases holding the rare instruments that have fascinated more than one generation of symphony-goers. (Incidentally, the instruments missing are on loan to New York's I.B.M. Gallery of Arts and Sciences.)

Co-chairmen for the luncheon, at which Symphony President of Trustees Henry Cabot will speak, are Mrs. Benjamin Tilghman, Mrs. John T. Coolidge, and Mrs. Charles Gessner.

At 4 o'clock, following the regular Friday concert, Boston members of the council are giving a champagne reception for Conductor Erich Leinsdorf and his attractive wife who are bringing as their reception guest of honor Loren Hollander, piano soloist for tomorrow's concert.

Mrs. Michael White is chairman of the reception and council members of this delightful idea are Mrs. Sidney Rabb, Mrs. Louis Cabot, Mrs. Abbott Smith, Mrs. Richard Solomon, and Mrs. Arthur Livingston.

The many invited guests will include Dr. and Mrs. J. H. Means, Mr. and Mrs. Albert Creighton, Mrs. Douglas Crocker, Mr. and Mrs. F. Murray Forbes, Mrs. Alfred Donovan, Mrs. Robert Steinert, Mrs. Allen Allen.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Record-American (m) (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 531,565

JAN 13 1964

SMART SET
By ROSE WALSH

Symphony, Group Hears Leinsdorf

Erich Leindorf, brilliant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, appreciates R.C.A.'s reference to Boston Symphony as "The Aristocrat of Orchestras," but he doesn't want anyone to think that it is so aristocratic as to be beyond the reach of anyone who loves music. Mr. Leinsdorf after conducting Friday afternoon's concert, joined the Council of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at a champagne reception in the Old Instruments Room of Symphony Hall.

He talked to the group—all of whom had attended the concert—about their big project of conveying to the public the needs and objectives of the world-renowned orchestra

Mrs. Endicott Peabody, noted for her keen interest in the arts, congratulated piano soloist Loren Hollander, who had played in the afternoon program.

Others enjoying the champagne hour were Mr. and Mrs. Henry Cabot, Mrs. Norman [illegible]ers, Mrs. Charles E. [illegible]on, Mrs. Lewis Cabot, Mrs. [illegible]red Donovan, Mrs. F. Murray Forbes, Mrs. William Kus[illegible]ell, Mrs. Joseph W. Lund, Mrs. William Arthur Reilly, Mrs. James C. Roy, Mrs. H. Frederick Hagemann, Mrs. C. Hodgkinson Gordon, Mrs. Arthur Beale, Mrs. Urbain Robert and Mrs. Richard Solomon.

* * *

Leinsdorf Feted at Champagne Reception

By MARJORIE W. SHERMAN

Just like many another proper Bostonian, Governor Peabody's beauteous blue-eyed wife, Toni, spent the better part of six hours Friday in a favorite pastime—the Boston Symphony Orchestra. From the time when she sat at luncheon at the Midtown between Boston's distinguished Edward Forbes, director-emeritus of the Fogg Art Museum, and the museum's eminent present director, John Coolidge, listening to the orchestra's incomparable Harry Ellis Dickson, to nearly six o'clock at the first of a series of gala post-concert receptions honoring the B.S.O.'s marvelous Leinsdorf, Toni Peabody was a cynosure for all eyes. She talked art and music at luncheon, joining in the fervent applause for Mr. Coolidge's scholarly, excellent speech ("any institution today would feel uncivilized if it confined itself to one field") after the Bruckner and Prokofiev and joined Mr. Leinsdorf in plans for the tremendous Kennedy Memorial Service here a week from Sunday, at which the Boston Symphony will play.

Slim and soignee in her Massachusetts blue and keeping an eye on the clock so as to pick up her children on time, the governor's wife confided plans for her brand-new series of State House teas, for which lovely, antique cabinets will be moved into the Capitol to display the beautiful old state china service. She also took time to make plans with Mrs. Sidney Rabb for the entertainment of their mutual friend, Mrs. Abraham Harman, wife of the ambassador from Israel when the Harmans come to Boston this month for the Ambassadors Ball.

A number of Mrs. Anthony Kutten's guests who lunched with Mrs. Peabody, Mr. and Mrs. Coolidge, Mr. and Mrs. Forbes, members of the Fogg Museum staff, and the Harvard Fine Arts department (who will join forces in the Spring to present an unusual concert of 20th century music at the Fogg) were also at the champagne reception in the Ancient Instruments Room. Mr. and Mrs. Leinsdorf brought as their guest the brilliant young pianist of the concert, 20-year-old Loren Hollander. Charming, dark-haired Mrs. Leinsdorf was affectionately greeted by many of her Brookline neighbors as she arrived at Symphony Hall, pink camellias in her hand.

A Council of Friends party, the informal, delightful reception at which Mr. Leinsdorf gave the amazing concert statistics of a single symphony season (more than a hundred "home" concerts) took place, appropriately enough, under the approving eyes of the great men who made the Symphony—founder Henry Lee Higginson; conductor Karl Muck, who gave the Bruckner Symphony its first performance in Austria when he was a young music director in Graz; Serge Koussevitzky, and many another familiar portrait. Reception guests included more than one half-century symphony subscriber, such as Mrs. Alexander Steinert, Mrs. William Aldrich and Mrs. Charles E. Bacon. Coming upstairs from the concert with Symphony President and Mrs. Henry Cabot and attractive, dark-haired Mrs. Norman Cahners, co-chairmen of the enterprising Council of Friends of the B.S.O.

Still others toasting the orchestra and Mr. Leinsdorf with a glass of champagne were beautiful Mrs. Brooks Botter, whose late father, H. Wendell Endicott, was among the Symphonys longtime supporters and trustees; Mrs. Valentine Hollingsworth; slim, patrician Mrs. Charles P. Howard; Mr. and Mrs. Thomas Proctor; Mrs. Jasper Whiting; Mrs. Joseph Lund; Mrs. Otis Russell; Mrs. Arthur Beale; Mrs. Richard Ely Danielson; Mrs. Edward Rose; Mrs. Alfred McIntyre; Mrs. Livingston Davis; Mrs. Alfred Donovan; Mrs. James Hooper Grew; handsome Mrs. F. Murray Forbes, a coral felt with her straight wool dress; Miss Rosamond Lamb; Mrs. Frederick Leviseur; Mr. and Mrs. John Palmer; Mr. and Mrs. Georges Moleux; Mrs. Sidney Shurcliff; Mr. and Mrs. David Howie, and scores more.

In the glass-cased room earlier, before the concert, Cambridge Council members lunched together, with Mrs. Benjamin Tilghman chairman. Still others symphonying yesterday in the Friday pattern of three generations of Bostonians—Judge Raymond Wilkins, leaving his coat in the Symphony office along with many another Symphony trustee; Mrs. Francis Sears, as slimly suited as her handsome grandchildren; Mrs. Edward B. Simmons, looking as pretty as her debutante daughter; Mrs. Robert Daley, another young-looking, attractive grandmother; Mr. and Mrs. Paul Clark; Mrs. Arthur Mitton; Eleo Sears; Mrs. Richard Sears; Mrs. Paul Bernat, being congratulated on her ladies committee job for the Museum, her black and white very smart and becoming; Mrs. Stephen Casey in deft, decorative blue; Mrs. James Hunnewell; Mrs. Charles Hovey; Mrs. Edwin S. Webster, another subscriber of more than half a century; Mrs. Thomas Gardiner; Mrs. B. Phippen Donnell; handsome Mrs. Allan Forbes; Mrs. Harris Fahnestock, Harvard's Wallace Woodworth, and, on from the Statler and a fashion show pre-symphony luncheon, Mrs. Howard David and Women's City Club Pres. Mrs. Melvin Guptill, and a table of guests; Mrs. Charlotte Gordon, who modeled with her five-year-old daughter, Laura; Mrs. Gael Mahony, titian-haired Boston beauty, and lovely, blonde Gloria Kent.

A QUIET MOMENT—Erich Leinsdorf has quiet chat with Mrs. Endicott Peabody.

SYMPHONY PRES. Henry Cabot and Mrs. Thomas Mahony of Mt. Vernon st. talk orchestra affairs.

CONDUCTOR and Mrs. Leinsdorf greet a friend, Mrs. James Hooper Grew of Andover (right).

Globe Photos by Ollie Noonan Jr.

SYMPHONY TOAST—Distinguished patron Mrs. William T. Aldrich toasts orchestra at champagne party.

(Herald Staff Photo by George Dixon)

LISTENING INTENTLY to Erich Leinsdorf (left), director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, are (left to right) Henry B. Cabot, Mrs. Michael White, Mrs. Arthur Livingston and Mrs. Leinsdorf. At the right is part of an adoring group waiting to shake his hand.

SYMPHONY TOAST—Distinguished patron Mrs. William T. Aldrich toasts orchestra at champagne party.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Times (e)
BEVERLY, Mass.
Circ. 8,350

JAN 17 964

Post - Symphony Fete Is Innovation Of Council

A champagne reception was given last Friday afternoon following Symphony for Conductor Erich Leinsdorf and his attractive wife, who brought with them as their reception guest of honor, Loren Hollander, piano soloist at the concert.

Mrs. Michael White was chairman of the reception and council members assisting with this delightful idea included Mrs. Louis W Cabot of Wenham. Mrs. Cabot, co-chairman of the Council of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has been an active participant in their other activities including luncheons before the concerts each Friday during the Symphony season.

This first post - Symphony party was held in the Ancient Instruments Room. Included among the distinguished guests at this new "little" event planned by the Councils of Friends was Henry B. Cabot, president of the board of trustees of the Boston Symphony.

Champagne Reception for Leinsdorfs

All social events center around the Symphony on Fri[illegible]. One of these was a champagne reception yesterday, for Boston members of the Council of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. To be a true patron, one must be a "Friend."

The reception was held in honor of Mr. and Mrs. Erich Leinsdorf, in the Old Instruments Room at Symphony Hall following the afternoon concert. Special guests were Loren Hollander, paino soloist, and Henry B. Cabot of Dover, president of the trustees of the orchestra, and Mrs. Cabot.

Looking on from his portrait in the background is Boston's beloved Henry Lee Higginson, who founded the orchestra in 18[illegible]

ALISON ARNOLD

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Times (e)
BEVERLY, Mass.
Circ. 8,350

JAN 17 964

State House Setting For Spring Social Events

Mrs. Endicott Peabody's project of reviving the past glories of the State House and making it an intimate part of the life of the people of Massachusetts, in emulation of Mrs. John Fitzgerald Kennedy's restoration of the White House, will be reflected in the many 1964 spring social events to be held there.

The Massachusetts Federation of Women's clubs will gather there on Wednesday, February 12. There'll be a reception in the Hall of Flags for the Friends of Symphony on March 10. A morning coffee for members of the Massachusetts Federation of Garden Clubs is scheduled for [illegible]day morning, March 31, at 10:30.

[illegible]rth Shore women are particularly active in all three of these organizations. Members of the Lothrop club will be among the guests at the February gathering. Mrs. Louis W. Cabot of Wenham is co-chairman of the Council of Friends of the Boston Symphony and Mrs. Neil M. MacLaren of Hamilton is president of the Federation of Garden Clubs.

The first of these parties, however, was described as a Boston Tea Party, 1964 style on Wednesday, January 15, when guests presented Mrs. Peabody with the State House china. She, in turn, will donate it to the State House and eventually it will be placed in the governor's mansion, when and if one materializes.

The Women's Clubs of Greater Lawrence had a sample of china made up for Mrs. Peabody's approval last spring and Wednesday at Greater Lawrence Day it was presented to Mrs. Peabody. It is Lennox china with a gold band and the blue seal of Massachusetts in the center.

Flowers on the tea table for this occasion, arranged by Ruth Traynor, were French roses that matched the Bulfinch beige of the walls, combined with masses of cornflowers of Massachusetts blue. There were also green plants of the type found in Massachusetts woodlands.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Sunday Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 465,653
JAN 19 1964

At Symphony Reception

Two committee Cabots salute Erich Leinsdorf at the Boston Symphony group's opening champagne reception. Mrs. Louis Cabot, co-chairman of the ladies committee, and Henry Cabot, president of the Boston Symphony Trustees.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Herald (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 178,553
JAN 16 1964

Social Chatter

By Alison Arnold

Set of China for State House Presented to Mrs. Peabody

A BOSTON TEA PARTY, 1964 style, was held at the State House yesterday afternoon. Instead of dumping the tea in Boston Harbor as at the original tea party, the guests presented Mrs. Endicott Peabody with the State House china. She, in turn, will donate it to the Sate House and eventually it will be placed in the governor's mansion, when and if one materializes.

* * *

To revive the past glories of the State House and to make it an intimate part of the life of the people of Massachusetts is an important project for Mrs. Peabody. Inspired by Jacqueline Kennedy's restoration of the White House, the first lady of Massachusetts has plans for beautifying the State House.

Last spring, the Women's Clubs of Greater Lawrence had a sample of china made up for Mrs. Peabody's approval. It is Lennox china with a gold band and the blue seal of Massachusetts in the center. Yesterday, at Greater Lawrence Day in Doric Hall at the State House, it was presented to Mrs. Peabody.

This tea party is only one of many social events to be held there. Members of the Morgan Memorial will meet there for tea next Monday, and on Feb. 12, the Massachusetts Federation of Women's Clubs will gather there. On March 10 there'll be a reception in the Hall of Flags for the Friends of Symphony.

There'll be a morning coffee for the members of the Massachusetts Federation of Garden Clubs, at 10:30, March 31. And perhaps, later, under crystal chandeliers, there'll be a ball as resplendent as in the early days of the Massachusetts Colony.

At yesterday's party, the flowers on the tea table, arranged by Ruth Traynor, were French roses that matched the Bulfinch beige of the walls, combined with masses of cornflowers of Massachusetts blue. There were also green plants of the type found in Massachusetts woodlands.

The pourers were Mrs. Roland R. Siskind, Mrs. Bert Siskind and Mrs. Irving Rogers of Andover, Mrs. John J. Buckley of Lawrence and Miss Miriam G. Demers of West Andover. A small table, set for two, displayed some of the State House china on a cloth of antique lace. With it was some of Mrs. Peabody's own antique silver.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 194,870
JAN 27 1964

DISTINGUISHED MUSICIANS and music partons will be invited to the reception which the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Council of Friends will give Friday afternoon following the first American performance of Leonard Bernstein's Symphony No. 3. Mrs. Louis Cabot of Wenham and Mrs. Norman Cahners of Brookline are co-chairmen of the Council and helping them arrange the post - concert party for Mr. Bernstein will be Mrs. Harris Fahnestock, Concord; Mrs. Benjamin Tilghman, Cambridge; Mrs. Irving Rabb, Newton; Mrs. C. Hodgkinson Gordon, Boston; Mrs. Charles Hovey and Mrs. Charles E. Mason Jr., Brookline; Mrs. G. Lincoln Dow Jr., Duxbury, and Mrs. James Perkins, Westwood.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Record-American (m) (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 452,333
JAN 29 1964

DISTINGUISHED musical personages and other guests will attend the informal reception planned by The Council of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to honor the American premiere of Leonard Bernstein's Symphony No. 3 (Kaddish). It will be held on Friday in the Ancient Instrument Room at Symphony Hall, following the afternoon concert at which Charles Munch will conduct the new work. Admission will be by invitation only.

Mrs. Louis W. Cabot of Wenham and Mrs. Norman L. Cahners of Brookline, co-chairmen of the Council of Friends, have chosen for hostess roles, Mrs. Lewis P. Cabot, Mrs. C. Hodgkinson Gordon, Mrs. Robert H. Cain, Mrs. Charles F. Hovey, Mrs. Charles E. Mason, Jr., Mrs. Benjamin Tilghman, Mrs. Harris Fahnestock, Mrs. G. Lincoln Dow, Jr., Mrs. Irving W. Rabb and Mrs. James H. Perkins.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
JAN 29 1964

Symphony Friends Plan Parties for Newtonites

The Newton Area of the Council of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has planned a series of parties for subscribers from the many vilages which comprise the City of Newton.

In December, two morning coffees were held in private houses, and Saturday, March 7, a Dutch Treat Dinner will be held at Symphony Hall for subscribers, from Newton, to the Saturday Evening Series of Symphony Concerts.

This Friday, Jan. 27, a Dutch Treat Luncheon in the Old Instruments Room at Symphony Hall has been arranged for subscribers to the Friday Afternoon Series, from Newton, by the three co-chairman of the area. They are Mrs. Robrt M. P. Kennard, Mrs. Irving Rabb and Mrs. Samuel A. Levine.

On their committee are Mrs. Stephen B. Willington, Mrs. Carl P. Waldinger, Mrs. Hugh Harwood, Mrs. Langdon Parsons, Mrs. W. Lloyd Allen, and Mrs. Edward A. Caredis, treasurer.

Guests of honor will be Mr. Charles H. Stockton, a trustee of the Boston Symphony Orchertra, who will speak at the luncheon, and Joseph Silverstien, the orchestra's concert master.

Among those who have already accepted are Mr. and Mrs. Thomas Perry (he is manager of the orchestra) Mrs. Raymond Ashley, Mrs. George P. Buell, Mrs. Henry Cummings, Mrs. Grosvenor Calkins, Mrs. William W. Cowles, Mrs. Charles Grover, Mrs. Dwight Shepler, Mrs. Worthing West, Mrs. John B. McKittrick and Mrs. Harold R. Keller.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Townsman
WELLESLEY, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 7,683
FEB 27 1964

Dinner Before Boston Symphony Concert March 10th

A dinner on March 10, is planned for Wellesley subscribers who attend the Tuesday evening series of Boston Symphony Concerts. It will take place in the Old Instruments Room at Symphony Hall, preceding the performance.

Members of the Wellesley Council of Friends of Symphony who will greet the guests are Mrs. William Vogler, Mrs. Bartlett Stone, Mrs. Thomas Chesterton, Mrs. Robert D. Chellis, and Mrs. Russell Sanders. Mrs. Robert G. Wiese, CE 5-0983 is in charge of reservations.

Among those who plan to attend are Mr. and Mrs. Jarvis Farley, Mr. and Mrs. Robert Colburn, Mr. and Mrs. Richard Muzzy, Mr. and Mrs. Gardner Bolster ,Dr. and Mrs. Francis M. Woods, Mrs. Ruth Shepardson. Guests are also welcome.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Times (e)
BEVERLY, Mass.
Circ. 8,350
FEB 3 1964

"Apres-Symphone" In Boston Celebrates "Kaddish" Premiere

"Apres-Symphone" on Friday afternoon, January 31, a reception, sponsored by the Council of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was held to celebrate the American premiere of the new Symphony No. 3, "Kaddish," by Leonard Bernstein.

The Old Instruments Room at Symphony hall was again the setting for the reception, at which many distinguished personages mingled with Bostonians. Charles Munch, who returned to Boston to conduct the performance was among the guests of honor. Other guests of honor were Mr. and Mrs. Bernstein, Jennie Tourel and Mr. Bernstein's parents, Mr. and Mrs. Samuel Bernstein.

Bernstein's work was commissioned by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Koussevitzky Music Foundation in celebration of the orchestra's 75th anniversary in 1955-56 when Dr. Munch was music director. Bernstein was able to complete the work only recently and Erich Leinsdorf invited Dr. Munch to conduct it on this significant occasion.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Herald (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 178,553
FEB 13 1964

Social Chatter

By Alison Arnold

Series of Parties Planned Before and After Symphony

BEFORE AND AFTER Symphony is THE favorite time for entertaining in Boston this winter. The Council of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has arranged a number of area parties at Symphony Hall during the next few weeks. Tomorrow, the Ancient Instruments Room will be gay with Valentines' Day flowers for a Dutch Treat Luncheon before the concert and a tea after it, for subscribers to the Friday afternoon concerts.

The luncheon is the first of a series of events planned for the North Shore and Andover committees for subscribers from those areas. In charge of the luncheon are Mrs. Howard Dickenson and Mrs. Erick Kauders of Marblehead, Mrs. Richard K. Thorndike of Beverly Farms and Mrs. James Grew of Andover. Hostesses will be Mrs. Nelson Aldrich, Mrs. Albert Goodhue, Mrs. John McCandless, Mrs. Henry B. Cabot, Jr., Mrs. Frederick Kauders and Mrs. William C. Loring.

Henry Cabot will speak of the needs of the orchestra from his point of view as president of the board of trustees. Speaking for the orchestra will be Pasquale Cardillo, the E-flat clarinet player, who is a member of the Orchestra Committee.

After tomorrow's concert, the Brookline-Chestnut Hill Committee will give a tea and reception in honor of Mr. and Mrs. Erich Leinsdorf and Mr. and Mrs. Henry Cabot, in the Ancient Instruments Room.

Co-chairmen of the committee are Mrs. Robert H. Cain and Mrs. Charles E. Mason, Jr.

Hostesses will be Mrs. James T. Baldwin, Mrs. John L. Grandin Jr., Mrs. Robert T. Hamlin, Mrs. Herbert Hoffman, Mrs. Robert H. Hopkins, Mrs. Charles F. Hovey. Mrs. Robert Reiser and Mrs. Ralph B. Williams Jr. Pouring tea will be Mrs. George Estin, Mrs. Charles R. Carney, Mrs. William T. Aldrich and Mrs. Augustus Thorndike.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 465,653
FEB 2 1964

All in Honor Of Our BSO

By Marjorie W. Sherman

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is one of a kind. Belonging in Boston, where it is a far more valid symbol than the sacred cod, it draws the best of Boston traditions together: the love of excellence in its musicians, who are the country's great ones; the tradition of service, which is part of Boston's quality; and the dedication of its friends and supporters, who help to spread music-making of the highest order here and abroad.

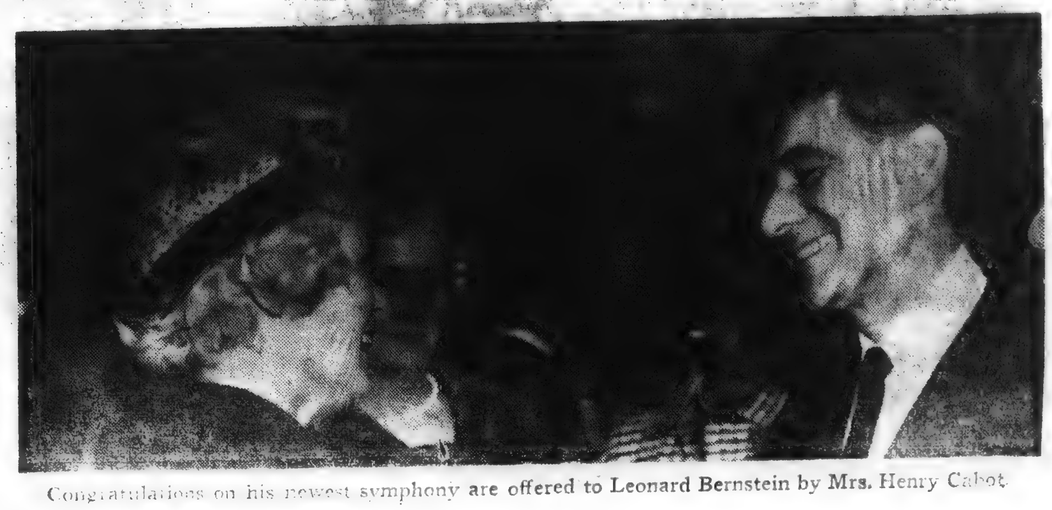
Bostonians by the hundreds devoted the day to honoring the Symphony on Friday. There wasn't a symphony breakfast, B.S.O. friends and subscribers were too busy with meetings. There were three luncheons, one at Symphony Hall for the Newton subscribers interested in becoming Friends of the Symphony; another at the Midtown Motor Inn honoring the 70th birthday of composer Walter Piston; and a third at the Statler. Crowning the day after a concert premiere in this country of Leonard Bernstein's Third Symphony, was a champagne reception for the Boston composer-conductor and his wife Felicia Monteleagre who served as narrator, givin by members of the Council of Friends of the B.S.O.

LUNCHEON IS SERVED at Symphony Hall's ancient instruments room to Newton subscribers as part of Council of Friends of the B.S.O. program. Scores enjoyed the occasion.

MUSIC ON MINDS—At reception honoring American composer Walter Piston (center) at Mrs. Anthony Kutten's pre-symphony luncheon at the Midtown. With the composer and Mrs. Piston are the B.S.O.'s Harry Ellis Dickson (left) and Harvard's Elliott Forbes.

GLOBE PHOTOS BY JOHN M. HURLEY AND EDISON FARRAND

(Leonard Bernstein, Felicia Monteleagre) and B.S.O. President Henry Cabot.



Congratulations on his newest symphony are offered to Leonard Bernstein by Mrs. Henry Cabot.

182

Boston Sunday
MAGAZINE • TV-RADIO PULLOUT SECTION
MARCH 1, 1964

Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra

Story and Photos on Pages 4, 5, 6

The steering co to right, Mrs. E
James Perkins

n In

BOSTON SUNDAY

182

Sunday

Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra

Story and Photos on Pages 4, 5, 6

Mrs. Erich Leinsdorf, wife of the musical director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Mrs. Alexander Steinert, a long-time friend of the Symphony and a member of the Friends.

The steering committee of the new Council of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, left to right, Mrs. Edward A. Stimpson of Wellesley Hills, Mrs. Louis M. Cabot of Wenham, Mrs. James Perkins of Westwood, the first woman trustee of the orchestra; Mrs. Benjamin Tilghman of Cambridge and Mrs. Norman Cahners of Brookline.

Friends of B.S.O. Play an Important Role

By Herbert A. Kenny

The friends (no capital letter) of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are legion and the Friends (capitalized) of the Boston Symphony Orchestra number about 4000, but they will not rest easy until they, too, are legion, and all friends are Friends.

The financial facts of life for a symphony orchestra are peculiar. The better it is, the more it is likely to cost. All symphony orchestras run at a deficit. Hence, the need for outside support. It is the Friends who set out determinedly to raise the money to fill the gap. In the case of the Boston Symphony Orchestra it goes over $300,000 a year.

If the seats were priced in order to insure meeting operating costs very few persons, indeed, could afford to attend. The hall seats only 2631. With perhaps a total of 80 concerts a year at the most, the financial return from tickets would be small. That from recordings is better, and the Boston Symphony records sell well. But whatever happens, however, things are stretched, there is that deficit at the end of the year like a spectre at the feast.

Nor are all seats reserved for those who can afford a year's subscription, although it could easily be done that way. Each Friday 251 balcony seats are sold on a "rush" basis at 60 cents each—surely the biggest cultural bargain in the world. When all expenses are toted up it costs about $2,692,665 a year to run the B.S.O., as it familiarly called.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra was established in 1881 by Henry Lee Higginson, and its first concert was given Oct. 22 of that year in the Boston Music Hall. On Oct. 15, 1900, the group gave its first concert in the then new Symphony Hall, now its permanent home, and owned and operated by the orchestra.

In the 1930's, the Friends of the Symphony Orchestra was formed, the years when the financial going was the roughest. There is no qualification for membership other than a contribution, no matter the size. The Friends, each and all, contribute.

The B.S.O. earns more of its annual budget through musical means than any other orchestra in the United States, more than 70 percent against a national average of 57 percent. Last year the operating deficit was $641,981, before income from investments and from the Friends. The Friends this year will have to meet $350,000 of the deficit.

To intensify the work of the Friends, they have formed a Council of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. These will assist the trustees in increasing the number of Friends and in generally spreading knowledge of the orchestra's cultural role and contribution to the Greater Boston community.

The council plans to sponsor a series of events to which Friends and subscribers will be invited. At present the Friends run a pre-Symphony luncheon in the famous Old Instruments Room at Symphony Hall. The co-chairmen of the Council of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are Mrs. Louis W. Cabot of Wenham and Mrs. Norman L. Cahners of Brookline.

The pre-Symphony luncheon of the Friends is, for them, or for those who attend, one of the most delightful aspects of the association. Here they meet Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the orchestra; Mrs. Leinsdorf, members of the orchestra, veteran supporters of the orchestra, members of the board of trustees, visiting musicians, guest performers and, best of all, each other.

Continued on Page 6

At one of the luncheons of the Friends, Mrs. Erich Leinsdorf, left, greets Lisa Nyquist of Concord, one of the youngest of the Friends, and her mother, Mrs. Richard N. Nyquist.

The Cover

Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony, left, waits with Joseph Silverstein, orchestra concertmaster and often soloist, in the Symphony Hall green room for the signal to go on stage.

184

Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra

Continued from Page 5

Perhaps they hear a brief lecture on the afternoon's performance, perhaps a few words on the problems that will face the orchestra in the coming year.

In the event, they find a sense of being a part, and an essential part, of one of the greatest musical organizations on the face of the earth.

This is not a small consolation in an age in which musical accomplishment is having a struggle for survival. It is not a small consolation in a decade in which, apart from its aesthetic accomplishments, the orchestra is found to be one of the major treasures of the city, a boon to its economic growth, a lure that brings men of intellect to the city and its environs so that Boston manages to maintain in an age of rabid competition, its reputation as one of the most civilized of communities.

Erich Leinsdorf, musical director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Mrs. Endicott Peabody, wife of the governor and a long-time friend of the orchestra.

Minnie Wolk, left, piano teacher, presents check to Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees of the orchestra, as Mrs. James Perkins looks on. The check was the residue in the treasury of the Music Guild of Boston, which dissolved after many years of promoting musical talent in Boston.

At a pre-concert luncheon in the Old Instrument Room of Symphony Hall, Henry B. Cabot, right, discusses some of the orchestra's problems with a group of Friends.

BOSTON SUNDAY GLOBE, MARCH 1, 1964

New England Newsclip Agency Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Journal
CONCORD, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 3,459

MAR 5 1964

Concord Friends of the Boston Symphony will gather in the Ancient Instruments Room at Symphony Hall on March 6 for sherry and a Dutch Treat luncheon before the regular Friday afternoon concert. During the luncheon, Edward Taft will speak for the trustees and Louis Speyer for the orchestra.

Mrs. Alexander Ellis, Jr., chairman of this event, will be assisted by Mesdames David B. Arnold, Jr., William C. Brengle, Henry M. Keyes, Carl Koch, Frederick H. Lovejoy, William B. Moses, Jr., Donald B. Sinclair, Brooks Stevens, Jr., John R. Whitney, Benjamin Wilson and Orrin G. Wood, Jr.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Times (e)
BEVERLY, Mass.
Circ. 8,350

MAR 2 1964

Farms Home Setting For Open House In Honor Of Symphony

Mrs. Richard K. Thorndike of 69 West street, Beverly Farms will welcome guests to her home on Wednesday evening, March 4, from 6 to 8 o'clock at an open house party planned for the Council of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Henry Cabot, president of the board of trustees of the Boston Symphony, will greet guests. Bernard Zighera, harpist of the Boston Symphony, will speak about the orchestra. Also among the guests will be Mrs. Louis W. Cabot of Wenham, co-chairman of the Council of Friends.

Other guests expected to attend the open house are: Mrs. William Ellis of Gloucester, Mrs. Thomas Gardiner of Manchester, Mrs. J. L. Gardner, Mrs. John Bryant, Mr. and Mrs. Frederick Kauders and Mr. and Mrs. William Loring, all of Beverly Farms; Mr. and Mrs. Neil Ayer and Mr. and Mrs. Louis W. Cabot of Wenham and Mr. and Mrs. Howard C. Dickinson of Marblehead.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Townsman
WELLESLEY, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 7,683

MAR 5 1964

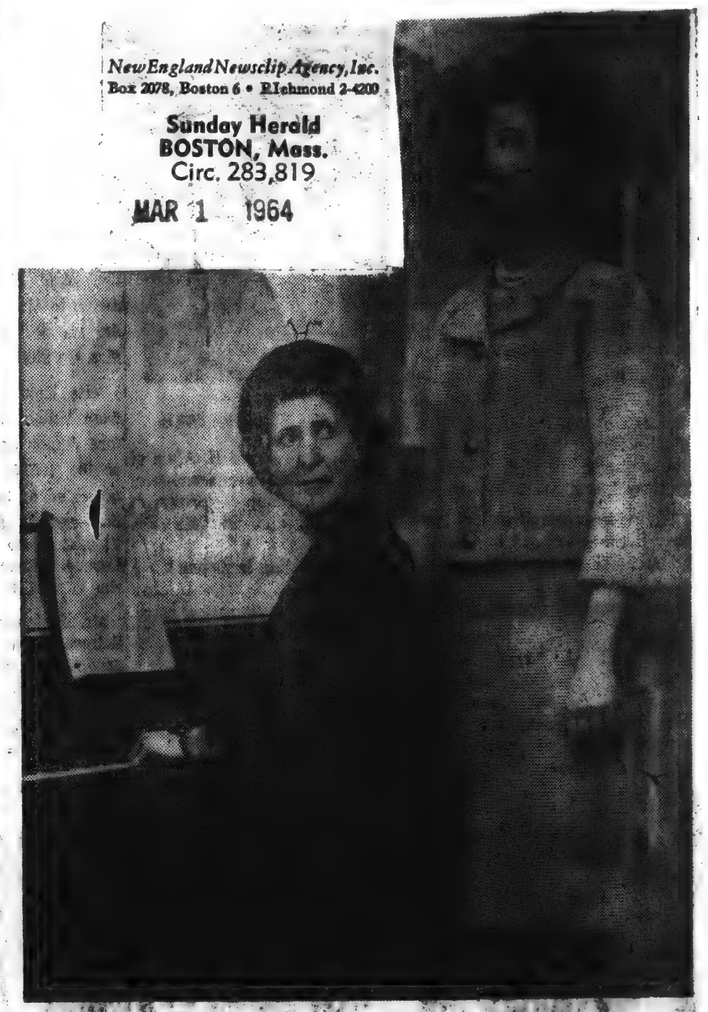
Luncheon Before Symphony Concert

Wellesley subscribers to the Boston Symphony's Friday Series have received invitations to a luncheon on March 20. It will take place in the Old Istrument room at Symphony Hall preceding the concert. Mrs. William Vogler and Mrs. Robert G. Wiese of Wellesley are co-chairmen. Members of the Wellesley council of Friends of Symphony who will be hostesses are: Mrs. Walter Amory, Mrs. Marshall Bolster, Mrs. Robert Dean, Mrs. Frank Homeyer, Mrs. Lewis Mustard Jr., Mrs. Edward Stimpson, Mrs. Mark Wheeler and Mrs. Lyman B. Brainerd.

Early acceptances have been received from Mrs. Frederick Atherton, Mrs. Daivd Boyd, Mrs. Forest Davidson, Mrs. Brackett Parsons, Mrs. Clinton Shattuck and Mrs. Frederick Haffenref-

185

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Herald
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 283,819
MAR 1 1964



(Above) In front of a portrait of the late Henry Lee Higginson, founder of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, are (left to right) Mrs. Robert Wiese, Mrs. Howard C. Dickinson and Mrs. Erick Kauders. (Below) A bust of Sibelius by Mrs. Serge Koussevitzky is admired by Mrs. G. Lincoln Dow Jr. of Duxbury, and Mrs. Benjamin C. Tilghman of Cambridge.

(Above) Proper Bostonian "Beatles" include (left to right) Mrs. Robert M. P. Kennard, Mrs. Richard K. Thorndike, Mrs. Michael M. White and Mrs. Samuel Levine, with some antique stringed instruments. (Below, right) Examining an unusual clock in the Ancient Instruments Room are (left to right) Mrs. Richard Higgins, Mrs. Alexander Ellis, Jr., and Mrs. Charles E. Mason Jr.

At an early piano in the Ancient Instruments Room at Symphony Hall is Mrs. Arthur J. Livingston. Beside her is Mrs. Louis W. Cabot, co-chairman of the Council of Friends.

Members of the Council of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra met Tuesday in the Ancient Instruments Room at Symphony Hall to discuss final plans for Symphony Week, March 2-12, that will focus attention on the orchestra's contribution ot the city and Commonwealth and its need for continuous support.

(Photos by George Dixon)

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Herald (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 178,553
MAR 2 1964

Symphony Friends Open House

OPEN HOUSE at "Forthorns," their home in Beverly Farms, will be held by Mr. and Mrs. Richard Thorndike, Wednesday, from 6 to 8 o'clock, for Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Henry B. Cabot, president of the Board of Trustees, will introduce Bernard Zighera, harpist, and other members of the orchestra.

Mrs. Louis Cabot, chairman of the Women's Executive Council, and others of the North Shore Committee will attend. Hostesses will be Mrs. John Bryant, Mrs. Frederick Kauders, Mrs. William Loring, Mrs. Thomas Gardiner, Mrs. John Gardner and Mrs. William Ellis.

The Concord Committee has planned two events for this week. On Thursday, Mr. and Mrs. Harris Fahnestock will give a cocktail party at their house for concert-goers who are interested in becoming Friends of the Orchestra. Mr. Cabot and Leonard Moss of the orchestra's violin section, will be guests of honor.

On Friday, Concord Friends will gather in the Ancient Instruments Room at Symphony Hall for sherry and a Dutch Treat luncheon before Friday's concert. During luncheon, Edward A. Taft will speak for the trustees, and Louis Speyer, for the orchestra.

Mrs. Alexander Ellis, Jr., is chairman of the luncheon. She'll be assisted by Mrs. Benjamin Wilson, Mrs. Donald B. Sinclair, Mrs. David B. Arnold, Jr., Mrs. Brooks Stevens, Mrs. Frederick H. Lovejoy, Mrs. William B. Moses, Jr., Mrs. William C. Brengle, Mrs. Orrin Wood, Jr., Mrs. John R. Whitney, Mrs. Carl Koch and Mrs. Henry Keyes.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Italian News
BOSTON, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 13,822
MAR 1 1 1964

BOSTON'S BEST

Boston is not used to having champions except for the Celtics and the Symphony. The Celtics are able to hold their own and better against all comers, but the Boston Symphony would be fighting a losing battle against rising costs if it were not for the aid that it receives from the dedicated group known as "Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra."

Although not a new group, their work is just now being officially recognized with a "week." This is as good a time as any then to join this group and keep our champion on top.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Herald (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 178,553
MAR 24 1964

Symphony Hall Supper Tonight

This evening, subscribers to the Cambridge series of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will gather for a buffet supper in the Ancient Instruments Room at Symphony Hall, to meet Doriot Anthony Dwyer.

The Cambridge Committee of the Council of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is headed by Mrs. Benjamin Tilghman, Mrs. Charles Gessner and Mrs. John C. Coolidge. Others are Mr. and Mrs. Ross McFarland, Mr. and Mrs. John M. Maguire and Mr. and Mrs. Amos Wilder.

Among others are Dr. and Mrs Laurence Ellis, Dr. and Mrs. Derek Denny-Brown, Mr. and Mrs. Alfred Romer, Mr. and Mrs. Herbert Agoos, Dr. and Mrs. Herbert Harris, Dr. Clement A. Smith and Mr. and Mrs. James Rousmaniere.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Herald
BELMONT, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 5,052
MAR 19 1964

Boston Symphony Men Guests At April 12 Party - Reception Here

A gala reception and cocktail party will be given Sunday afternoon, April 12, at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Hans J. Kroto, 253 Marsh street, with distinguished representatives of the Boston Symphony Orchestra as honor guests.

Henry B. Cabot, president of the orchestra's Trustees, and Mrs. Cabot will attend the second annual party given by the Belmont Council of the Friends party for three famed musicians who are leaving the orchestra at the end of the season, and their wives.

Mrs. Carlton Perry Fuller, 12 Fletcher Road, and Mrs. Kroto are co-chairmen of the affair, for which invitations are being mailed to a goodly number of Belmont's many Symphony-goers who are prospective Friends' members.

Co-chairmen and committee alike feel fortunate that Samuel Mayes, Louis Speyer and Joseph de Pasquale, virtuosi of the cello, English horn and viola, respectively, will attend the party. The musicians are being royally feted in Boston and its suburbs as a mark of affection and respect before they take leave of the orchestra.

The Friends' Belmont guests will hear of the Symphony from Mr. Cabot at 5 o'clock, and will also be briefed on the plans and projects of the Friends.

Members of the executive committee of the Belmont Council of the Friends, with Mrs. Fuller and Mrs. Kroto, are Mrs. S. Roy Burroughs, Mrs. B. T. Edwards and Mrs. Claude E. Welch.

The committee helping with arrangements for the party includes Mesdames Theodore G. Ames, Robert Baldwin, C. Harold Berry, Harold S. Bird, Alden C. Brett, John Bunker, James S. Duesenberry, George M. Fenollosa, Charles H. Gushee, Malcolm Hecht, Jr., Warren B. Kahn, Joseph H. Keenan, Richard Van S. Lenk, Henry Hixon Meyer, William M. Murray, Talcott Parsons and Warren W. Point.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Herald (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 178,553
MAR 20 1964

Events at Symphony Hall

BEFORE AND AFTER the Symphony is Boston's favorite time for entertaining. Fashion shows, lectures, luncheons and champagne receptions fill the social calendar to overflowing each Friday and Saturday. Three big affairs will be held in the Ancient Instruments Room at Symphony Hall, today and tomorrow.

Wellesley subscribers to the Friday afternoon concerts. who are members of the Council of Friends of Symphony, will give a luncheon this noon. Tomorrow, a buffet supper for subscribers from the Dedham and North Shore areas will be held before the concert. Afterwards the Chestnut Hill and Brookline Areas will give a champagne reception for Mr. and Mrs. Erich Leinsdorf.

Mrs. William Vogler and Mrs. Robert Wiese are co-chairmen of today's luncheon. Henry Cabot, president of the trustees, will speak, as will Georges Moleux, first bass viol player.

Luncheon hostesses will be Mrs. Walter Amory, Mrs. Marshall Bolster, Mrs. Robert Dean, Mrs. Frank Homeyer, Mrs. Lewis Mustard, Jr., Mrs. Edward Stimpson, Mrs. Mark Wheeler and Mrs. Lyman Brainerd.

In charge of tomorrow's buffet supper are Mrs. Richard Higgins of Dedham and Mrs. Nelson Aldrich of Marblehead. Abram Berkowitz, a trustee, and James Stagliano of the orchestra, will be the speakers.

Mrs. Charles Mason, Jr., and Mrs. Robert Cain are co-chairmen of the champagne reception, tomorrow evening, when more than 100 are expected. Judge Raymond Wilkins will speak, and hostesses will include Mrs. E. Morton Jennings, Mrs. William F. Ray, Mrs. Frederick Weed, Mrs. Francis Barnum, Mrs. Ralph Katz, Mrs. Abram Berkowitz and Mrs. Thomas Perry.

* * *

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Citizen
BELMONT, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 4,173
MAR 20 1964

Sunday Reception to Honor Three Members of Symphony

PAGE ONE

A gala reception and cocktail party will be given Sunday afternoon, April 12, at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Hans J. Kroto, 253 Marsh st., with distinguished representatives of the Boston Symphony Orchestra as honor guests.

Henry B. Cabot, president of the orchestra's Trustees, and Mrs. Cabot will attend the second annual party given by the Belmont Council of the Friends of the Symphony, a farewell party for three famed musicians who are leaving the orchestra at the end of the season, and their wives.

Mrs. Carlton Perry Fuller, 12 Fletcher rd., and Mrs. Kroto are co-chairmen of the affair, for which invitations are being mailed to a goodly number of Belmont's many Symphony-goers who are prospective Friends' members.

Co-chairmen and committee alike feel fortunate that Samuel Mayes, Louis Speyer and Joseph de Pasquale, virtuosi of the cello, English horn and viola, respectively, will attend the party. The musicians are being royally feted in Boston and its suburbs as a mark of affection and respect before they take leave of the orchestra.

The Friends' Belmont guests will hear of the Symphony from Mr. Cabot at 5 o'clock, and will also be briefed on the plans and projects of the Friends.

Members of the executive committee of the Belmont Council of the Friends, with Mrs. Fuller and Mrs. Kroto, are Mrs. S. Roy Burroughs, Mrs. B. T. Edwards and Mrs. Claude E. Welch.

The committee helping with arrangements for the party includes Mesdames Theodore G. Ames, Robert Baldwin, C. Harold Berry, Harold S. Bird, Alden C. Brett, John Bunker, James S. Duesenberry, George M. Fenollosa, Charles H. Gushee, Malcolm Hecht, Jr., Warren B. Kahn, Joseph H. Keenan, Richard Van S. Lenk, Henry Hixon Meyer, William M. Murray, Talcott Parsons and Warren W. Point.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Advertiser
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 448,810
APR 26 1964

BSO Reception For Subscribers

Mrs. Alexander Steinert is opening her home on Commonwealth ave., this afternoon at 5 o'clock for a reception sponsored by the trustees and the Council of Friends of Boston Symphony Orchestra for Boston Symphony subscribers who reside in Boston.

Mr. and Mrs. Erich Leinsdorf and Mr. and Mrs. Henry B. Cabot with other Boston Symphony trustees and their wives will attend.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Evening Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 146,915
APR 7 1964

BELMONT SYMPHONY-GOERS will have a party with a purpose next Sunday. In fact, the festive reception at Mr. and Mrs. Hans Kroto's will serve a double purpose—to welcome prospective members of the Belmont Council of Friends of Symphony, and to honor three musicians leaving the B.S.O. at the end of this season, Louis Speyer, Samuel Mayes, and Joseph de Pasquale.

Symphony Pres. Henry Cabot will also be a special guest on Sunday. Mrs. Carlton P. Fuller is co-chairman with Mrs. Kroto for the reception, and their committee includes Mrs. Robert Baldwin, Mrs. Henry Meyer, Mrs. William Murray, Mrs. Harold Bird, Mrs. Theodore Ames, Mrs. Alden Brett, and Mrs. Malcolm Hecht Jr.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 194,870
MAR 3

Today in Society

Luncheons, Suppers Aid Hub Symphony Orchestra

By MARJORIE W. SHERMAN

Dedicated attendance at Symphony, for years the hallmark of the true Bostonian, is the same privilege that founder Henry Lee Higginson thought it would be, but even that astute planner didn't realize what rising costs could do to the B.S.O. in the way of an annual deficit.

As orchestra president Henry Cabot explained so forthrightly at the meeting of the Friends this month, the earning power of the orchestra, increased by extra concerts and recordings, cannot physically, be pushed much further, yet the gap which is causing the use of capital funds must be closed.

The Friends of the orchestra are a devoted group, giving what they can, from a dollar to a thousand, but though this helps stem the financial tide, it is still imperative to find more funds.

The Women's Council of Symphony was formed to do just that, by somehow increasing a hundredfold the interest in, and support of, the orchestra.

Mrs. Charles F. Hovey, Mrs. Norman Cahners, and Mrs. Louis Cabot, and a score of other concerned committee members have planned and set in agreeable motion a series of luncheons and suppers at Symphony Hall before concerts, shared by different communities.

Informal and extremely pleasant, these music-minded occasions are sparked by orchestra members and trustees as guests.

On Friday, President Cabot and bass violist Georges Moleux shared guest honors at a Wellesley subscribers' luncheon in the Ancient Instruments Room, and on Saturday, a buffet supper [illegible] Dedham and North Shore patrons preceded the concert, and a reception for the Leinsdorfs was given after the concert by the Brookline and Chestnut Hill groups.

Tomorrow, Tuesday, subscribers to the Cambridge series of the Orchestra will have as their buffet supper guests at Symphony Hall the orchestra's Doriot Anthony Dwyer. The Cambridge Council, headed by Mrs. John C. Coolidge, Mrs. John C. Coolidge, Mrs. Charles Gessner, and Mrs. Benjamin Tilghman, will have some 70 guests, among them San Francisco critic Alfred Frankenstein, who will come with the Diggory Venns.

Still others of the many attending will be Mr. and Mrs. James Rousmaniere, Dr. Clement Smith, Dr. and Mrs. Derek Denny-Brown, Mr. and Mrs. Ross McFarland, Mr. and Mrs. Amos Wilder, Dr. and Mrs. Laurence Ellis, Mr. and Mrs. Herbert Agoos, Dr. and Mrs. Herbert Harris, Mr. and Mrs. Alfred Romer.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Herald (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 178,553
APR 25 1964

Symphony Event At 5 Tomorrow

Mrs. Alexander Steinert of Commonwealth avenue asks us to announce that the reception at her house tomorrow afternoon for Boston Symphony subscribers who live in the city will be held at 5 o'clock instead of 3, the hour given erroneously to the newspapers.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Citizen
BELMONT, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 4,173
APR 10 1964

187

Friends of Symphony Party Here Sunday

Plans are progressing apace for the reception and cocktail party to be given next Sunday afternoon, April 12, at the 253 Marsh st. home of Mr. and Mrs. Hans J. Kroto, the second annual party sponsored by the Belmont Council of the Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mrs. Kroto and Mrs. Carlton Perry Fuller, co-chairmen, and a large committee have been working for the success of the affair which is in the nature of a farewell to three distinguished members of the orchestra—Samuel Mayes, Louis Speyer and Joseph de Pasquale — who are leaving the orchestra at the end of this season, and their wives.

Among those Belmont Symphony-goers who are planning to attend are Mr. and Mrs. Earnest B. Dustan, Dr. and Mrs. Samuel S. Hanflig, Mrs. William G. Taussig, Mr. and Mrs. James H. Messing, Mr. and Mrs. John R. Markham, Mr. and Mrs. Alfred Willmann, Dr. and Mrs. Henry H. Babcock, Mrs. B. Abbott Cope, and Mr. and Mrs. Arthur T. Ippen.

Also Mrs. Raynor G. Wellington, Mr. and Mrs. Harold E. Seder, Mrs. Lewis S. McCreary, Miss Grace McCreary, Mr. and Mrs. Paul D. Caskey, Mr. and Mrs. Gerard Salton and Mr. and Mrs. David R. Pokross.

Henry B. Cabot, president of the orchestra's trustees, and Mrs. Cabot will also be honored guests, with Mr. Cabot speaking briefly.

Mrs. Kroto and Mrs. Fuller urge Belmont Symphony go-ers, and prospective Friends' members, who did not receive invitations last year or this, and who would like to attend, to get in touch with either of them. The same applies to those who would like to be included next year.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Herald (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 178,553
APR 8 1964

Morning Coffee Today for Orchestra Friends

A MORNING COFFEE for the Council of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place today at 10:30 at the home of Mrs. Robert C. Dean, 29 Hundreds Rd., Wellesley Hills, as again Symphony appears in the social news.

This is the final affair in a series of luncheons and dinners the Wellesley Council has sponsored this spring for subscribers and friends of the orchestra living in Wellesley. Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees of the orchestra, will speak briefly on the work and needs of the orchestra, which will end its 83rd season, April 17.

Mrs. H. Starr Ballou and Mrs. Mark C. Wheeler are co-chairman for the coffee. They will be assisted by Mrs. Robert W. Bennett, Mrs. Marshall C. Bolster, Mrs. Russell M. Sanders, Mrs. Robert G. Saunders and Mrs. F. Walker.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Herald
BELMONT, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 5,052
APR 9 1964

Second Annual Party Of Boston Symphony

Plans are progressing apace for the reception and cocktail party to be given next Sunday afternoon, April 12, at the 253 Marsh street home of Mr. and Mrs. Hans J. Kroto, the second annual party sponsored by the Belmont Council of the Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mrs. Kroto and Mrs. Carlton Perry Fuller, co-chairman, and a large committee have been working for the success of the affair which is in the nature of a farewell to three distinguished members of the orchestra — Samuel Mayes, Louis Sperer and Joseph de Pasquale — who are leaving the orchestra at the end of this season, and their wives.

Among those Belmont Symphony-goers who are planning to attend are Mr. and Mrs. Ernest B. Dustan, Dr. and Mrs. Samuel S. Hanflig, Mrs. William G. Taussig, Mr. and Mrs. James H. Messing, Mr. and Mrs. John R. Markham, Mr and Mrs. Alfred Willmann, Dr. and Mrs. Henry H. Babcock, Mrs. B. Abbott Cope, and Mr. and Mrs. Arthur T. Ippen.

Also Mrs. Raynor G. Wellington, Mr. and Mrs. Harold E. Seder, Mrs. Lewis S. McCreary, Miss Grace McCreary, Mr. and Mrs. Paul D. Caskey, Mr. and Mrs. Gerard Salton and Mr. and Mrs. David R. Pokross.

Henry B. Cabot, president of the orchestra's Trustees, and Mrs. Cabot will also be honored guests, with Mr. Cabot speaking briefly.

Mrs. Kroto and Mrs. Fuller urge Belmont Symphony go-ers and prospective Friends' members, who did not receive invitations last year or this, and who would like to attend, to get in touch with either of them. The same applies to those who would like to be included next year.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Herald (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 178,553
23 1964

Symphony Hall Buffet Supper

Tomorrow, subscribers to the Cambridge series of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will gather for a buffet supper in the Ancient Instruments Room at Symphony Hall to meet Doriot Anthony Dwyer. The Cambridge committee of the Council of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is headed by Mrs. Benjamin Tilghman, Mrs. Charles Gessner and Mrs. John C. Coolidge.

Among others who will attend are Mr. and Mrs. Ross McFarland, Mr. and Mrs. John Mazure, Mr. and Mrs. Amos Wilder, Mr. and Mrs. Laurence Ellis, Miss Penelope Noyes, Dr and Mrs. Derek Denny-Brown, Mr. and Mrs. Alfred Romer, Dr. and Mrs. Herbert Harris, Dr. Clement A. Smith and Mr. and Mrs. James Rousmaniere.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Townsman
WELLESLEY, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 7,683
APR 2 1964

Mrs. Dean Has Coffee For Symphony Council

Mrs. Robert C. Dean of 29 Hundreds Road, Wellesley Hills, is opening her home on Wednesday, April 8, at 10:30 a.m. for a morning coffee for the Council of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This is the final affair in a series of luncheons and dinners the Wellesley Council has sponsored this spring for subscribers and friends of the orchestra living in Wellesley.

Henry B. Cabot, President of the Trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be the guest of honor and will speak briefly on the work and needs of the orchestra which is finishing its 83rd season on April 17.

Mr. H. Starr Ballou and Mrs. Mark C. Wheeler are co-chairmen for the coffee. They will be assisted by Mrs. Roger W. Bennett, Mrs. Marshall C. Bolster, Mrs. Russell M. Sanders, Mrs. Robert S. Saunders and Mrs. Rufus F. Walker as hostesses. Any Friend of the Orchestra who was not able to attend any of the earlier parties will be welcome at this final one.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-42C
Traveler (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 164,299
APR 24 1964

By PEGGY BROWN
Society Editor

This season's final reception for Boston Symphony subscribers, sponsored by the Trustees and Council of Friends of the Orchestra will be held Sunday (April 26) afternoon.

Mrs. Alexander Steinert, tireless devotee and supporter of all things musical, will open her home at 401 Commonwealth Ave. at 3 p.m.

This reception is for Symphony subscribers residing in the city of Boston. Attending will be the Orchestra's music director, Erich Leinsdorf, and Mrs. Leinsdorf. Also Mr. and Mrs. Henry B. Cabot and other Trustees and their wives.

Mrs. Louis Cabot and Mrs. Albert Titcomb are co-chairmen. Among those who have accepted invitations are Adm. and Mrs. Samuel Eliot Morison, Mrs. Charles Codman, William Hunnell and Mrs. Richard Sears.

188

Symphony Week.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Herald (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 178,553
FEB 27 1964

March 2-12 Declared As "Symphony Week"

Governor Endicott Peabody and Mayor John Collins have each issued proclamations designating March 2-12 as "Symphony Week." Thus Massachusetts and Boston will join in a period of special tribute to the Boston Symphony Orchestra in recognition of its unique contributions to the city and the entire Commonwealth. "Symphony Week" will serve to honor the orchestra for its achievements at home and abroad and to emphasize the need for continuous support of the orchestra by the community at large.

Several downtown stores are planning complete window displays on the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and many other merchants in metropolitan Boston will contribute display areas for "Symphony Week" posters. In addition, Boston newspapers, radio and television stations will generously give extra attention to the orchestra during the period. On Tuesday, March 10, Governor and Mrs. Peabody will honor the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Mr. and Mrs. Erich Leinsdorf with a Governor's Reception in the Doric Hall of the State House.

"Symphony Week" will close on Thursday, March 12, with the annual meeting of the Friends of the Boston Symphony Orch stra, those who have made a contribution to the orchestra during the 1963-1964 season. A surprise program, suggested by members of the orchestra especially for the annual Friends meeting, will be followed by an informal reception in the Gallery.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Berkshire Eagle (e)
PITTSFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 29,087
FEB 26 1964

Symphony Week Proclaimed In Honor of BSO

BOSTON—Gov. Endicott Peabody and Mayor John Collins of Boston have each issued proclamations designating March 2-12 Symphony Week.

Thus the commonwealth and the city will join in a period of special tribute to the Boston Symphony Orchestra in recognition to its contributions to the city and the entire commonwealth. Symphony week will honor the orchestra for its achievements at home and abroad and to emphasize the need for continuous support of the orchestra by the community at large.

Several Boston stores are planning window displays on the orchestra, and many other merchants in Metropolitan Boston will contribute display areas for Symphony Week posters. In addition, Boston newspapers, radio and television stations will give extra attention to the orchestra during the period. On March 10, Gov. and Mrs. Peabody will honor the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Conductor and Mrs. Erich Leinsdorf at a governor's reception in the Doric Hall of the State House.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Times (e)
BEVERLY, Mass.
Circ. 8,350
FEB 28 1964

Proclaim March 2-12 Boston Symphony Week

Governor Endicott Peabody of Massachusetts and Mayor John Collins of Boston have each issued proclamations designating March 2 to 12 as "Symphony Week."

Thus the Commonwealth of Massachusetts and the City of Boston will join in a period of special tribute to the Boston Symphony Orchestra in recognition of its unique contributions to the city and the entire Commonwealth. "Symphony Week" will serve to honor the orchestra for its achievements at home and abroad and to emphasize the need for continuous support of the orchestra by the community at large.

Several Boston stores are planning complete window displays on the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and many other merchants in Metropolitan Boston will contribute display areas for "Symphony Week" posters. In addition, newspapers, radio and television stations will generously give extra attention to the orchestra during the period.

On March 10 Governor and Mrs. Peabody will honor the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Mr. and Mrs. Erich Leinsdorf with a Governor's Reception in the Doric Hall of the State House. "Symphony Week" will close on Wednesday, March 12, with the annual meeting of the Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, those who have made a contribution to the orchestra during the 1963-1964 season. A surprise program, suggested by members of the orchestra especially for the annual Friends Meeting, will be followed by an informal reception in the gallery. Henry B. Cabot, president of the Trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will also address the audience.

All of Boston and much of the United States were brought together recently to share in the January 19th Memorial Service for President Kennedy at the Cathedral of the Holy Cross, and before that, in the days immediately following the assassination, the orchestra was also seen on national television in memorial concert.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 194,870
FEB 27 1964

A GOVERNOR'S RECEPTION in Doric Hall at the State House will be given by the Peabodys Mar. 10 in honor of Symphony Week—a tribute to the Boston Symphony Orchestra's contribution to Boston and the Commonwealth.

On Mar. 12, the annual meeting of the Friends of Symphony will be held at Symphony Hall. There will be a surprise program by the orchestra, and a reception afterward. Pres. Henry Cabot and conductor Erich Leinsdorf will be honor guests.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Traveler (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 164,299
FEB 27 1964

Tribute To Hub's Symphony

By PEGGY BROWN
Society Editor

Socially Speaking

No pre - Symphony luncheons to talk about this week, for the Boston Symphony Orchestra is on tour. But NEXT week! — Now that's another matter.

By proclamation of Gov. Endicott Peabody and Mayor John Collins, Mar. 2 to 12 has been designated a "Symphony Week."

SPECIAL TRIBUTE TO ORCHESTRA

Our fingers count 10—no, 11—days in that week. No matter. The period will be a special tribute to the Boston Symphony Orchestra by Massachusetts and Boston in recognition of its unique contributions to the Commonwealth and the city.

"Symphony Week" will serve to honor the Orchestra for its achievements at home and abroad. It will also emphasize the need for continuous support of the Orchestra by the community at large.

Gov. and Mrs. Peabody will honor the B.S.O. and its musical [illegible] Leinsdorf and Mrs. Leinsdorf with a reception Mar. 10 in the Doric Hall of the State House.

The annual meeting of the Friends of the Boston Symphony are those who have made a contribution to the Orchestra during the 1963-64 season.

A surprise program, suggested by members of the Orchestra especially for the Friends meeting, will be followed by an informal reception. Henry B. Cabot, president of the Trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will also address the audience.

Without the Friends there would be no Boston Symphony Orchestra. In an open letter to the Friends following the magnificent Jan. 19 Memorial Service for President Kennedy, Cabot noted that "Cardinal Cushing recognizes this and has made a generous gift to the Orchestra."

Cabot added, "We still need $150,000 for this season. To obtain this we hope our old Friends will increase their gifts . . . and that those who have not contributed heretofore will do so now."

The Orchestra contributes not only to the city and Commonwealth but carries the name of Boston far abroad. Its international tours have taken it from Moscow to Tokyo.

Local thousands see and hear the Orchestra annually through its six series of subscription concerts at Symphony Hall, open rehearsals, Boston Pops concerts, Esplanade concerts and Tanglewood programs.

In addition, the Orchestra is seen and heard regularly in Providence, Brooklyn, New York City and many other cities. The audience is greatly increased through radio, television and recordings.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 194,870
MAR 7 1964

By MARJORIE W. SHERMAN

Symphony Week is being observed right round the clock by the enterprising members of the Women's Council. Five towns will share the dinner hour before the regular Monday series concert, dining in the historic Ancient Instruments Room beneath the gold-framed portraits of founder Henry Lee Higginson and great conductors of the orchestra.

Dedham, Dover, Needham, Millis, and Marblehead are dividing the gold chairs, with Mr. and Mrs. Thomas Perry and Mr. and Mrs. John Sant Ambrogio as their honor guests. Mr. and Mrs. James Jackson, Mr. and Mrs. Richard Higgins, Mr. and Mrs. Nelson Aldrich are among the chairmen for the occasion. Tonight Newton Friends of the Orchestra and Council members will have supper at Symphony Hall, their honor guest Sidney Rabb of the Symphony Trustees. Mrs. Robert M. P. Kennard and Mrs. Samuel Levine were cochairmen, and Michael Sasson, violinist, will be a special guest.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Union (m)
SPRINGFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 83,691
MAR 11 1964

Peabodys Host Leinsdorfs

Boston Symphony Director and Mrs. Erich Leinsdorf were given a reception in Doric Hall of the State House by Gov. and Mrs. Endicott Peabody.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Traveler (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 164,299

Big Symphony Treat

By PEGGY BROWN
Society Editor

Today starts "Symphony Week" in Boston and the Commonwealth. And ticket-holders for the Symphony concerts this Friday and Saturday (Mar. 6 and 7) and next Monday and Tuesday (Mar. 9 and 10) are in for a special treat.

Erich Liensdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has invited Leopold Stokowski to be guest conductor of the Orchestra for the first time. The 82-year-old conductor now works primarily with the American Symphony Orchestra, which he created in 1962, in New York City.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Herald (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 178,553
MAR 11 1964

189

CONDITOR HONORED (Herald Staff Photo by Frank Cushing) — Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and his wife were lauded yesterday at a State House reception given by Gov. and Mrs. Peabody. Sampling refreshments are, from left, Gov. Peabody, Mrs. Leinsdorf, Mrs. Toni Peabody and Mr. Leinsdorf. About 200 attended.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 194,870
MAR

Today in Society

Peabodys Hosts to Leinsdorfs at Doric Hall

By MARJORIE W. SHERMAN

Tuesday was just the kind of a day for a really nice tea party, like the Peabodys' party for the Leinsdorfs at the State House.

The fragrance of tea and coffee mingled with the soft spring scent of flowers in handsome pillared Doric Hall as members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its trustees joined Mrs. Peabody and Ladies Council members after B.S.O. Director Erich Leinsdorf's special tour of the House and Senate with Gov. Peabody.

Cited by the governor for his "Towering genius and uncompromising dedication to excellence," and named "one of the truly great citizens of this state and of the world," Leinsdorf took a keen interest in the tour and the history of the beautiful old Bulfinch-designed hall.

Half a dozen United States Presidents, Lafayette and many other famous visitors have been honored at receptions in Doric Hall, but it has been more than 100 years since a party like Tuesday's has been given there.

There was more talk of music than politics as the little frosted cakes were handed round, and plans for Washington visits the end of this month to coincide with the orchestra's first concert in the White House.

Children of embassy families in Washington will be President and Mrs. Johnson's guests for the concert on the 31st, and Boston Cabots and Peabody's with sons or daughters in embassy service, will share a double interest in the concert.

Slim and chic and greeting most of the day's more than 200 guests by name, Toni Peabody kept watch over her visitors and made sure that the top-hatted sergeant-at-arms got some tea.

Her husband drank his tea with Mr. and Mrs. Leinsdorf, the Anthony Kuttens, and Atty. Gen. Edward Brooke.

Orchestra member Harry Dickson, who has done the music community such an outstanding service with the Youth Concerts, was kept busy explaining what symphonies children like best.

Members of the Youth Concerts advisory committee at the reception Tuesday included Mrs. Manuel Kurland who has helped get out more than 5000 tickets for this season's series.

The big hallful of old friends also included longtime trustees like Supreme Court Justice Raymond Wilkins, composer Leon Kirchner, distinguished visitor Mme. Serge Koussevitzky, widow of the renowned BSO conductor and Harvard's able Elliot Forbes, Women's Council chairman Mrs. Charles Hovey, dynamic, pretty music committee member Carol (Mrs. Avram) Goldberg, the John Cooliges, the Edward Counihans, the orchestra's sole woman trustee, Mrs. James Perkins, the Edward Tafts, the John Bradleys, the Thomas Newells, Mrs. Robert Saltonstall, Mrs. Samuel Levine, the Michel Sassons, the John Gardners, and scores more.

The occasion was part of Symphony Week in Boston, which ends tomorrow with the annual meeting of the Friends at Symphony Hall

HONORED GUEST at the State House, Boston Symphony's distinguished Erich Leinsdorf (right), with Atty. Gen. Edward Brooke, Mrs. Leinsdorf and Mrs. Avram Goldberg of Brookline. (Photo by Herbert Capwell)

190
New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 465,653
MAR 15 1964

State House Pays Tribute to Symphony

Gov. Peabody greets Erich Leinsdorf, director of Symphony Orchestra.

Photos by Herbert Capwell, Globe Staff

Mme. Serge Koussevitzky, widow of the long-time Boston Symphony conductor, chats with Leon Kirchner of Harvard Music Department.

Mrs. Anthony Kutten, a worker on the Symphony Council and Youth Concerts and the Cambridge Drama Festival, and Atty. Gen. Edward Brooke, president of the Boston Opera Group.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Press (e)
BRISTOL, Conn.
Circ. 14,439
MAR 12 1964

WELCOME NEW CONDUCTOR: Gov. and Mrs. Peabody held the first civic reception to honor Mr. and Mrs. Erich Leinsdorf since the renowned conductor became Music Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Here Mr. and Mrs. Leinsdorf (L) meet with Gov. and Mrs. Peabody in the State House. (UPI Telephoto)

ANNUAL FRIENDS MEETING

191

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 194,870
FEB 2 0 1964

Players Plan Surprise for BSO Friends

Members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are planning a special surprise program for the annual meeting of the Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Mar. 12.

Attendance will be by invitation to all the Friends for the 1963-64 season, those who have made contributions during the current season. The annual meeting will be the climax and conclusion of "Symphony Week," March 2-12, which has been designated by Gov. Peabody and Mayor Collins to honor the orchestra for its achievements at home and abroad and to emphasize the need for continuous support of the Orchestra by the entire community.

Although the orchestra has for many years played a short musical program at the Annual Friends Meetings, this is the first time the members themselves have suggested a special surprise program of this nature.

Plans for "Symphony Week," including the March 12 Annual Friends Meeting, have been coordinated by the Council of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mrs. Louis W. Cabot and Mrs. Norman L. Cahners, co-chairmen. The Council of Friends includes representatives from over fifty communities in the Metropolitan Boston area.

During "Symphony Week" merchants in the downtown and outlying areas will contribute display space to spotlight the orchestra; the newspaper, radio and television media will give extra attention to the Boston Symphony Orchestra; and on March 10 Gov. and Mrs. Peabody will hold a Governor's Reception at the State House to honor Mr. and Mrs. Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 194,870
MAR 2 1964

The Symphony Needs Help

Of all the glittering jewels in Boston's cultural crown, the Boston Symphony Orchestra should certainly rate among the most precious. It is a unique institution in the United States, earning more of its annual budget through musical means than any other orchestra.

And yet, with its emphasis on a quality that the whole world admires, the B.S.O. runs up a heavy deficit. This year that amounts to some $350,000, and the generous 4000 who comprise the Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have raised all but $150,000 of that.

This has been proclaimed Symphony Week, in honor of the orchestra. The occasion serves to point up the need for support of the B.S.O. by the community at large—which should take a special pride in its accomplishments, its lustre, and its immeasurable contributions to the cultural life of the entire Boston area.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Herald (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 178,553
MAR 13 1964

MUSIC

Players Giveth Great Pleasure And Taketh Same, Forsooth

My Dear and Most Honoured Friends:

It should give me the greatest pleasure to record in this journal, an account of the happenings that befell at Symphony Hall during a brief time after yesternoon; these happenings were climax to the period beginning a week from last Monday, in which many utterances of gratitude were expressed to members of the Towne's band, or the Symphony, for performance of deeds deserving honour most high, and were attended by respected Persons from every corner of the Commonwealth.

The Event was first occasion'd by sundry remarks from Mr. Cabot, president of the Trustees, pertinent to the state of the band's organization. He reveal'd an adjustment of admission prices for the season ensuing in October, and likewise the amount of the current obligation—$350,000; a momentous sum, from which he petitioned most respectfully for relief, an entreaty that I humbly extend unto you.

All Bewigged

Following these statements the entire Hall was plunged into a profound darkness, and one could hear muffled mumbling and rustling of stage furniture through the void. When lamps and candles were lit, the Ladies and Gentlemen beheld a modest number of the Towne's ablest musicians, bewigged according to fashion and attired in habits of tasteful colour and classic design. They assigned themselves to their desks without fuss, the players of the French horns having brought a table with refreshment.

Having prepared a program of the finest Symphonies composed for us by Mr. Mozart, the band demonstrated the prowess and musicianly character for which they are reknowned—notwithstanding some notes struck with dissonant candor by the hornistes, done so with such authority that one would almost suspect the composer of putting them there with purpose.

As the Adagio was begun the horn players lay aside their instruments and betook themselves to their table, sipping wine from the cup with utmost calm and dignity; furthermore, they did not disdain a whit to try a hand with the cards. Indeed, vintage wine it must have been, for it attracted the leader's attention, and he was offerred the same by the principal hornist, for his eccentricity a man of obvious culture and grace.

Though the leader was given to wand'ring a bit during his cadenza, by good fortune he failed to upset the remainder of the Ensemble, and the players took to their duties in the Finale with great zeal. There were sounds disturbing to the ear in the penultimate and final harmonies, but by a stroke of goodness they gave the Audience great delight and added hilarity to the proceedings.

After Mr. Mozart's piece (A Musical Joke) the Ladies and Gentlemen retired to the rear chamber for tea, and the occasion was blessed with enduring gay spirit.

Render'd this 13th day of March, I remain your most humble and obedient servant,

McLAREN HARRIS

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Herald
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 283,819
MAR 8 1964

Special Week's Climax

FRIENDS OF SYMPHONY WILL MEET THURSDAY

"Symphony Week," which was designated by the proclamations of Gov. Peabody and Mayor Collins to honor the Boston Symphony Orchestra and to emphasize its need for continuous support by the community and Commonwealth, will conclude on Thursday with the annual meeting of the Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, those who have made a contribution to the orchestra for the 1963-64 season.

Members of the orchestra will present a special surprise program for the Friends, which was suggested by the orchestra members especially for this meeting and which is now in secret preparation. The Friends will also hear a short address by Henry B. Cabot, President of the Trustees, and have an informal reception afternoon in the Gallery

On Tuesday afternoon, March 10, Governor and Mrs. Endicott Peabody will honor Mr. and Mrs. Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony Orchestra with a Governors Reception at the State House. Invitations have been extended to the members of the orchestra, members of the Legislature and heads of State, and the Council of Friends of the orchestra.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sun (e)
LOWELL, Mass.
Circ. 45,001
MAR 29 1964

MEMBERS OF THE Boston Symphony orchestra are planning a special surprise program for the annual meeting of the Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, on Thursday, March 12. Attendance will be by invitation to all Friends of the Orchestra for the 1963-64 season, those who have made contributions during the current season. The annual meeting will be the climax and conclusion of "Symphony Week", March 2-12, which has been designated by Gov. Endicott Peabody and Mayor John F. Collins to honor the Orchestra for its achievements at home and abroad and to emphasize the need for continuous support of the Orchestra by the entire community.

Although the orchestra has for many years played a short musical program at the annual Friends meetings, this is the first time the members themselves have suggested a special surprise program of this nature.

Plans for "Symphony Week", including the March 12 annual Friends meeting, have been co-ordinated by the Council of Friends of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mrs. Louis W. Cabot and Mrs. Norman L. Cahners, co-chairmen.

On March 10 Gov. and Mrs. Peabody will hold a Governor's reception at the State House to honor Mr. and Mrs. Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has invited Leopold Stokowski to be guest conductor of the orchestra for the first time. The 82-year old conductor, who now works primarily with the American Symphony Orchestra in New York City which he created in 1962, will conduct the concerts of Friday and Saturday, March 6 and 7, and the following week, the programs of Monday and Tuesday.

192

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 194,870

MAR 13 1964

Today in Society

Symphony Players Don Knee Pants

By MARJORIE W. SHERMAN

The sight of Symphony's good men and true in satin knee pants and brocaded coats is a treat not soon to be forgotten (especially since it was back in the Koussevitzky era that these gorgeous garments made their last appearance). Lighting candles, playing cards and drinking wine, the orchestra perfectly illustrated Mozart's "Musical Joke," the occasion the 30th annual meeting of the Friends of Symphony.

It was a delightful party, with tea and coffee afterwards, and a host of longtime Symphony neighbors full of pleasant nostalgia. One was conscious, as always, of the remarkable versatility of these peerless players, remembering the goodwill as well as the consumate skill that makes up a working year of 208 concerts, from the Esplanade to the tall pines of the Berkshires, from the unsurpassed marvel of the Kennedy Memorial music to the smallest bit of musical byplay at the Youth Concerts.

Yet these men, at the top of their profession, held in the highest esteem by their own and every other world community of music, earn about an assistant professor's salary, and face with Henry Cabot, president of the trustees, the recurrent lack of funds ensuring the future of the orchestra.

Mr. Cabot spoke gratefully of 5000 "friends" of the orchestra and the fact that the orchestra has "earned" all but $350,000 of its $2,700,000 way this year, and stand $17,000 ahead of last year's deficit. But it still means "dipping into capital," a fearsome phrase to Bostonians since the first Adams argued against it.

Boston is increasingly conscious of its Symphony orchestra, according to Mr. Cabot, who also explained that tickets are not raised in price "because these are not meant to be concerts for the rich." He went on to point out that there are still seats in the second balcony for 60 cents, and they're likely to remain at that price.

Some of Thursday's guests at tea wondered aloud if Boston couldn't follow the pattern of other cities and hold a tremendous annual ball—with the orchestra as drawing card—a Mozart dinner, a Strauss champagne supper, a Bach breakfast—with talented Symphony wives planning menus, decorations and program. It seems like a wonderful idea for a wonderful cause.

Nearly a thousand Friends were at Symphony Hall for the 4 o'clock meeting—and in case a few early arrivals wondered why the doors weren't open as promptly as usual, it was because pianist van Cliburn was practicing for today's concert with the orchestra.

Former orchestra players as well as trustees, Women's Council members, and those who attend the concerts of Friday, Saturday, Monday or Tuesday made a most appreciative audience for the orchestra's Mozartian scene.

A few of the familiar faces —the Oliver Wolcotts, the Charles S. Birds — Mrs. George Lewis, Mrs. Robert H. Stevenson, the Charles Hoveys the Edward Tafts, Mrs. Thomas Gardiner with a Women's Council badge, attractive Mrs. James Grew also wearing the scarlet badge—the Robert Kennards, Mrs. John Enders, the Anthony Kuttens, Mrs. Alexander Steinert, the Albert Titcombs, and scores more.

The Boston Globe

Women's Pages

Confidential Chat • Fashions • Food • Society

FRIDAY, MARCH 13, 1964 Twenty-Three

AWAITING CUE—Members of Boston Symphony Orchestra wait for call to perform Mozart's "Musical Joke." (Herb Capwell Photo)

AWARDS.

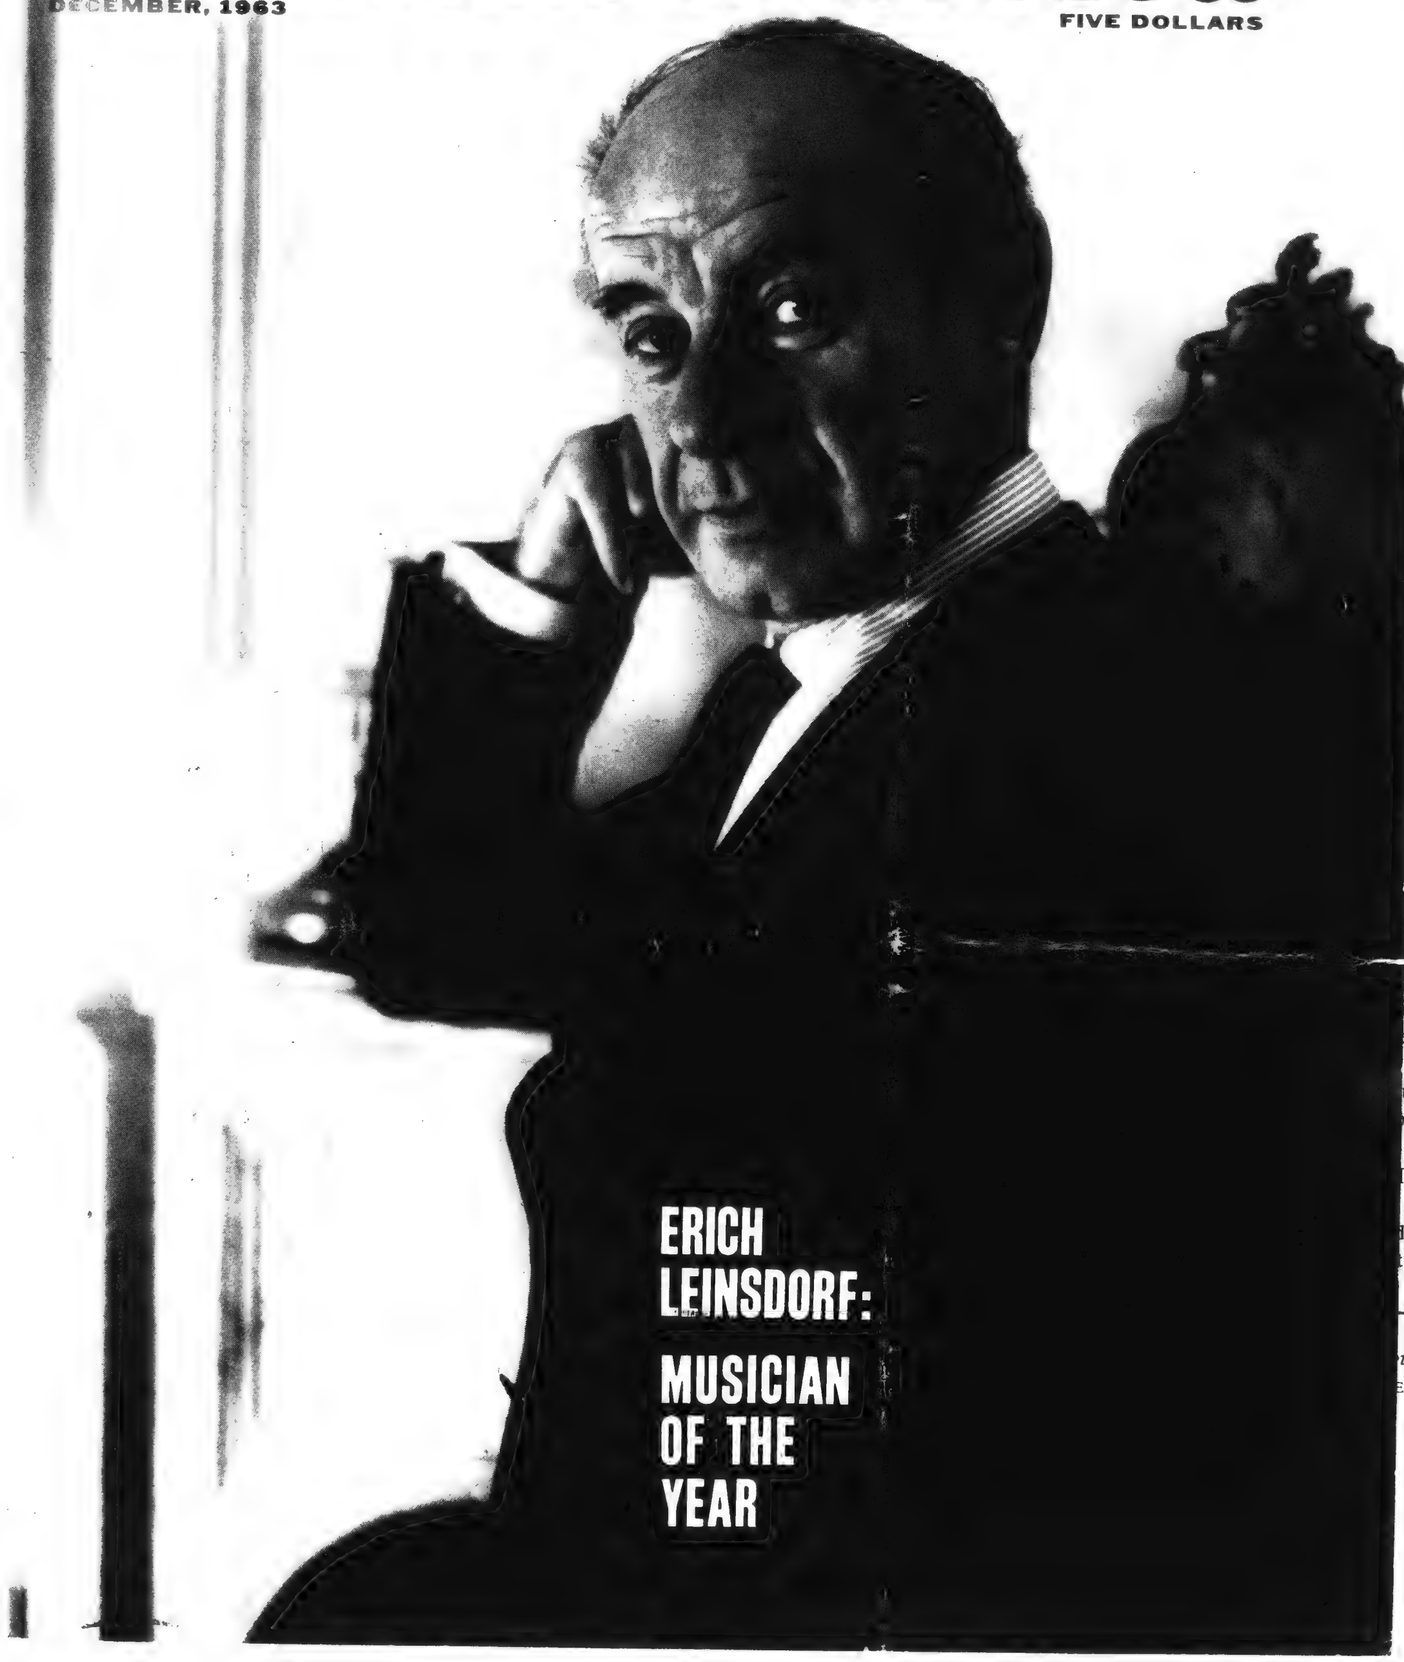
193

3

musical america

DECEMBER, 1963

FIVE DOLLARS



ERICH LEINSDORF: MUSICIAN OF THE YEAR

DRF:

ager of the Henry Cabot have lunch
He was not
's board of ot wanted to t developed,
so about the
er of things,
ed Leinsdorf
ical director

e that I had te a note to one should to tell you think," says ther cut his nows exactly ar is to call that at 7:29

y organized,
endous self-

n Leinsdorf's discipline," n willpower.
essional and
his faculties.
ed but says,
must do the s a commit-
f Brahms is feeling of te bum with uld enjoy it

a prisoner;
The freedom

dorf needing as easy to phony, was

ERICA'S 1963

ON THE COVER

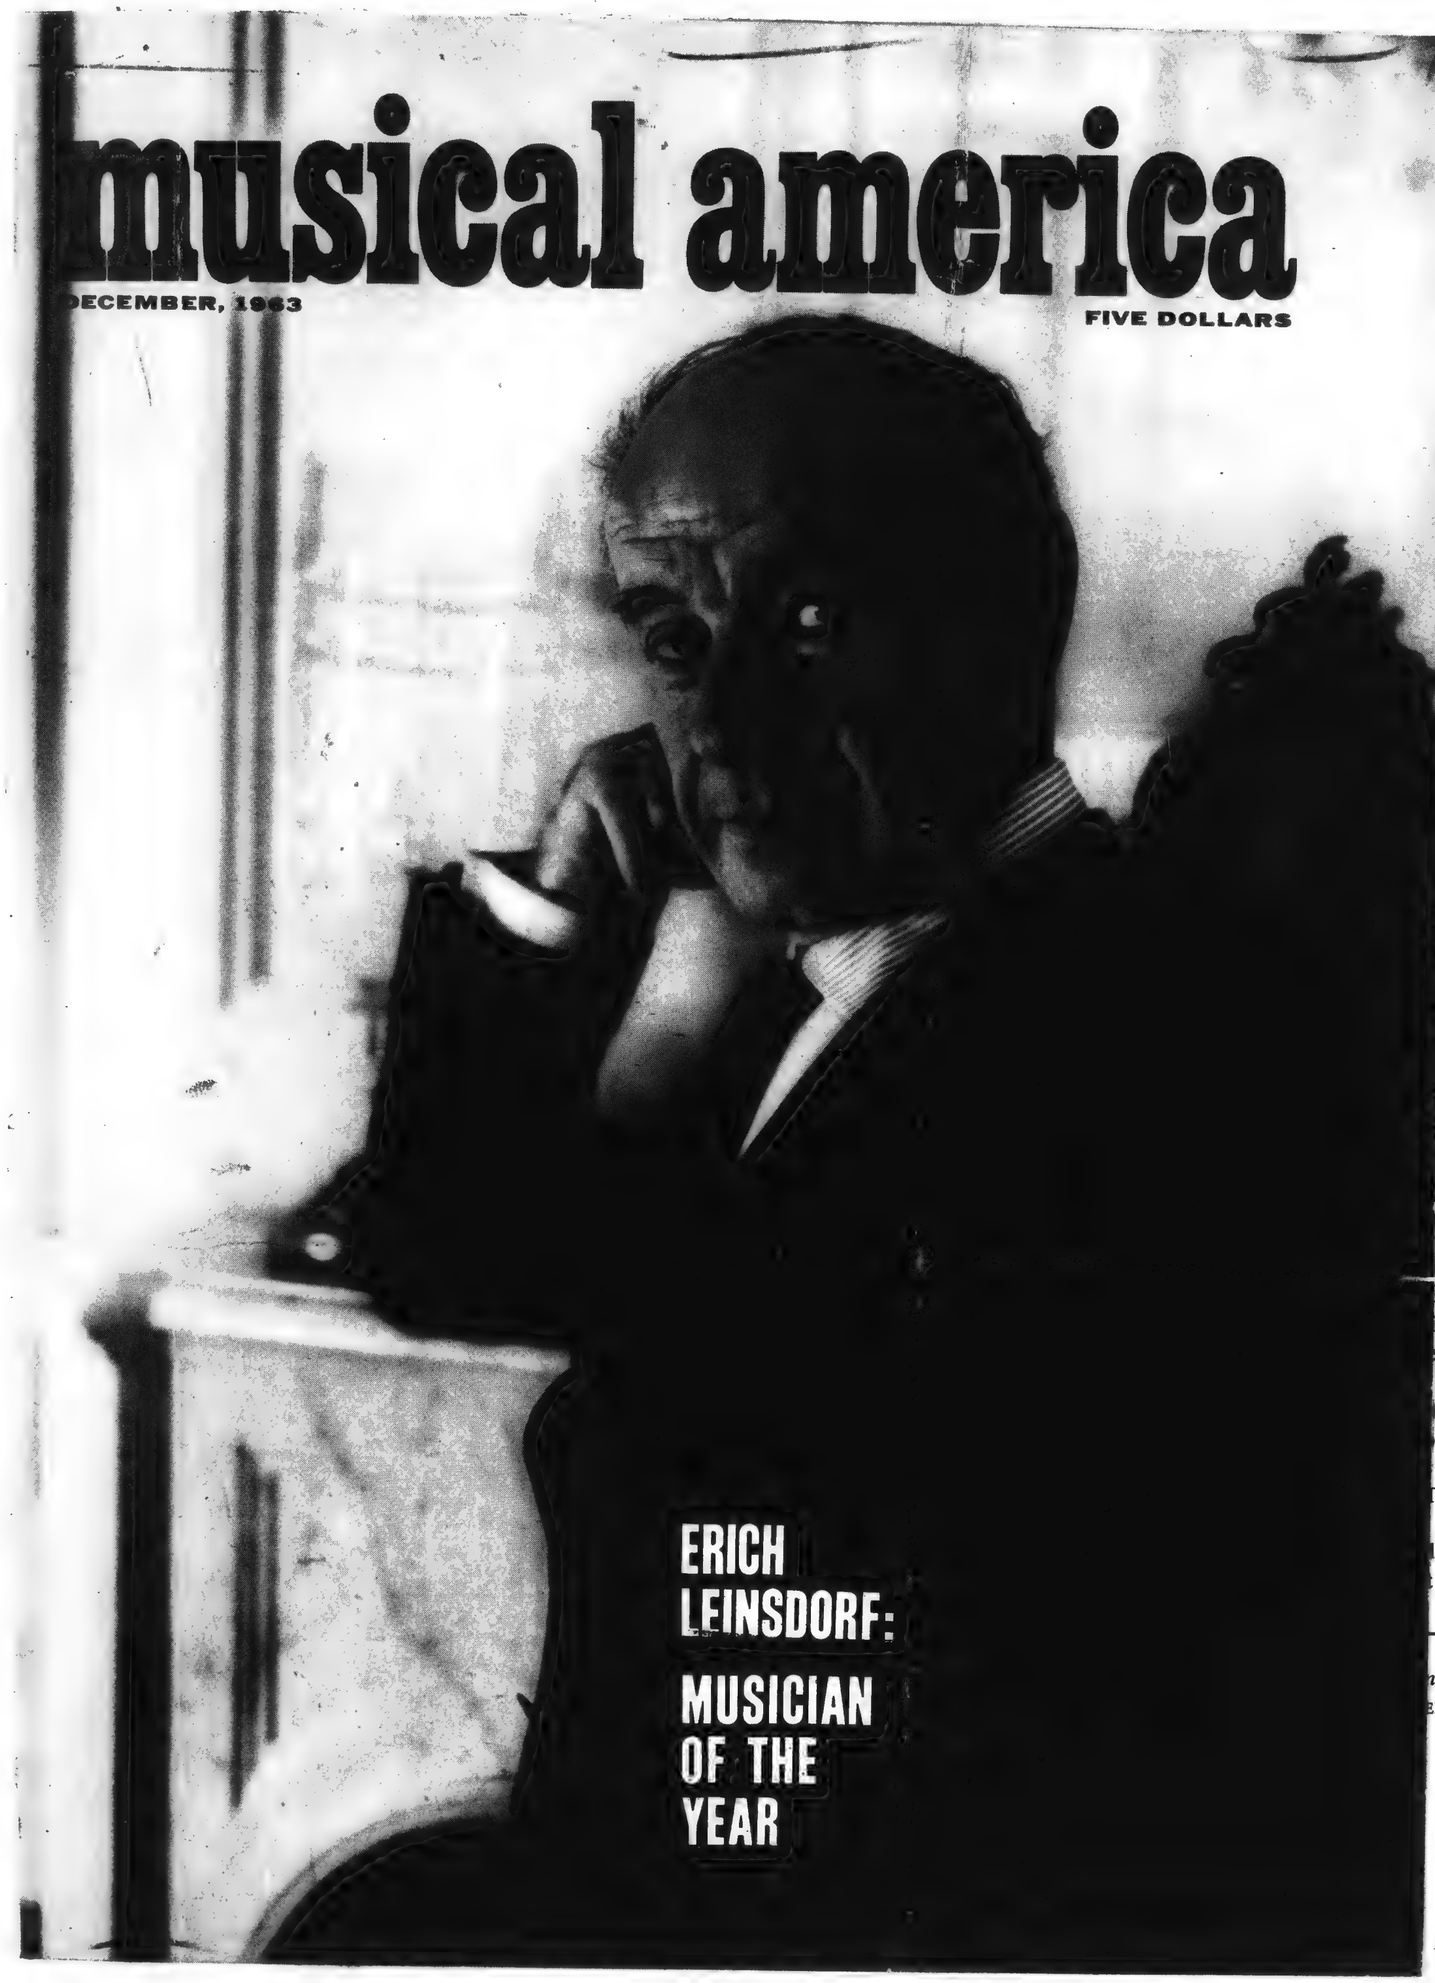
Erich Leinsdorf, conductor of the Boston Symphony, is featured on this month's cover as the choice, in a poll of the nation's music critics and editors, for the Musician of the Year.

(Photo by John Ardoin)

MPA®

AWARDS.

193



ON THE COVER

Erich Leinsdorf, conductor of the Boston Symphony, is featured on this month's cover as the choice, in a poll of the nation's music critics and editors, for the Musician of the Year.

(Photo by John Ardoin)

MPA

ORF:

ager of the Henry Cabot have lunch
He was not
's board of ot wanted to t developed,
so about the
er of things,
ed Leinsdorf
ical director

e that I had te a note to one should to tell you think," says ther cut his hows exactly

ar is to call that at 7:29
y organized,
endous self-

Leinsdorf's discipline," willpower.
essional and
his faculties.
ed but says,
must do the s a commit-
f Brahms is feeling of te bum with uld enjoy it

a prisoner;
The freedom

lorf needing as easy to phony, was ERICA'S 1963

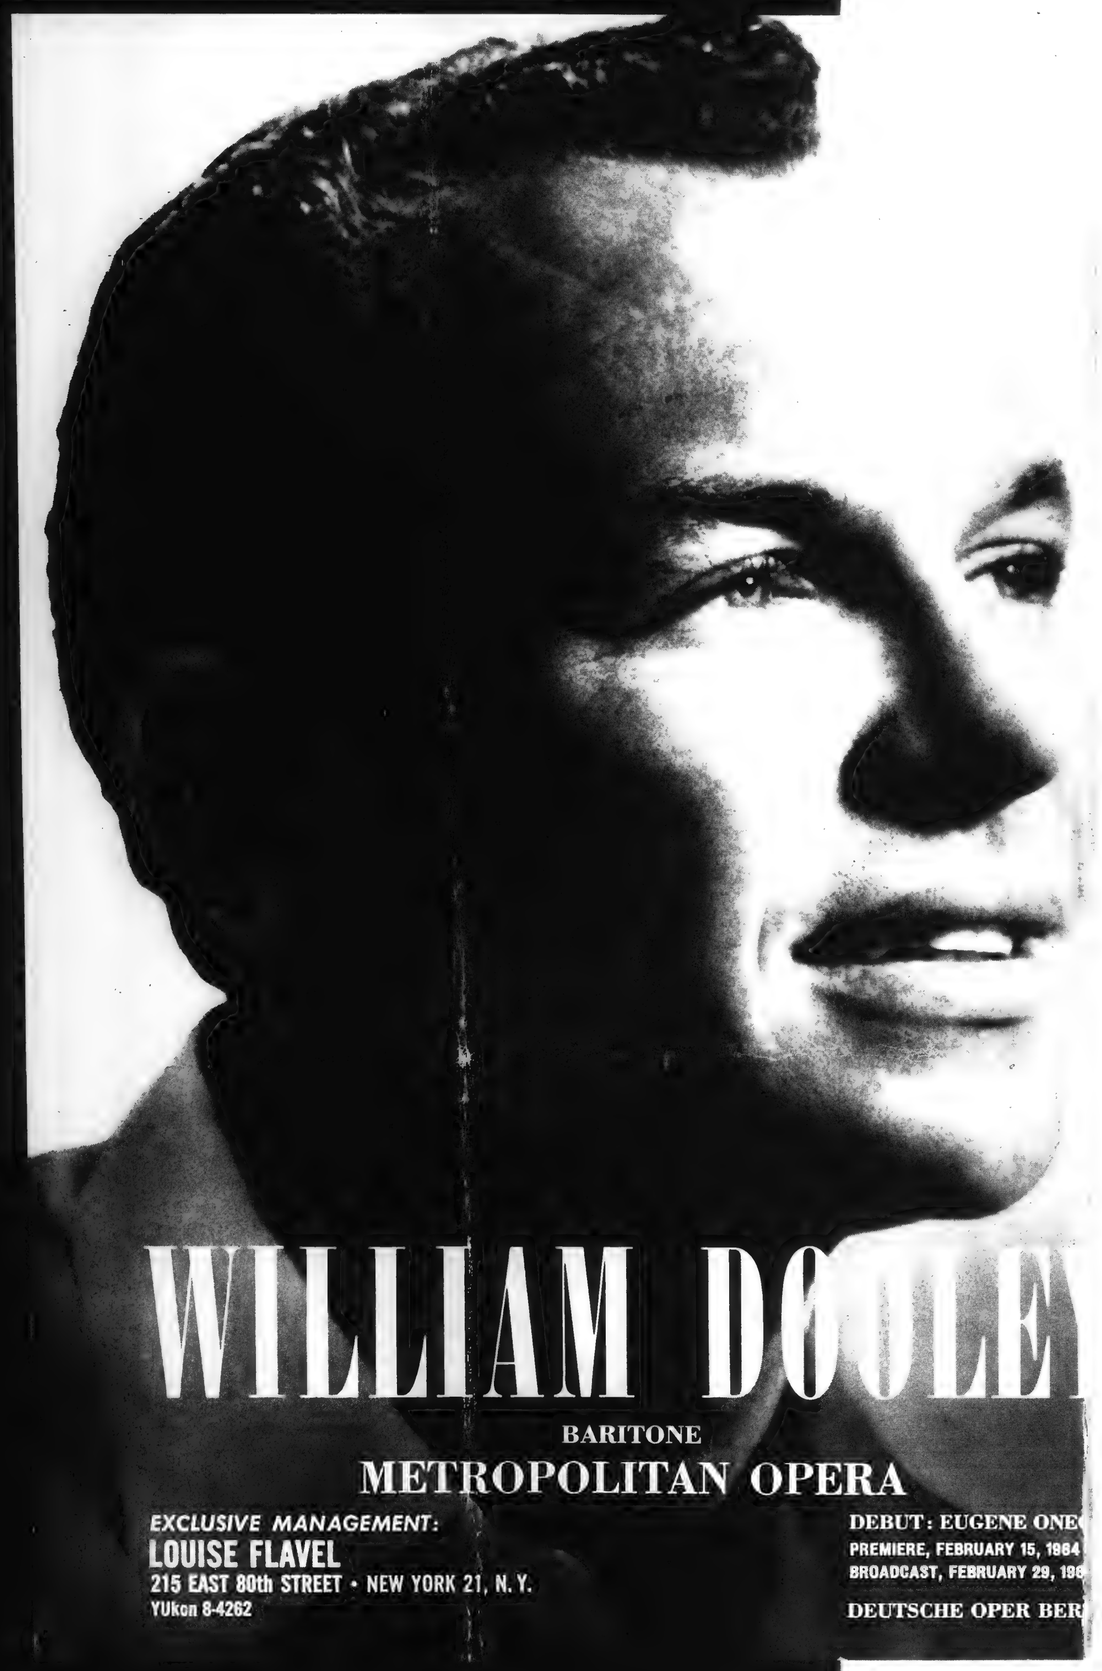
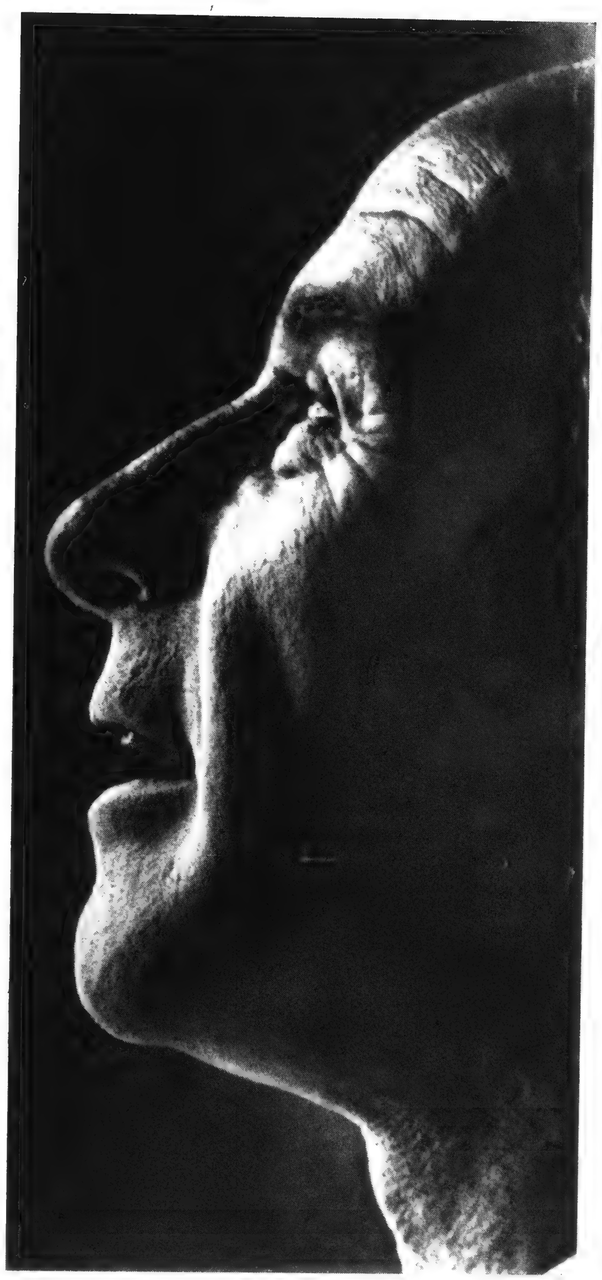
AWARDS.

19





ERICH LEINSDORF:

By Milton Esterow

One day in 1961, Thomas D. Perry, manager of the Boston Symphony, called Erich Leinsdorf. "Henry Cabot would like to meet you," he said. "Could you have lunch with us on Monday?" Leinsdorf said he could. He was not sure what Cabot, president of the orchestra's board of trustees, had in mind, but suspected that "Cabot wanted to look me over for future reference." Cabot, it developed, was thinking not only about the future but also about the present. After some casual talk about a number of things, including how Cabot played the clarinet, he offered Leinsdorf one of music's biggest plums—the post of musical director of the Boston Symphony.

"Later," Leinsdorf recalls, "it occurred to me that I had never formally accepted. I sat down and wrote a note to Cabot. I said, 'In general, when one is invited, one should reply. Since you have invited me, I just want to tell you "Thank you, I accept."' "

Leinsdorf has a passion for thoroughness. "I think," says a recording-company executive, "that he'd rather cut his throat than waste time." A friend says, "He knows exactly what he's going to do, when and how. If his car is to call for him at 7:30 at his house, you can be sure that at 7:29 he'll come through the door. He's tremendously organized, sort of a musical computer. There is this tremendous self-discipline."

The word "discipline" evokes harsh images in Leinsdorf's mind. "I think willpower is a better word than discipline," he says. "I have limitless confidence in human willpower.

"You know, the difference between the professional and the amateur performer is one of control over his faculties. The amateur is the person who is equally gifted but says, 'Tonight I don't feel like doing Brahms. I must do the Schubert.' The professional is the one who has a commitment to the public and must do the Brahms if Brahms is scheduled that night. I have a considerable feeling of responsibility to the audience."

He smiles and adds: "I could be an absolute bum with the greatest of ease. I flatter myself that I could enjoy it more. The man in a world of competition is a prisoner; anyone who thinks differently fools himself. The freedom of the bum appeals to me."

To the music world, the picture of Leinsdorf needing a shave and wearing tattered clothes is about as easy to

---

Erich Leinsdorf, conductor of the Boston Symphony, was elected Musician of the Year in MUSICAL AMERICA'S 1963 poll of the nation's music critics and editors.

ON THE COVER

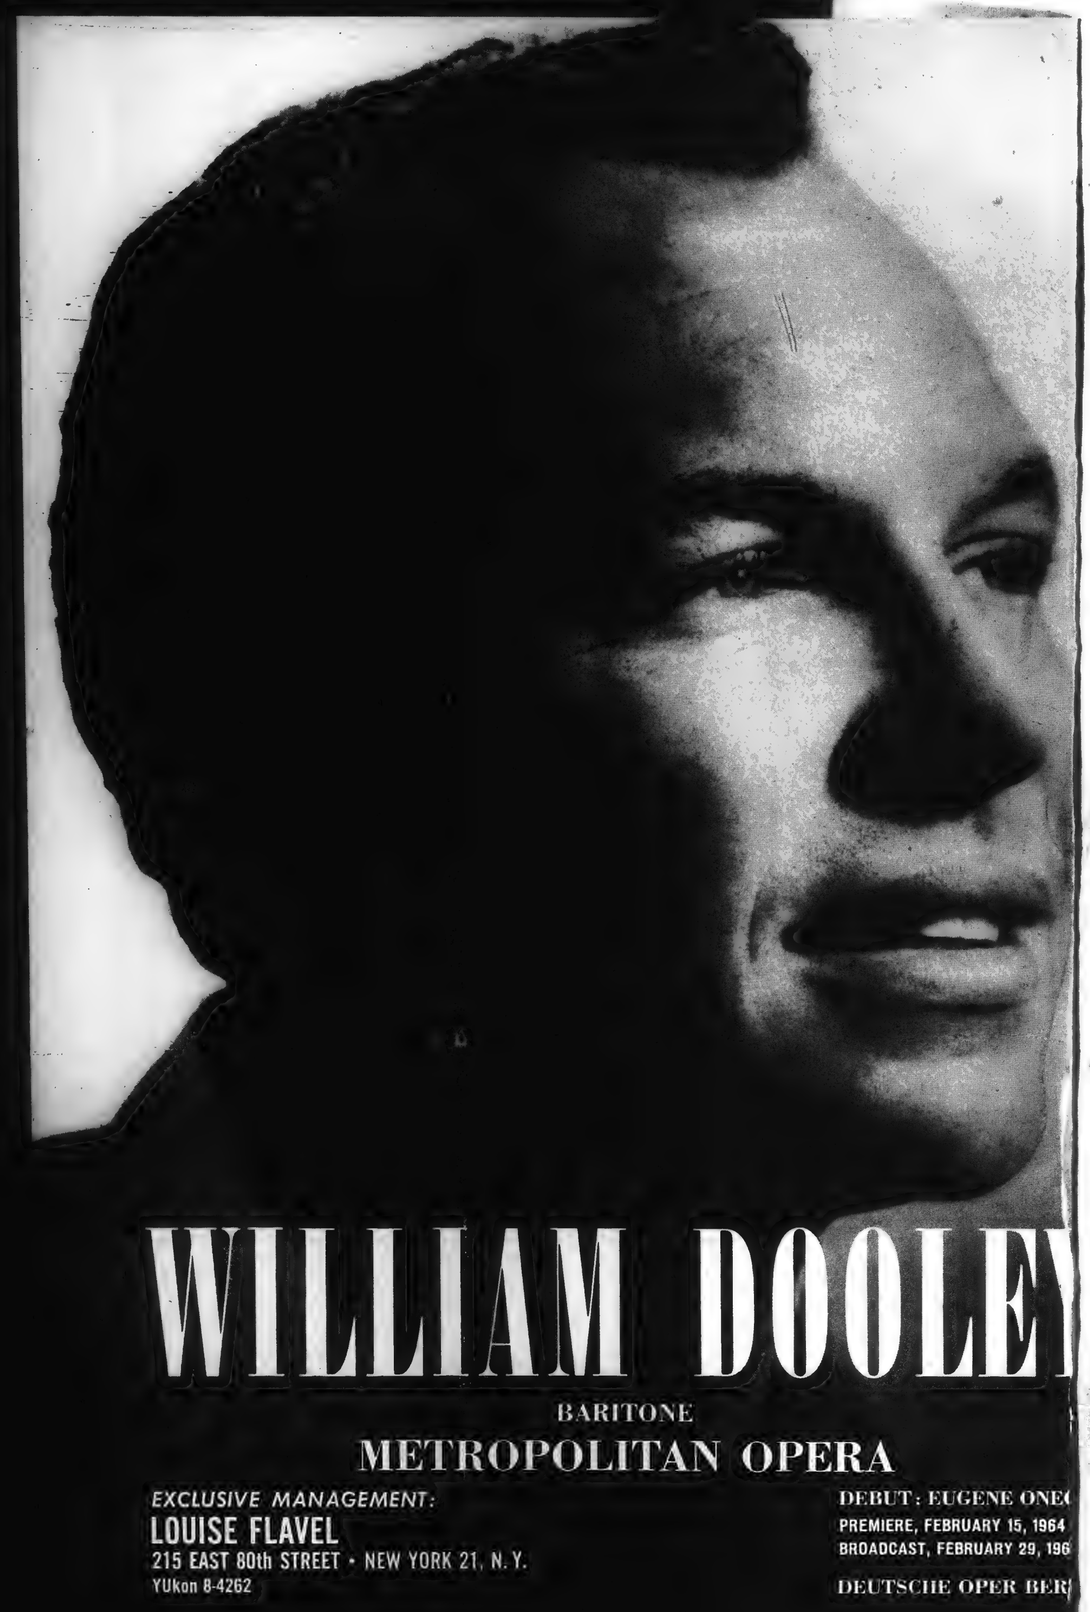
Erich Leinsdorf, conductor of the Boston Symphony, is featured on this month's cover as the choice, in a poll of the nation's music critics and editors, for the Musician of the Year.

(Photo by John Ardoin)

MPA®

AWARDS.

193



ERICH LEINSDORF:

By Milton Esterow

One day in 1961, Thomas D. Perry, manager of the Boston Symphony, called Erich Leinsdorf. "Henry Cabot would like to meet you," he said. "Could you have lunch with us on Monday?" Leinsdorf said he could. He was not sure what Cabot, president of the orchestra's board of trustees, had in mind, but suspected that "Cabot wanted to look me over for future reference." Cabot, it developed, was thinking not only about the future but also about the present. After some casual talk about a number of things, including how Cabot played the clarinet, he offered Leinsdorf one of music's biggest plums—the post of musical director of the Boston Symphony.

"Later," Leinsdorf recalls, "it occurred to me that I had never formally accepted. I sat down and wrote a note to Cabot. I said, 'In general, when one is invited, one should reply. Since you have invited me, I just want to tell you "Thank you, I accept."' "

Leinsdorf has a passion for thoroughness. "I think," says a recording-company executive, "that he'd rather cut his throat than waste time." A friend says, "He knows exactly what he's going to do, when and how. If his car is to call for him at 7:30 at his house, you can be sure that at 7:29 he'll come through the door. He's tremendously organized, sort of a musical computer. There is this tremendous self-discipline."

The word "discipline" evokes harsh images in Leinsdorf's mind. "I think willpower is a better word than discipline," he says. "I have limitless confidence in human willpower.

"You know, the difference between the professional and the amateur performer is one of control over his faculties. The amateur is the person who is equally gifted but says, 'Tonight I don't feel like doing Brahms. I must do the Schubert.' The professional is the one who has a commitment to the public and must do the Brahms if Brahms is scheduled that night. I have a considerable feeling of responsibility to the audience."

He smiles and adds: "I could be an absolute bum with the greatest of ease. I flatter myself that I could enjoy it more. The man in a world of competition is a prisoner; anyone who thinks differently fools himself. The freedom of the bum appeals to me."

To the music world, the picture of Leinsdorf needing a shave and wearing tattered clothes is about as easy to

---

Erich Leinsdorf, conductor of the Boston Symphony, was elected Musician of the Year in MUSICAL AMERICA'S 1963 poll of the nation's music critics and editors.

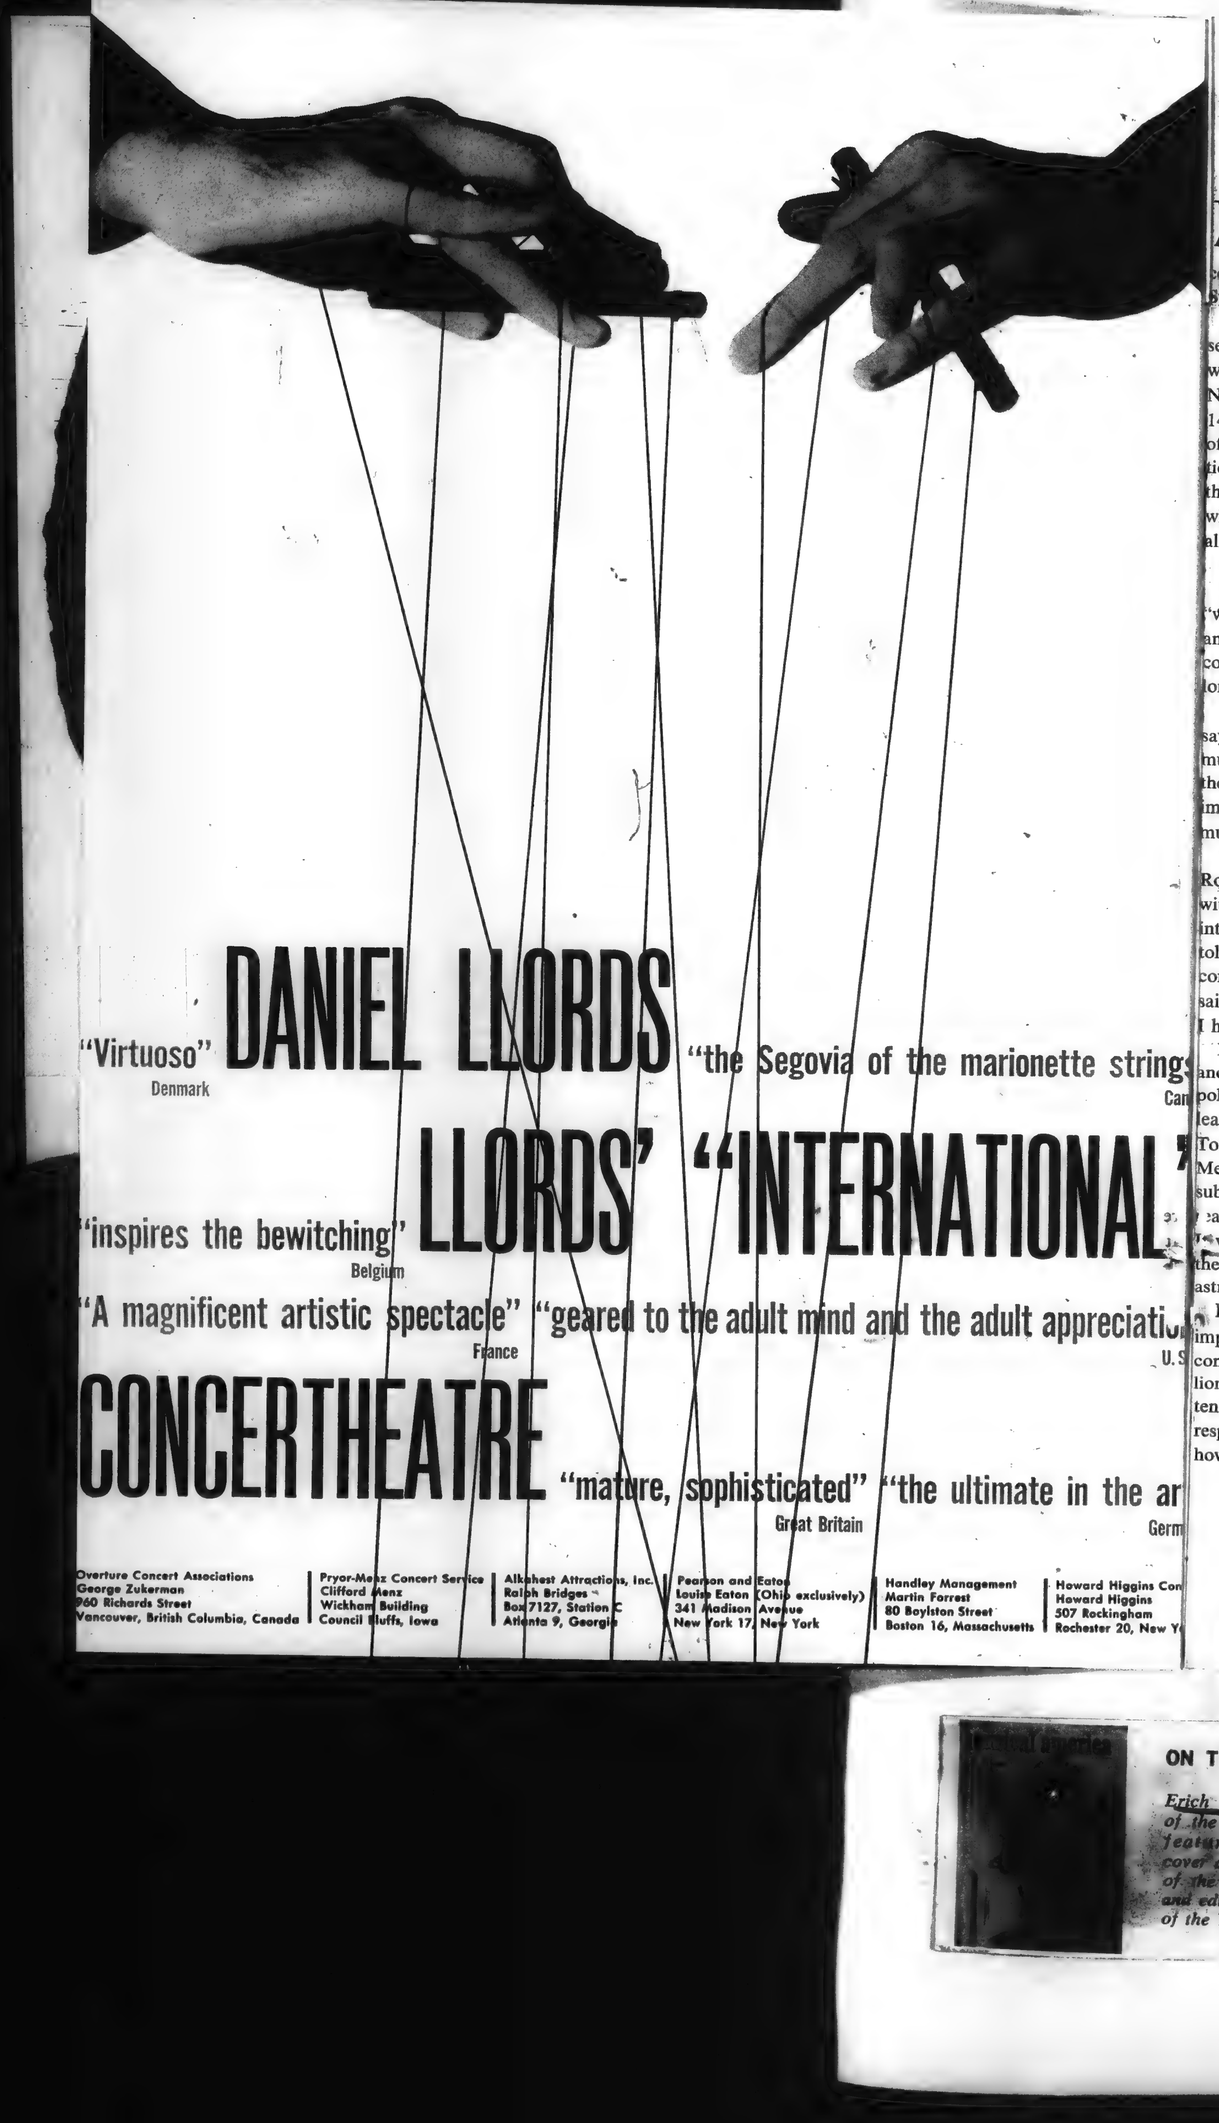
ON THE COVER

Erich Leinsdorf, conductor of the Boston Symphony, is featured on this month's cover as the choice, in a poll of the nation's music critics and editors, for the Musician of the Year.

(Photo by John Ardoin)

AWARDS.

193



2

MUSICIAN OF THE YEAR

conjure up as one of Jimmy Durante conducting the Boston Symphony in Beethoven's "Eroica."

In the 51 years since his birth in Vienna, the world has seen several Erich Leinsdorfs. One was the Wunderkind who skyrocketed to the top: asistant to Toscanini at 22, a New York debut as a conductor at the Metropolitan Opera 14 days before his 26th birthday. Another was the Leinsdorf of the 1940s and early '50s: a roly-poly man with a reputation in some circles as "a bear with a short temper." Today there is the Leinsdorf, short, thin and meticulously dressed, whose temper hasn't exploded publicly in years, and with all of Boston—musicans and the public—in love with him.

What has caused the transformation?

"When I worked with Toscanini," Leinsdorf explained, "what he consciously practiced and I admired was this: If an oboe or horn phrases a solo differently from your own conception, it is better for the end result to let him be, so long as he is anywhere in a reasonable avenue of good taste.

"I have not always managed this, but I think I can also say why. I have a short tolerance for any but the best musicians. Since I have not always been associated with them, this short tolerance has sometimes, I guess, made me impatient. I feel the most profound affection for the good musician.

"When I did the Bartók Concerto for Orchestra with the Rochester Symphony, that it couldn't be done as well as with the Philadelphia Orchestra got me into a mood of intolerance that was not entirely reasonable. I have no tolerance for the second-rate. In Rome last year at a recording session, a musician came up to me. 'Maestro,' he said, 'this year you are in such good humor.' I replied, 'Yes, I have a good orchestra.'"

Leinsdorf paused and went on. "What had been lacking, and it was not entirely my fault—it was partly through the political constellation of the world—was the normal minor-league experience. It's a large order when you start at 22, Toscanini's only assistant. At 26, your're conducting at the Met. Obviously, there was a human lag. Everything is subject to change. What caught up with me was a complete realization that a technocrat is not what the world wants. It wants a rounded man. I might also suggest that I'm not the only one whose association with Toscanini led him astray."

Leinsdorf credits Rudolf Bing with having played an important role in the transformation. "He's exceedingly concerned for his personnel. The whole picture of a cruel lion tamer is something in which he has to indulge five or ten per cent of the time. He feels an intense loyalty and responsibility to the people he works with. Yet I've seen how this man, with a few strokes, got his name in the news with a totally different slant, as if seen through a false lens. I realized that this could happen to anybody. What I'm saying is that I became aware that one may project oneself so that other people see one differently from how one sees oneself. I have in the last five years learned more about what communicates to the outside world.

"My main problem was the lack of minor-league seasoning and the lack of a person whose advice I could trust. I don't think people can exist without advice. I believed that if one had ability it was the beginning and the end of the story. One must have more than ability. You can pound the hell out of a piano. But the conductor's instrument is the human being. The No. 1 thing when you work as a conductor is your ability with humans on a thousand different levels. Over the years, this gradually dawned on me."

Of Leinsdorf before Boston, a friend says: "Erich was getting nowhere fast. He was getting lots of exposure, but he was like a lot of conductors who haven't made it. They put on a big show, make themselves more important than they are. But all this irritation with life is a thing of the past."

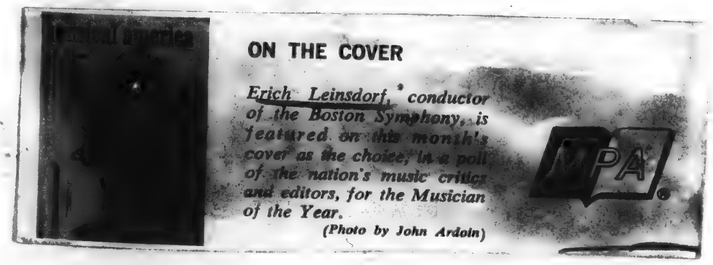
At rehearsals, a musician says, there is the iron hand in the velvet glove, but the velvet is very thick. "The Boston Symphony hasn't worked so hard since the Koussevitzky days."

"He's amazing in sizing up a situation," says one Boston observer. "You must be honest with him. If you try to wiggle, he zooms in on you. If you level with him, anything is all right. He will forgive you if you say 'I don't know,' but if you're not honest, well, then his eyes get steely. The musicans admire and respect him. I don't think there is the same emotional relationship that they had with Munch. Munch was very warm, but with Leinsdorf there's a certain formality. At the Berkshire Music Festival, Leinsdorf would wander into a class unannounced. The kids used to say, 'Don't relax. Big Daddy is watching you.'"

Leinsdorf was born on February 4, 1912. His father died when Erich was three. "I was started in music by my mother," Leinsdorf said. "Her plan was to get me—through the help of one of her uncles, who was an editor—into the newspaper business. I started playing the piano when I was five. Up to my 15th year, I was in doubt what I was going to be. I was interested in soccer. I played left fullback, and when I was tired of running I was the goalie. I had a very good kick with my left foot.

"By the age of 18, I knew I was going to be a performer. I didn't know in what capacity. At that age you can't make up your mind. I tell the kids at Tanglewood that the casting is done a little bit by forces outside ourselves.

"I studied orchestral conducting in Vienna and tried to



ON THE COVER

Erich Leinsdorf, conductor of the Boston Symphony, is featured on this month's cover as the choice, in a poll of the nation's music critics and editors, for the Musician of the Year.

(Photo by John Ardoin)

AWARDS.

193

On the porch of Leinsdorf's house, plans are made for Tanglewood: Leonard Burkat, former music administrator of the Boston Symphony; conductor Leinsdorf; and Thomas D. Perry, Jr., the orchestra's manager land any kind of position. Austria was in a depression, and the shadows across the border were large." In 1933, he hiked 150 miles to Salzburg, where he got a job as Bruno Walter's assistant in preparing operas for the festival.

In 1934, Toscanini was in Vienna to conduct the Vienna Philharmonic. "I was sitting and listening to one of the rehearsals," Leinsdorf said. "One of the officials of the orchestra came into the hall and said they couldn't find anyone to play Kodaly's 'Psalmus Hungaricus' on the piano for the old man. I told him I could. Toscanini liked the way I played it."

For the next three summers, Leinsdorf was Toscanini's assistant in Salzburg. In 1938, Leinsdorf was hired as a conductor at the Metropolitan. How did he get the job in New York? "Lotte Lehmann had a lot to do with it. I knew her well in Salzburg. I coached her in some of her roles. But I've never quite pinned down who did what. Toscanini? He wasn't on speaking terms with the Met. The direct line was Lehmann, Edward Johnson and Artur Bodanzky."

On Leinsdorf's arrival in this country, there was visa trouble. His visa expired in 1938. "It took the help of a freshman Congressman named Lyndon Johnson to prepare the necessary legal formula for me to leave the country, go to Canada briefly, and apply to the American consulate for quick re-entry."

Leinsdorf made his debut at the Met on January 21, 1938, conducting "Die Walküre." Noel Straus wrote in The New York Times: "Although but 26 years old, the new director led his forces with a sure hand and in general made a favorable impression. If there was nothing startling about his work, it evidenced solid musicianship and was ripe with exceptional promise."

Some months later, the Met was ripe with complaints. The Wagnerian wing, led by Lauritz Melchior and Kirsten Flagstad, felt that Leinsdorf was not yet ready to conduct at the Met.

"To my fairly accurate memory, there was never an overt fight between us," said Leinsdorf. "There was a disapproval of my musical ways. Bodanzky had got them used to a style—to get through as fast and easily as they could. He speeded up Wagner's tempos till it wasn't even funny. Lauritz told me, 'You know, you may be right with your tempos, but nobody can sing these operas three times a week your way.' "

Above: Leinsdorf and concertmaster Joseph Silverstein discuss musical problems en route to an engagement. Right: Leinsdorf at home in Symphony Hall

Leinsdorf was at the Met until 1943. He left to become conductor of the Cleveland Orchestra. A few months later, he was inducted into the army. He was honorably discharged 18 months later. From 1947 to 1955, he was conductor of the Rochester Philharmonic. Then there was a season as director of the New York City Opera. He went back to the Met as guest conductor and was there until the call came from Boston.

Leinsdorf lives in Brookline, Massachusetts, with his wife, Anne, whom he married in 1939. They have five children: David, 21; Gregor, 19; Joshua, 18; Hester, 15; and Jennifer, 11.

At one time, Leinsdorf played bridge not infrequently. Now, he says, he finds all games, after the first few minutes, exceedingly boring. He reads a great deal about politics, government and European history. "My greatest relaxation is moving mentally in totally different directions, meeting people on a totally different track—for example, Cambridge or M.I.T. people."

A Leinsdorf admirer says, "For the first time in his career, Erich is in the right job at the right time."

Leinsdorf replies: "If this is true, one has to believe in certain constellations." He adds: "I remember my first rehearsal, as guest conductor, in Boston. It was January 31, 1961, a Tuesday. From my first second on that stage, I was at home." ●

ON THE COVER

Erich Leinsdorf, conductor of the Boston Symphony, is featured on this month's cover as the choice, in a poll of the nation's music critics and editors, for the Musician of the Year.

(Photo by John Ardoin)

MPA®

AWARDS.

193

On the porch of Leinsdorf's house, plans are made for Tanglewood: Leonard Burkat, former music administrator of the Boston Symphony; conductor Leinsdorf; and Thomas D. Perry, Jr., the orchestra's manager land any kind of position. Austria was in a depression, and the shadows across the border were large." In 1933, he hiked 150 miles to Salzburg, where he got a job as Bruno Walter's assistant in preparing operas for the festival.

In 1934, Toscanini was in Vienna to conduct the Vienna Philharmonic. "I was sitting and listening to one of the rehearsals," Leinsdorf said. "One of the officials of the orchestra came into the hall and said they couldn't find anyone to play Kodaly's 'Psalmus Hungaricus' on the piano for the old man. I told him I could. Toscanini liked the way I played it."

For the next three summers, Leinsdorf was Toscanini's assistant in Salzburg. In 1938, Leinsdorf was hired as a conductor at the Metropolitan. How did he get the job in New York? "Lotte Lehmann had a lot to do with it. I knew her well in Salzburg. I coached her in some of her roles. But I've never quite pinned down who did what. Toscanini? He wasn't on speaking terms with the Met. The direct line was Lehmann, Edward Johnson and Artur Bodanzky."

On Leinsdorf's arrival in this country, there was visa trouble. His visa expired in 1938. "It took the help of a freshman Congressman named Lyndon Johnson to prepare the necessary legal formula for me to leave the country, go to Canada briefly, and apply to the American consulate for quick re-entry."

Leinsdorf made his debut at the Met on January 21, 1938, conducting "Die Walküre." Noel Straus wrote in The New York Times: "Although but 26 years old, the new director led his forces with a sure hand and in general made a favorable impression. If there was nothing startling about his work, it evidenced solid musicianship and was ripe with exceptional promise."

Some months later, the Met was ripe with complaints. The Wagnerian wing, led by Lauritz Melchior and Kirsten Flagstad, felt that Leinsdorf was not yet ready to conduct at the Met.

"To my fairly accurate memory, there was never an overt fight between us," said Leinsdorf. "There was a disapproval of my musical ways. Bodanzky had got them used to a style—to get through as fast and easily as they could. He speeded up Wagner's tempos till it wasn't even funny. Lauritz told me, 'You know, you may be right with your tempos, but nobody can sing these operas three times a week your way.' "

Above: Leinsdorf and concertmaster Joseph Silverstein discuss musical problems en route to an engagement. Right: Leinsdorf at home in Symphony Hall

Leinsdorf was at the Met until 1943. He left to become conductor of the Cleveland Orchestra. A few months later, he was inducted into the army. He was honorably discharged 18 months later. From 1947 to 1955, he was conductor of the Rochester Philharmonic. Then there was a season as director of the New York City Opera. He went back to the Met as guest conductor and was there until the call came from Boston.

Leinsdorf lives in Brookline, Massachusetts, with his wife, Anne, whom he married in 1939. They have five children: David, 21; Gregor, 19; Joshua, 18; Hester, 15; and Jennifer, 11.

At one time, Leinsdorf played bridge not infrequently. Now, he says, he finds all games, after the first few minutes, exceedingly boring. He reads a great deal about politics, government and European history. "My greatest relaxation is moving mentally in totally different directions, meeting people on a totally different track—for example, Cambridge or M.I.T. people."

A Leinsdorf admirer says, "For the first time in his career, Erich is in the right job at the right time."

Leinsdorf replies: "If this is true, one has to believe in certain constellations." He adds: "I remember my first rehearsal, as guest conductor, in Boston. It was January 31, 1961, a Tuesday. From my first second on that stage, I was at home." ●

ON THE COVER

Erich Leinsdorf, conductor of the Boston Symphony, is featured on this month's cover as the choice, in a poll of the nation's music critics and editors, for the Musician of the Year.

(Photo by John Ardoin)

194

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

PEEKSKILL STAR
Friday, December 27, 1963

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

ALBANY TIMES UNION
Sunday, December 22, 1963

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

NEW ROCHELLE STANDARD
Thursday, December 26, 1963

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

YONKERS HERALD STATESMAN
Thursday, December 26, 1963

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

MAMARONECK TIMES
Thursday, December 26, 1963

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

MOUNT VERNON ARGUS
Thursday, December 26,

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

OSSINING CITIZEN REGISTER
Thursday, December 26, 1963

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

TROY TIMES RECORD
December 28,

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

SCHENECTADY GAZETTE
Tuesday, December 24, 1963

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

White Plains Reporter Dispatch
Friday, December 27, 1963

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Times (e)
HARTFORD, Conn.
Circ. 126,360
JAN 7 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Press (e)
BRISTOL, Conn.
Circ. 14,439
DEC 27 1963

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Register
NEW HAVEN, Conn.
Circ. 105,605
JAN 5 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
News (e)
SPRINGFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 101,591
DEC 20 1963

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Herald
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 283,819
DEC 22 1963

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 465,653
DEC 22 1963

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Union (m)
SPRINGFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 83,691
DEC 19 1963

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sun (e)
ATTLEBORO, Mass.
Circ. 11,206
DEC 18 1963

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Times (e)
BEVERLY, Mass.
Circ. 8,350
DEC 26 1963

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sun (e)
LOWELL, Mass.
Circ. 45,001
DEC 21 1963

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Republican
SPRINGFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 112,302
DEC 22 1963

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Berkshire Eagle (e)
PITTSFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 29,087
DEC 19 1963

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Times
NEW MILFORD, Conn.
Weekly Circ. 4,129
DEC 23 1963

Chattanooga Daily Times
CHATTANOOGA, TENN.
D. 52,218 S. 82,245
DEC 22 1963

THE REPORTER DISPATCH
WHITE PLAINS, N. Y.
D. 32,821
DEC 27 1963

San Francisco Chronicle
THE VOICE OF THE WEST
D. 300,065 S. 330,671
DEC 30 1963

Atlantic City Press
ATLANTIC CITY, N. J.
D. 49,351 S. 35,543
DEC 22 1963

The Daily Argus
MOUNT VERNON, N. Y.
D. 18,830
DEC 26 1963

The Hartford Times
D. 126,360
JAN 7 1964

INTERNATIONAL MUSICIAN
NEWARK, N. J.
MONTHLY 245,100
APR 1964

Baltimore American
BALTIMORE, MD.
SUN. 312,266
DEC 29 1963

New York Post
D. 372,679 S. 255,557
DEC 27 1963

VARIETY
NEW YORK, N.Y.
W. - CIRC.N.AVAIL.
DEC 25 1963

THE KANSAS CITY STAR
KANSAS CITY, MO.
D. 336,484 S. 370,535
DEC 29 1963

The Denver Post
The Voice of the Rocky Mountain Empire
D. 249,867 S. 347,167
JAN 12 1964

Honolulu Star-Bulletin
D. 100,858
JAN 1 1964

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
BAY NEWS
W. 12,100
DEC 28 1963

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
KINGS COURIER
W. 15,200
DEC 28 1963

St. Louis Globe-Democrat
D. 306,470 S. 375,265
DEC 28 1963

Leinsdorf 'Musician Of Year'

Erich Leinsdorf, Music Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has been named Musician of the Year by Musical America, one of the leading magazines in its field in the United States. This designation was based on a poll of the nation's music critics and editors. As Musician of the Year Leinsdorf will appear on the cover of the January, 1964 Annual Booking Edition of Musical America and will be the subject of a major article.

In the 1962-63 music season Erich Leinsdorf began his first year as Music Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra During his first season he introduced the world premiere of Samuel Barber's Piano Concerto, the world premiere of the Benjamin Lees Violin Concerto, and the American premiere of Benjamin Britten's War Requiem. He led the Orchestra in all eleven concerts of its Transcontinental Tour in April.

In July he began his first summer of directing the Orchestra in its Berkshire Festival programs at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., conducting 18 of the 24 concerts. At the same time he began his duties as director of the Berkshire Music Center, taking an active part with his seminars for conductors.

Leinsdorf is a Fellow of the American Academy of Arts and Sciences, Boston, and a member of the Advisory Committee on the Arts of the National Cultural Center, Washington, D. C.

MUSIC VENDOR
NEWARK, N. J.
W. 6,600

DEC 2 8 1963

Leinsdorf of Year'

...and music editors of ...papers and magazines ...Leinsdorf their choice ...for "Musician of the Year" for 1963. Poll was conducted and the results announced by Musical America in its annual artists issue.

Leinsdorf, now in his second season as music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was the choice of the critics, who have ...of the brilliance he has ...ton orchestra in the two-

...ar. RCA Victor has is-...rdings of Leinsdorf con-...ston orchestra as well as ...which he conducted for an operatic ...ning with Bartok's Concerto for Orchestra and continuing with Mahler's Symphony No. 1 (the first Mahler recording ever to gain a place on the popular best-selling charts), Leinsdorf has subsequently recorded Beethoven's Eroica Symphony, Richard Strauss' Ein Heldenleben, Mendelssohn's Incidental Music to a Midsummer Night's Dream, and two recordings with soloists—Dello Joio's Fantasy and Variations and Ravel's Concerto in G with pianist Lorin Hollander and Tchaikovsky's Piano Concerto No. 1 with Artur Rubinstein.

In opera, Leinsdorf was the conductor for the Red Seal recording of "Madam Butterfly," with Leontyne Price, Richard Tucker, Rosalind Elias and Philip Maero. Issued as the first opera in "Dynagroove" "Madama Butterfly" was heralded by many critics.

In addition to the regular Boston Symphony seasons in Boston and at Tanglewood, Leinsdorf has also directed the orchestra's sold-out New York and Brooklyn seasons and brought the ensemble renewed national attention by way of an extensive transcontinental tour last winter.

CASH BOX
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W.—CIRC. N. AVAIL.

DEC 2 8 1963

Mag Poll Names Leinsdorf As "Musician Of The Year"

ERIC LEINSDORF

...K—Conductor Erich Leins-...n the nod of the nation's ...ics and music editors as ...of the Year" for 1963.

...was conducted by Musical ...nag, and the results are in ...t annual artists issue.

...orf, in his second season as ...or of the Boston Symphony, ha... a busy disk year, having been inv...d in eight RCA Victor Red Sea... releases. Seven of the releases were instrumental classics, one was an opera, "Madama Butterfly," Victor's first opera in Dynagroove and the label's fastest-selling opera package ever.

PAGE ONE
CRIMMED

BILLBOARD
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 50,000

MAY 2 3 1964

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 603,574 SUN. 1,283,785

MAY 1 3 1964

RECORD WORLD
NEW YORK, N.Y.
W. - CIRC.N.AVAIL.

MAY 30 1964

The News American
BALTIMORE, MD.
D. 213,257 SUN. 312,266

MAY 2 4 1964

New York World-Telegram and The Sun
D. 423,849 SAT. 142,176

MAY 1 3 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Evening Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 146,915

MAY 1 3 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 202,711

MAY 1 3 1964

Leinsdorf Wins Two Grammys

NEW YORK — Erich Leinsdorf, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra won two Grammy awards Tuesday night at the annual awards banquet of the National Academy of Recording Arts and Scientists.

His first was for best classical performance - orchestral — "Bartok Concerto for Orchestra," in which he conducted the BSO.

The second was for best opera recording — Puccini's "Madama Butterfly" with Leinsdorf conducting the RCA Italiana Orchestra and Chorus.

Bandleader Henry Mancini won the Grammy for the Record of the Year, for "The Days of Wine and Roses."

The melody composed by Mancini and Johnny Mercer also received the Maris Award as the Song of the Year.

Barbra Streisand won the Album of the Year Award for "the Barbra Streisand Album" and also received the Grammy for the best female vocal performance for the same album.

The Album of the Year in the classical category was Benjamin Britten "War Requiem."

There were 42 prizes awarded. Among the leading recipients were:

Best instrumental jazz performance by soloist or small group: "Conversations with Myself" by pianist Bill Evans.

Best instrumental jazz performance by large group: "Encore Woody Herman 1963"" by Woody Herman.

Best performance by an orchestra primarily not jazz or for dancing—"Java" by Al Hirt.

Best new artists of 1963—The Swingle Singers. Same group won best performance by a chorus for "Bach's greatest hits."

Best gospel or other religious recording—"Dominique" by Soeur Sourire.

Best performance by a vocal group—"Blowing in the Wind," by Peter Paul and Mary.

Best original score from a motion picture or television show—"Tom Jones."

Best score fro man original cast show album—"She Loves Me."

Best classical performance—vocal soloist—"Great Scenes from Gershwin's Porgy and Bess," by Leontyne Price.

Best classical composition by contemporary composer—"War Requiem," by Benjamin Britten.

Best comedy performance—"Hello Muddah, Hello Faddah," by Allen Sherman.

Best documentary spoken word or drama recording other than comedy—"Who's Afraid of Virginia Woolf," by the original cast.

Best Rock 'n' Roll recording —"Deep Purple," by Nino Tempo and April Stevens.

Best country and western recording—"Detroit City," by Bobby Bare.

Best folk recording—"Blowing in the Wind," by Peter Paul and Mary.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Patriot-Ledger (e)
QUINCY, Mass.
Circ. 44,419
DEC 1 9 1963

U.S., French Prizes Given Charles Munch And Erich Leinsdorf

Boston Symphony Orchestra music directors, past and present, have been named winners of national and international honors.

Charles Munch, who left Boston in August, 1962, is the recipient of the 1964 Grand Prix National du Disque for his Boston Symphony recording of Berlioz' "Romeo and Juliet." Erich Leinsdorf, who replaced Dr. Munch last year, has been named "musician of the year" by the magazine Musical America.

"Romeo and Juliet" was recorded April, 1961 at Symphony Hall, with Rosalind Elias, Giorgio Tozzi and Cesare Valletti soloists. The New England Conservatory Chorus accompanied.

Leinsdorf, selected by a magazine poll of the nation's music critics and editors, conducted the world premieres of Benjamin Lee's Violin Concerto and Samuel Barber's Piano Concerto and the American premiere of Benjamin Britten's "War Requiem" during his first year as music director. A fellow of the American Academy of Arts and Sciences, Boston, and a member of the advisory committee on the arts of the National Cultural Center, Washington, D.C., Leinsdorf won the Grand Prix last year for his recording of "Die Walkure" with the London Symphony Orchestra and soloists.

CUE
NEW YORK, N.Y.
W. 167,032

DEC 28 1963

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Traveler (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 164,299

FEB 3 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 194,870

JAN 3 0 1964

Charles Munch Will Get Music Degree

Charles Munch, former conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will receive an honorary Doctor of Music degree from the New England Conservatory of Music at a convocation in Jordan Hall on Feb. 5. The ceremony, which will include a brief musical program, will begin at 4 p.m. The public is invited. No tickets are required.

Invited guests include faculty, trustees, and friends of the New England Conservatory; trustees and members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; representatives of the French government, and civic and community leaders. Conservatory Pres. Chester W. Williams will confer the degree.

During his association with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Munch performed and recorded several major works with the New England Conservatory Chorus, Lorna Cooke deVaron, conductor. One of their recent RCA Victor recordings has won three separate awards; their performance of Berlioz' "Romeo and Juliet," won the award for the best classical choral recording of 1962 given by the National Academy of Recording Arts and Sciences; the Berlioz recording also won the Grand Prix des Discophiles 1963 and the Prix du President de la Republic of the French Academy.

MUSIC VENDOR
NEWARK, N. J.
W. 6,600

DEC 2 8 1963

Orch Name Leinsdorf 'Musician of Year'

...ics and music editors of ...spapers and magazines ... Leinsdorf their choice for "Musician of the Year" for 1963. Poll was conducted and the results announced by Musical America in its annual artists issue.

...ch Le...f

Leinsdorf, now in his second season as music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was the choice of the critics, who have w... glow... ...y of the brilliance he has ...ught to th... Boston orchestra in the two-... period.

In the past year, RCA Victor has issued seven recordings of Leinsdorf conducting the Boston orchestra as well as one in which he conducted for an operatic recording. Beginning with Bartok's Concerto for Orchestra and continuing with Mahler's Symphony No. 1 (the first Mahler recording ever to gain a place on the popular best-selling charts), Leinsdorf has subsequently recorded Beethoven's Eroica Symphony, Richard Strauss' Ein Heldenleben, Mendelssohn's Incidental Music to a Midsummer Night's Dream, and two recordings with soloists—Dello Joio's Fantasy and Variations and Ravel's Concerto in G with pianist Lorin Hollander and Tchaikovsky's Piano Concerto No. 1 with Artur Rubinstein.

In opera, Leinsdorf was the conductor for the Red Seal recording of "Madam Butterfly," with Leontyne Price, Richard Tucker, Rosalind Elias and Philip Maero. Issued as the first opera in "Dynagroove" "Madama Butterfly" was heralded by many critics.

In addition to the regular Boston Symphony seasons in Boston and at Tanglewood, Leinsdorf has also directed the orchestra's sold-out New York and Brooklyn seasons and brought the ensemble renewed national attention by way of an extensive transcontinental tour last winter.

CASH BOX
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W.—CIRC. N. AVAIL.

DEC 2 8 1963

Mag Poll Names Leinsdorf As "Musician Of The Year"

ERIC LEINSDORF

N... RK—Conductor Erich Leinsd... won the nod of the nation's m... critics and music editors as "... an of the Year" for 1963.

T... poll was conducted by Musical Amer... mag, and the results are in its current annual artists issue.

Leinsdorf, in his second season as conductor of the Boston Symphony, has had a busy disk year, having been involved in eight RCA Victor Red Seal releases. Seven of the releases were instrumental classics, one was an opera, "Madama Butterfly," Victor's first opera in Dynagroove and the label's fastest-selling opera package ever.

PAGE ONE CLIPPED

BILLBOARD
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 50,000

MAY 2 3 1964

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 603,574 SUN. 1,283,785

MAY 1 3 1964

RECORD WORLD
NEW YORK, N.Y.
W. - CIRC.N.AVAIL.

MAY 30 1964

The News American
BALTIMORE, MD.
D. 219,257 SUN. 312,266

MAY 2 4 1964

New York World-Telegram and The Sun
D. 423,849 SAT. 142,176

MAY 1 3 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Evening Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 146,915

MAY 13 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 202,711

MAY 13 1964

Leinsdorf Wins Two Grammys

NEW YORK — Erich Leinsdorf, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra won two Grammy awards Tuesday night at the annual awards banquet of the National Academy of Recording Arts and Scientists.

His first was for best classical performance - orchestral — "Bartok Concerto for Orchestra," in which he conducted the BSO.

The second was for best opera recording — Puccini's "Madama Butterfly" with Leinsdorf conducting the RCA Italiana Orchestra and Chorus.

Bandleader Henry Mancini won the Grammy for the Record of the Year, for "The Days of Wine and Roses."

The melody composed by Mancini and Johnny Mercer also received the Maris Award as the Song of the Year.

Barbra Streisand won the Album of the Year Award for "the Barbra Streisand Album" and also received the Grammy for the best female vocal performance for the same album.

The Album of the Year in the classical category was Benjamin Britten "War Requiem."

There were 42 prizes awarded. Among the leading recipients were:

Best instrumental jazz performance by soloist or small group: "Conversations with Myself" by pianist Bill Evans.

Best instrumental jazz performance by large group: "Encore Woody Herman 1963'" by Woody Herman.

Best performance by an orchestra primarily not jazz or for dancing—"Java" by Al Hirt.

Best new artists of 1963—The Swingle Singers. Same group won best performance by a chorus for "Bach's greatest hits."

Best gospel or other religious recording—"Dominique" by Soeur Sourire.

Best performance by a vocal group—"Blowing in the Wind," by Peter Paul and Mary.

Best original score from a motion picture or television show—"Tom Jones."

Best score fro man original cast show album—"She Loves Me."

Best classical performance—vocal soloist—"Great Scenes from Gershwin's Porgy and Bess," by Leontyne Price.

Best classical composition by contemporary composer—"War Requiem," by Benjamin Britten.

Best comedy performance—"Hello Muddah, Hello Faddah," by Allen Sherman.

Best documentary spoken word or drama recording other than comedy—"Who's Afraid of Virginia Woolf," by the original cast.

Best Rock 'n' Roll recording—"Deep Purple," by Nino Tempo and April Stevens.

Best country and western recording—"Detroit City," by Bobby Bare.

Best folk recording—"Blowing in the Wind," by Peter Paul and Mary.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Patriot-Ledger (e)
QUINCY, Mass.
Circ. 44,419

DEC 1 9 1963

U.S., French Prizes Given Charles Munch And Erich Leinsdorf

Boston Symphony Orchestra music directors past and present, have been named winners of national and international honors.

Charles Munch, who left Boston in August, 1962, is the recipient of the 1964 Grand Prix Nationdl du Disque for his Boston Symphony recording of Berlioz' "Romeo and Juliet." Erich Leinsdorf, who replaced Dr. Munch last year, has been named "musician of the year" by the magazine Musical America.

"Romeo and Juliet" was recorded April, 1961 at Symphony Hall, with Rosalind Elias, Giorgio Tozzi and Cesare Valletti soloists. The New England Conservatory Chorus accompanied.

Leinsdorf, selected by a magazine poll of the nation's music critics and editors, conducted the world premieres of Benjamin Lee's Violin Concerto and Samuel Barber's Piano Concerto and the American premiere of Benjamin Britten's "War Requiem" during his first year as music director. A fellow of the American Academy of Arts and Sciences, Boston, and a member of the advisory committee on the arts of the National Cultural Center, Washington, D.C., Leinsdorf won the Grand Prix last year for his recording of "Die Walkure" with the London Symphony Orchestra and soloists.

CUE
NEW YORK, N.Y.
W. 167,032

DEC 28 1963

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Traveler (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 164,299

FEB 3 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 194,870

JAN 30 1964

Charles Munch Will Get Music Degree

Charles Munch, former conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will receive an honorary Doctor of Music degree from the New England Conservatory of Music at a convocation in Jordan Hall on Feb. 5. The ceremony, which will include a brief musical program, will begin at 4 p.m. The public is invited. No tickets are required.

Invited guests include faculty, trustees, and friends of the New England Conservatory; trustees and members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; representatives of the French government, and civic and community leaders. Conservatory Pres. Chester W. Williams will confer the degree.

During his association with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Munch performed and recorded several major works with the New England Conservatory Chorus, Lorna Cooke deVaron, conductor. One of their recent RCA Victor recordings has won three separate awards; their performance of Berlioz' "Romeo and Juliet," won the award for the best classical choral recording of 1962 given by the National Academy of Recording Arts and Sciences; the Berlioz recording also won the Grand Prix des Discophiles 1963 and the Prix du President de la Republic of the French Academy.

196

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

BROOKLYN DAY NEWS
Saturday, January 4, 1964

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

BROOKLYN KINGS COURIER
Saturday, January 4, 1964

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

FLATBUSH LIFE
Saturday, January 4, 1964

MUSIC VENDOR
NEWARK, N. J.
W. 6,600

DEC 2 1 1963

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
KINGS COURIER
W. 15,200

JAN 4 1964

The Philadelphia Inquirer
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
D. 604,828 S. 1,000,980

DEC 2 2 1963

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
FLATBUSH LIFE
W. 15,500

JAN 4 1964

MUSICAL AMERICA
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 15,900

JAN 1964

MUSICAL LEADER
CHICAGO, ILL.
MONTHLY-CIRC. N. AVAIL.

JAN 1964

CASH BOX
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W.—CIRC. N. AVAIL.

JAN 4 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Berkshire Eagle (e)
PITTSFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 29,087

DEC 1 9 1963

VARIETY
NEW YORK, N.Y.
W: - CIRC.N.AVAIL.

JAN 1 1964

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
BAY NEWS
W. 12,100

JAN 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Times (e)
BEVERLY, Mass.
Circ. 8,350

JAN 2 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

News (e)
MALDEN, Mass.
Circ. 10,537

DEC 1 8 1963

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Sunday Republican
SPRINGFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 112,302

DEC 2 2 1963

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Berkshire Eagle (e)
PITTSFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 29,087

MAY 2 6 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Herald (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 178,553

DEC 2 0 1963

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 194,870

DEC 1 8 1963

Munch, BSO Win French Record Award

The RCA Victor recording of Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet" has been awarded one of France's highest international prizes, "Prix du President de la Republique."

Notification was made to Victor by the Academie du Disque Francaise this week. It is the second international prize awarded to the two - record album this year, the first having been the "Grand Prix des Discophiles 1963."

Three Soloists

The performance is by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch conducting, with soloists mezzo - soprano Rosalind Elias, tenor Cesare Valletti and basso Giorgio Tozzi, with the New England Conservatory Chorus.

The album was released in September, 1962, in RCA Victor's Soria Series, and immediately met with critical acclaim in the U. S. and abroad.

Another Soria Series package, Wagner's opera, "Die Walkure," in a performance starring Birgit Nilsson, Rita Gorr, Jon Vickers and George London and directed by Erich Leinsdorf, also was a recipient of the Grand Prix des Discophiles 1963.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Patriot-Ledger (e)
QUINCY, Mass.
Circ. 44,419

DEC 7 1963

Pierre Monteux Honored In London

LONDON (AP) — Pierre Monteux, eminent symphony conductor, received a gold medal and acclaim as a "great conductor —one of the greatest living."

The 89-year-old musician, former conductor of the Boston Symphony, led the London Symphony and then was awarded the Gold Medal of the Royal Philharmonic Society. Sir Adrian Boult, English conductor, presented the medal for musical achievement and spoke of Monteux as "our hero."

Monteux replied he was "very touched, very honored, grateful and happy."

The Telegraph critic said: "Clearly it is above all for his great services to the kind of music that springs from the free play of fantasy and is domiciled in the world of dreams" that Monteux was awarded the medal.

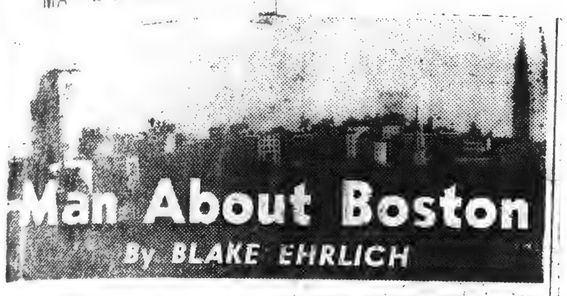
The Times said the Royal Philharmonic Society was years late in giving Monteux its medal and added:

"The honor was well deserved, for Monteux is and always has been a natural spontaneous musician of the greatest distinction."

The critic said Monteux "could not conduct an unmusical performance if he tried." The paper added, however, that Monteux had given better performances.

B.S.O. Members' Activities. 197

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Traveler (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 164,299
MAY 23 1963



Green Stamp Customers Get Best Of Symphony

YOU KNOW WHAT YOU CAN GET with Green Stamps now? Culture, that's what.

Since Monday, 13 redemption stores, or centers or whatever they call them, have been test-offering in the Boston area fine recordings of fine music. The response of the book-bearing customers has been very good, I'm told.

JAMES STAGLIANO

This should mean that eventually all Green Stamp customers everywhere will be able to get the records. When this comes to pass, it will be good news for a bunch of the boys in the Boston Symphony.

FOR TEN YEARS NOW, these eminent chairholders have been cutting records in their spare time and selling them under the label, "Boston Records." It doesn't say anything on the label about the artists belonging to the Boston Symphony. It seems a rather larger record company has an exclusive contract for recording the Symphony.

For the ten years that Boston Records has been operating, it has been losing money at the rate of $10,000 a year. Losing money in exchange for artistic achievement hasn't bothered them unduly, but the idea of making money in appreciable chunks is rather exhilarating.

I lunched with the man who started the business, James Stagliano, principal hornist of the Boston Symphony. A principal hornist plays the French horn and is usually referred to in the music world as a "horn player," I am happy to say.

STAGLIANO IS NOT at all averse to money, but all his life he hasn't been able to resist the lure of the arts. For example, when he was making $125 a week blowing the horn in a Detroit theater, he allowed himself to be shanghaied into the Detroit Symphony.

Then he took the title of principal hornist and a raise in pay of sixty dollars a week.

Somewhat the same thing happened when he came to Boston to play at Koussevitsky's urging. To come here, he left off blowing bubbles of pure gold in Hollywood with the Los Angeles Philharmonic, the Hollywood Bowl Orchestra, for movie studios and for network radio.

BUT HE CAME TO BOSTON. His recording company has this simple aim: "To record the best of chamber music and the needlessly neglected large works, with the best musicians, under the best possible conditions."

He pointed out to me that there are 37 different recordings of Beethoven's Fifth on the market, and more than 20 of the Ninth. They set out to record those works not considered commercially exploitable by the big companies.

"We're not against money," Jim told me, "but we are for music. We play 48 weeks a year with the Symphony, and we are too tired to do something we don't really want to do just for the sake of money."

THE MUSICIANS, not the engineers or the advertising men are the ones who decide when a recording is right for release. This, of course, drives everybody but the musicians crazy.

Composer Walter Piston was delighted by a recording session of his "Quintet for Wind Instruments." He told the men, "Marvelous! You'll never do better than that." They didn't believe him, and made four more recordings before they were satisfied.

When engineers follow their usual practice of fattening up sounds or of lopping them off for fear they'll peak, Boston Records refuses the master record.

SO JIM STAGLIANO IS HAPPY that the collectors of Green Stamps will form a new, broad audience for his little gems. And there'll be money coming in.

When I asked if he'd observe the Green Stamp connection with a recording of Bach's, "I Know That My Redeemer Liveth," he said no.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Herald (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 178,553
OCT 9 1963

Trumpeter Roger Voisin Will Speak

FIRST TRUMPETER of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Roger Voisin, will give a talk before the Pre-Symphony Luncheon in the Terrace Room of the Hotel Statler Hilton, Friday. He will discuss this week's Symphony program, "From the Point of View of the Trumpeter."

The Women's City Club, which is sponsoring this series of Pre-Symphony Luncheons, is cooperating with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, through weekly talks, in acquainting the public with the workings of this great musical institution.

Mr. Voisin and his wife will remain for the luncheon and will meet the guests. He will discuss in detail the difficult trumpet solos of the Mahler Fifth Symphony, which will be played that day, and which has not been played since the time of the late Serge Koussevitzky.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Record-American (m) (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 452,333
OCT 1 0 1963

TALL, HANDSOME, French-born Roger Voisin, first trumpeter of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be the guest speaker before Friday's Pre-Symphony Luncheon in the Terrace Room of the Statler-Hilton Hotel. Internationally renowned as a soloist and for his recordings Mr. Voisin (whose subject will be, "From Point of View of the Trumpeter") is going to talk about the difficult trumpet solos of the Mahler Fifth Symphony which will be played at the afternoon concert

The Women's City Club, sponsors for the series of pre-symphony luncheons, is co-operating with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in acquainting the the public with its workings.

During the luncheon French-designed furs and hats will be modelled by Mrs. Raymond C. Gordon (co-master of the Millwood Hunt Club); Mrs. Charlotte Hodgkinson Gordon, Mrs. Robert Chick, Mrs. Samuel Batchelder Jr., Mrs. Victor Kazanjian, Mrs. Laurence O. Albre, Miss Gloria Kent, Mrs. Howard K. Holladay, Mrs. Alexander Welch and Mrs. Robert Downer.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Journal
REVERE, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 8,250
NOV 14 1963

North Shore Unit To Begin Concerts

The North Shore Philharmonic Orchestra of Lynn will open its 16th season with a concert on Sunday evening. The program will begin at 8:00 p.m. in Memorial Auditorium, Lynn City Hall.

Roland Tapley of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will conduct, as he has since the founding of the Orchestra in 1948. Robert Marra of Revere, a teacher at the high school, is concertmaster (first violinist) of the Orchestra. He is also a charter member of the Orchestra.

The concert will feature Rachmaninoff's Second Piano Concerto in C Minor with Yasuko Tsukamoto as soloist. The other major work programmed is the Second Suite from the ballet "Bacchus et Arianne" by Albert Roussel.

Tickets and subscriptions are obtainable from orchestra members or by contacting F. L. Jones, Manager, 125 Boardman Ave., Melrose.

SAVANNAH, GA.
NEWS
D: 55,202 S: 60,313
NOV 5 1963

Symposium Picks Work Of Gruber

A new composition by Savannah composer Albion Gruber has been selected for performance at the first annual Symposium of Contemporary Music for Brass at Georgia State College in Atlanta this weekend.

Roger Voisin, principal trumpeter with the Boston Symphony Orchestra who is nationally recognized for his brass recordings, will be guest lecturer, conductor, and performer at the three-day forum.

Gruber's score, "Variations on an Easter Theme," calls for an ensemble of trumpets, horns, and trombones. It is based on the ancient hymn "Ye Sons and Daughters."

Music by 14 Southern composers will be featured during the forum. It will be performed by the Georgia State College Brass Ensemble.

Gruber is a member on the faculty of Savannah Country Day School and directs the Copps Memorial Choir at the Cathedral of St. John the Baptist.

The symposium is a part of the college's 50th anniversary observance.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Record-American (m) (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 452,333
NOV 30 1963

String Quartet '64 Schedule

The Nova Quartet, string quartet in residence at the New England Conservatory, has scheduled a series of three performances in Jordan Hall on Jan. 8, Feb. 7 and Mar. 20.

The newly formed quartet is composed of distinguished virtuosi from the Boston Symphony Orchestra—concertmaster Joseph Silverstein, violinist George Zazofsky, principal violist Joseph de Pasquale and principal cellist Samuel Mayes. In addition to their individual accomplishments in orchestral and chamber music, each of the quartet members has been soloist with the Boston Symphony.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Herald (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 178,553
NOV 26 1963

Chamber Concert Aids Civil Liberties Union

Six musicians of three different occupations combined talents last night at Jordan Hall in a chamber concert benefitting the legal fund of the Civil Liberties Union of Massachusetts.

Three of the participants are Boston Symphony members: — Harry Ellis Dickson, violin, Eugene Lehner, viola, and Richard Kapuscinski, cello — for years associated with chamber groups in this area. They were joined by Robert Koff, violinist of the faculty at Brandeis University and former member of the Juilliard String Quartet; Gregory Tucker, pianist, composer and teacher at M. I. T.; and Gerald A. Berlin, lawyer by trade, clarinetist by choice.

Of the evening's two works, Mozart's Clarinet Quintet in A major, K. 581, utilizes the clarinet and first violin as more or less equal partners for solo honors, answering and accompanying one another in the opening Allegro, exchanging prominence among variations of the finale and in the Austrian-folk-flavored Menuetto.

To the mellow timbre of the clarinet are given the Larghetto's long melodic lines, and with these Mr. Berlin particularly excelled. He possesses an expansive tone, a dynamically acute sense of phrase, and a fine ability to sustain extended passages without a break. Mr. Koff led a closely-knit ensemble with metric precision and artistic grace.

In the Brahms Piano Quartet No. 1 in G minor, emphasis was on the darker colors of the combination, arising from Brahms' predilection for unisons and octaves, as well as melodies set in the tenor register of the cello. In such situations and with the muted strings of the Intermezzo, the balance between Mr. Tucker at the piano and Messrs. Koff, Lehner and Kapuscinski was especially noteworthy. For the finale, a vigorous Rondo on a folk dance theme, the ensemble again moved with spirit and accuracy through a quick succession of rests and entrances to an energetic conclusion.

In its dedication to the memory of President Kennedy, an active worker for equality under law, this concert became worthy in every respect: sponsorship, purpose and execution.

McL. H.

The Program

A concert of chamber music for the benefit of the Legal Fund of the Civil Liberties Union of Massachusetts was given last night at Jordan Hall, by the following: Gerald Berlin, clarinet; Robert Koff and Harry Ellis Dickson, violins; Eugene Lehner, viola; Richard Kapuscinski, cello; and Gregory Tucker, piano.

Clarinet Quintet in A maior, K. 581 ..... Mozart
Piano Quartet No. 1 in G minor, Op. 25 ..... Brahms

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Christian Science Monitor (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 174,850
NOV 23 1963

Nova Arte Quartet

The Nova Arte Quartet, in residence at the New England Conservatory, is composed of artists from the Boston Symphony Orchestra; concertmaster Joseph Silverstein, violinist George Zazofsky, principal violinist Joseph de Pasquale, and principal cellist Samuel Mayes. They are presenting a series of three performances at Jordan Hall on Jan. 8, Feb. 7, and March 20. Tickets are now on sale at the Jordan Hall box office.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Advocate
SHARON, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 2,700
NOV 28 1963

MIDWINTER CONCERT

Inquiries have arrived from Belmont, Winthrop, East Bridgewater, and Whitman, in addition to the usual orders from the nearby towns, regarding the Sharon Civic Orchestra's concert and art exhibit, Sunday December 8, at Sharon High School.

The appearance of Boston Symphony Orchestra violinist, Ayrton Pinto, together with the Sharon Orchestra's new composer-conductor, John Bavicchi, has excited the interest of many in the Boston music community, too.

As happens every year, Sharonites are reminded by residents of surrounding communities of the envy in which Sharon residents are held simply because of the continued existence of the Sharon Civic Orchestra. How fortunate we are, indeed, to have a live orchestra, and this year, as in the past, a fine guest soloist, within a few minutes drive from our respective homes.

The program is beautifully planned, and the two pieces chosen by the soloist, Tartini's Concerto in G Minor, and Baal Shem (Three Pictures of Chassidic Life) by Bloch, make it complete.

Mrs. Max Clere, Art Exhibit Chairman, has announced the completion of all arrangements. Our ticket chairman, Mrs. Victor Ellins, finds bundles of ticket orders in her mailbox each day.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Advocate
SHARON, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 2,450
NOV 21 1963

Soloist at Sharon Concert

AYRTON PINTO

It is with great pride and satisfaction that the Sharon Civic Orchestra presents its guest soloist for the Mid-Winter Concert, Sunday, December 8th.

Ayrton Pinto, Brazilian violinist began his career at the age of nine at the Brazalian Conservatory of Music in Rio de Janeiro. There he studied with Yolanda Peixoto who markedly influenced his initial endeavors in his chosen career. He received his Bachelor's Degree in 1952, in Brazil. Here in the United States he studied with Richard Burgin, concert master and associate conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. At the New England Conservatory, he received a Master's Degree in 1955 and the Artist's Diploma in 1957.

He became a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1959, and has been made an honorary professor at the Brazilian Conservatory of Music.

Mr. Pinto will play the Tartini Concerto in G Major, and the "Baal Shem" Suite of Bloch, with the Sharon Civic Orchestra on December 8th.

Ticket chairman for the concert is Mrs. Victor Ellins, 14 West Street.

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE
ALBANY TIMES UNION
Sunday, November 17, 1963
New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Banner (e)
BENNINGTON, Vt.
Circ. 5,111
NOV 15 1963

SAMUEL MAYES, principal cellist for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be soloist for the Berkshire Community Symphony Orchestra's concert at Williams College next Wednesday evening. Mayes was a soloist before the age of 10 and became a member of the Philadelphia Orchestra at 19. He appeared frequently at Tanglewood.

Berkshire Symphony To Play at Williams College

WILLIAMSTOWN, Mass.—The second concert of the Berkshire Community Symphony Orchestra's 19th season will take place next Wednesday, Nov. 20 at 8:30 p.m. in Chapin Hall of Williams College.

The orchestra will be joined by Samuel Mayes, principal cellist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in a performance of Dimitri Kabalevsky's "Cello Concerto" which was written in 1948-9 and introduced in the United States by Mayes in 1953.

The cellist also had the distinction of performing this work in 1959 under the composer's direction. At that performance in Boston, the audience response was so wild that the second movement—considered by many to be one of the most lyric of twentieth century cello works—had to be repeated. Kabalevsky is at present professor of composition at the Moscow Conservatory.

Mayes was soloist with his native St. Louis Symphony before the age of 10, and was one of the youngest musicians ever to be admitted to the Curtis Institute in Philadelphia. Before joining the Boston Symphony as its first cellist 14 seasons ago, Mayes held that same post with the Philadelphia Orchestra.

The concert, which will be conducted by Irwin Shainman, professor of music at Williams, will open with the first area performance of "Three Old Spanish Pieces" by Joaquin Nin-Culmell, formerly a member of the Williams College music faculty and the first conductor of the Berkshire Community Symphony. Known widely as a composer and pianist, Nin-Culmell is at present professor of music at the University of California.

This will be Shainman's last performance with the orchestra this season as he leaves for study and research in Europe in early February. His place on the podium will be taken by Edgar Curtis of the Albany Symphony, who will appear locally in March.

Tickets will be available at the door on Wednesday evening, and may also be obtained in advance by telephoning the following Williamstown members of the orchestra's ticket committee: Mrs. Russell Bastert, Mrs. William Fox, Mrs. John MacFadyen, Mrs. John Martin, and Mrs. Harold White. Children under the age of 12 are admitted free of charge and are cordially invited to attend.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Herald (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 178,553
NOV 14 1963

THE ROVING EYE

A Dream Violin

By ROBERT TAYLOR

IT ISN'T as if George Zazofsky objected to the $50,000 Guarneri del Gesu violin that a generous friend lent him for the performance. He just didn't want to pin his faith on a label.

For tomorrow afternoon, Saturday night and Tuesday evening, Mr. Zazofsky, a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's violin section more than 21 years, will appear as the soloist in Alban Berg's Concerto. This honor rarely comes to an ensemble player. The itinerant virtuoso, the established name performers, usually occupy the spotlight. When the conductor of a major orchestra chooses one of his own men, the act itself constitutes a handsome tribute.

ROBERT TAYLOR

Moreover, when Mr. Zazofsky steps before his colleagues he will carry a violinist's dream instrument, a Guarnerius made in Cremona, Italy, in 1731, one of a dozen extant, and probably the only one analyzed by M.I.T. electronic devices.

"They did it by my request," he told us the other day. "I wanted to find out if it excelled my own Guadagnini, which was made in Milan in 1752. I bought that instrument years ago, but of course I could never hope to own a Guarnerius, an almost priceless violin. Then, a little over a year ago, I met a collector named Irving Levick from Buffalo, an amateur violinist and a connoisseur.

He offered to lend me a Del Gesu known to history as 'The Baltic' (one of the violins made by Giuseppe Bartolomeo Guarnerius, who often put the initials I H S on his label, and who is considered the peer of Stradivarius) if I ever appeared as soloist with The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

★ ★ ★

"I HAD INFORMED Mr. Levick of the possibility, resulting from the auditions held by Erich Leinsdorf when Richard Burgin retired as concertmaster. Mr. Leinsdorf asked 20 violinists to play the second movement of the Berg Concerto. The work was close to my heart for a number of reasons: I had studied with Louis Krasner, who had commissioned the score; I attended the American premiere, with Krasner as soloist and Serge Koussevitzky conducting, in 1936; and I thought the music itself one of the masterpieces of this century.

"Presently, the field of 20 narrowed to three finalists. Since the closing chord of the first movement is related to the opening chord of the second, I asked Mr. Leinsdorf if he would have any objection to presentation of the entire concerto. He did not, I played the Concerto; as matters turned out, my colleague, Joseph Silverstein, was selected concertmaster, but Mr. Leinsdorf immediately wanted to know if I would appear as soloist in the Berg.

"The dates remained to be settled, eventually these were arranged, and Mr. Levick presented me with 'The Baltic.' I've spent over six months determining how much the violin will take, the pressures, the individual weight of the bow. Oddly enough, my Guadagnini proved superior in a small room. As a member of the Nova Arte Trio I turned up one night for a concert at the St. Botolph Club and casually produced the Guarnerius.

"Joe Silverstein took one look, and exclaimed that it wouldn't do, and he was right: for chamber orchestra my own instrument had more flexibility, though without the sustaining power of a mellow Guarnerius.

★ ★ ★

"I'M A PRACTICAL-minded person, however, and didn't think I ought to ride on the label, so I got in touch with another colleague, the violinist George Humphrey, who has been collaborating on the laboratory study of instruments at M.I.T. After a Symphony concert Professor Bosch and a number of assistants set up their equipment at the rear of the hall, and I played first on "Violin A" and then on "Violin B," vibrato scales, double stops, harmonics and various tests, and in the end the Guarnerius came out far ahead for the concert hall.

"Berg's Concerto has been offered only twice before at Symphony—by my teacher, Krasner, and by Isaac Stern. The results of M.I.T.'s experiments are incomplete. To date the secrets of the master Italian violin makers have not been unlocked.

"The score is a lovely and technically difficult expression that demands miracles. At the close, a G over G near the bridge held 12 beats, you're out there at the mercy of your rosin and bow." George Zazofsky grinned. "And the magic of Cremona."

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sun (e)
LOWELL, Mass.
Circ. 45,001
DEC 7 1963

Joseph Silverstein

THE NOVA ARTE QUARTET whose membership includes such distinguished artists as Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster of the Boston Symphony orchestra; George Zazofsky, violinist, concertmaster and musical director of the Zimbler Sinfonietta; Joseph de Pasquale, principal violist of the Boston Symphony orchestra, and Samuel Mayes, principal cellist of the Boston Symphony orchestra, has been selected as string quartet in residence at the New England Conservatory.

A series of three concerts will be given in Jordan hall at the Conservatory starting Jan. 8, 1964. The program will be announced at a later date.

Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony orchestra, has invited Joseph Silverstein, the orchestra's concertmaster, to be soloist at the concerts of Friday and Saturday of next week. Mr. Silverstein, who is serving his second season as concertmaster of the orchestra, will play the Violin Concerto No. 2 by Bela Bartok. The concerts will open with the Symphony No. 3 of Schubert and will continue with the Suite from "Le Coq d'Or by Rimsky-Korsakov.

During 1964 The Stratford (Canada) festival will celebrate the 400th anniversary of the greatest poet-playwright who ever lived. In April, the month of Shakespeare's birth, the festival company will make its first visit to England to present "Love Labour's Lost" and "Timon of Athens," along with Moliere's "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme," at the Chichester festival theater—on a stage that was planned after that of Stratford festival theater.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Herald (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 178,553
DEC 2 1963

Cambridge Symphony To Begin Workshops

With five years of accomplishment behind it, the Cambridge Civic Symphony opens its new season on Sunday evening, Dec. 15, in Sanders Theatre, under its founder and conductor, Victor Manusevitch, Boston Symphony Orchestra musician. Offering solid experience in concert-giving and in "workshop" sessions during forty Sunday evenings each year, it has enabled young musicians to enter major orchestras throughout the country.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Advocate
SHARON, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 2,700
DEC 5 1963

BIG EVENT OF '63-'64 SEASON IN SHARON SET FOR THIS SUNDAY NIGHT

This Sunday, December 8th, at 8 p.m. in Sharon High School's beautiful 1200-seat auditorium, John Bavicchi, new conductor of the Sharon Civic Orchestra, will conduct the first concert of the 1963-64 season. The program, as previously announced, has been carefully and thoughtfully chosen for its variety and interest; the added attraction of Boston Symphony Orchestra violinist, Ayrton Pinto, further enhances the attractiveness of the evening's fare. To further delight the members of the audience, the traditional Art Exhibit promises to be as rewarding as always, and to complete the evening everyone is invited to a coffee hour reception in the cafeteria following the concert, to meet John Bavicchi and the guest soloist, Mr. Pinto.

There is no doubt in anyone's mind as to the rewarding evening in store for all Sharonites and their friends. Newspapers in Belmont, Brookline, Quincy, Boston, and all surrounding towns have noted the coming event. There is only one thing to be desired — let's fill the auditorium to capacity Sunday night. Let every family in Sharon show its appreciation for having live music available in its home town. Not many towns or cities can boast of having had an Orchestra for 16 years; give your support now!

One of the many statements attributed to Mr. Bavicchi was the following.

"With the people of this town supporting their Orchestra in such style for so long, one can only dream what may happen in the future." Let's give John Bavicchi a warm welcome to Sharon, and show him just what can happen NOW.

for ticket information.

See the ad on amusement page

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Gazette (e)
WORCESTER, Mass.
Circ. 93,580
DEC 30 1963

Concert Opens Winter Series At Auditorium

By JOHN F. KYES
Gazette Music Critic

The Worcester Orchestra of 47 players, conducted by Harry Levenson, began its season of winter concerts-in-the-round yesterday at the Auditorium. A noteworthy feature of the program was the appearance of Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Joseph de Pasquale, its principal violinist. The vehicle for these outstanding musicians was Mozart's "Symphonie Concertante," in three movements, using an orchestra of 26 strings, two oboes and two horns.

That the elaborate passages of the "Allegro Maestoso" and the final "Presto" would be both shining and crisp, and that the tranquil episodes of the "Andante" would sing, was of course to be expected at the hands of such skilled artists. It was also gratifying that Levenson preserved good balances between the solo instruments and the ensemble. The work of the latter was alert, though not faultless.

Interesting Spots

Some of the most interesting spots in the work were the duet cadenzas, taken with elegance and easy accuracy.

The earlier program was melodious without developing much impact. Glinka's "Russlan and Ludmila" Overture was standard fare. Wagner's "Siegfried Idyll," a lovely thing, becomes still more interesting when its story is recalled. Its tender themes were inspired by Wagner's baby son, Siegfried, and the piece was played in his home on Christmas, 1870, the birthday of Wagner's wife Cosima, amid the most happy surroundings.

The Idyll needs a continual delicacy of handling, to produce its full charm. Yesterday the thoughtful and cooperative work of leader and orchestra did much to reach that end, without achieving completely luminous tone or inspired phrasing.

Of interest, and seldom heard, Elgar's "Three Bavarian Dances" proved to be Nos. 1, 3 and 6 from his choral suite, "Scenes from the Bavarian Highlands," revised by Charles Godfrey. Written in 1896, this music shows its date, with forthright melodies and tricks of phrasing which are pleasant but not astonishing today. "The Dance," "The Lullaby" and "The Marksmen" brought out warm colorings in the orchestra.

'Porgy and Bess'

Nine of the best tunes from Gershwin's "Porgy and Bess" gave the group a chance to be heard in one of its best mediums, music from famous shows. Some of the liveliest "swing" was found in "Summertime," "I Got Plenty O'Nuttin" and "It Ain't Necessarily So." The encore was Leroy Anderson's Winter Sleighride."

Another concert will be given Jan. 19. The soloist will be Samuel Mayes, first cellist of the Boston Symphony.

The sponsors for these free community events are Art Photo Service, Inc., Fitchburg; Astra Pharmaceutical Products, Inc., B-W Footwear, Inc., Webster; Crompton & Knowles Corporation, Guaranty Bank & Trust Co., Harr Motor Co., Massachusetts Electric Co., Worcester Gas Light Co. and the Worcester Telegram and The Evening Gazette.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Herald (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 178,553
JAN 9 1964

Music

Nova Arte Quartet Superior Ensemble

By McLAREN HARRIS

Last year there was the Nova Arte Trio, consisting of Joseph Silverstein, violin; Joseph de Pasquale, viola, and Samuel Mayes, cello—all leaders of their respective sections in the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This year the ensemble has assumed quartet proportions with the addition of Violinist George Zazofsky, also a Symphony member.

Such was the group that performed last night at Jordan Hall, playing three quartets and one movement from another, ranging in style from classic to modern. Haydn, Mozart, Hindemith and Mendelssohn make solid material upon which a quartet may test its capabilities; a large audience was quite pleased with the results, and well it should be.

The Program

The Nova Arte String Quartet, consisting of Joseph Silverstein, violin, George Zazofsky, violin, Joseph de Pasquale, viola, and Samuel Mayes, cello, performed the first of three chamber music programs last night at Jordan Hall.

Quartet, Op. 50, No. 6 (The Frog) Haydn
Adagio from Quartet in B flat major, K. 458 Mozart
Quartet No. 3, Op. 22 Hindemith
Quartet in E minor, Op. 44 Mendelssohn

The opening Haydn Quartet, Op. 50, No. 6 (The Frog), mostly dominated by the first violin, progressed with clearly-etched design. The Adagio sang with a peaceful emotion, there was firm metric declamation in the Menuetto, and the fast movements were nimbly propelled, with impulse but without impatience. The following Adagio from Mozart's B flat major Quartet (the "Hunt" quartet, K. 458) was played in memory of Philip Allen, 28-year trustee of the New England Conservatory; here beauty was in serene melody, colored by a lightly romantic sentiment.

Hindemith's Quartet No. 3, Op. 22 provided diversity of expression. Within the four movements there is rich thematic invention, much melodic flow and smooth linear characteristics. Texture of parts is matched and balanced conservatively, with percussive unisons in the second section and finale and pizzicato accompaniment in the slow movement; the harmonic implications however, are carried out less traditionally, with much dissonance and logic.

Mendelssohn's E minor Quartet, Op. 44 was the final example of superb sensitivity, a work matching in breadth those of Beethoven or Schubert, albeit with less substance; the movements glowed with energy and warmth, in the terms of the composer and the tones of the performers.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Christian Science
Monitor (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 174,850
JAN 9 1964

Nova arte players tune up

By Roland Nadeau

The conductor Joseph Krips once said that the ideal symphony orchestra was the one that thought and played like a string quartet. Judging from the performance of the quartet heard in Jordan Hall Wednesday, we are tempted to invert this notion and say that superb chamber music playing can arise when the players think as a symphony as well as a string quartet.

The occasion was the debut of the Nova Arte Quartet, the ensemble in residence at the New England Conservatory of Music. Its members are all leading players of this city's patrician ensemble, the Boston Symphony Orchestra — Joseph Silverstein, George Zazofsky, violins; Joseph de Pasquale, viola; Samuel Mayes, cello.

But make no mistake: these gentlemen do not overplay; they can be as demure as you wish. Yet unlike so many other quartets, they are not afraid to produce rich, fullblooming sound for it's own sake. Take, as an example, the first item on the program, the String Quartet, Op. 50, No. 6 ("The Frog") by Haydn.

In the first section of the Menuetto are found startling, accented dissonances that must surely have shaken up Beethoven when he first heard them. The players attacked these acrid sounds with plunging bows that fairly scraped the strings in the crush of their bite. This was no time to pussyfoot.

On the other hand, in the second movement, the Poco adagio, some of the most tender musical whispers ever heard were articulated.

* * *

Mr. Silverstein simply must be the compleat quartet leader. He has everything. His intonation is impeccable; his tone is sweet but unafraid; he leads discreetly but with decision; and his technique dazzles when it has to.

This last quality was most apparent in the Finale of the Haydn work: It has brilliant cross bowings, highly reminiscent of the virtuosic style found in Vivaldi, effortlessly done by Mr. Silverstein.

The next work was the Adagio from the String Quartet in B-flat major, K. 458, by Mozart, played in memory of Philip R. Allen. Mr. Allen, for 17 years chairman of the Trustees at the Conservatory, was an amateur cellist who particularly loved this movement. The Chair for Chamber Music, established in honor of Mr. Allen, supports the quartet in residence.

The two final compositions of the evening were Hindemith's Quartet No. 3, Op. 22; and Mendelssohn's in E minor, Op. 44. These are symphonic in the true sense of the term: large in scope and full in sound.

* * *

The quartet's best playing of the evening probably occurred in the third movement of the Hindemith. Here was a quasi-impressionistic piece, complete with veiled, muted melody set off against a delicate pizzicato, which required a sense of sound for its own sake that only symphony players who are noted soloists in their own right can fully comprehend.

The final Presto agitato of the Mendelssohn brought the recital to a stunning close. Their playing in this movement was tight in ensemble, rich in sound and symphonic in effect, which is as it should be.

The Nova Arte Quartet will again appear in their 1964 series on Friday, Feb. 7, and on Friday, March 20, at Jordan Hall.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 194,870
JAN 9 1964

10:00 p.m.

Jordan Hall

Nova Arte Quartet Inaugurates Series

By MARGO MILLER

The topic of conversation Wednesday evening at Jordan Hall was, of course, the two Boston Symphony resignations. For on stage was the Nova Arte Quartet, composed of Joseph Silverstein and George Zazofsky, violins, and departing orchestra principals Joseph dePasquale, viola and Samuel Mayes, cello. The large audience had good cause to regret the quartet's union will be so brief.

As good quartets go, the Nova Arte is young in seasons. This year it began its association, as string quartet in residence, with the New England Conservatory. A yearly series of programs, of which Wednesday's was the first, with other nearby concerts, was envisioned both to further the art of chamber music and to continue ensemble playing.

Actually, these four men, since Silverstein's elevation to concertmaster, have been a kind of quartet within the Boston Symphony. The proximity of their desks, the awareness of another player's talents and taste, his qualities of tone all contributed to the ensemble before its formal founding. As in the massed orchestra they have also that opulent string sound which is a joy to the listener.

Wednesday's program offered the sixth Quartet ("The Frog") of Haydn's Op. 50; Hindemith's Third, Op. 22; the Mendelssohn E-minor, Op. 44; and, in memory of Philip R. Allen, Conservatory trustee and chamber music devotee, the adagio from Mozart's "Hunt" Quartet.

Throughout the evening, the balance of the ensemble was exemplary, so essential an ingredient of concerted playing. Here and there, where one instrument is the more prominent, one rejoiced in the mellowness of Zazofsky's fiddle, as he set out the first theme of the Hindemith slow movement; or Silverstein's sweet and elegant tone in the Haydn allegro. Or, in the lower voices, de Pasquale's riches and Mayes' resonant beauties.

These various qualities, with the tautness of ensemble playing, seemed best realized in the Hindesmith Quartet. Not that the Haydn was not charmingly fashioned or the Mendelssohn done with polish. But a brio, also necessary in quartets, was there most apparent.

The remaining concerts by the Nova Arte Quartet in Jordan Hall are on the Friday evenings of Feb. 7 and 20.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Herald
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 283,819
FEB 2 1964

Wellesley Symphony Concert Next Sunday

The Wellesley Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Rolland Tapley, will present their Mid Season Auditorium at 8 p.m. The concert will feature Joseph de Pasquale, first viola of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, playing Berlioz' "Harold in Italy." Music of Samuel Barber, Satie and Roussel complete the program. The concert is presented free of charge and no tickets are required.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Christian Science
Monitor (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 174,850
MAR 9 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
News-Tribune (e)
WALTHAM, Mass.
Circ. 15,819
MAR 6 1964

Gabrielli Trio At Junior College Next Wednesday

The Newton Junior College Art and Music Series will present the Gabrielli Trio in an all-Mozart program at 8:15 P.M. Wednesday at College Hall, Washington Park, Newtonville. This event is free and open to the public.

This group, which is in residence at the Boston Conservatory of Music, takes its name from the master violin maker of Florence, Italy. The violin, viola, and cello, played by the members of the Trio, are beautifully matched, excellent examples of the craftsmanship of Giovanni Baptista Gabrielli in the years 1749 to 1751.

The artists are members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with extensive chamber music backgrounds. Alfred Schneider, violin, is a graduate of the Eastman School of Music and a former member of the Modern Art Quartet. Earl Hedbarg, viola, is former violist of the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra. Richard Kapuscinski, cello, was a student of the Curtis Institute of Music, a former member of the LaSalle String Quartet, and a founding member of the Boston Arts Quartet.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Herald (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 178,553
MAR 9 1964

Nova Arte Quartet In Finale March 20

Joseph Silverstein, George Zazofsky, Joseph de Pasquale, and Samuel Mayes will make their final Jordan Hall appearance as the Nova Arte Quartet on Friday evening, March 20. Since Mr. de Pasquale and Mr. Mayes will join the Philadelphia Orchestra next season, this appearance will be the last opportunity to hear the highly regarded quartet of Boston Symphony musicians.

The program for March 20 includes Mozart's Duo in B flat major for violin and viola, Hindemith's Trio No. 1, and Brahms Quartet in C minor, op. 51, no. 2. Tickets are on sale at the Jordan Hall box office, telephone KE 6-2412.

St. Petersburg T
ST. PETERSBURG, F
D. 127,804 S. 132,
FEB 16 1964

The TALLAHASSE family?

I never did fi

Mr. and Mrs professional nam sional violinists.

This year Bur
iting professor" o
Florida State Uni month, he has flo weeks and met wi
The rest of the t where he conducts is associate condu teaches violin at t

Miss Posselt t and at the Bosto nual concert tour

NEXT YEAR
lahassee and Bur
FSU students.

Mrs. Burgin i
70-year-old husban

She was born
violin almost imm

"They bought three years old,"
in Tallahassee fo famous musician
He was a solo v mother was Ida seven children. A reer didn't last t after she had fiv
ing and also taug

Mrs. Burgin s pedagogue," unti
but in Carnegie H

From then on girl's dream.

"I played at ter went to Euro
Jacques Thibaud
I made my Eur
phony under Pie ranged my debu out Europe for
sia. My tour in had a marvelous

BURGIN, W deprecatingly th life."

NewEnglandNe
Box 2078, Boston 6
Jewish BOSTO
Weekly
MAR

NewEnglandNe
Box 2078, Boston 6
Chronicle
BROOKL
Weekly
MAR

St. Petersburg Times
ST. PETERSBURG, FLA.
D 142,035
1961

201

The Violin Is Part Of The Family

By ANN WALDRON
Of The Times Staff

TALLAHASSEE — Who plays second fiddle in this family?

Mr. and Mrs. Richard Burgin (she prefers her professional name, Ruth Posselt) are both professional violinists.

This year Burgin has been a "distinguished visiting professor" of violin at the School of Music at Florida State University. For a salary of $720 a month, he has flown in once every three or four weeks and met with his pupils for a couple of days. The rest of the time, he's been based in Boston, where he conducts the Boston University orchestra, is associate conductor of the Boston Symphony and teaches violin at the conservatory.

Miss Posselt teaches violin at Wellesley College and at the Boston Conservatory and plays an annual concert tour.

✓ ✓ ✓

NEXT YEAR THE Burgins will move to Tallahassee and Burgin will devote full time to his FSU post.

Mrs. Burgin is a great deal younger than her [illegible] husband.

She was born in Boston and began to study the violin almost immediately.

"They bought me my first violin when I was three years old," she said recently when she was in Tallahassee for a concert. "My father was a famous musician and traveled with Nellie Melba. He was a solo violinist and conducted opera. My mother was Ida Lewis Pierce, the singer. She had seven children. As you can see, her operatic career didn't last too long. But as a matter of fact, after she had five children, she went back to singing and also taught Latin in college."

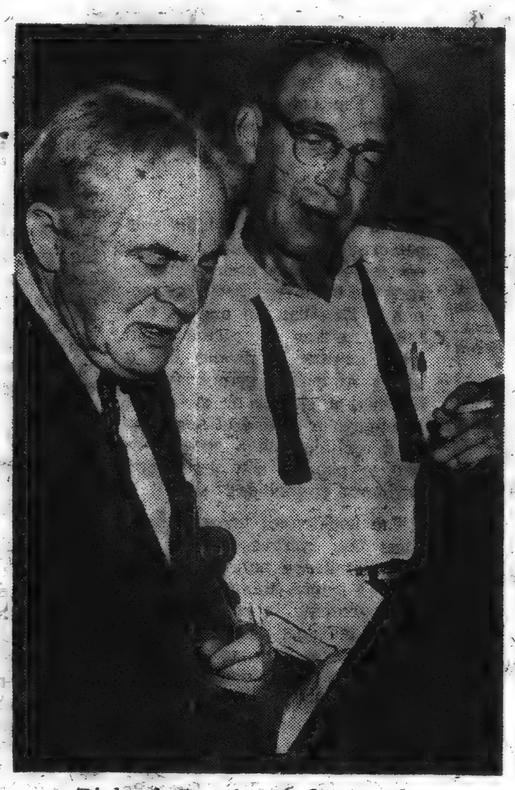
Mrs. Burgin studied with Ondricek, "the great pedagogue," until she was eight and made her debut in Carnegie Hall at the age of nine.

From then on, her career sounds like a young girl's dream.

"I played at Symphony Hall in Boston and later went to Europe," she said. "I studied with Jacques Thibaud and learned the French repertoire. I made my European debut with the Paris Symphony under Pierre Monteux and Pablo Casals arranged my debut in Spain. I concertized throughout Europe for seven years, including Soviet Russia. My tour in Russia lasted two months and I had a marvelous time."

✓ ✓ ✓ ✓

BURGIN, WHO SPARKLES with vitality, says deprecatingly that he started the violin "late in life."



Richard Burgin, Robert Sedore

"I was five years old," he said. "My wife started much earlier. She came from a musical family."

Burgin's father was a sign painter in Warsaw and thought his little son had a good ear. He bought the boy a fiddle and took him to a violinst in the Warsaw Philharmonic for lessons.

Burgin made his debut with the Philharmonic in 1903, when he was nine years old. He recalls that he played the Fourth Concerto by Vieuxtemps and Hungarian melodies by Aaronson. "You only play a piece like that when you're young," he said recently on one of his visits to FSU. "Later you realize how difficult it is."

✓ ✓ ✓

IN 1920 THE YOUNG Burgin came to America as concertmaster for the Boston Symphony. He was concertmaster until last year, and is still associate conductor.

"He is the most famous concertmaster in the world," says Dean Karl Kuersteiner of FSU's School of Music.

"I met my husband in 1938 when I again was soloist for the Boston Symphony and he was concert master," recalls Mrs. Burgin. "I was playing the Tchaikovsky violin concerto and some of the hairs on my bow broke. I was playing the cadenza and I didn't want to stop. He very deftly got up and plucked them off.

"In 1940 we were married. Until then my husband was a confirmed bachelor."

✓ ✓ ✓

HAS THERE BEEN ANY jealousy or conflict with both of them pursuing careers as violinists?

"We always have such deep respect for one another that when we don't agree, we don't argue," she said. "He thinks I'm perfect, and I think he is. He's not at all jealous. He wants me to play more and more. To me he's the most important person. He's quite a superior person—very intellectual, interested in politics and literature and religion and he has a wonderful sense of humor. We both like to read and I'm an ardent swimmer. I'm a wonderful cook."

The Burgins have lived for years in an "enormous" house in Brookline — "big enough for us both to practice at the same time," Mrs. Burgin has said—and summered on Cape Cod and at Tanglewood, where they both teach.

"We have two children," said Mrs. Burgin. "Diana is a student at Swarthmore. She is a pianist —but it's an avocation. She doesn't want to be a professional. She likes languages and would like to be an interpreter, possibly at the United Nations. Our son is at Groton. He's 16 and graduating. He is very gifted in writing. He wrote poetry from the age of six and he's written four novels already. He's extremely musical—discerning and discriminating. He's gifted in athletics and has his letter in tennis."

✓ ✓ ✓

MRS. BURGIN HAS PLAYED many times when her husband has conducted but the first time they ever appeared as violin soloists on the same program was last fall at Florida State University.

"At home, we play together. We have covered all the literature for two violins. It's a rich literature, too, not just the classics, but new things too," said Mrs. Burgin.

Burgin seems to be pleased tremendously at the prospect of moving to Tallahassee. Kuersteiner plans to start offering a Ph.D. with emphasis on the violin when Burgin joins the faculty full time. There will also be a "Quartet in Residence" with Harry Dunscomb, cellist, and Robert Sedore, viola, joining the Burgins.

Even before next year, the new activity starts. In June, Burgin will direct a symposium for orchestra conductors at FSU.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Jewish Advocate
BOSTON, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 35,304

MAR 12 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Chronicle-Citizen
BROOKLINE, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 9,106

[illegible] 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Jewish Times
BROOKLINE, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 8,000

MAR 12 1964

Youth Concert Event April 5

A delightful evening "Inside the B.S.O." featuring Harry Ellis Dickson is being presented by the Brookline Youth Concerts Committee on Sunday evening, April 5, at 8 o'clock, Driscoll School Auditorium, (Westbourne Terr.) Brookline.

Mr. Dickson is well known as a Boston Symphony Orchestra violinist; associate conductor of the Boston Pops and the Esplanade concerts; conductor of the Brookline Youth Concerts; and "raconteur" at the Midtown Pre-Symphony Luncheons.

Mr. Roger Voisin, first trumpeter of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and also recognized as a talented amateur photographer, will show his slides of the orchestra on tour in Europe and in Japan, with commentary by both Mr. Voisin and Mr. Dickson.

The committee for this unusual treat includes Mrs. William Silverman, chairman; Mrs. Hyman Simons, Miss Ann Macdonald, Mr. John Corley and the Mmes. William Grove, Michael Kamin, John Connolly, Henry A. Zoll, Lester Snierson, Robert Ravven, Norman Sherman, Bernard Gilbert, John R. Lak George Dobrow, Manuel Kurlan Robert Monroe, Philander Ratzkof Jerome Jacobs, Ray Goldber Robert Geyer, Samuel Stone; Mar Calen, Morris Kesselman, Morri Goodman, Jack Pearlman an others.

A social hour will follow the program. Tickets may be obtained from the ticket chairman, Mrs. Norman Sherman, LO 6-7694, or from any member of the committee. Donation is $1.00.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Herald (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 178,553

DEC 31 1963

Mazzeo Speaker at Pre-Symphony Lunch

Rosario Mazzeo, bass clarinetist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be introduced by his colleague, Harry Ellis Dickson, as the first of the 1964 speakers from the Orchestra at the Pre-Symphony Luncheon on Friday at the Mid-Town Motor Inn. The luncheon will honor the Boston Chapter of the American Recorder Society, an organization founded on Beacon Hill in 1955 to promote opportunities for groups to play recorder music for their own enjoyment and to advance its standards.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Sunday Republican
WATERBURY, Conn.
Circ. 49,216

MAR 8 1964

WILLIAM MARSHALL, violinist, and his son, Douglas, 15-year-old pianist, will be the featured artists at the final Young People's Concert of the season Saturday at 11 a. m. at the State Theater.

Final Youth Concert Due Saturday

A 15-year-old musical virtuoso and his father are the featured performers in the last Young People's oncert of the season to be presented by the Waterbury Symphony Orchestra Saturday at 11 a. m. at the State Theater.

Douglas Marshall, a high school sophomore from Westwood Mass., began studying the piano at the age of six under the guidance of his mother, a music teacher. He is an accomplished organist, and has been the summer organist at St. Paul's Episcopal Church in Stockbridge, Mass., and also at St. John's Episcopal Church in Westwood.

At the age of nine, he began performing as a boy soprano and sang many recitals throughout New England, and also with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in October, 1962. He sang the role of Amahl in Menotti's "Amahl and the Night Visitors" for three years with the Boston Intimate Opera Company, and also in a professional production in Baltimore, Md. For two summers, he sang with Bretton Woods Boy Singers, Bretton Woods, N. Y., and was considered the finest singer the choir has had in its 50-year existance.

First As Pianist

Although he has been a musical performer most of his life, next Saturday's Young Peoples Concert will be Douglas' first public apperance as a piano soloist. He will play the first movement of Bach's Concerto No. 1.

William Marshall, father of the young pianist, is a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and formerly was first violinist with the National Symphony Orchestra of Washington, D. C. A native of Shreveport, La. He is a Purple Heart veteran of World War II, when he served as infantryman and bandsman. He took his bachelor of music degree at Northwestern University, and his master of music degree at Boston University, studying with Richard Burgin, concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Marshall will perform Mendelsshn's Violin Concerto, First Movement, at the Young People's Concert.

The Waterbury Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Sayard Stone, will present two composers' interpretations of a city. They will perform Aaron Copeland's "Quiet City," and Leonard Bernstein's "West Side Story." Phillip Young of Taf School has written the narration which will be presented by Mrs. Donald Y. Goss.

Mrs. Thomas Knowlton and Mrs. John S. Ferguson, co-chairmen of the Young People's Concerts have announced that ticket are available at the State Theater, as well as other outlets in the city.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Telegraph (e)
NASHUA, N. H.
Circ. 13,082

MAR 13 1964

Wilson Guest Organist for School Fete

Elmer (Pop) Wilson will be the guest conductor and organist for the concert Wednesday night in High School. The program sponsored by the music department and the senior class will include the High School glee club, the girls' chorus, a piano quartet, and the symphonic band.

Highlight of the program will be the appearance of Armando Ghitalla, trumpeter with the Boston Symphony orchestra who will be the guest trumpet soloist with the symphonic band.

Ghitalla has been a member of the Boston Symphony since 1951. He is also first trumpet of the Boston Pops orchestra. His solos will include: "The Carnival of Venice" and "The Lost Chord". Ghitalla will be accompanied by the symphonic band and will also be joined by two Nashua High School trumpeters in the playing of "Bugler's Holiday." The two Nashua trumpeters are Richard Stacy, a senior, and John Mandziej. Both are members of the first trumpet section of the band.

Another member of the band who will also be a featured soloist on Wednesday night is Daniel Kudzma, a member of the first clarinet section who will be the piano soloist.

Tickets now on sale may be purchased from band and glee club members.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Telegraph (e)
NASHUA, N. H.
Circ. 13,082

MAR 18 1964

Complete Program Is Set For High Concert Tonight

Seventeen numbers are on the program for tonight's Nashua High school spring concert. The concert will be sponsored by the senior class and the music department and will be held in the high school auditorium at 8.

The Nashua High Glee club with Virginia Dean as accompanist and Elmer Wilson as organist will open the program with "Alleluja" by Mozart, "Every Time I Feel the Spirit", a spiritual arranged by Dawson, "Gonna Build a Mountain" by Newley and "Battle Hymn of the Republic" arranged by Fred Waring.

The girls' chorus accompanied by the Townsmen Quintet will sing "As Long As He Needs Me" from "Oliver" by Bart and "If Ever I Would Leave You" from "Camelot" by Lerner and Lowe.

The next performers will be Virginia Dean, Thomas Gidge, Thomas Brooks and Marc Winer. They will form a piano quartet and present Rachmaninoff's "Prelude in G Minor" and Schubert's "Moment Musical."

After intermission the symphonic band will open the second part of the program with "Bandology" by Osterling. The band will also play "Ballet Parisien" by Offenbach, Theme from "The Apartment" by Charles Williams with Daniel Kudzma, piano soloist, and the "Dam Busters" March" by Eric Coates.

Selections by guest trumpet soloist Armando Ghitalla of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will include "The Carnival of Venice" arranged by Del Staigers and "The Lost Chord" by Sullivan.

Ghitalla will be accompanied by the band and will be joined by Richard Stacey and John Mandziej for the performance of Anderson's "Bugler's Holiday."

Wilson will be the guest conductor for the final selection "Our Director March" by Bigelow. The march is the Nashua High school song.

Tickets for tonight's concert will be on sale at the box office, officials said.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Telegraph (e)
NASHUA, N. H.
Circ. 13,082

MAR 19 1964

High School Spring Concert Given Ovation

A standing ovation was accorded the spring concert last night presented by the Nashua High school music department and Senior class in the auditorium.

An audience of 1,400 jampacked the auditorium for the event.

Among highlights of the concert was the performance by Armando Ghitalia of the Boston Symphony who was guest trumpet soloist with the band. Each of his selections was enthusiastically received, and a standing ovation was spontaneous for the playing of "Bugler's Holiday" in which be was joined by two Nashua High School trumpeters, Richard Stacy and John Mandziej.

The program opened with the glee club whose performance set the standard for the evening. Their interpretation of the spiritual, "Every Time I Feel the Spirit", and the Mozart "Alleluia" were enthusiastically received.

Climaxing their performance was the Fred Waring arrangement of "The Battle Hymn of the Republic", with Elmer Wilson, guest conductor, at the organ and Roger Duquette on percussion. Accompanist for the glee club, Virginia Dean, gave an outstanding performance.

Part two of the program featured the Girls' chorus accompanied by the Townsmen quintet. Their selections were "As Long As He Needs Me" from 'Olivier' and "If Ever I Would Leave You" from 'Camelot.' Features of their performance was the blending of voices and tone quality, supported by the able "Townsmen."

Armando Ghitalla, of the Boston Symphony orchestra, and guest trumpet soloist with the High school band in last night's spring concert at Nashua High school, had this to say about the Nashua school music program.

"Nashua is one of the fortunate towns where the musical program really works.

"The function of such a program is primarily to provide its youth the opportunity not only to love and appreciate music but to reap the benefits of their own personal accomplishment in increased self-confidence and the inestimable value of the discipline and togetherness which music demands.

"The people of Nashua have provided beautiful facilities for music in its public schools. I sincerely hope they appreciate the wonderful work which is being carried on by Stephen Norris in his dedication to his work and his students.

"The success of the music program is immediately apparent in the response, ability and enthusiasm of the students. They are gaining the real value of music - - a common love, an individual enjoyment and a wonderful opportunity and lesson in living and doing things together."

Part three featured the piano quartet including Virginia Dean, Thomas Gidge, Thomas Brooks and Marc Winer.

Their performance of "Prelude in G Minor" by Rachmaninoff and "Moment Musical" by Schubert was among standout features of the concert.

The High School Symphonic band opened the second half of the program and maintained the caliber set in the first part of the program. The outstanding feature of the band's performance was their excellent accompaniment of the piano solo "Theme from the Apartment" played by Dan Kuczma as well as the accompaniment for Mr Ghitalia.

Mr Wilson, who was guest conductor for the final selection, and the band were given another standing ovation for their performance of "Our Director March", the Nashua High School song.

Before the end of the program, Mr Ghitalia was presented a gift by band president, Jeff Lind, in behalf of the members of the band and glee club for his outstanding contribution to the concert.

He was also presented a scroll by William Tsiaras, senior class president, making him an honorary member of the band as well as the senior class.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Telegraph (e)
NASHUA, N. H.
Circ. 13,082

MAR 9 1964

Hub Trumpeter To Lead School Concert Here

Armando Ghitalla, associate first trumpeter of the Boston Symphony orchestra and first trumpeter of the Boston Pops orchestra, will be in Nashua Wednesday for the first in a series of rehearsals with the Nashua High school symphonic band. A school concert will be presented March 1[illegible] in the high school auditorium.

Ghitalla will be the guest trumpet soloist with the band in the program that is sponsored by the music department and the senior class of Nashua High school.

The program which will include the Glee Club, the Girls' Chorus, and a piano quartet, plus the band and Ghitalla. A capacity audience is anticipated.

Wednesday's rehearsal in the high school will include the two solos to be played by Ghitalla accompanied by the symphonic band and the trumpet trio that will include two trumpeters of the band together with Ghitalla.

Tickets went on sale last week. Members of the band, Glee Club and senior class are selling tickets.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Telegraph (e)
NASHUA, N. H.
Circ. 13,082

203

An Evening Of Fine Music

Nashua concert-goers experienced a memorable evening of music Wednesday at the Spring Concert presented by the Music Department and Senior Class of Nashua High School in the school auditorium.

1,400 persons heard a flawless presentation of vocal and instrumental work which speaks well for the musical training being given in our schools, the enthusiasm with which the students respond, and the bright future for Nashua music in these talented young performers.

We understand that guest soloist, Armand Ghitalla of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was lavish in his praise of the fine backing given him in his numbers by the Symphonic Band, which is an unusual tribute, indeed.

Individual student soloists, as well as the several performing groups, moved flawlessly through varied types of popular and classical music, testimonial to the fine direction of Stephen G. Norris, musical director.

So skillfully arranged was the program that a modern jazz group, the Townsmen, a large mixed glee club, a girls' chorus, a piano quartet and the impressive symphonic band blended into an ear-pleasing and smoothly-paced musical treat.

Appearance of C. Elmer Wilson as guest conductor of the final band number was a sentimental highlight of the evening.

The student musicians and their instructors are to be congratulated for this fine effort. Nashua's musical advancement is assured for a long time by this group of young artists, many of whom will enrich our symphony orchestra and other musical groups for years to come.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Telegraph (e)
NASHUA, N. H.
Circ. 13,082
MAR 16 1964

(Telegraphoto - Shalhoup)

READY FOR CONCERT—The Nashua High piano quartet, one of the features of the concert to be presented Wednesday night by the NHS Symphonic band discuss last minute arrangements. Seated are Virginia Dean and Thomas Gidge and standing, Thomas Brooks (left) and Marc Winer. Miss Dean and Winer are members of the glee club, while Brooks and Gidge belong to both the band and the glee club. Among their piano selections will be "Moment Musical" and "Prelude in G. Minor."

Featured soloist is trumpeter Armando Ghitalla, a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Telegraph (e)
NASHUA, N. H.
Circ. 13,082
MAR 12 1964

CONCERT SOLOIST—Armando Ghitalla, a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, rehearses with the Nashua High School Band, as the group gets ready for the Wednesday, March 18 concert at Senior High auditorium. At right is music director Steven Norris, band conductor.

(Telegraphoto - Shalhoup)

Ghitalla's presentations will include "Carnival of Venice" and "The Lost Chord." He will be joined by two band members for the performance of the trumpet trio, "Bugler's Holiday," with accompaniment by the NHS band.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Telegraph (e)
NASHUA, N. H.
Circ. 13,082
MAR 17 1964

GUEST SOLOIST—Armando Ghitalla will be the guest trumpet soloist at tomorrow night's concert of the Nashua High school symphonic band. Ghitalla is with the Boston Symphony and the Boston Pops. A native of Alpha, Ill, the 35-year-old musician has been associated with many orchestras including the New York City Center Opera and Ballet Orchestra, the RCA Recording Orchestra, and the Huston Symphony. He has held recitals in many major cities, including an appearance at Carnegie Hall in New York. He has a solo record album for release in August.

204

ALBUQUERQUE, N. M.
JOURNAL
D. 48,800 S. 70,900

JUN 7 1964

String Principals Of Boston Symphony Guest Artists Here

Boston Symphony Orchestra's three principal string players will make their initial appearance tonight in the June Music Festival's fourth program of the current season.

Joseph Silverstein, violinist and concertmaster of the Boston Symphony; Burton Fine, first viola, and Jules Eskin, first cellist, will open tonight's program with Beethoven's String Trio, Opus 9 No. 1. This will be followed by the Richard Strauss' Sonata for violin and piano, to be played by Silverstein, with Ralph Berkowitz, pianist. This is one of the works being performed in honor of the composer's centenary.

Following the intermission, the three guest artists will be joined by Josef Gingold, violin; Kurt Frederick, viola; and Georges Miquelle, cello, for a performance of Brahms' Sextet for Strings, Opus 18.

The concert will begin at 8:15 p.m., and single admission tickets will be on sale from 7 p.m. at the Albuquerque Little Theatre, 224 San Pasquale SW.

The three guest artists will also be heard in the Wednesday night concert, concluding program of the June Music Festival. This performance will include Schubert's String Trio No. 2, performed by Silverstein, Fine and Eskin, to be followed by Strauss' Quartet, Opus 13, presented by Silverstein, Fine, Eskin and Berkowitz, in observance of the Centennary of Richard Strauss. Following the intermission, the three guest artists will be joined by Gingold and Miquelle for the concluding program number, Schubert's Quintet, Opus 163.

BOSTON SYMPHONY principal string players Jules Eskin, Joseph Silverstein, and Burton Fine, left to right, rehearse for their performance here as guest artists with the Albuquerque June Music Festival. Eskin, first cellist; Silverstein, violinist and concertmaster of the Boston Symphony, and Fine, first viola, will be heard in concerts tonight and Wednesday night in the Albuquerque Little Theatre, 224 San Pasquale SW. Concerts begin at 8:15, and the single admission tickets will go on sale after 7. (Journal photo)

ALBUQUERQUE, N. M.
JOURNAL
D. 48,800 S. 70,900

JUN 9 1964

June Festival

City Audience Hears More Brilliant Music

Albuquerque was treated to a fourth evening of brilliantly played chamber music Sunday — in the next to the last concert of the June Music Festival.

Appearing as guest artists were the principal strings of the Boston Symphony — Concertmaster Joseph Silverstein; Burton Fine, first violist; and Jules Eskin, first cello.

The Boston musicians opened the program with the Beethoven string trio, Opus 9, No. 1. Silverstein then appeared with Ralph Berkowitz, pianist, to present the Strauss Sonato for Violin and Piano, Opus 18, in honor of the centenary of Strauss' brith.

The dazzling sextet, Opus 18, of Brahms concluded the program. Joining with Silverstein, Fine and Eskin were Kurt Frederick on the viola, Georges Miquelle on the cello and Josef Gingold, violinist.

The festival concludes Wednesday when Eskin, Fine, Silverstein, Miquelle, Gingold and Berkowitz will appear. Music of Schubert and Strauss is on the program.

The concert will begin at 8:15 p.m. in the Albuquerque Little Theatre. — M.J.P.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Herald (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 178,553

APR 10 1964

N. Shore Orchestra

Armando Ghitalla, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be soloist in John Worley's trumpet concerto, "Sea Pines," in the North Shore Philharmonic Orchestra's spring concert on Sunday at 3 in the Lynn City Hall auditorium. Conducted by Rolland Tapley, the program will include Tchaikovsky's "Capriccio Italien," Arthur Foote's " A Night Piece," with flute solo by Frank Comparone, Saint-Saens' French Military March and a circus-style medley, "Big Top," by Lucien Thayer.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 194,870

APR 9 1964

B.S.O. Cellist To Play, Talk On Jewish Music

Bernard Parronchi, cellist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will give a lecture-concert of Sephardic music Sunday evening at 8, in Congregation Adas Shalom, Adams st., Quincy.

The program will include performances by the Temple Israel Glee Club of Boston, conducted by Edward Madden, and liturgical music by Cantor Saul Rogolsky of Congregation Adas Shalom. A social hour will follow.

The event is jointly sponsored by all the Jewish organizations in Quincy, is open to the public without charge, and observes Jewish Music Month.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Herald (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 178,553

APR 10 1964

Wellesley Symphony

The Wellesley Symphony Orchestra, directed by Rolland Tapley, will present its 15th annual spring concert at the Wellesley Junior High School tonight at 8:30. The program will feature Carl Nielsen's Concerto for Flute, with soloist Doriot Anthony Dwyer of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Other works will include the St. Paul Suite for Strings by Holst and Brucker's Symphony No. 4, he "Romantic.' The program is open to the public free of charge.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Citizen (e)
LACONIA, N. H.
Circ. 5,933

APR 16 1964

Famed Violinist Will Appear In Plymouth

PLYMOUTH — Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster of the world famed Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be heard as first violinist in the Nova Arte Quartet which will present the eighth annual Hyman S. Kaplan Memorial concert on Wednesday evening, April 29, at 8 o'clock in Silver Hall of Plymouth State college under the sponsorship of the Plymouth Rotary club.

Silverstein, in his first season as concertmaster with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, joined the Symphony in 1958. He studied at Philadelphia's Curtis Institute as did the other three members of the Nova Arte Quartet.

His previous orchestral experience includes membership in the Houston, Denver and Philadelphia orchestras. Silverstein's notable achievement as a soloist made him prize-winner at the 1959 Queen Elizabeth Music Competition in Belgium, and won him the 1960 Naumburg Foundation Award.

Less than a month ago he was soloist with the Boston Symphony in a New York performance of Igor Stravinsky's Violin Concerto at Lincoln Center.

The other members of the Nova Arte Quartet, George Zazofsky, violinist; Joseph de Pasquale who plays the viola, and Samuel Mayes, cellist, have been heard in Plymouth several times during the Kaplan Memorial series. Proceeds from the concerts are used for Rotary college scholarships.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Allston-Brighton
Citizen Item
BOSTON, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 10,000

MAR 12 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Jewish Times
BROOKLINE, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 8,000

APR 2 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Chronicle-Citizen
BROOKLINE, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 9,106

APR 2 1964

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 194,870

APR 2 1964

'Inside B.S.O.'

An evening entitled "Inside the B.S.O." will feature two members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The event, sponsored by the Brookline Youth Concerts Committee, will begin Sunday evening at 8 in the Driscoll School Auditorium, Westbourne ter., Brookline.

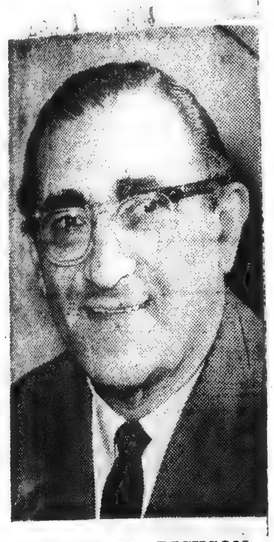
Harry Ellis Dickson, orchestra violinist, conductor of the Youth Concerts at Symphony Hall and associate conductor of the Boston Pops and Esplanade concerts, will give the kind of commentary he delivers at the pre-symphony luncheons Fridays.

Roger Voisin, principal trumpet of the orchestra, will show his slides of Boston Symphony tours in Europe and Japan.

A social hour will follow.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Press
WESTWOOD, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 2,884
APR

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Press
WESTWOOD, Mass.
Weekly Circ. 2,884



HARRY ELLIS DICKSON

Harry Ellis Dickson Will Speak April 23

Mr. Harry Ellis Dickson, noted violinist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Associate Conductor of the Boston Pops and the Esplanade Concerts, will be the guest attraction at the Norwood-Westwood Chapter of Hadassah Donor Dinner on April 23, at Corman's Party House in Sharon.

Mrs. Frederick Bloom, president of the Chapter, and her co-chairmen for the annula donor dinner, Mrs. Gerald Simches and Mrs. Marvin Cain, are understandably proud to present Mr. Dickson at this affair. Mr. Dickson will deliver one of his famed witty and informative talks which have delighted audiences at the Boston Symphony open rehearsals and Pre-Symphony Luncheons.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 194,870
APR 13 1964

North Shore Philharmonic

Rolland Tapley Draws A Commendable Sound

By T. F. CLIFFORD

A successful community orchestra is a curious combination of civic support, dedicated amateur players and an unusual conductor. Sunday's Spring Concert by the North Shore Philharmonic Orchestra of Lynn illustrated this.

An audience modest in size gave generous support.

Some 60 players on stage diligently worked their way through a program of 19th and 20th century music, producing a commendable sound.

The major contribution was that of conductor Rolland Tapley. He has extraordinary effectiveness with community orchestras. His directing is clear and crisp. During the occasional shaky passage, not unknown to such orchestras, he controls his forces with a strong yet suave manner.

The first half of the program consisted of "French Military March" by Saint-Saens, Foote's "A Night Piece" and "Capriccio Italien" of Tchaikowsky.

Despite several lapses in intonation, these selections were well played. Rhythms were clear, and the ensemble was expressive. Frank Comparone, soloist in "A Night Piece," projected a full, lovely flute tone.

After intermission came a composition by Lucien Thayer of the Globe staff. "Big Top" pictures animal roars, a calliope, trainers' guns—everything but sawdust. Midway in the score, barking dogs remind one of the parade in Piston's "Incredible Flutist." More than a parade, however, "Big Top" is practically the sound track for a movie on P. T. Barnum. The melodies are original, singable yet not cliches. The instrumental writing reveals that Mr. Thayer knows his orchestration.

The last selection combined the world premiere of "Concerto for Trumpet" by John C. Worley, with the virtuoso playing of soloist Armando Ghitalla. The concerto is rhythmically complex and 20th century in harmony. In the first movement dazzling trumpet passages supported by sophisticated orchestral tissue alternate with a quiet, smooth line for the soloist.

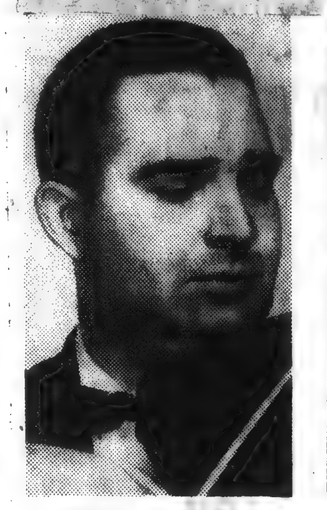
The second movement, Molto Adagio, has an attractive legato melody. The finale presents bravura display for the soloist over Latin American rhythms.

Prof. Worley more than satisfied the soloist, the orchestra and the audience. Mr. Ghitalla's trumpet performance had the sheen and artistry expected of a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Both composers were presented to the audience before their music was performed. Afterward, each was called on stage to share the applause. As an encore, Mr. Ghitalla, with Jeffrey Stern and Edward Rhodes of the orchestra's trumpet section, played "Trumpeter's Holiday" by Anderson. The audience took this as frosting on the cake, a tasty ending to an afternoon of pleasant music.

(Dr. Clifford is head of the music department, Salem State College.)

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Gazette (e)
WORCESTER, Mass.
Circ. 93,580
DEC 27 1963



JOSEPH SILVERSTEIN

JOSEPH de PASQUALE

Orchestra Begins Concerts Sunday

Worcester Orchestra's eighth season of concerts-in-the round will start Sunday with a concert at 3 p.m., in Worcester Auditorium featuring two of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's most prominent members.

They are Concertmaster Joseph Silverstein and principal violist Joseph de Pasquale.

Silverstein began with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1955 when he was 23., and within a short space of time attracted considerable notice from his colleagues as well as fro mmusicians outside the orchestra. He won third prize in 1959 in the Queen Elizabeth of Belgium International Competition.

Naumburg Award

In 1960 Silverstein, whose father was a violin teacher won the Walter W. Naumburg Foundation award. He became concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra a short time later.

Pasquale who was taught by his father, a professional musician, became the first of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's virtuoso players to be soloist under the orchestra's new music director, Erich Leinsdorf. To him fell the distinction in 1947 of becoming the youngest principal viola of any major orchestra.

Program for Sunday's concert, which will be presented by the Worcester Orchestral Society, will include works by Glinka, Wagner, Elgar, Mozart and Gershwin

Conductor will be Harry Levenson, who founded the orchestra in 1947.

Concerts-in-the-round are only part of a busy schedule for the 48-strong orchestra made up of musicians from the Greater Worcester Area. During the year they put on many other concerts.

Sponsors

Sponsoring the concert-in-the-round are Art Photo Service, Inc., Fitchburg; Astra Pharmaceutical Products Inc.; B-W Footwear, Inc. of Webster; Crompton & Knowles Corp., Guaranty Bank and Trust Co., Harr Motor Co., Massachusetts Elecrtic Co., Worcester Gas Light Co., and Worcester Telegram and Gazette. Complimentary tickets may be obtained at M. Steinert & Sons, 308 Main St., or from any of the sponsoring companies.

The orchestra will put another concert-in-the-round on Jan. 19 in the Auditorium when the soloist will be the Boston Symphony orchestra's principal cellist, Samuel Mayes.

APPOINTMENTS, RESIGNATIONS & RETIREMENTS

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Christian Science Monitor (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 174,850

JAN 29 1964

Symphony fills two key positions

The two vacanices arising in the Boston Symphony Orchestra as a result of the recent resignations of Joseph de Pasquale and Samuel Mayes have now been filled.

Mr. de Pasquale and Mr. Mayes have received appointments to the Philadelphia Orchestra; they are to be succeeded by Burton Fine who, after joining the Boston Symphony at the beginning of the season, will be promoted to principal violist, and by Jules Eskin, former principal cellist with the Cleveland Orchestra since 1961, who is now appointed to the same chair at Symphony Hall. Their appointments will become effective with the beginning of the season of 1964-65.

Both newcomers are native Philadelphians, and both studied at the same music school—Philadelphia's Curtis Institute (also the alma mater of Mr. Pasquale and Mr. Hayes).

The final selections were made by Erich Leinsdorf while the orchestra was in New York last week for four concerts. Mr. Leinsdorf acted on the unanimous recommendations of a committee specially set up from the orchestra for the auditions. The conductor emphasized the fact that the new principals enter their careers "not by an arbitrary process but after a long and careful search in which ten leading members of the Symphony . . . were actively engaged."

Mr. Fine joined the Boston Symphony after nine years as a research chemist at the National Aeronautics and Space Administration's Lewis Research Center in Cleveland. He has played with a number of chamber music ensembles, including the Baldwin-Wallace String Quartet.

Mr. Eskin has played as first cellist with the New York City Center Opera and Ballet Orchestra, made a recital tour of Europe in 1961, and has played annually in the Casals Festival Orchestra in Puerto Rico.

INTERNATIONAL MUSICIAN
NEWARK, N. J.
MONTHLY 245.100

APR 1964 Buffalo

SYMPHONIC HIGHLIGHTS

ORCHESTRA MEMBERS Burton Fine, one of the newest members of the Boston Symphony, has been chosen as its new principal violist. The new principal cellist is Jules Eskin. This announcement followed several weeks of intensive auditions by a committee consisting of five principal players of the Boston Symphony and Richard Burgin, the orchestra's associate conductor. The committee heard every member of the orchestra who wished to audition, in addition to many of the most distinguished and best known orchestral and chamber music players in this country and Canada. The final selections were made by Erich Leinsdorf who accepted the unanimous recommendations of the committee. Burton Fine joined the Boston Symphony at the beginning of the current season as a violinist after having spent nine years as a research chemist at the National Aeronautics and Space Administration's Lewis Research Center in Cleveland. During these years he played in a number of chamber music ensembles, including the Baldwin-Wallace String Quartet. He was born in Philadelphia and studied at the Settlement Music School and then for four years at the Curtis Institute of Music in that city. In the summer of 1950 he studied at the Berkshire Music Center. Jules Eskin has been the principal cellist of the Cleveland Orchestra since 1961. He is also a native of Philadelphia and a former student at the Curtis Institute where he studied with Leonard Rose . . . Daniel Majeske, an assistant concertmaster of the Cleveland Orchestra since 1959, has been promoted to first assistant concertmaster. . . . Gerald Appleman has been appointed principal cellist of the Cleveland Orchestra effective next season. He will occupy the chair once held by his teacher, Leonard Rose, who was first cellist in Cleveland from 1939 to 1943.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 194,870

JAN 28 1964

Symphony Fills Its Two Empty Chairs

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has filled the vacancies of two musicians who defected to the Philadelphia Orchestra. It promoted one Philadelphian from its own ranks and acquired another from Cleveland.

Burton Fine, who joined the B.S.O. this season in the rear rank of the violins, has been promoted to principal violist. Jules Eskin, principal cellist with the Cleveland since 1961, will hold that chair at Symphony Hall.

They replace Joseph de Pasquale and Samuel Mayes respectively, who will leave at the end of the Berkshire Festival in August.

The resignations of de Pasquale and Mayes caused a furore in musical circles when announced last month. It was rumored that they had been stolen, much the same way TV stars are lured to rival networks by better billing and financial prospects.

Erich Leinsdorf made oblique reference to their departure. He emphasized the manner in which their successors were selected and referred openly to "fair competition" which had been employed to find the best men.

Fine joined the symphony at the beginning of the current season after spending nine years as a research chemist at the National Aeronautics and Space Administration's Lewis Research Center in Cleveland.

During his years there he played with a number of chamber ensembles, including the Baldwin-Wallace String Quartet.

He was born in Philadelphia and studied at the Settlement Music School under Ivan Galamian. He continued with Galamian at the Curtis Institute for the four years. In the Summer of 1950 he studied at the Berkshire Music Center.

He has a B.S. degree from the University of Pennsylvania and a Ph.D. in chemistry from Illinois Institute of Technology. In Cleveland he played the viola professionally with the string quartet in residence at First Unitarian Church, where Robert Shaw is minister of music. He is married and has three children.

Eskin has been principal cellist of the Cleveland Orchestra since 1961. He, too, is a native of Philadelphia and a former student at the Curtis Institute, where he studied with Leonard Rose.

Before going to Cleveland Eskin played with the Dallas Symphony and as first cellist with the New York City Center Opera and Ballet Orchestra.

He made a recital tour of Europe in 1961 and has given recitals in New York's Town Hall. He has also played annually with the Casals Festival Orchestra in Puerto Rico.

K. K.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Times (m)
NEW YORK, N. Y.
Circ. 681,612

JAN 28 1964

Boston Symphony Names Fine Its Principal Violis

Special to The New York Times

BOSTON, Jan. 27 — Burton Fine, a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra since the beginning of the season, was named today principal violis for next season.

Jules Eskin, principal cellist of the Cleveland Orchestra since 1961, will join the Boston organization in the same capacity next season. They will fill vacancies caused by resignations.

Mr. Fine spent nine years as a research chemist with the National Aeronautics and Space Administration's Lewis Research Cente rin Cleveland. He played with various chambe ensembles in his spare time. Mr Eskin is a career musician. Both studied at the Curtis Institut of Music in Philadelphia.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Patriot-Ledger (e)
QUINCY, Mass.
Circ. 44,419

JAN 31 1964

Symphony Chooses New Principals

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has announced the selection of two new principal players after auditions. They are Burton Fine, principal violist and Jules Eskin, principal cellist.

Mr. Fine, a former research chemist, joined the orchestra at the beginning of this season as a violinist. Mr. Eskin, principal cellist of the Cleveland Orchestra since 1961, has also been first cellist with the New York City Center Opera and Ballet Orchestra. Both men are in their early thirties.

MUSICAL LEADER
CHICAGO, ILL.
MONTHLY-CIRC. N. AVAIL.

FEB 1964 Buffalo

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The appointments of Burton Fine as principal violist and Jules Eskin as principal 'cellist have been announced by the Boston Symphony . . . . A collection of ancient instruments from the Orchestra's Casadesus Collection, which is on permanent display at Boston's Symphony Hall, was exhibited at the IBM Gallery in New York City . . . The Orchestra presented the American premiere of Leonard Bernstein's Third Symphony, "Kaddish" on Jan. 31; commissioned by the Orchestra in 1955-56, the work was conducted by Charles Munch . . . Announcements for the forthcoming 1964 Berkshire Festival have included appointments of Aaron Copland and Gunther Schuller to head the Composition Department, with Pierre Boulez and Lukas Foss as additional members; special program features planned include "music for festivals," a contemporary American music festival, and a Richard Strauss cycle.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-420

Herald (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 178,553

JAN 28 1964

Symphony Chooses 2 New Principals

At yesterday morning's rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Thomas D. Perry, Jr. announced that Burton Fine, one of the newest members, had been chosen os the new principal violist, and that Jules Eskin would become the principal cellist.

The announcement followed several weeks of auditions before five principal players of the orchestra and ichard Burgin, associate conductor. The final selections were made by Erich Leinsdorf while the orchestra was in New York last week.

NEW YORK Herald Tribune
D. 355,898 S. 451,270

JAN 28 1964 Buffalo

Boston Symphony Appointments

The Boston Symphony announced yesterday the appointment of Burton Fine as first violist and Jules Eskin as first cellist, effective in 1964-'65. They replace Joseph de Pasquale and Samuel Mayes respectively, who will take similar pasts with the Philadelphia Orchestra next season. Mr. Fine is presently a member of the Boston Symphony's violin section. Mr. Eskin is first cellist of the Cleveland Orchestra.

MUSICAL AMERICA
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 15,900

MAR 1964 Buffalo

ORCHESTRAS

Band in Boston

Erich Leinsdorf recently approved the appointments of Burton Fine as principal violist and Jules Eskin as principal cellist to the Boston Symphony. The appointments came after several weeks of intensive auditions by a committee consisting of five players from the orchestra and Richard Burgin, the orchestra's association conductor. Mr. Leinsdorf, who heard all the final auditions, accepted the unanimous recommendations of the audition committee.

Mr. Fine joined the Boston Symphony at the beginning of the current season after having spent nine years as a research chemist at the National Aeronautics and Space Administration's Lewis Research Center in Cleveland. Eskin has been principal cellist of the Cleveland Orchestra since 1961.

The New York Times
D. 680,265 S. 1,306,418

JAN 28 1964 Buffalo

Boston Symphony Names Fine Its Principal Violist

Special to The New York Times

BOSTON, Jan. 27 — Burton Fine, a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra since the beginning of the season, was named today principal violist for next season.

Jules Eskin, principal cellist of the Cleveland Orchestra since 1961, will join the Boston organization in the same capacity next season. They will fill vacancies caused by resignations.

Mr. Fine spent nine years as a research chemist with the National Aeronautics and Space Administration's Lewis Research Center in Cleveland. He played with various chamber ensembles in his spare time. Mr. Eskin is a career musician. Both studied at the Curtis Institute of Music in Philadelphia.

306

APPOINTMENTS, RESIGNATIONS & RETIREMENTS

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Christian Science Monitor (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 174,850

JAN 29 1964

Symphony fills two key positions

The two vacancies arising in the Boston Symphony Orchestra as a result of the recent resignations of Joseph de Pasquale and Samuel Mayes have now been filled.

Mr. de Pasquale and Mr. Mayes have received appointments to the Philadelphia Orchestra; they are to be succeeded by Burton Fine, who, after joining the Boston Symphony at the beginning of the season, will be promoted to principal violist, and by Jules Eskin, former principal cellist with the Cleveland Orchestra since 1961, who is now appointed to the same chair at Symphony Hall. Their appointments will become effective with the beginning of the season of 1964-65.

Both newcomers are native Philadelphians, and both studied at the same music school—Philadelphia's Curtis Institute (also the alma mater of Mr. Pasquale and Mr. Hayes).

The final selections were made by Erich Leinsdorf while the orchestra was in New York last week for four concerts. Mr. Leinsdorf acted on the unanimous recommendations of a committee specially set up from the orchestra for the auditions. The conductor emphasized the fact that the new principals enter their careers "not by an arbitrary process but after a long and careful search in which ten leading members of the Symphony . . . were actively engaged."

Mr. Fine joined the Boston Symphony after nine years as a research chemist at the National Aeronautics and Space Administration's Lewis Research Center in Cleveland. He has played with a number of chamber music ensembles, including the Baldwin-Wallace String Quartet.

Mr. Eskin has played as first cellist with the New York City Center Opera and Ballet Orchestra, made a recital tour of Europe in 1961, and has played annually in the Casals Festival Orchestra in Puerto Rico.

INTERNATIONAL MUSICIAN
NEWARK, N. J.
MONTHLY 245,100

APR 1964

SYMPHONIC HIGHLIGHTS

ORCHESTRA MEMBERS Burton Fine, one of the newest members of the Boston Symphony, has been chosen as its new principal violist. The new principal cellist is Jules Eskin. This announcement followed several weeks of intensive auditions by a committee, consisting of five principal players of the Boston Symphony and Richard Burgin, the orchestra's associate conductor. The committee heard every member of the orchestra who wished to audition, in addition to many of the most distinguished and best known orchestral and chamber music players in this country and Canada. The final selections were made by Erich Leinsdorf, who accepted the unanimous recommendations of the committee. Burton Fine joined the Boston Symphony at the beginning of the current season as violinist after having spent nine years as a research chemist at the National Aeronautics and Space Administration's Lewis Research Center in Cleveland. During these years he played in a number of chamber music ensembles, including the Baldwin-Wallace String Quartet. He was born in Philadelphia and studied at the Settlement Music School and then for four years at the Curtis Institute of Music in that city. In the summer of 1950 he studied at the Berkshire Music Center. Jules Eskin has been the principal cellist of the Cleveland Orchestra since 1961. He is also a native of Philadelphia and a former student at the Curtis Institute where he studied with Leonard Rose. . . . Daniel Majeske, assistant concertmaster of the Cleveland Orchestra since 1959, has been promoted to first assistant concertmaster. . . . Gerald Appleman has been appointed principal cellist of the Cleveland Orchestra effective next season. He will occupy the chair once held by his teacher, Leonard Rose, who was first cellist in Cleveland from 1939 to 1943.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Morning Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 194,870

JAN 28 1964

Symphony Fills Its Two Empty Chairs

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has filled the vacancies of two musicians who defected to the Philadelphia Orchestra. It promoted one Philadelphian from its own ranks and acquired another from Cleveland.

Burton Fine, who joined the B.S.O. this season in the rear rank of the violins, has been promoted to principal violist. Jules Eskin, principal cellist with the Cleveland since 1961 will hold that chair at Symphony Hall.

They replace Joseph de Pasquale and Samuel Mayes respectively, who will leave at the end of the Berkshire Festival in August.

The resignations of de Pasquale and Mayes caused a furore in musical circles when announced last month. It was rumored that they had been stolen, much the same way TV stars are lured to rival networks by better billing and financial prospects.

Erich Leinsdorf made oblique reference to their departure. He emphasized the manner in which their successors were selected and referred openly to "fair competition" which had been employed to find the best men.

Fine joined the symphony at the beginning of the current season after spending nine years as a research chemist at the National Aeronautics and Space Administration's Lewis Research Center in Cleveland.

During his years there he played with a number of chamber ensembles, including the Baldwin-Wallace String Quartet.

He was born in Philadelphia and studied at the Settlement Music School under Ivan Galamian. He continued with Galamian at the Curtis Institute for the four years. In the Summer of 1950 he studied at the Berkshire Music Center.

He has a B.S. degree from the University of Pennsylvania and a Ph.D. in chemistry from Illinois Institute of Technology. In Cleveland he played the viola professionally with the string quartet in residence at First Unitarian Church, where Robert Shaw is minister of music. He is married and has three children.

Eskin has been pincipal cellist of the Cleveland Orchestra since 1961. He, too, is a native of Philadelphia and a former student at the Curtis Institute, where he studied with Leonard Rose.

Before going to Cleveland, Eskin played with the Dallas Symphony and as first cellist with the New York City Center Opera and Ballet Orchestra.

He made a recital tour of Europe in 1961 and has given recitals in New York's Town Hall. He has also played annually with the Casals Festival Orchestra in Puerto Rico.

K.K.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Times (m)
NEW YORK, N. Y.
Circ. 681,612

JAN 28 1964

Boston Symphony Names Fine Its Principal Violis

Special to The New York Times

BOSTON, Jan. 27 — Burton Fine, a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra since the beginning of the season, was named today principal violist for next season.

Jules Eskin, principal cellist of the Cleveland Orchestra since 1961, will join the Boston organization in the same capacity next season. They will fill vacancies caused by resignations.

Mr. Fine spent nine years as a research chemist with the National Aeronautics and Space Administration's Lewis Research Cente rin Cleveland. He played with various chamber ensembles in his spare time. Mr. Eskin is a career musician. Both studied at the Curtis Institute of Music in Philadelphia.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Patriot-Ledger (e)
QUINCY, Mass.
Circ. 44,419

JAN 31 1964

Symphony Chooses New Principals

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has announced the selection of two new principal players after auditions. They are Burton Fine, principal violist and Jules Eskin, principal cellist.

Mr. Fine, a former research chemist, joined the orchestra at the beginning of this season as a violinist. Mr. Eskin, principal cellist of the Cleveland Orchestra since 1961, had also been first cellist with the New York City Center Opera and Ballet Orchestra. Both men are in their early thirties.

MUSICAL LEADER
CHICAGO, ILL.
MONTHLY-CIRC. N. AVAIL.

FEB 1964

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The appointments of Burton Fine as principal violist and Jules Eskin as principal 'cellist have been announced by the Boston Symphony . . . A collection of ancient instruments from the Orchestra's Casadesus Collection, which is on permanent display at Boston's Symphony Hall, was exhibited at the IBM Gallery in New York City . . . The Orchestra presented the American premiere of Leonard Bernstein's Third Symphony, "Kaddish" on Jan. 31; commissioned by the Orchestra in 1955-56, the work was conducted by Charles Munch . . . Announcements for the forthcoming 1964 Berkshire Festival have included appointments of Aaron Copland and Gunther Schuller to head the Composition Department, with Pierre Boulez and Lukas Foss as additional members; special program features planned include "music for festivals," a contemporary American music festival, and a Richard Strauss cycle.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Herald (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 178,553

JAN 28 1964

Symphony Chooses 2 New Principals

At yesterday morning's rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Thomas D. Perry, Jr., announced that Burton Fine, one of the newest members, had been chosen as the new principal violist, and that Jules Eskin would become the principal cellist.

The announcement followed several weeks of auditions before five principal players of the orchestra and ichard Burgin, associate conductor. The final selections were made by Erich Leinsdorf while the orchestra was in New York last week.

Herald Tribune
NEW YORK
D. 355,898 S. 451,270

JAN 28 1964

Boston Symphony Appointments

The Boston Symphony announced yesterday the appointment of Burton Fine as first violist and Jules Eskin as first cellist, effective in 1964-'65. They replace Joseph de Pasquale and Samuel Mayes respectively, who will take similar pasts with the Philadelphia Orchestra next season. Mr. Fine is presently a member of the Boston Symphony's violin section. Mr. Eskin is first cellist of the Cleveland Orchestra.

MUSICAL AMERICA
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 15,900

MAR 1964

ORCHESTRAS

Band in Boston

Erich Leinsdorf recently approved the appointments of Burton Fine as principal violist and Jules Eskin as principal cellist to the Boston Symphony. The appointments came after several weeks of intensive auditions by a committee consisting of five players from the orchestra and Richard Burgin, the orchestra's association conductor. Mr. Leinsdorf, who heard all the final auditions, accepted the unanimous recommendations of the audition committee.

Mr. Fine joined the Boston Symphony at the beginning of the current season after having spent nine years as a research chemist at the National Aeronautics and Space Administration's Lewis Research Center in Cleveland. Eskin has been principal cellist of the Cleveland Orchestra since 1961.

The New York Times
D. 660,265 S. 1,306,418

JAN 28 1964

Boston Symphony Names Fine Its Principal Violist

Special to The New York Times

BOSTON, Jan. 27 — Burton Fine, a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra since the beginning of the season, was named today principal violist for next season.

Jules Eskin, principal cellist of the Cleveland Orchestra since 1961, will join the Boston organization in the same capacity next season. They will fill vacancies caused by resignations.

Mr. Fine spent nine years as a research chemist with the National Aeronautics and Space Administration's Lewis Research Center in Cleveland. He played with various chamber ensembles in his spare time. Mr. Eskin is a career musician. Both studied at the Curtis Institute of Music in Philadelphia.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 465,653
MAR 1

New Principals

Eskin and Fine Pleased At Symphony Prospects

By MICHAEL STEINBERG

Late in January the Boston Symphony announced that the replacements for the departing solo cellist and violist, Samuel Mayes and Joseph de Pasquale, would be Jules Eskin currently of the Cleveland Orchestra, and Burton Fine of the Boston Symphony's second violin section.

STEINBERG

Curious about both men and fascinated by the mechanics of, and the politics behind, the annual shifts in orchestras, I arranged for conversations with both our new first desk players.

The opportunity to meet Jules Eskin came when the Cleveland Orchestra spent two days of their tour in Boston. Eskin is young, and possessed of a certain glamour that should gladden the hearts of the Friday subscribers. I caught him for some minutes after he had returned from taking a young lady to lunch at Durgin Park and just before he went to visit Boston concertmaster Joseph Silverstein.

Chamber Music

Silverstein's name came into conversation often, and the many years of friendship and of mutual respect are a central reason that motivated Eskin to audition for the Boston vacancy and to be intensely glad over the way it all turned out. Relations between the first chair string players are an important matter under any circumstances. They are particularly so in Boston where Eskin's new appointment carries with it a chair in the Nova Arte Quartet whose leader is, of course, Silverstein.

The increased opportunities for chamber music playing are also an important factor behind the cellist's broad anticipatory smile these days. The prospect of his work with the Nova Arte Quartet and Trio, and coaching chamber music at the New England Conservatory and at Tanglewood, these are all most pleasant matters. It is, however, in the field of chamber music that Eskin feels the only possible regret concerning his move: because of the Boston Symphony's Summer obligations in the Berkshires, he will have to give up the wonderful sessions at Rudolf Serkin's Marlboro.

Admires Leinsdorf

How does he feel about Erich Leinsdrof, I asked. Once again, unqualified enthusiasm, for the analytical and intellectual force of the conductor's mind, and especially "for the thoroughly adult way he works with an orchestra." The admiration for Leinsdorf is of long standing, and it goes back to past associations in New York. All in all, Eskin was most emphatic in saying that in a season that produced solo cello vacancies in Boston, New York and Philadelphia, no outcome could have pleased him more than his becoming first cellist in Boston.

Curious about the degree to which financial considerations might affect Eskin's pleasure in his appointment, I brought up that topic, but we agreed the question was ungentlemanly, and it was withdrawn. An interviewer must ask about hobbies, and an interviewee must produce some. Eskin confessed to an interest in photography, though he has little time for it these days. We ended by talking about the cooking he does in the Cleveland apartment he shares with assistant concertmaster Arnold Steinhardt, and our conversation evaporated in a pleasant imaginary aroma of beurre noir and vintage Rhine wines.

Ex-Chemist Fine

More recently, I met Burton Fine for lunch before one of the Friday Symphony concerts. I had heard about him from a common friend in the Cleveland Orchestra who used to play quartets with him during Fine's days of working as a research chemist for N.A.S.A., and Fine lived up to the intensity, intelligence, and humor I had been led to expect.

The first question naturally concerned his double career in science and music. "Burton could never leave music alone. He just had to keep worrying it," my Cleveland friend had said. For Fine it was largely a question of potential excellence. Chemistry, he felt, would not take him beyond "a comfortable mediocrity," but music might. Even so, he admitted to continuing surprise, even shock, at the rapidity of developments.

The audition for the current season's violin vacancy was to determine whether or not he would return to music full time. When some months after Fine's joining the orchestra the auditions for the principal viola chair were announced, he entered. He had not, he felt, played his best at the audition that got him into the Symphony because being in music only part-time had kept him from being in his best form. It seemed a good idea, therefore, simply to let Leinsdorf hear him again now that he was playing better. "Also," he added, "I thought it was a good idea to let him know I played viola. Certain works like Schoenberg's Transfigured Night and some Mozart pieces have to have the viola section beefed up, and I like to play viola. Besides, it pays an extra five dollars a week."

The orchestra's schedule around Christmas time allowed him leisure for practising on the viola, "and shoveling snow," and very evidently he was in excellent form when he played, first for the orchestra committee, then for Leinsdorf.

Fine is in every way as happy as possible. One of the things he likes about being a violist is being in the middle of the texture, the same reason Mozart liked it, too. For him, the Boston viola section is incomparably the best, and not one that requires any pushing or pulling. He, too, is pleased about the increased opportunities for chamber music and about the close association with Silverstein, an old friend from Curtis Institute days.

We spoke about his children, of whom there are three. "The oldest is extremely musical," Fine said with pride, and just a touch of disquiet. We discussed that day's program, Alban Berg's trumpet parts and the relation of Schumann's "Overture, Scherzo, and Finale" to the Second Symphony. "Well, I have to look at a few passages," said the new principal violist, and suddenly disappeared into Symphony Hall to take his place at the backstand of second violins.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Evening Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 146,915
JAN 29 1964

Musical Chairs

Fine Sitting Pretty In Boston Symphony

By MARGO MILLER

How is the Boston Symphony taking the resignations of its principal violist and cellist? It depends whom you talk to. Rumors come like Timpani thunder.

Backstage, a player with 46 years service said, "we have always got men from other orchestras but I've never heard of players going from Boston."

Then, the rumor that Eugene Ormandy would audition the rest of the B.S.O. on the next free day!

Followed by the rumor that Erich Leinsdorf's Christmas gift to the Philadelphia conductor was a copy of Dr. Spock—on the care of new arrivals. It's not known what George Szell whose Cleveland Orchestra loses its first cellist, Jules Estin, to Boston, may have sent to Leinsdorf.

Burton Fine, named Monday as first violinist, has inspired Symphony Hall wags to new heights. Joining the very last desk of second violins in September, Fine's jump to Joseph de Pasquale's viola chair, come next season, has caused many to look at the last row with new interest. Joseph Silverstein, now concertmaster, began his B.S.O. career in Fine's present chair.

So, the rumor that there will be open auditions for the last violin stand.

Fine's ability on both violin and viola has players reconsidering their own instruments. A departing violinist called over his back that he was hurrying home to practice for the forthcoming English horn audition. A bassoonist is dusting off his old fiddle.

Until winning the violin audition, Fine had not been in a orchestra for some time. He played much chamber music during his nine years as a research chemist for the National Aeronautics and Space Administration laboratory in Cleveland. Space is a pretty good spring board to other things, especially in Ohio, but at present, Fine has no designs on a U.S. Senate seat from Massachusetts.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Gazette (e)
TAUNTON, Mass.
Circ. 12,652
JAN 28 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Union (m)
SPRINGFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 83,691
JAN 28 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Recorder-Gazette (e)
GREENFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 13,354
JAN 30 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sun (e)
ATTLEBORO, Mass.
Circ. 11,206
JAN 28 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Enterprise & Times (e)
BROCKTON, Mass.
Circ. 45,777
JAN 28 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Journal (m)
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
Circ. 61,299
JAN 28 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Transcript-Telegram (e)
HOLYOKE, Mass.
Circ. 26,214
JAN 28 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Journal (e)
LEWISTON-AUBURN, Me.
Circ. 14,063
JAN 28 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Transcript (e)
NORTH ADAMS, Mass.
Circ. 13,209
JAN 28 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Call (e)
WOONSOCKET, R. I.
Circ. 26,710
JAN 28 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Times-Argus (e)
BARRE, Vermont
Circ. 11,184
JAN 28 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Berkshire Eagle (e)
PITTSFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 29,087
JAN 28 1964

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Times (e)
HARTFORD, Conn.
Circ. 126,360
JAN 29 1964

NASA Researcher Joins Symphony

Boston — (AP) — A former research chemist with the National Aeronautics and Space Administration has been named the Boston Symphony Orchestra's principal violist.

And along with that rare pairing comes an announcement of a series of coincidences.

Burton Fine, the new chief violist, comes to Boston from Cleveland. Also newly appointed is Jules Eskin as principal cellist. He too comes from Cleveland.

Both are Philadelphia natives. Both studied at the same Philadelphia music school. Both are in their 30s. And both take the places of musicians who left Boston to go to the Philadelphia Orchestra.

Fine, who has a doctorate in chemistry, was with NASA's Lewis Research Center in Cleveland for nine years.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sentinel (e)
KEENE, N. H.
Circ. 7,894
FEB 15 1964

208

Began Lessons Here at 6

PAGE ONE

Local Youth in Boston Symphony

Keene's Michael Vitale has achieved at 21 a step in his career that scores of the nation's best musicians don't reach till they're 35. He has become a member of the Boston Symphony, one of the nation's tops.

The youth who started taking violin lessons from the late Fredyum Henrickson here at the age of 6, and in three years had outstripped his instructor's capacity to teach, was auditioned in Boston on Monday morning with eight other aspirants.

He was the only one selected for final audition in the afternoon and before the day was over he was a member of the Boston Symphony. He is to report to Symphony Hall for his first rehearsal with the group on Sept. 21.

His basic salary with compensation from television performances, recordings and other sources is expected to gross him from $10,000 to $15,000 a year.

Day of Hurdles

Monday was a day of hurdles for the 1960 Keene High School graduate who has made clearing hurdles a matter of record in the past 15 years.

Roland A. Whitney, trustee of the Michael Vitale Musical Education Fund, got the story of the day in a letter from the youth. Here it is:

In morning auditions with a "jury" of symphony members behind a curtain in Symphony Hall where they could hear but not see, Vitale and eight others who had been assigned identifying numbers gave individual performances.

MICHAEL VITALE

The jury picked only one—Vitale—for a final afternoon audition.

Various Pieces

He was given various symphonic pieces to practice in the two or three hours between the two auditions, rehearsing them with a pianist. Then late in the afternoon Erich Leinsdorf, Boston Symphony conductor, appeared with another handpicked "jury".

He asked for parts of Mendelssohn's Concerto, then gave Vitale some Wagnerian works to play by sight reading while Leinsdorf conducted. The works were not the ones practiced.

The test over, Leinsdorf, appearing pleased, asked his jury members if they were satisfied. They said they were and Vitale was in.

It's a big step for a young man who is yet to finish his formal music schooling. Vitale is to be graduated from the Juilliard School of Music in New York in June.

Started Here

His career started under the late Mr. Henrickson, who recognized that after three years, when Vitale was 9, the boy needed instruction beyond what he could give.

A New England Conservatory of Music audition led, the following year, to study with Alfred Krips, Boston Symphony assistant concertmaster, on a scholarship. The Conservatory presented Vitale in a recital in Jordan Hall when he was 12—an unusual recognition of talent.

At 12 Vitale, again with scholarship aid, entered the Juilliard School's preparatory division to study with violin instructor Ivan Galamian, one of the world's greatest.

Vitale's high-school years were grueling. He worked at his studies at KHS, practiced afternoons and evenings, and commuted to New York on weekends.

On graduating in 1960 he entered Juilliard to devote full time to studying music theory while continuing his violin major with Galamian, who still is his teacher.

Concert Violinist

His goal is to be a concert violinist, and that requires a violin with special tonal qualities and resonance. Keene patrons raised $500 toward a Grancino that cost $2,500. Vitale was to pay the rest in four years.

Vitale is the son of Mr. and Mrs. Michael R. Vitale of 217 Gilsum St. He was married last year and his wife, Sheila, is a violin student under Galamian at Juilliard. She has a year to go.

While at Akron (Ohio) High School her violin teacher, Joseph Gingold, Cleveland Symphony concertmaster, recommended her for the Juilliard Preparatory Division, and that she attend a high school in the New York area. She is a 1961 graduate of Atlantic City (N.J.) High School.

Her goal is to play in a symphony or teach.

NEW ENGLAND NEWSCLIP
Box 2078, Boston 6 - 742-4200
BOSTON, MASS.
Record-American
M/E Circ. 441,810
MAY 7 1964

★ ★ ★

THOMAS D. PERRY, Jr., manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, brought messages (via letter) from Erich Leinsdorf, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to Samuel H. Mayes, cellist, and Joseph de Pasquale, violist, at their farewell reception Monday evening in the Oval Room of the Sheraton Plaza Hotel. The two excellent musicians who are leaving the Boston group after the Tanglewood season to join the Philadelphia Symphony, were feted by scores of music-loving friends.

Greetings from Gov. Endicott Peabody were conveyed to the honor guests by Mrs. Peabody who presented them with framed, autographed pictures of the State House. "I had them framed this morning because I find unframed pictures rarely get hung," commented the state's First Lady.

Mrs. Mayes and Mrs. dePasquale (just returned from a short vacation in Europe) received with their husbands. Sharing hostess duties were committee members Duchess Anna von Leuchtenberg de Beauharnais, Mrs. Louis W. Cabot, Mrs. Norman L. Cahners, Mrs. Richard A. Ehrlich, Mrs. Henry Dunster Howe, Mrs. William Ray Kitchel, Mrs. Serge Koussevitsky, Mrs. Ellis Little, Mrs. Albert Clement Titcomb and Mrs. Frank Weinstein.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sentinel (e)
KEENE, N. H.
Circ. 7,894
FEB 21 1964

Cause For Pride

A thrill of pride must have run through Keene and some neighboring communities last Saturday, when the Sentinel published the story that Michael Vitale had, at 21, been selected as a member of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

Behind the story of Michael's leap into the top ranks of American musicians lies another story involving many people and many organizations in this area.

Michael supplied the talent, the self-sacrifice, the hours of disciplined practice, the determination and the ambition. His family, including his young wife, backed him up to the fullest. His teachers, the late Fredyum Henrickson, Alfred Kripps and Ivan Galamian, shared their knowledge with him and gave him vital encouragement and guidance.

But in a uniquely American way the decisive financial support that Michael required to obtain the best possible musical education came from the individuals and organizations in his home town and in Dublin and Peterborough.

In other societies, artistic talent is often nurtured by the government; occasionally by very wealthy patrons. But in the United States today the young artist who lacks adequate funds too often is forced to abandon his career, because he cannot afford to continue it.

Fortunately for him, Michael's enormous potential was recognized by some of his fellow citizens when he was still a child and a few of them, under the leadership of Roland A. Whitney of Marlboro, assumed the responsibility of enlisting community support to insure that the youngster's talent had a chance to flower.

Michael gave his first Keene recital when he was nine years old under the sponsorship of a number of Keene organizations, whose members sold tickets and helped realize a net profit of nearly $1200. Other recitals with community sponsorship followed in subsequent years.

Meantime, a number of summer residents of Dublin and Peterborough also became interested in Michael's career and lent substantial support. Among them were Mrs. John C. Fremont, Mr. and Mrs. Louis C. Gerry and the late Mrs. Jane Thaw.

With this kind of help and backing from friends and neighbors, plus scholarships from music schools, plus his own efforts, young Michael gradually climbed the steep and demanding path to musical success.

His job with the Boston Symphony, beginning this fall, will provide the financial security he has never before known. At 21 he has already reached a level which many other talented youngsters never reach.

Ahead of him lie years of opportunity for further professional growth and development—and, perhaps, greatness.

The people and the organizations who have done so much for this young man are justifiably proud of him. And we, in turn, are proud of them.

New England Newsclip Agency, Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Herald (m)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 178,553
APR 15 1964

Farewell Fete for Symphony Men

A FAREWELL RECEPTION in honor of two members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra—Joseph de Pasquale and Samuel H. Mayes—will be given Monday evening, May 4, from 6 to 8 o'clock in the Sheraton Plaza's Oval Room. At their request, the proceeds after expenses will be donated to the Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The committee for the reception includes Duchess Anna von Leuchtenberg de Beauharnais, Mrs. Louis W. Cabot, Mrs. Norman L. Cahners, Mrs. Richard A. Ehrlich, Mrs. Henry Dunster Howe, Mrs. William Ray Kitchel, Mrs. Serge Koussevitzky, Mrs. Ellis Little, Mrs. Albert Clement Titcomb and Mrs. Frank Weinstein.

The Standard-Times
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
D. 65,046 S. 52,312

DEC 23 1963

Boston Musicians Accept New Posts

Special to The Standard-Times

BOSTON, Dec. 23—Two Boston Symphony string instrumentalists have accepted first-desk assignments with the Philadelphia Symphony.

Violist Joseph DePasquale and cellist Samuel Mayes will replace William Schoen and Lorne Munroe, respectively, at the end of this season.

A Philadelphia native, Mr. DePasquale will join his two brothers and a sister-in-law, also string artists with the Philadelphia group.

Mr. Mayes' assignment renews his 12-year association with the orchestra which he left, in 1948 to become principal cellist with the Boston Symphony.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Traveler (e)
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 164,299

1964

The Knickerbocker News
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 55,660

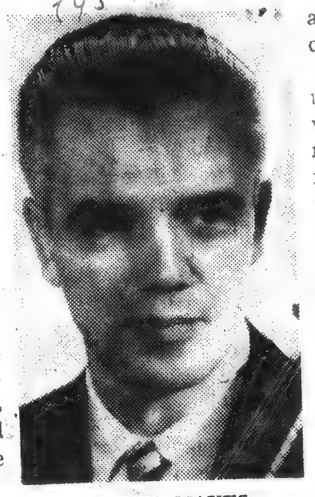
JAN 3 1964

Boston Symphony Losing Principal Cellist, Violinist

Samuel Mayes, first chair cellist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Joseph de Pasquale, principal violist with the group will join the Philadelphia Orchestra next season as permanent members of the Pennsylvania ensemble.

Both Mr. Mayes and Mr. de Pasquale are well-known to Capital District residents through their performances with the Boston Orchestra in Tanglewood's summer festival. Mr. Mayes was last seen, locally, when the cellist played a concerto with the Berkshire Community Orchestra.

For Mr. de Pasquale, the move will be a family affair. Two brothers and a sister-in-law are members of the Philadelphia Orchestra. Mr. Mayes and Mr. de Pasquale have also played and recorded much chamber music together.



SAMUEL MAYES

The move by the first chairmen from the Boston Orchestra will necessitate a search for replacements. Erich Leinsdorf, musical director of the orchestra, has announced he will audition current members of the group before going into the audition plans.

When an orchestra loses men who perform on the first chair level, it can undergo a temporary setback before the new musicians are trained in the style of their new home ensemble. It looks like an active summer on the orchestral marketplace with managements looking over the talents from each other's groups in the hopes of balancing the losses that are certain to occure. (D. L. C.)

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200

Sunday Journal
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
Circ. 193,108
JAN 5 1964

Boston Loses Mayes

Big Orchestras Raid Each Other's Ranks

New York — (UPI) — When the New York Philharmonic was in need of a super cello player it found its man playing in the Philadelphia Orchestra.

That put the Philadelphia Orchestra in need of a super cellist. It found one in the Boston Symphony—and for full measure took along a super viola player.

Thus it is that the Philadelphia Orchestra has been able to announce that Samuel Mayes, the Boston Orchestra's principal cellist, and Joseph de Pasquale, Boston's principal violist, are transferring to Philadelphia, leaving the first chairs vacant, until replacements are found, in Symphony Hall on Massachusetts Avenue.

Now the Boston Symphony is in need and if you have a super cellist or violist or any super stringed instrument player in your symphony orchestra, you're well advised to keep an eye on him.

This game of musical chairs is played for keeps. Super stringed instrument players are hard to come by, like flashy and reliable first basemen or outfielders who hit routinely in the .300s.

You can't have superlative symphonies or baseball teams without such performers. If being superlative is your endeavor—and it is the endeavor of the New York Philharmonic, the Philadelphia Orchestra and the Boston Symphony — you'll get them at whatever cost.

Even a casual glance tells you symphony orchestras don't lack for stringed instrument players. Violinists, violists, cellists and string bass men are in large numbers arrayed in banks and usually bowing or plucking in a unison that must be the envy of the Rockettes or any other chorus line.

But in each of these banks there usually are only one or two players who bat 1.000 in making their instruments "speak" with the eloquence of an orator—in sustaining with exquisitely perfect phrasing and intonation the long-drawn musical sentence.

The symphonic literature is replete with such sentences. When they come in the symphony, the orchestra suddenly is silent while one viola or one cello or one violin utters it. If this solo instrument gasps or gurgles or rasps or mumbles, the whole orchestra becomes conspicuously a poor one.

The current musical chairs among America's most celebrated orchestras began when Carl Stern, first cellist of the New York Philharmonic for many years, announced his retirement at the end of the present season.

Next came the announcement that Lorne Munroe, first cellist of the Philadelphia Orchestra for 13 years, would succeed Stern at the beginning of the 1964-65 season.

The next party heard from was the Philadelphia Orchestra. It was announced that Mayes would become its cello soloist and de Pasquale its principal violist at that time.

Where do you suppose the Boston Symphony got Mayes in the first place? Answer: From the Philadelphia Orchestra in which he had a cello first desk from 1939 to 1948.

Whereas the present shortage of superior stringed instrument players is distressing, there is much hope for the future and Munroe and his wife can take credit for it. She was a concert violist before they married and now she is the mother of 10 sons. Both parents are still under 40.

Expert stringed instrument playing runs in families. Take the de Pasquales. Joseph is going to join his brothers, Francis and William and William's wife in the Philadelphia Orchestra. Francis is a cellist; William and his wife are violinists.

There is yet another de Pasquale brother. He is Robert and he plays the violin in the New York Philharmonic. The father of these strings-playing brothers was a strings player, as you might have known.

Symphony Farewell For 2 Musicians

By PEGGY BROWN
Society Editor

Boston's loss is Philadelphia's gain. Two first desk musicians from the Boston Symphony Orchestra are leaving the Hub to join the Philadelphia Orchestra.

Musical and social friends of cellist Samuel H. Mayes and violist Joseph de Pasquale will honor them at a reception in the Oval Room of the Sheraton-Plaza at 6 p.m. on Monday, May 4.

ALL INVITED TO ATTEND

While formal invitations to this party were mailed out last week, it was not possible to send one to every Symphony subscriber. Anyone is welcome to attend, however, who knows Mayes or De Pasquale either personally or from listening to their music.

Since Symphony is so dear to the hearts of Proper Bostonians, a large turnout of local socialites is expected. A check for $5 to Ann Sargent at the Sheraton-Plaza will assure your name being placed on the door list.

While the Orchestra is losing these musicians—three of them, actually, for Mayes' wife, cellist Winifred Winograd, is going to Philadelphia, too—the coffer of the Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will gain.

Mayes and De Pasquale have asked graciously that the reception's proceeds beyond expenses be donated to the Friends.

The move is a gain for the musicians, too, and will reunite De Pasquale with his three brothers, all of whom play in the Philadelphia Orchestra. Two of them are also first chair musicians.

Socially Speaking

The "brothers four" play also as a chamber music quartet. They will now be able to practice together and schedule concerts—one in Boston in the fall, it is hoped.

Cocktails and a May Bowle will be served at the reception and the latter sounds musical as well as spring-like. It's a German concoction of Liebfraumilch, fresh strawberries and sweet woodruff!

A distinguished committee is planning the farewell party. Included is Duchess Anna von Leuchtenberg de Beauharnais, who is the mother of De Pasquale's wife, the former Princess Maria. Mrs. de Pasquale is a niece of Serge Koussevitsky whose widow is also a member of the committee.

Others are Mrs. Louis W. Cabot and Mrs. Norman L. Cahners, co-chairmen of the Council of Friends; Mrs. Richard A. Erlich, Mrs. Henry Dunster Howe, Mrs. William Ray Kitchel, Mrs. Ellis Little, Mrs. Albert Titcomb and Mrs. Frank Weinstein.

Ironically the new principal violist and cellist replacing the musicians—Jules Eskin, cello, and Burton Fine, viola—are native Philadelphians. So is Joseph de Pasquale. He's simply going home.

WEE WOMEN

"I wasn't yelling at you. I was coughing."

The Philadelphia Inquirer
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
D. 604,828 S. 1,000,980

JAN 7 1964

Cellist Mayes' Wife To Join Orchestra

Winifred Winograd, Boston Symphony Orchestra cellist, has been appointed to the Philaedlphia Orchestra for next season. She wil lreplace Samuel Belenko, who will retire at the end of the season after playing 38 years with the Orchestra.

Miss Winograd is the wife of Samuel Mayes, Boston Symphony first cellist, who was named last month as principal cellist of the Philadelphia Orchestra, succeeding Lorne Munroe next season.

The appointments gave the Orchestra its second husband-and-wife team. William de Pasquale and his wife, Barbara, are violinists with the symphony.

A native of Yakima, Wash., Miss Winograd studied at Curtis Institute with Felix Salmond and later with Gregor Piatigorsky. She was principal cellist of the Fort Wayne (Ind.) Philharmonic from 1949 to 1957, then joined the Boston Symphony. She is the first woman to have played in that orchestra's string section.

Miss Winograd auditioned for the Philadelphia post last month, before Eugene Ormandy.

ST. LOUIS POST-DISPATCH
D. 347,672 S. 564,337

DEC 22 1963

CELLIST SAMUEL MAYES IN PHILADELPHIA SYMPHONY

Special to the Post-Dispatch

PHILADELPHIA, Dec. 21—Cellist Samuel Mayes, who was born in St. Louis, has been named to the first desk in the Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra.

Mayes, a graduate of the Curtis Institute here, was a cellist with the Philadelphia Orchestra for 13 years before moving to the Boston Symphony as first cellist in 1948. His new assignment takes him from Boston to Philadelphia.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Berkshire Eagle (e)
PITTSFIELD, Mass.
Circ. 29,087
DEC 23 1963

Cellist Mayes and Violist de Pasquale Quitting BSO for Philadelphia Symphony

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

The departure of two of the principals of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the end of the coming Tanglewood season has been announced, strangely enough, by the Philadelphia Orchestra Association to which the musicians will go for the start of the 1964-65 season.

Joseph de Pasquale, principal of the viola section, and Samuel Mayes, principal of the cellos, will leave the Boston orchestra, one, De Pasquale, to return to his native city, and the other, Mayes, to rejoin the Philadelphia orchestra that he left in 1948.

Samuel Mayes

Joseph de Pasquale

Joins Brothers

De Pasquale, who is married to a niece of the late Serge Koussevitzky, will replace William Schoen, who occupied the viola spotlight in Philadelphia only one year, and, at the same, will find himself, by design and preference, working in the same orchestra with his brother Francis, who is a cellist, and his brother William, who is in the violin section. The latter's wife, Barbara, is also in the violin section to join the Philadelphians next season also. In addtion to their orchestral duties, the four brothers will form the De Pasquale String quartet, long an aspiration of the exceptional family.

Lorne Munroe, now principal cellist of Philadelphia, will join the New York Philharmonic next season to replace Carl Stern, a one-time South Mountain music colony student of the late Willem Willeke, who is retiring. His place in Philadelphia will be taken by Mayes, whose wife, Winifred Winograd, will also leave the Boston cello section for that of the Philadelphians. Mrs. Mayes' former husband has just been named conductor of the Hartford Symphony Orchestra.

The two men have been mighty pillars of the Boston Orchestra structure, and it will not be an easy task of those responsible for personnel in Boston to replace them, although trades and switches are not a novel process in musical organizations any more than they are in the big leagues of baseball.

The two Bostonians only recently scored formidable successes with their orchestra in performances of the solos in Strauss' "Don Quixote," both in Boston and New York, and there was so much favorable comment that it was hoped that there would be a recording made of the masterpiece.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Sunday Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 465,653
DEC 22 1963

De PASQUALE

MAYES

2 Departing Players Laud BSO, Leinsdorf

Two world renowned string players expressed regrets Saturday at leaving the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the end of the current season to join the Philadelphia Orchestra.

Joseph DePasquale, first viola, has been with the symphony since 1947. He came here shortly after his discharge from the Marine Corps, where he had been a trumpeter with the Marine band and a violist with the Marine Symphony.

Samuel Mayes, first cellist, will be returning to the same desk he held in Philadelphia when he joined the Boston Symphony in 1948.

De Pasquale said, "I'm leaving the Boston Symphony Orchestra so I'll be with my three brothers in the Philadelphia Orchestra. I have two brothers there now, and a third will join them next year. In that way we will be able to rehearse together often and perhaps make a name for our own string quartet. It has been something we have been planning for a long time."

He explained that he and his brothers rehearse together when they can and have performed together on a number of television shows.

He said their work with the string quartet will, of course, be an addition to their full assignments with the Philadelphia Orchestra.

Robert DePasquale is a violinist with the New York Philharmonic and will join the Philadelphia Orchestra in the Fall. The brothers already with the Philadelphia Orchestra are Francis, a cellist, and William, first violin.

Mayes said that he will get more money in Philadelphia but gave no other reason for leaving.

Mayes said of conductor, Erich Leinsdorf: "He is a great conductor, and it is a great orchestra. I leave with regrets, but I am looking forward to the future and renewing my association with the Philadelphia Orchestra."

DePasquale expressed similar sentiments. "I am leaving with great regrets. The organization has been truly wonderful to me over the years. I have great respect and admiration for Mr. Leinsdorf, the orchestra trustees and manager Thomas D. Perry."

Eugene Ormandy, conductor of the Philadelphia Orchestra, could not be reached for comment. Leinsdorf is in Nassau.

NewEnglandNewsclipAgency,Inc.
Box 2078, Boston 6 • RIchmond 2-4200
Evening Globe
BOSTON, Mass.
Circ. 146,915
DEC 21 1963

For Philadelphia

Mayes, DePasquale Leaving Symphony

By JOHN W. RILEY

Two of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's top string players will leave the orchestra at the end of the current season to join the Philadelphia Orchestra next Fall.

Thomas D. Perry, Boston Symphony manager, confirmed today the pending resignations of Samuel Mayes, first cellist, and Joseph De Pasquale, first viola.

The Boston Symphony season runs through the Berkshire Festival which ends in August.

Mayes thus returns to the post he held with the Philadelphia Orchestra when he joined the Boston Symphony in the Fall of 1948.

Mayes, who is part Cherokee Indian, will become first cellist of the Philadelphia Orchestra, while De Pasquale will become first violist.

De Pasquale joined the Boston Symphony in 1947, not long after he was discharged from the Marines. He had been a trumpeter with the Marine Band, and a violist with the Marine Symphony.

Both men studied their principal instrument at the Curtis Institute of Music in Philadelphia.

